"Das Stundenbuch" was published in 1905; it is in three parts, written at different times, and entitled respectively "Vom römischen Leben," "Von der Pilgerschaft" and "Von der Armut und dem Tode." The whole book is the imaginative expression of a Russian monk's search for God—it was commenced in Russia —and shows, what was not so apparent in "Das Buch der Bilder," the character of the poet's religious and mystical ideas. It is in these ideas, perhaps, that we find the chief distinction between Rilke and Hofmannsthal, from whose work there is by no means so plain a philosophy to be deduced. "Das Stundenbuch" has been called a "prayer-book." Its basis is a kind of philosophy of immanence. "Beside me," says the poet, addressing God, "Thou hast no home in which warm, familiar words may greet Thee.

Rilke's fame rests on his poetry. But he has also written prose stories and attempted the dramatic form. Both activities are also faithfully dealt with by M. Faesi, whose book, both as a carefully-written and necessary piece of biography and as a study of a poet by a poet, should certainly be read by all who wish to study modern German poetry. A Rilke is not just a writer whose reputation may be transitory; his work seems certain of a permanent place in twentieth-century German literary history. If this proves to be so, M. Faesi's study will deserve to stand beside it.

We are desired by the Committee for the Summer School of Theology, which is to be held in July at the School of Theology, Oxford, to call the special attention of our readers to the interdenominational character of the meeting.
A GLIMPSE AT MEDIAEVAL ISLAM

MARRAKECH DANS LES PALMES. Par André Chevrillon. (Paris, Calmann-Lévy. 4fr. 90.)

W

E in England know M. Chevrillon best by his English studies. We have a tenderness for him because he has paid us more attention than any other living French author, and because, apparently, the more he examines us the better he likes us. We know him as the critic of Sydney Smith and Ruskin, and, what interests us considerably more in these days, as the author of the best study of Mr. Rudyard Kipling that has yet appeared. We remember his flattering pictures of our army organization in war.

But M. Chevrillon has always had another "line," the East, and particularly Islam. To this he now returns in "Marrakech dans les Palmes." The scene of his new study is not, in fact, the East; for Morocco is actually, though it is not easy to realize it, further West than Land's End. It is the Western outpost of Islam, and the last stronghold of pure African Islam, untouched by Europe. M. Chevrillon has played the part of an intelligent and enterprising reporter. He paid in March, 1913, a long visit to Marrakech, which had been taken by the French six months before, seizing his opportunity to examine a society of which Madame had returned it to the zenith of Moorish power in Spain, that had remained unchanged ever since, and that was now inevitably to undergo a transformation. He returned to it towards the end of the war, to note that the transformation had already commenced, though one of the greatest administrators of modern times, General Lyauty, had done all that was in his power to save the old civilization.

M. Chevrillon has gone to his task in a fashion as painstaking as enthusiastic. He has pictured for us in minute detail that arrested world, its architecture (including the famous Tower of Kootoubia, sœur illustre de la tour Hassan, de Rabat, et de la Giraldal, de Séville 1), its music and dances, its literature, its commerce, its daily life, from that of the great Moorish chieftains, like the barons of "Ivanhoe," to the holy beggars squating in the sunshine. He has a most vivid power of description, a brilliancy and softness of style that recall that of M. Pierre Loti discussing similar themes. Hear him, for example, on the gardens of the Aguelal:

Plus rien que le soleil et l'azur, et les peuplés de beaux oliviers, et les palmiers surgiants, et l'arôme embaumé des étoiles de cire, entre les rangs et les rangs des clairs feuillages vernis ; et le feu des jeunes fleurs promettant les grenades, et aussi les chants, les trilles, les subites querelles des grives et des merles. Et, pardessous ces changeantes sonorités, tout est présent, comme une âme évanouie dans du bonheur, et qui flotte avec les nappes de parfums, la rumeur endormie des invisibles colombes 1.

On a retrouvé la prime jeunesse du monde ; et quelle paix, quelle sécurité, quel pur oubli de tout : on oublierait ici la mort, dont l'ombre n'a jamais passé sur ces lieux. Seulement la perfection de la vie, de son moment suprême : jeunes floraisons, frais éclats, beauté, volupté. Et ce divin moment, on dirait qu'il est fixé pour toujours, que cet enchantement, rien ne viendra le dissiper ou le rompre.

But it is Loti with a difference. M. Chevrillon is in some sort an apostle of French Imperialism. He turns from the beauties of Marrakech to contrast the French power with its rather hard eyes the rise of French power. Regretful that certain grave splendors must pass, regarding with horror the ugliness and debauchery of Casablanca, where European civilization is installing itself with such unpleasant companions, he has yet small sympathy for the efforts of the Moroccans to preserve their world from the Roumi. He records without comment how the wretched defenders of the city of Morocco, armed with a few Winchesters and many charms, were mown down, line after line, by the machine-guns. But the citizens of Morocco, according to him, are well content with the new régime. At least they have accepted it as easily as every other dynasty in their history. All Government comes from God. The only point to be considered in their eyes is the relative severity or gentleness of the ruler, and they have found Lyauty the most just and indulgent they have known. They relate with pride how the Resident General, in the midst of the feast at the feast of Moual Idries, placed twenty-five gold pieces in the brass mouth outside the sanctuary; how he received a special invitation from the Imans to cross the sacred threshold, and how he refused it.

It was by this decent respect for the feelings of her subjects, coupled with the cool audacity of her Pro-Consul, that France held Morocco throughout the war with a handful of men.

C. F.

M. MAX JACOB

LA DÉFENSE DE TARTUFFE. Par Max Jacob. (Paris, Société Littéraire de France.)

"EXTASES, Remords, Visions, Prières, Poèmes et Méditations d'un Juif Converti"—this is the qualifying sub-title of M. Jacob's book. It is a collection of odds and ends, of fragments thrown out by the spasmodic eruption of a very peculiar mind. Here we have a piece of self-confession, here a poem, here a vision, here a loud snigger, and here the Christian penitent's spasm of remorse. In M. Jacob we find the curious phenomenon of a mystic, passionately sincere, but who cannot help perceiving that, seen from certain angles, religion can look very like an enormous joke. "Quand l'oeil gauche me dérange, je crois que j'ai mort.; tout à l'heure, j'ai eu une crise de larmes au Sacré-Cœur et pourtant l'oeil gauche me dérangeait; comment dire cela au Père?" How indeed? We are not surprised when we read a little later on: "Mes amis prennent ma conversion pour une farce un peu plus corse que les autres. Mon parrain dit qu'il m'appellerait 'Fiacre.'" And so it goes on, this spiritual drama, so important, so tragic and so very nearly a farce of gigantic proportions. It has its moments of thrilling intensity. Here is one of the scenes, curiously nightmarish and disquieting:

L'orgie est au Sud! L'orgie est à Montparnasse! dans un atelier est l'orgie de Montparnasse. Qui est là? Ouvrez! C'est le professeur! C'est la bavure. Ils ont traversé l'escalier, ils se sont rangés au fond. "Qui est là?—Ouvrez! C'est le bon Dieu!" Tout le monde est plein d'effroi! Entrez, mon Seigneur. Or ce n'était que le commissaire de police, un vilain moustachu avec sa ceinture.

One could go on quoting indefinitely, picking out a fragment here and there from the heap; and indeed this is the only method by which we can criticize M. Jacob's work. For the book cannot be considered as a whole: it is a conglomeration of isolated units. And it is here that one perceives the inherent weakness of M. Jacob's talent—his incapacity to keep up an ordered train of thought, to conceive on a large scale, to build, to compose. We must take him for what he is, a spasmodic thinker, a poet of lyrical fragments, but fragments that are often of a remarkable beauty.

"Max Jacob, enchanteur et poète"—the phrase is André Salmon's. When one has read "La Défense de Tartuffe" one cannot help feeling that in some queer, rather grotesque way M. Jacob deserves the title.
LETTERS FROM ITALY

VIII. HISTORICAL AND POLITICAL STUDIES

In order to vary these letters of mine, I shall leave literature alone for a while. I have still to speak of a number of other writers, of Deledda, Papini, the Futurists and the more recent playwrights, who will return later. At the moment I propose to give the British public some account of movements of a more scientific nature. I shall begin with history.

"La Storia della Storiografia in Italia nel Secolo XIX.," which Croce has been publishing in La Critica since 1915, affords a rich novel, a novel of investigation. The identity of philosophy and history, which Idealism claims as its greatest mental conquest—or which is at least the height of its aspirations—is here put into practice in a conception of the writing of history that coincides absolutely with the development of philosophy, and indeed appears as something inseparable from it.

The appearance of Positivism in Italy in the second half of the nineteenth century resulted in a strange mixture of history and anti-history, of enthusiasm for facts and of the passive acceptance of theological tradition. The last idealist school of history, the Neo-Guelphs, had perished in the general downfall of thought. But the Positivists, with which it dealt and the ideals that inspired it were handed on to the pioneers of the new movement. Ferrari, who, in many ways anticipated Positivist history, or who is at least a link between the Guelphs and the Positivists, modelled the negations and antitheses of his "Histoire des Révolutions d'italie," his "History of Italy," on the Guelphs. He substituted Fatality for Providence as the dynamic power in history, and he imagined the course of human events to be influenced by "fatal antipathies," natural and invincible as the dyads in systems of theology. But there was no God, either as beginning or end of the process. The Guelph and Ghibelline system, a theological phantasmagoria, became a science in the professional and impersonal meaning of the term. Two opposite tendencies, which are none the less identical in their very opposition, mark both the historical and, generally, the philosophical work of the age of Positivism. On the one hand, there was the desire for a detailed investigation of the bare facts, rejecting all assistance from ideas and all contact with actual political interests; on the other hand, thought, humiliated and discredited in vain, indulged in fantastic system-building, setting up a theology and idolatry of facts, and exchanging with them empty, abstract chimeras. Marselli, in his "Scienza della Storia" (1873), followed in the footsteps of Comte, and distinguished the theological phase, metaphysical phase, and finally a scientific phase of history. Antonio Spaventa elaborated Positivism, with which this triad, which had little that was scientific or Positivist about it, lost the different phases of history-writing on an a priori basis. Other writers, on the contrary, while avoiding assumptions that were too obviously theological in character, timidly inserted their reflections among the events, and, being unable to fuse the two into a whole, they delivered abstract judgments, condemnations or acuittals on humanitarian, moral or Catholic principles, which they waved like banners over the grey fabric of their bald narrative.

In the earlier period, when party feeling, whether Neo-Guelph or Neo-Ghibelline, humanitarian or Federalist, ran high, historical subjects had been clearly defined and kept within the radius of actual political interests. But they now became extraordinarily varied and chaotic. The investigations of the new generation of scholars were inspired by no higher purpose than literary curiosity for the unpublished document a desire to utilize and display their skill and training in research, which had then become the touchstone by which all literary ability was tried. The ideal of these ploughmen of thought was to break up as many fields as possible, preferably those which had been least cultivated, to reap the scanty harvest they promised. But though this purely philological method often produced results that were strange and inconclusive, the work of the new generation possessed at least one sound characteristic—a characteristic that gave Positivist philosophy, in spite of its obvious inferiority in culture and equipment as compared with other contemporary movements, the originality which brought new life and an element of progress to the study of philosophy. This was the essential immanence of the thought, the tendency not to go outside the data, but to explain them by themselves. This element, freed from the coarse accretions of Positivism, left the germs of a higher philosophy of Positivism, and, even under the cloak it then wore, it made a firm stand against the abstract and arbitrary tendencies of the metaphysical systems of the day. As Croce well puts it, the detailed rules of philosophy, the refusal to allow a man to write on a historical subject without being acquainted with its literature, were mere "the translation of an historical character into the historical character of thought and of every form of activity, which becomes more truly original, free and individual, the closer it is linked to the work of others and the work of the past."

The upholders of this philological method, the so-called "pure historians," may be divided into two generations, a division which possesses not merely a chronological, but also a mental, significance. The first generation adopted, or rather imposed, the philological method—writers who had already fought under other flags and brought to the new school, often in their own despite, a sense of the great problems that had taken their rise in the earlier philosophical education. Thus Villari, Malfatti, De Lava and Comparetti succeeded in relieving the dullness of pure historical Positivism because they had been brought up in a richer and more varied school of thought, and a profession of philological realism gave a new sense of concrete solidity and reality. But the second generation of pure historians was born amid different surroundings, in the philological schools founded by the earlier generation. More thoroughly purged of all extraneous influences, it is also drier and more colourless. Its unrelied nakedness reveals the defects of a purely philological method cut off from all organic conceptions of life. Thus from De Lava to his pupil Cipolla, from Comparetti to Graf, from Malfatti to Crivellucci, we are rushing down an ever steeper decline. As history rejects every element of history, we find ourselves on one side the bare facts; on the other, superimposed and almost forced upon them, the comments. The dreary moralizing and the Catholicism of Cipolla, the scholarly and academic outlook of Graf, the reduction of history to sterile negations by Pais, combined with the learned and detailed philological equipment of these writers, show the detached and scattered results of a lifeless analytical method working on lines diametrically opposed to those of true history.

Alfredo Oriani led a lively, spirited reaction against this colourless philological method during the last decade of last century. His attitude in historical, and, generally speaking, in moral and political, science is very similar to that taken up by the English, and by Francesco De Sanctis in aesthetics and literary criticism towards the same enemy. Like the two great Southerners, the Romagnol writer passed almost unnoticed in his own generation, which was ill fitted to understand him. This affected not only his fame, but also the organic development of his thought, upon which the alien character and the indifference of the world around him rested like a dead, stifling weight. Hence the endless intricacies, the inequalities, the uneven and emphatic method of progress, which generally characterize men who are before their time—that is, all those who fail to establish a satisfactory mental balance, and who are incapable of a sympathetic and intelligent intercourse with the world around them. Such men are condemned to a wearing work of self-criticism and to an excessive expenditure of mental energy upon the purely negative task of resistance.

To be continued.

Guido de Ruggiero.
List of New Books
Prepared in co-operation with the Library Association.

The method of classification adopted is a series of groups roughly corresponding with the Dewey Decimal System, the sub-classes being indicated, for the benefit of librarians and others familiar with the system, by the class-numbers given at the end of each entry. The first number in these represents the main class, the second one of the subdivisions, and so on.

Those works in the List which appear most suitable for purchase by Public Library Authorities are marked with an asterisk.

100 PHILOSOPHY.

In six courageous essays the author makes suggestions which, starting as they must prove to some, demand early and serious consideration. Denouncing the reckless and disastrous marriages which are a feature of the time, and wishing to maintain the dignity of true marriages, in which the husband and wife are joined together in sentiment and thought, Mrs. Hartley not only urges that marriage in the first place should be conditional upon the man and the woman having been engaged for a fixed and sufficiently long period, but also advocates free divorce by mutual desire and arrangement, after sufficient deliberation, if the union should prove to have been a failure. The proposal in the sixth essay, that there should be an "open recognition of honourable sexual partnerships outside of marriage," will probably meet with greater opposition, but the author's arguments are forceful. The suggestion in the penultimate paper, that illegitimate children should be protected by being placed in the same position of advantage as they would have had if legally born, will find a large number of supporters. So also will some of the recommendations in the fourth essay, relating to "regulation and protection in suppressing prostitution." The book is well worth reading.

Kelly (Alfred Davenport). The Claims of Spiritualism: can they be harmonized with science, morals and religion? Wells Gardner [1920]. 6 in. 96 pp. app. (bibliog.) paper, 1/6 n. 133.9

A concise and temperate summary and review, by a clergyman of the Church of England, of the arguments for and against spiritualism. Mr. Kelly believes that the arguments for spiritualism "are unsatisfactory," and declares that "Christianity and spiritualism are in the long run mutually exclusive."

A series of well-written and thought-stimulating essays by the Vice-President of the Theosophical Society. The substance of several of them has appeared in the Nineteenth Century, the Theosophist, Lucifer, and elsewhere.

200 RELIGION.

In this, the second Memorial Lecture on the Arthur Davis foundation, under the auspices of the Jewish Historical Society of England, Mr. Herford discusses the fact of the continuous existence and influence of Judaism; shows that the human race in general, and Christianity in particular, "would have been much the poorer if there had not been that presence and influence," and proceeds to the conclusion that for the benefits which have been wrought by Judaism during all the centuries of Christian ascendency "the world is indebted, directly or indirectly, to the Pharisees."

*Hope (Sir William St. John) and Atchley (E. G. Cuthbert F.). An Introduction to English Liturgical Colours. S.P.C.K., 1920. 7 in. 91 pp. app. index, 3/6 n. 247.7

A succinct treatment of the subject which was fully dealt with by the authors in their larger work, published in 1918. At the end of the present volume is a table of liturgical colours, setting forth what, in the judgment of the authors, represents "the general usage of the Church of England in pre-Reformation days."

Williams (Michal). Christian Symbols. Talbot & Co. [1919]. 6 in. 93 pp. ill. index, 2/6 n. 248

In this exceedingly useful elementary handbook such Christian symbols as the lamb, lion, nimbus, vesica piscis, the various types of crosses, the labarum, and the dove are described clearly and succinctly. Numerous examples of uses of the symbols are cited; and there are 77 illustrations.

300 SOCIOLOGY.

Blackie's Complete Course of Manuscript Writing. Blackie, 1919. 8 in. 24 pp. il. paper, 4d. n. 372.5

This and Miss Golds' "A Guide to the Teaching of Manuscript Writing" (see below) are companion works.

Fairgrieve (J.) and Young (Ernest). The Old World ["Harv. Geographer", Book 8]. Philip & Son, 1919. 7 in. 178 pp. ill. maps, 2/ n. 372.8

"Facts have been chosen to illustrate principles, and not to compile a juvenile gazetteer." This sentence from the introductory note well conveys the basic idea of the authors of these excellent geographies. The illustrations are as admirable as the text.

The system described is "an attempt to revive, in a simplified form, the beautiful manuscript writing of bygone years." The results depicted are exceedingly attractive; and it is stated that by the methods suggested young children can learn to write without any undue effort.

Written down during a period of two years with the A.I.F., this record of personal experiences attempts to show how other people's minds work in the insulated world of active military service, and illustrates the human side of a soldier's life, which embraces many tasks, some of which call for sterling qualities of character, if not for courage. The illustrations are by Bombardier M. M. Waller.

Mr. Hendy, who is Head of the Department of Training in the University of Oxford, explains in this lecture how the system of training must be reorganized to meet the situation created by the Education Act of 1918. The Continuation Schools will require teachers who possess, besides academic qualifications, a knowledge of the industrial conditions under which their pupils, who will already be wage-earners, pass their lives when not at school. A great number of Secondary School teachers will also be called for. Mr. Hendy lays down the principles on which the training of teachers should be based, and gives some details of the organization of training in the University.

The first of a series of three books, this volume is intended to cover the arithmetical work of the second, third, and fourth grades. The three main principles which have guided the authors are the selection and organization of subject-matter, derivation and application, and motivation. The numerous illustrations are very helpful.

Socialism, said the late Jack London, writing these studies in 1905, is based not upon the equality, but upon the inequality of men. It demands no new birth into spiritual purity. It deals with what is, not with what ought to be; its material is the "clay of the common mould." The last chapter gives the reasons for the author's conversion to Socialism. He compares United States conditions with those of Britain, and in "The Tramp" paints a heart-breaking picture of the sweating system.

The cases are accompanied by a scholarly introduction, extending over more than a hundred pages, and divided into two parts, the first of which deals with the Council as a court, its jurisdiction, procedure, and the like. The second part consists of notes on the cases. Mr. Leatham having died, the work has been completed by his American colleague.

Stocker (R. Dimsdale). What's Wrong with the Middle Classes? Palmer & Hayward [1919]. 7 in. 55 pp. paper. 6d. n. 323.32

Whether the Middle Classes will listen to and digest the homily addressed to them by their candid friend the author is very doubtful, but it would do them a world of good. "If you have anything to lose except your job, depend upon it you are a member of the Middle Class." The Middle Class has arrived at the parting of the ways. Hitherto it has been a hanger-on to the fringes of the aristocracy and a creature of Capitalism. It has found temporary salvation in Conservatism, or justification in Liberalism of an individualist cast. Too snobbish hitherto to seek safety and a social destiny in the Labour Party, it must now make up its mind to be merged in one thing or the other.

*Weston (Jessie L.). From Ritual to Romance. Cambridge, 1919. 9 in. 209 pp. index. 12/6 n. 398.2

See review, p. 365.

Young (Filion), ed. The Trial of Hawley Harvey Crippen. Edited, with notes and an introduction, by Filson Young ("Notable Trials Series"). W. Hodge & Co. [1920]. 9 in. 247 pp. il. por. apps., 10/6 343.1

Much of the evidence in this painstaking case presents points of interest to tocollogists. In the introduction it is shown that Dr. Crippen was once thought to have murdered his wife; and that one of the children whom he was suspected of having murdered, had in fact never been abroad with the accused husband.

The editor remarks that "most honest men, finding themselves in the situation in which he (Crippen) ultimately found himself, for whatever reason, and tried by the tests by which he was tried, would be glad to come out of them half so well," and, further, that "acts of gross moral obliquity may march with conduct above the ordinary standards—conduct which, if we wish to be just, as we hope for justice to ourselves, should be remembered and recorded no less than the crime."

500 Natural Science.

An elaborate descriptive monograph, with 156 beautiful plates.

A piece of work emanating from the Oxford School of Forestry, and published with the assistance of the Development Commission, this will no doubt be accepted as the standard book on the subject. Mr. Hiley has investigated the diseases of the common larch, especially the larch canker, which has ruined many plantations, and he puts forward many remedies. He gives excellent advice on soils and the treatment of larch plantations, and the plates illustrating the book are first-rate.

This paper (read December 13, 1917) was a preliminary study of the experiments and results set forth at greater length in "The Palaeolithic Man," noticed in The Athenæum of January 2 last.

See review, p. 301.

800 LITERATURE.

Blackie's French Plain Texts. Blackie [1919]. 6½ in. 26, 40, 35, 28, 37, 23 pp. paper, 4d. each. 840.8

Several editions of the following and other famous French works, suitable for school use: La Fontaine, "Shorter Fables"; Dumas, "Jaco, ou le Brigand"; Michelet, "Jeanne d'Arc"; Balzac, "Un Épisode sous la Terreur"; and A. Daudet, "Lettres de mon Moulin: Contes Choisis," and "La Dernière Classe."

The editors' idea is to give boys a grasp of Caesar's work as a whole, by providing a translation of about two pages of Caesar into English for every page left in Latin. Considerable portions will thus be read in English, and pupils who are struggling with the difficulties of the language will become accustomed with Caesar's story. The English passages, moreover, may be useful for translation into Latin prose.

The papyri of which this volume contains translations are the oldest Jewish writings in existence, apart from the Bible and one or two inscriptions. They come from a "hitherto unknown colony" of Jews at Elephantine and Syene, and cover practically the whole of the fifth century B.C. These texts are of special interest, and a remarkable feature is the complete silence as to some of the fundamental facts of Jewish history and religion. For example, there is "not the faintest allusion to the Sabbath, nor to the Law."

The Australian padre has kept this amusing record of the game competitions, contests of skill and other pastimes with which his Aussies entertained themselves at the front. The best, to our taste, are the twisted proverbs, such as "Never put off to-day what you must put on to-morrow—sleep in.""

An officer, half-modernized by the life in the trenches, treats the lady who wants to break off their engagement as Fielding's Lord Fulham tried to treat Sophia; but the lady still holds out, and seeks safety with her Socialist lover. But "the Dawn," "the Revolution," "the Future," offer no truer freedom for her woman's soul than the time-honored conventions; and there ensues a Shavian conflict between the idealist and a more human lover, in which the latter wins. It is a clever pamphlet play, but there is more speculating than dialogue.

Jacob (Max). La Défense de Tartuffe. Paris, Société Littéraire de France, 1919. 6½ in. 215 pp. 844.9

See review, p. 318.

"Much learning ahead of experience makes the person a public nuisance." "Mirth is the human passion heaven loves..." The most disturbing sound to the ear of God is "the laughter without a mirth; it was the noise the devil made when he was turned out." "Faith is the sublime attitude of the soul face to face with the impossible." These are samples from this small collection of thoughts.
Mencken (H. L.), A BOOK OF BURLESQUES. New York, Knopf [1920]. 8 in. 237 pp., $2. 818.5

Strikingly miscellaneous in form, but less so in matter, is this set of dialogues, dramas without words, extracts from memoirs of the Devil, short stories, mock aphorisms, and skits on musical programme-makers. Mr. Mencken is a clever and witty satirist, with an encyclopedic knowledge of the latest crazes and imbecilities, particularly of his countrymen and countrywomen. Cheops, in "The Visionary," is a shrewd hit at the modern world. "My idea was to make it the boss pyramid of the world. The king who tries to beat it will have to get up pretty early in the morning. . . ." But the hero of one, first and last, a three thousand and set me back at least six months." He is referring to one of the strikes that broke out at intervals. And after recounting what he had done for labour, the ancient captain of industry repines: "People will think of Cheops as a heartless old rapscallion—me, mind you! Can you beat it?"

Sound literary taste and considerable charm of style are the characteristics of these essays. Miss Wordsworth elaborates a contrast between Dante and Goethe. In "Behind the Scenes" she tries to correct the popular idea that the real life of the actor is often a painful antithesis to what he appears on the stage. She sums up admirably the refined art of Jane Austen, and shows how Browning's "Fra Lippo Lippi" expounds the aspirations and artistic canons of Andrea del Sarto. Other essays are on Ruskin, flattery, the English character, etc.

POETRY

Alcock (J. A. M.). PRIMAL AIRS. Allen & Unwin, 1920 7/1 in. 56 pp. paper, 3/1 n. 821.9

Mr. Alcock's poetry is a thing of solemn thunders. Sometimes the thunders have the genuine Olympian or Sinaetic ring; but at others something seems to go wrong, and we become aware that it is no thunder that we are listening to, but the rumbling of a drum perished at the west end.

Wouldst thou with lumbering satyrs in dures
Decline once more in anguish unannealed?

Under that stroke the drum's eastward end also threatens to give way.

See notice, p. 306.

Clark (Alfred). THE MAGGART BOOK. Lane, 1919. 7/1 in. 201 pp., 5/1 n. 821.9

"Peter, who tells his own tale (in italicized prose), has been in love with Margaret since she was a child, and now, a convalescent from trench-fever, is staying at her home, where they become engaged and married before he returns to France. Margaret writes down what he dreams in his delirium, and this and other material yields a quantity of fluent, sentimental, and fancifully humorous verse.

Field (M. G.). AMBUSH AND SONG. Heath Cranton [1920] 7 in. 36 pp., 4/6 n. 821.9

The first line of the first poem in Captain Field's book may be taken as a cleft mark that tells us the key in which the whole volume has been tuned:

When fleecy cloudlets blush athwart the sky . . .

An adagio opening; but the music brightens up later, and we get an allegretto of elves and fairies:

How they skip and pass
On the velvet grass.
Footing it in and out so sprightly!

The diapason closes full with three poems entitled "Death," "Evening" and "Vale."

This is a short bibliographical account of the quarto "Fugitive Pieces" (Newark, 1806) and the small octavo, "Poems on Various Occasions" (Newark, 1807), which are now exceedingly rare, the impression having been recalled by the poet when exception was taken to the fourteen stanzas entitled "To Mary."

Sappho.

Way (Arthur H.), tr. SAPPHO; AND THE VIGIL OF VENUS. Macmillan, 1920. 7/1 in. 36 pp., 3/6 n. 884.2 and 874

Dr. Way's version of Sappho is marréd—so it seems to us—by occasional unnecessary amplifications of the original. Thus where Sappho simply wrote: "The moon has set, and the Pleiades too; midnight: time passes, and I lie alone," Dr. Way translates as follows:

The moon has dipt into the sea:
The Pleiads' westerning flight is flown:
Deep midnight's pall hangs heavily:
The time fleets by: and I—ah me!—Lie on my couch alone, alone!

This rather overrich form of expression is more suitable to the translation of the "Pervigilium Veneris" which follows the fragments of Sappho. There are fine things in Dr. Way's version. We could wish, however, that he had found a better rendering of "Cras amet qui nunquam amavit, quique amavit crus amet," than "To moron who ne'er hath loved shall love, and who hath loved shall love tomorrow."

Sedgwick (Henry Dwight). DANTE: A LECTURE [Sic] ON THE DIVINE COMEDY. New Haven, Conn., Yale Univ. Press, 1918 (siz.) 7/1 in. 201 pp., 6/6 n. 885.15

In this fact for the times Mr. Sedgwick leaves learning on one side, and concerns himself with Dante as a poet and a believer in eternal righteousness. What book can claim the second place for Western nations except the "Divine Comedy?" In height, depth, and amplitude of thought, in ethical, philosophical, and religious interest, in intensity and variety of thought and drama, no other poem or other work of literature can match this of Dante's. The author endeavours to put the reader in imagination by Dante's side, and enable him to comprehend the hopes, beliefs, and passions of his time.

Wolfe (Humbert). LONDON SONNETS ("Adventurers All," 27). Oxford, Blackwell, 1920. 7/1 in. 64 pp. paper, 2/6 n. 821.9

The London Sonnets which give this book its title are for the most part dramatic monologues in Cockney. After reading them one is left wondering why Mr. Wolfe should have chosen this particular form. "Nuns fret not at their convent's narrow room," but old-clothes-sellers and fried-fish-shop-men find it hard to do themselves justice within the sonnet's scanty plot of ground. Mr. Wolfe's most successful poem is an essay in the manner and matter of Hood's "Bridge of Sighs," which he calls "The Dead Man in the Pool." "Sometimes when I think of love" contains some charming lines; and there are felicities of expression in some of the sonnets on love and war which fill the second half of the volume.

FICTION.

This characteristic study of a fine nature revealed to its depths by the ordeal of a slanderous charge first appeared in 1912.

"Now for the first time published," this readable story deals with incidents in the career of one Paget Kingsley, an emigrant to Sydney, who becomes a partner in various triumphs of a well-known trainer, wins an exciting hurdle race, and marries the widow of a reprobate, whose violent end the reader cannot bring himself to deplore.

Kavanagh (Colman). THE SYMBOLISM OF "WUTHERING HEIGHTS." Long [1920]. 7/1 in. 30 pp. paper, 9d.n. 823.89

No doubt Emily Brontë did find inspiration in such truths as "To know all is to pardon all," and "Love is heaven, and heaven is love"; but the author of this well-written paper goes rather far in discovering a whole scheme of symbolism and moral probation in her "grand prose poem."
March 5, 1920

THE ATHENÆUM

232

Maindron (Maurice). LE TOURNOI DE VAULPLASSANS ("Bibliothèque Plon"). Paris, Plon-Nourrit [1920]. 7¾ in. 234 pp. paper. 2fr. 84.39

A cheap edition of this brilliant novel of adventure in the sixteenth century, in the times of the Huguenot wars.

It is extremely sad that, at the early age of 41, a fatal disease should have struck down the author of this charming delineation of a little boy's outlook upon life. A peculiar subtlety and directness of touch, art which is transmutable into arsness, and a deep insight into the psychology of the young child are shining qualities of "Running Wild." Bertram Smith clearly recalled his early boyhood; and the book is obviously by a man "who knew." Strikingly well-founded, for instance, are the remarks as to the inanity of "many grown up people's" ponderous and patronizing jokes with children: "But these jesters were profoundly wrong. There is nothing comic about being a child. The very first necessity is that he should be taken seriously. If you are going to treat him like a monkey or a kitten, you are lost, even while you are proclaiming how fond you are of children. And, far from being easy to amuse him, it is an event so rare and precious that if you have once succeeded in it you have taken a long stride toward winning the great possession of his confidence."

The little boy's meditations upon Santa Claus, his views of "Reformation," and the account of "The Little House that I Found" are delightful. So are the chapters on "Relations" and "Competition." The latter is especially true to life.

Mr. Smith's work will be missed by readers as greatly as his personality is mourned by his friends.

910 GEOGRAPHY, TOPOGRAPHY, ANTIQUITIES.

Butler (Samuel). ALPS AND SANCTUARIES OF THE CANTON TIICINO. Fifield. 1920. 7½ in. 335 pp. il. index, 7½ n. 914.94

The second impression of Mr. Fifield's new edition of this delightful book. We have seldom found ourselves so wholly in agreement with the opinions on the dust-cover as in this case. We confirm our own previously expressed opinion that "it is as good as the "Note-Books""; we agree with the Times that "anyone who wished to make Butler's acquaintance should begin with this book," with Sir W. Robertson Nicoll that "it is perhaps Butler's best book," with the Observer that "it is the best of travel books since 'Etohn.'" Only the Pall Mall Gazette with its verdict "as full of laughter as 'Hudibras'" in its notice of the reviewer had ever read "Hudibras." Something is wrong in that comparison. There is laughter in "Hudibras"; there is laughter in "Alps and Sanctuaries"; but never were two laughters more different. In spite of this, we greet with satisfaction the evidence of a steady demand for one of the finest livres de chevet in the English language.

See review, p. 318.

920 BIOGRAPHY.

Mrs. Agassiz's greatest work was her part in the growth and development of the college for women which became known as the "Harvard Annex" and later as Radcliffe College. In memory of Anne Radcliffe, afterwards Lady Mowbray, a seventeenth-century pioneer of higher education for women. Of this flourishing institution the widow of Professor Louis Agassiz was for many years the honoured President. Mrs. Agassiz wrote her husband's biography, and died at a very advanced age on June 27, 1887. She was a great and experienced teacher of girls, and, according to Professor W. W. Goodwin, possessed "almost unerring practical wisdom" and "unfailing common sense."

Turnbull (William Peever). Turnbull (Herbert Weston). SOME MEMORIES OF WILLIAM PEEVER. TURNBULL, ONE OF HIS MAJESTY'S INSPECTORS OF SCHOOLS. Bell, 1919. 9 in. 228 pp. por. index, 10/6 n. 920

Second Wrangler, Second Smith's Prize-man, and holder of a second class in the Classical Tripos, William Peever Turnbull was well qualified to fill the post he held, that of Chief Inspector of Schools for the N.E. Division of England. Modesty, detachment from convention, and breadth of vision were notable elements in his character. A genius for friendship was another. Mr. Turnbull, who died in 1917, witnessed the riots at Mitchelstown in 1887, was a Liberal in politics, was strongly opposed to the South African War, "and, it is to be hoped, is not a Bolshevik." The memoir preceding these extracts from Mr. Villiers' correspondence, and the letters themselves, show that he was a combination of the mystic and the "born soldier." He was a cheerful, amiable, and imbued with the spirit of renunciation. The words "a Christian and a good soldier" well describe him. Mr. Villiers (whose father was Sir Francis Hyde Villiers, now British Ambassador to Belgium) was born in 1886, and educated at Wellington College and at Magdalen College, Oxford, where he graduated with double honours. He lost his life while taking part in the capture of Bourlon Wood by the 40th British Infantry Division.

930-990 HISTORY.

Princess Cantacuzène, who was a personal friend of the Romanovs, relates—conscientiously, and, as she believes, without prejudice or bias—the story of what she herself witnessed (July, 1914—1917). In Raspoutine she sees symbolized the worst, and in the Grand Duke Nicholas the best, of Old Russia. Raspoutine she calls the first example of the mentality that triumphs in Russia to-day. He was a tool of conspirators, and she regards the Bolshevism as the tool of the infernal demons.

Hobson (H. W.). A SURVEY OF MODERN HISTORY. Blackie, 1919. 8 in. 294 pp. maps, appx. index, 6/6 n. 940.9

A bright and vigorous book, dealing with the century which began at Waterloo. It often disposes of difficult questions in a manner that suggests the style of Lord Fisher, but it has some of the best maps for educational purposes that we have ever seen, and its general conclusions are brevy and wholesome.

J. CHILDREN'S BOOKS.

A stimulating short narrative of the life of Elizabeth Fry, whose work in prison reform bears fruit to the present day. The pleasing portrait is one drawn by Muried S. Marshall's brother "her boy." Lady Petty Balfour contributes the foreword to the book, which is the first of a series of similar biographies for young readers.

These biographical studies of Iboe, Anselm, Edward I, Sir Walter Raleigh, Wesley and Wilberforce, Reynolds, Watt, Nelson, Conden, Bright, Nurse Cavell, and others form an interesting and inviting introduction to the study of citizenship.
GEORGE ALLEN and UNWIN, Ltd.

The Philosophy of Speech
By GEORGE WILLIS. 7/6.

"Should engage the attention of those who have made some progress in, and those just entering upon, the study of philosophy. Mr. Willis is always interesting, ingenuous, and suggestive."—Spectator.

Arrows of Desire

"A charming book... the whole subject is delightfully treated."—Edinburgh Review.

Pagan and Christian Creeds
Their Origin and Meaning.
By EDWARD CARPENTER. 10/6.

"A really attractive book, full of charm and suggestion, of insight into great problems, of interest that is varied on every page."—Havelock Ellis in Daily Herald.

The Republic of Liberia

"A very clear account by a practised pen... made more attractive by a number of excellent illustrations and an adequate map."—Times.

"A most instructive and interesting account. Every lover of Africa will be grateful to him."—African World.

Karl Marx
By ACHILLE LORIA. 2/6. Authorised Translation from the Italian with a foreword by E. and C. Paul.

Wars and Treaties, 1815—1914
By ARTHUR PONSONBY. 2/- (3rd Impression).

"One of the most useful books of history seen for some time."—Daily News.

Joseph Fels: His Life Work
By MARY FELS. 6/-

"An admirably written story of the American millionaire whose life was freely spent in endeavouring to better the position of his fellow men."—Globe.

Empire and Commerce in Africa
By LEONARD WOOLF. 20/6.

"A penetrating study which no student of politics or history can afford to leave unread."—Daily Mail.

"A piece of historical research of great value... a fascinating study."—Daily Herald.

Flashes of London
By CHARLES INGE. 6/- Just Out.

Her mysteries and humour; her glamour and pathos; her feverish nights and eerie dawn.

Some Modern Novelists
Appreciations and Estimad.
By H. T. and WILSON FOLLET. 7/6.

Problems of the Playwright
By CLAYTON HALL. 7/6.

With the Mad 17th to Italy
By Major E. H. HODY. 10/6.

"Full of fun and sunshine."—Daily Mail.

"One of the cheviest war-books."—Star.

What is wrong with the Stage
By WILLIAM POEL. 2/6.

"He has done much practical good in the past by getting Shakespeare and others acted decently... his book is of value in showing the historic element in the degradation of the theatre."—Times.

A SECOND THOMAS HARDY?

Shepherd's Warning
(Second Impression)

"Without any special heralding Mr. Leadbetter seems to have stepped into the front rank, perhaps even to the leadership of those active novelists whose theme is English rural life. We may interpret the word 'active' with, of course, a thought for the master of them all, the wizard of Dorchester, at whose feet it would probably be fair to suppose Mr. Leadbetter learned some of his craft. His new story is a tale that conquers by its direct humanity and by an art so delicate and so deftly concealed that the book has a deceptive appearance of having written itself without effort on the part of the author. 'Shepherd's Warning' will prove 'Reader's Delight.'"—Punch.

"He is a writer."—Graphic.

"A skilful and capable workman. We congratulate him on this fresh example of his beautifully delicate art."—Morning Post.

Two Sisters. A Novel By R. H. BRETHERTON. 7/6 Just Out.

NEW POETRY.

Paths of Glory
More Poems Written During the Great War.
Edited by BERTRAM LLOYD. 4/6 and 3/6.

"Deserves well of the public."—Manchester Guardian.

Lines of Life

"He is a poet by temperament. There is not one piece that can fail to stir the imagination—of anyone capable of imagining."—Daily Mail.

NEW AND S. P. C. K. RECENT BOOKS.

ERASMUS AND LUTHER: Their Attitude to Toleration.
By the Rev. ROBERT H. MURRAY, Litt.D., H' Blake Scholar in History, Trinity College, Dublin. 2s. net.

THE FIVE LAMBETH CONFERENCES.
Compiled under the direction of the Most Reverend RANDALL T. DAVIDSON, D.D., Archbishop of Canterbury. 12s. 6d. net.

THE CISTERCIANS IN YORKSHIRE.
By J. S. FLETCHER, Member of the Yorkshire Archaeological Society. With seven Illustrations by Warwick Gomme and a facsimile from the "Chronicles of Meaux." 17s. 6d. net.

MOSES: THE FOUNDER OF PREVENTIVE MEDICINE.
By PERCIVAL WOOD, M.R.C.S., L.R.C.P. 4s. net.

LETTERS AND PAPERS OF ALGERNON HYDE VILLIERS.
With a Memoir by HARRY GRAHAM. With a Portrait. 10s. net.

SOME SOURCES OF HUMAN HISTORY.
By W. M. FLINDERS PETRIE, D.C.L., L.L.D., F.B.A. Illustrated. 3s. net.

THE ROYAL GUIDE TO WINDSOR CASTLE.
By the late Sir WILLIAM ST. JOHN HOPE, Litt.D., D.C.L. With Frontispiece and two Coloured Plans. Paper covers, 2s. 6d.; Cloth boards, 3s. 6d. net.

THE LOST APOCRYPHA OF THE OLD TESTAMENT
By M. R. JAMES, Litt.D. 5s. 6d. net.

MAKING THE MOST OF LIFE.
By W. CUNNINGHAM, D.D., F.B.A. With a Preface by J. P. WHITNEY, D.D. Cloth boards. 4s. net.

THE POEMS OF GILBERT WHITE.
With a Preface by Sir HERBERT WARREN, K.C.V.O., D.C.L., Professor of Poetry, Oxford University. Cloth boards. 6s. net.

THE PARISH GILDS OF MEDIEVAL ENGLAND.
By H. F. WESTLAKE, M.A., F.S.A., Author of "St. Margaret's, Westminster." With six Illustrations. 15s. net.

WESTMINSTER: The Story of the English Towns.
By H. F. WESTLAKE, M.A., F.S.A., Custodian and Minor Canon of Westminster Abbey. With Maps, Plans, and Illustrations. 3s. 6d. net.

THE WAY OF UNDERSTANDING.
By KENNETH F. KIRK, Keble College, Oxford. With a Preface by ALBERT MANSBRIDGE. Paper cover, 1s. net; Cloth, 2s. net.

A little handbook for adults who wish to continue their education.

Helps for Students of History

17. THB WANDERINGS AND HOMES OF MANUSCRIPTS.
By M. R. JAMES, L.H.D., F.B.A. Paper cover, 2s.; cloth boards, 3s. net.

19. AN INTRODUCTION TO THE HISTORY OF AMERICAN DIPLOMACY.
By CARL RUSSELL PLOW, Ph.D., Professor of American History in the University of Wisconsin. 1s. net.

20. HINTS ON TRANSLATION FROM LATIN INTO ENGLISH.
By ALEXANDER SOUTER, D.LITT. 6d. net.

21. HINTS ON THE STUDY OF LATIN.
By ALEXANDER SOUTER, D.LITT. (A.D. 125-750.) 8d. net.

SOCIETY FOR PROMOTOR CHISTIAN KNOWLEDGE.

London—Central Office: 6, St. Martin's Place, W.C.2.

Book Shops: 64, New Bond Street, W.1; 43, Queen Victoria Street, E.C.4.

Brighton—125, North Street. And at all Booksellers.
Appointments Vacant

UNIVERSITY OF BRISTOL.

DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION: MEN'S DIVISION—SIX TEMPORARY ASSISTANT LECTURERS will be appointed for the session 1920-21, at salaries of £200 each. If admissions justify it, the appointments may be continued for the following session 1921-22; and it is hoped that one or two at least may be continued permanently.

Applicants must be trained graduates with good teaching experience. Well qualified women applicants might be considered.
Particulars from the Registrar, to whom applications should be addressed not later than March 20.

COUNTY BOROUGH OF SUNDERLAND.

PUBLIC LIBRARIES, MUSEUM AND ART GALLERY.

THE COMMITTEE invite APPLICATIONS for the POSITION of MALE ASSISTANT in the Central Library. Salary on new scale £162 10s., advancing by increments of £12 10s. to £200 per annum. Public Library experience essential, including Dewey Classification open access.

Applications, stating present position and particulars of Library Association Certificates held, etc., together with copies of not more than three recent testimonials to be delivered addressed to me at my office, Town Hall, Sunderland, not later than first post on the 22nd March, 1920, endorsed "Library Assistant.

H. CRAVEN.

Town Clerk.

COUNTY BOROUGH OF STOKE-ON-TRENT EDUCATION

COMMITTEE.

HANLEY SECONDARY SCHOOL.

WANTED, on April 19, 1920, an ASSISTANT MASTER to teach GEOGRAPHY to the boys. Applicants should possess diploma or some definite qualification in the subject, and should have had teaching experience. Salary according to scale.
Forms of Application (which should be duly filled up and returned to the Director of Education not later than March 22, 1920) may be obtained on receipt of stamped addressed envelope from
Dr. W. LUDFORD FREEMAN,
Director of Education.

Education Offices, Town Hall, Hanley, Stoke-on-Trent.
March 8, 1920.

BALSHAW'S GRAMMAR SCHOOL.
LEYLAND, LANCs.

WANTED May 1, 1920, FORM MASTER, honours degree, to teach science. Salary according to Lancashire County Scale allowing for more than seven years' previous experience.

Evening work limited to three evenings a week.—Apply F. JACKSON,
M.A., Headmaster. Thomas Dodd, Clerk to the Governors, 47, Lune Street, Preston.

BALSHAW'S GRAMMAR SCHOOL.
LEYLAND, LANCs.

TEMPORARY TEACHER OF MATHEMATICS, Master or Mistress, Wanted at Once. Salary according to Lancashire County Scale.—Apply F. JACKSON, M.A., Headmaster.

THOS. DODD,

Clerk to the Governors,

47, Lune Street, Preston.

KINGSTON-UPON-THAMES PUBLIC LIBRARY.

THE LIBRARY COMMITTEE invite applications for the Temporary Post of CHIEF ASSISTANT, to perform the duties of the Sub-Librarian, who has been granted leave of absence until July, 1921, to attend the School of Librarianship. Candidates must have had practical experience, and hold certificates of the Librarianship Association. Salary £180 with two annual increments of £10 to £200.

Applications, with not more than three recent testimonials, and endorsed "Chief Assistant," should reach the undersigned by
March 22.

B. CARTER,

Borough Librarian.

WORKSOP PUBLIC LIBRARY.

APPLICATIONS are invited for the POST of ASSISTANT LIBRARIAN. Salary £104 per annum. Knowledge of classification essential.—Applications to be sent to J. T. HUGHTON, Librarian.

Appointments Vacant

WEST RIDING COUNTY COUNCIL,
MEXBOROUGH AND DISTRICT SECONDARY SCHOOL.

WANTED for Next Term a MISTRESS with good qualifications in English. Salary begins at £150 to £250 and rises by £10 a year to £330. One year's post graduate training counts as two years of experience. Improvement of scale under consideration.—
Apply immediately to HEADMASTER, Mexborough Secondary School.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE OF SOUTH WALES AND MOSMOUTHSHIRE.

COLEG PRIFATHROFOAEL DEHEUDIR CYMRU A MNYWY.

THE COUNCIL of the COLLEGE invites APPLICATIONS for the POST OF PROFESSOR OF FRENCH LANGUAGE
AND LITERATURE. Commencing salary £300 per annum.

Further particulars may be obtained from the undersigned, by whom 100 copies of applications and testimonials must be received on or before Saturday, April 10, 1920.

D. J. A. Brown,
Registrar.

University College, Cardiff.
March 4, 1920.

NORTHAMPTON COUNTY BOROUGH EDUCATION

COMMITTEE.

SCHOOL OF ART.

THE EDUCATION COMMITTEE invite APPLICATIONS for the APPOINTMENT of PRINCIPAL of the SCHOOL OF ART. Applicants should be qualified as required by the Regulations of the Board of Education. Salary £400 per annum, rising by yearly increments of £35 to £600 per annum.

Further particulars and a form of application may be obtained from the undersigned, with whom applications should be lodged not later than April 3, 1920.

Mr. G. H. Parsons, Acting Secretary to the Committee,
Borough Education Offices, 4, St. Giles' Street, Northampton.
March 6, 1920.

WATFORD—LONDON ORPHAN SCHOOL.

WANTED IN MAY,

(1) RESIDENT SENIOR MATHEMATICAL MISTRESS
Salary £150 per annum.

(2) RESIDENT HISTORY MISTRESS. Salary £100—£120 per annum.

Good degree and experience essential.
Apply to Headmistress.

MANCHESTER EDUCATION COMMITTEE.
MUNICIPAL SCHOOL OF ART.

1. A DESIGN MASTER is required to take charge of the work of the Design Section, and to assist in the general work of the School. Candidates must hold recognised qualifications. It is desirable that candidates should have experience in the teaching of design and allied subjects.

Commencing salary £400, rising to £500 by annual increments of £25.

2. An ASSISTANT MASTER is required to assist in the Design and Crafts Section in the general work of the School.
Candidates must hold recognised qualifications.

Commencing salary £200, rising to £300.

Further particulars and forms of application for the above appointments may be obtained from the undersigned, to whom applications must be returned by March 31, 1920.

SPLURLEY HAY,
Director of Education.
Deansgate, Manchester.

HUDDERSFIELD TECHNICAL COLLEGE.

Principal: J. F. HUDSON, M.A., B.Sc.

APPLICATIONS are invited for the following posts:

ASSISTANT LECTURER IN BIOLOGY, with good qualifications in either BOTANY or ZOOLOGY. Initial salary £300.

ASSISTANT IN THE SCHOOL OF ART, well qualified in Design. Initial salary £250.

Further particulars may be obtained on application to
T. THOMPSON,
Secretary.

Appointments Wanted

LADY (40) seeks POSITION in LIBRARY. Two years' experience. Good testimonials. — Apply Box 567,
Art Exhibitions

"GARDENS GAY AND JOYOUS"
By BEATRICE PARSONS
At THE GREATOREX GALLERIES
14, GRAFTON STREET, NEW BOND STREET, W.1.
MARCH 8 to 31.
Daily 10 to 5. Saturday 10 to 1.

FROM the 3rd to 30th MARCH ONLY.
AUGUSTUS E. JOHN'S War, Peace Conference, and Other
Portraits.
THE GALLERY OF THE ALPINE CLUB, Mill Street, Conduit
Street, W.
"There is one thing Mr. Augustus John has above his contemporaries; that is, an instinct for painting."—Morning Post.
"It needs no prophetic insight to foretell that the exhibition...
will be one of the sensations of the season."—Daily News.

ETCHINGS BY IAN STRANG
THE CHENIL GALLERY
by the Town Hall, Chelsea.

THE MALVERNS—
LANDSCAPE IMPRESSIONS BY LEONARD RICHARD.
Pastels by H. B. Brabazon, Frank Brangwyn, R.A., George Clausen, R.A., John Charles Conder, Augustus John, Albert Moore, &c.
ELDAR GALLERY,
40, GREAT MARLBOROUGH STREET, W.
Admission 1s. 3d., including catalogue.

Authors’ Agents, etc.

THE AUTHORS’ ALLIANCE are prepared to consider and place MSS. for early publication. Literary work of all kinds dealt with by experts who place Authors’ interests first.
Twenty years’ experience. Please note new address: 93 and 94,
CHANCERY LANE, LONDON, W.C.2.

AUTHORS’
MSS. placed at highest prices: free monthly prizes; terms for stamps.—Cambridge Literary Agency, 8, Henrietta-St., W. C.2.

PROOF READING, INDEXING, RESEARCHES, REVISION
Linguist, good experience.—Mr. F. A. HADLAND, 18, Bellevue
Mansions, Forest Hill, S.E. 24.

HISTORICAL Documents or Deeds, Parchment or Paper, cleaned and repaired.—Write L.G., 36, High Road, Balham, S.W. 12.

Typewriting &c.

TYPEWRITING OF EVERY DESCRIPTION carefully and promptly executed at home, 1s. per 1,000 words; carbon copy, 3d. per 1,000 words. Duplicating, Cambridge Local.—
Miss NANCY McFARLANE, 11, Palmeira Avenue, Westcliff Essex.

TYPEWRITING. — Authors’ MSS. Examination Papers,
Letters, Circulars, Testimonials, General Copying, Duplicating, etc.—J. TRIMMELL, 8, Moira Terrace, Cardiff.

Entertainments

HOLBORN EMPIRE
Holborn Tube Station,
LEWIS CASSON AND HAROLD WINDSOR’S SEASON OF DAILY MATINEES at 2.30.
This Week, * Modest.* Next Week, "TOM TROUBLE"

A NEW POET.

"This is great stuff," writes Lord Alfred Douglas. "It is beautiful. No such blank verse has been written by any man living that I know of. It is a pleasure to find someone writing real sonnets, correct in form as well as informed with deep thought and beauty. The lyrics are extra-ordearly good."

"It is pure gold," writes Sir Samuel Leighley in the course of a long review of the book. Mr. Pin is in the line of the great poets and follows their great tradition with a sureness of touch, a sense of the music and colour of words, a feeling for natural beauty and a profound insight into its underlying spirit, which must give him a permanent place among those who have written great verses. But it is in his sonnets that Mr. Pin rises to his true stature. The praise may seem extravagant, but we are of opinion that no living man has done better work. In dignity of thought, pomp and splendour of language and careful workmanship that spares no pains they reach the very highest level."
HERBERT MOORE PIM IS THE POET.
Songs from an Ulster Valley (3s. 6d. net with portrait) is his book.
The Publishers are Grant Richards, Ltd.

Booksellers & Catalogues

THE EASTERN COUNTIES’ LIBRARY.
PLAYFORD, IPSWICH.
A LIBRARY FOR STUDENTS OF THEOLOGY, PHILOSOPHY, HISTORY AND MODERN LITERATURE.
Any newly published work on any subject may be ordered, and will be sent post free to members paying the following rate of subscription. Books may be changed as often as new ones are required. Send your subscription to the Secretary with a list of books and they will be ordered specially for you if not already in the library. Cheques should be made payable to the Eastern Counties’ Library.
SPECIAL POST FREE RATE OF SUBSCRIPTION.—Two
Books, £1 10 0 per annum; Three Books, £3 10 0 per annum;
Each Additional Book, £1 0 0 per annum.

THE ART OF PRINTING
A COLLECTION OF FINE BOOKS PRINTED IN LONDON
BY THE FOLLOWING CELEBRATED PRESSMEN—
CARADOC, ERAGNY, ELSTON, ESSEX HOUSE, and the VALE PRESS.
Prices from 1/5. each, post free.
Full particulars on application to:
L. CHAUNDY OF OXFORD LTD
21 ALDEMAR STREET, LONDON, W.1.

EGYPT, PALESTINE, and the FAR EAST; Travel; Arabian Nights; and Napoleon Era. New Catalogue post free on application.—J. A. ALLEN & Co., 16, Grenville Street, London, W.C.1.

BOOKS AND AUTOGRAPHS.
CATALOGUES FREE.

Educational

ACCOUNTANCY, SECRETARYSHIP, BUSINESS TRAINING.
An Appointments Bureau (free) is open to all qualified students of the Metropolitan College—the Varsity of Secretarial and Accountancy Training—Specialised Post-Course (practical training and exam. coaching) taken at home in spare time under the high-qualified staff in the Kingdom, comprising many Final Honourmen, Chartered Accountants, and Barristers-at-Law.
Fees are most moderate, and may be paid by instalments.—Write to-day (postcard will suffice) for list of recent appointments vacant, particulars of scholarship scheme, and copy of "Student’s Guide,” free of charge or obligation. METROPOLITAN COLLEGE, Ltd., Dept. 319, St. Alains.

For Sale

Suitable for Institution or School.
BERKSHIRE ADJOINING WINDSOR FOREST.
In A Park. FINE VIEWS.
AN exceptionally well-built HOUSE, containing thirty to forty large Bedrooms, fine suite of very spacious Reception Rooms.
Cottages, Garage, Stabling, and numerous outbuildings.
HOME FARM AND PARK, 277 ACRES.
For Sale at mere fraction of original Cost.
RALPH PAY & TAYLOR, 24, Davies Street, Berkeley Square, W.
THE ECONOMICS OF IT

A WEEK ago we had occasion, while heartily endorsing the proposal that the Government should establish substantial pensions for pioneers of medical research, to allude to the desirability of equally substantial pensions for men of letters. Such a suggestion is not, we are regretfully aware, practical politics in the present state of society, in which the man of letters is conceived as an amiable idler who can not only perfectly well live on air himself, but support a family on the same wholesome element. But to play even for a moment with so eminently reasonable a suggestion is to invite the shock of contrast which the view of the actual condition of men of letters at this moment affords. We think it well that our readers' attention should be drawn to it.

Men of letters are shy of revealing their economic affairs, however much they may be fond of spiritual autobiography, and we believe this to be the first time that a direct reference has been made to the fact that literary journalists at the present moment receive precisely the same payment for their work as they did before the war. Is there any other profession or trade whatever in a similar case? If there is, we have not heard of it. Moreover, of all his journalistic colleagues, it is precisely the reviewer who has to suffer most. His position never was a particularly happy one; his livelihood was never absolutely secure; he has always been paid by the piece. But although his condition in the years before the war was by no means enviable, he managed to rub along. If he was lucky he might make five pounds a week. But the reviewer who was lucky to make five pounds a week in 1913 needs a good deal more luck to make five pounds a week in 1920. Obviously, since the rate of payment remains the same, he must persuade his editor to print the same amount of his work. And this is precisely what the editor cannot do. He cannot give the same space to book reviews that he did in 1913, for the simple reason that he has not got the space to give. If anyone were to compare the total space given to book reviews in the daily and weekly press before the war with the space given to them to-day, he would, we think, find that the total for 1920 is not more than one half what it was for 1913. Thus the reviewer who made five pounds a week before the war is fortunate if he can make four pounds a week now. And probably he has to do now just as much work for his four pounds as he had to do then for his five. He is expected to read and criticize as many books as then; but his reviews must be shorter than they were. Any reviewer knows that it is not writing about the book that takes the time, but reading it. The conclusion is inevitable. The book-reviewer is being crushed out of existence; and the longer he survives the worse will his work become. No man can do good criticism with the prospect of absolute economic disaster in front of him.

The immediate remedies are two, and neither is possible. Either the pay of the literary journalist must be doubled, as all other wages have been, or he must find some more remunerative literary employment. First, then, we may consider the possibility of doubling his wages. There is a general impression abroad that to be the proprietor of a journal is a short road to a fortune. No doubt that in some cases it is; but it depends upon the character of the paper. We may say quite categorically that no journal which devotes considerable space to criticisms of the highest quality it can get, irrespective of the name of the writer, is in any danger of becoming a gold mine for its proprietor. The price of paper has quadrupled, the wages of the printers have more than doubled, the cost of replacing machinery is anything up to six times what it used to be. As a set-off to this the advertisement rates have increased perhaps by one-half, and the selling price in the case of a daily newspaper may have been doubled. On an average we may say that the expenditure has increased twice as much as the revenue. A journal of the kind we are considering, where the editor makes it a point of honour to devote an adequate space to the best criticism he can obtain, cannot command the enormous circulation necessary in order that the advertisement rate may be advanced automatically pari passu with the increased expenditure. It is an unfortunate fact, which has nevertheless to be faced, that the number of people who will pay, say, twopence a week solely for criticism which they consider good is at the outside about fifty thousand. If it costs one shilling a week the figure would drop immediately to the neighbourhood of ten thousand. It is certainly not by the quality of its literary criticism that “big circulation” is made for a newspaper.

Thus it is that the proprietors of a newspaper that prints literary criticism worthy the name cannot afford to pay double for it. A good literary page is merely, as the honest editor only too well knows, an encumbrance in the struggle for circulation. If he is a truly modern editor he will discard it altogether and devote it to personal paragraphs about heavy-weight boxers, prominent divorcées, and an extra column of racing tips. In that way he stands a reasonable chance of increasing his proprietor’s dividends and his own salary at least. Fortunately not all the editors are of the truly modern brand yet; but very probably the whole of the next generation of editors will be. The weakest go to the wall; and it would be merely obstinacy that could close our eyes to the fact that among all journalists, sporting, religious, political and the rest, the literary journalist is the one who provides the commodity for which there is the least demand. The wages of any other journalist are likely to be doubled before his. It is a question of economics.

Let the second remedy be applied. Our bankrupt reviewer shall write novels. Unfortunately he has gained in the exercise of his profession, not indeed a very exalted idea of the novels that are generally written, but a fairly high one of what he may permit himself to write. In short, he is handicapped at the outset; he is that untractable fellow, a conscientious novelist. Now, the publisher stands in the same relation to him as novelist as the editor did to him as reviewer. Here, too, we have a sprinkling of truly modern publishers; but on the whole it may fairly be said that the publisher is anxious to publish any work that seems to him worthy. Our conscientious novelist’s novel is indubitably worthy. The publisher casts back in his mind. Ten years ago he took on just such another conscientious novelist who is now enjoying the sound circulation (very remarkable for a conscientious novelist) of two thousand five hundred copies. The publisher can count on a profit of fifty pounds from him now, against which he has to set small but steady losses in the eight or nine years before. He shakes his head; he would have tried it gladly ten years ago, but now—the risk is too great. Politely and regretfully he bows our conscientious novelist out, and completes his list with a new sex novel by a sex expert of acknowledged standing and circulation to match. After all, the man must live, even though he is a publisher, and he can live only by supplying a marketable commodity. Nowadays one unsuccessful first novel will swallow up the profits of two moderately successful ones; before the war one moderately successful novel would fairly float two unsuccessful. The weakest to the wall. Of all novelists, sex, sporting, detective, sentimental, and the rest, the conscientious literary novelist is the last to cover his printing bill.

There is no remedy short of a change in society itself. Unless the public can be induced to discover in itself a vastly increased liking for conscientious literary work the man of letters is doomed to suffer hardships even more serious than those he now endures. And here we seem to be involved in a vicious circle. The appetite for good literature and good criticism is created by good literature and good criticism; there is no other way. AS the literary journalist is slowly dragged under by the clutch of the economic factor, the opportunity of remedying his condition grows less and less. At all costs this process of accelerated degradation must be prevented. Those who have it in their power to prevent it are the few who are faithful to good work in literature and the arts. They must set themselves to make proselytes, not for this journal rather than any other, but for any journal which treats literature seriously and makes a real effort to provide honest and enlightened criticism. They would not have the man of letters work for a starvation wage; it lies with them to help remove the disgrace from our so-called civilization, in which many a man who has given the very best that is in him to the cause of literature would be glad to receive the wage of a newspaper compositor.

M.

DE QUINCEY’S MOTHER

Cornelia, Lady Byron and Queen Victoria would have had a great deal in common; their sons not quite so much. But supposing relations to have become strained they would have had one unfailling topic on which to fall back—their mothers. They both had good mothers. So strong is the maternal instinct that most women, unless they actually drink or run away from their husbands, are good mothers. There is a certain family likeness between them.

If ever a man had a good mother it was De Quincey. She had the best attribute of a good mother—the power of producing first-rate children out of apparently commonplace material. She herself, though a vigorous, clear-headed woman, was from all accounts entirely conventional, unimaginative, Philistine. Of her husband little is known. He was consumptive, lived abroad, "travelling in search of health," for the greater part of his married life. He only returned to his family a few weeks before his death. He died at the age of 38, when his eldest surviving son was only 12.
De Quincey therefore tells us very little about his father, but that little is not promising. He was a Manchester merchant, and left an "unburdened estate producing £1,000 a year." De Quincey describes him as a "plain, unpretending man," literary to the extent of having written a book. This work, entitled "A Tour in the Midland Counties of England," appeared in the Gentleman's Magazine of 1774.

Yet the wife of this "plain, unpretending man" bore him eight children, whose collective genius, but for the extraordinary fate which overhung them, should have made the solid, comfortable house at Greenhay famous as the shabby rectory at Haworth. But fate was even more cruel to the house of the De Quinceys than to that of the Brontës, and only one of its marvellous children is remembered.

Thomas De Quincey stands out alone of his name famous in English literature, and on his own particular mountain without a rival. But no one who has read those amazingly little read "Autobiographical Sketches" will doubt that he was one of eight children — all unusually gifted, of whom two, if not four, were gifted richly as himself. De Quincey's word is not of course the best possible evidence. One may perhaps feel a little sceptical about the "premature intellectual grandeur" of De Quincey's eldest sister, "thou dear noble Elizabeth," who died in her ninth year, "whose head for its superb development was the astonishment of science." But no reader of the "Opium-Eater," "Levana" or "The Avenger" will suspect their author of having invented the characters of William and Richard De Quincey. All the important events in Richard's marvellous career are confirmed by the "De Quincey Memorials," drawn from sources quite independent of De Quincey's own writings. As for William, if De Quincey invented the character of that young man, then Bacon wrote "Hamlet," and a monk the "Odyssey." No, these wonderful children were the fruit, not of the drugged fancy of Thomas, but of the respectable womb of Mrs. De Quincey.

They were well brought up. Mrs. De Quincey achieved that combination of dignity and unworldliness peculiar to British matrons. As her son says:

No mother can ever have lived who was more vigilant to see that we received to the last fraction every attention due to our manners, to our health, or to the proprieties of our dress. It is as good as a comedy in my feeling when I call back the characteristic scene which went on every morning of the year. All of us were for some six years marched off or carried off to a morning parade in my mother's dressing-room. As the mail coaches go daily in London to the Inspector of Mails, so we rolled out of the nursery at a signal given, and were minutely reviewed in succession. When this inspection, which was no mere formality, had travelled from the front rank to the rear, when we were pronounced to be in proper trim or, in the language of the guards, "All right behind," we were dismissed, but with two ceremonies that to us were mysterious and allegorical—first our hair and faces were sprinkled with lavender water and milk of roses; secondly, we received a kiss on the forehead.

Mrs. De Quincey's care for her children's physical welfare increased rather than diminished as they outgrew the nursery, or, rather, in her eyes they never did outgrow the nursery. To Thomas, aged 16, returning from school with his younger brothers, she writes: "I must repeat, do not let Henry go from you for a moment, and let Pink [Richard] mind the luggage. Keep Henry from leaning against the coach door, or over the side of the boat." A merciful Providence hid Henry from her sight on half-holidays. Four years later, when Thomas is an undergraduate, she writes to him at Oxford: "Enclosed I send you two half 5s notes. Mind to join the right halves together when you get them."

She continued to send her son's money long after they left College. They suffered from that inability to make a living so common in talented families. Their mother at the end of her life sent nearly half of her income to her sons. She spared neither time nor money in "cures" for her daughter Mary.

But this was not all. Mrs. De Quincey was no worldly mother—absorbed in the health and material prosperity of her children. She was the fine model of a British—not a Roman—matron, a woman of Evangelical piety. Religious ladies moved into the vicinity of Chester in order to have the benefit of her conversation for themselves—her example for their daughters. Bishops, priests and deacons dined nightly at her table. "We shall miss you very much at the Bible Meeting Thursday next," writes Hannah More from Barley Wood.

Her piety burned with a clear, almost a scorching flame. Infidelity—levity—ever apparently innocent light-heartedness, fled from before her like the devil before holy water. "Speak to mistress," said a lively housemaid on being asked why she did not appeal to her mistress in a case of supposed wrong. "Speak to mistress—would I speak to a ghost?"

Terrible indeed was the one occasion on which infidelity raised its head in Mrs. De Quincey's own house—lifting its voice at her very table, choking the good seed sown in the ears of her servants at family prayers. It was not Mrs. De Quincey's fault. The Hon. Antonina Dashwood Lee was introduced into her household by her daughter's governess—a Miss Wesley, a niece of John Wesley, the founder of Methodism. It was known that she was a "bold thinker," and that for a woman she had an "astounding command of theological learning." Miss Wesley's recommendation and the theological learning prevailed over the bold thinking, and the neighbouring clergy were invited in large numbers to meet her. The results were disastrous. All too soon it was discovered that this "bold thinking" was infidelity of the most militant type, the theological learning the deadliest weapon in its armoury. The Rev. Mr. Clowes, Rector of St. John's Church, Manchester, was rendered speechless. "Horror, blank horror, seized him upon seeing a woman, a young woman, a woman of captivating beauty whom God had adorned so eminently with gifts of mind and person, breathing sentiments that seemed to him fresh from the vintage of hell." As for Mrs. De Quincey, "For the first and last time in her long and healthy life she took to her bed—the victim of an alarming nervous attack."

It was not likely that a woman who took her duties as a hostess thus seriously would treat her spiritual functions as a mother lightly. She did not. Her conception of the maternal office was terrific. "I have an awful account," she writes to Thomas at school, "to give as a parent. My charge is one of the talents I must render up with improvement, or meet the just punishment of its neglect or abuse." Her moved among her children “as ever in the Great Taskmaster’s sight,” preparing to meet this awful day of reckoning. Her children reacted accordingly. “It may seem odd,” writes Thomas, “according to some people’s ideas of mothers, that some part of my redundant love did not overflow upon me. But she delighted not in infancy—not infancy in her. The very greatness of some qualities in her mind made this impossible.”

Still the “awful account” had to be rendered. How was Mrs. De Quincey to prepare it? To begin with, the human heart was desperately waked, and the sooner the children realized their own innate vileness the better. As Thomas writes:

Usually mothers defend their own cubs, right or wrong; and they also think favourably of any pretensions to praise which these cubs may put forward. Not so my mother. Were we taxed by interested parties with some impropriety of conduct? Trial by jury, English laws of evidence, all were forgotten; and we were found guilty on the bare affidavit of the angry accuser. Did a visitor say some flattering thing of a talent or accomplishment by one or other of us? My mother protested so solemnly against the possibility that we could possess one or the other, that we children held it a point of filial duty to believe ourselves the very scum and refuse of the universe.

Any spontaneous ideas were probably the sprouts of original sin—and must be promptly suppressed. Mrs. De Quincey writes to Thomas: “We have very few sentiments of union between us—and [if Thomas lived at home] the whole task of suppressing opposing ones would fall on me.” This task of suppressing the “opposing opinions” of seven unusually clever and high-spirited children was obviously too much for one woman—however devoted and energetic. The boys were sent early to school.

D. Hussey.

WILDERNESS

On lonely Kinton Green all day
The half-blind tottering plough-horse grieves,
Dim chimes and crowings far away
Come drifting down the wind like leaves;
And there the wood’s a coloured mist,
So close the blackthorns intertwill—
The blackthorns clung with heapan soles
Blue-veiled to weather coming cold
And ruby-tasselled shepherd’s rose
Where flock the finches plumed with gold,
And swarming brambles laden still Though boys and wasps have ate their fill.

Here shining out on lubber boughs
The lantern crabs loiter and light
The smoke that smouldering leaves unhause
Like stars in frost as sharp and bright;
And here the blackbird deigns to choose
His blooded laws by ones and twos.

Cob-spider runs his glistening maze
To murder doddering hungry flies,
Curt echo mocks the mocking jays,
The partridge in the stubbles cries;
And Hob and Nob like blind men pass
Down to the Bull for pipe and glass.

Edmund Blunden.
in bitter conflict of some sort—such groans escape him now and then, and the lean, wire-drawn face, with the tightly closed lips and the anxious eyes, wears such an expression of nervous apprehension. Once, when he was driving with his old friend Colonel Crawford, he sat silent hour after hour, and the Colonel, reaching home, wrote in his journal: "He demanded a weapon of "consol," which in another would have demanded sword or pistol. "It is too foolish," exclaimed poor Coutts; the truth was merely that "my spirit's gone, and my mind worn and harras'd," and "I am now rather an object of pity than resentment."

But whatever secret anguish compelled the richest man in England to drive hour after hour in silence, there were also amenities and privileges attached to his state which lightened the office gloom and tinged the ledgers with radiance. The reader becomes aware of a curious note in the tone in which his correspondents address him. There is an intimate, agonized strain in all their voices. His correspondents were some of the greatest people in the land; yet they wrote generally with their own hands, and often added the injunction: "Burn this Letter the moment it is read" . . . "Name it not to my Lord," this particular document continues, "or to any creature on earth." For royal as they were, beautiful, highly gifted, they were all in straits for money; all came to Thomas Coutts; all approached him as suppliants and sinners beseeching his help and confessing their follies as if he were something between doctor and priest. He heard from Lady Chatham the story of her distress when the payment of Chatham's pension was delayed; he bestowed £10,000 upon Charles James Fox, and earned his eulogistic gratitude; the Royal Dukes held their secret consultations in his rooms; the Duchess of Devonshire, confessed her gambling losses, called him her dear friend and died in his debt. Lady Hester Stanhope thundered and growled melodiously enough from the top of Mount Lebanon. Naturally, then, Thomas Coutts had only to say what he wanted, and some very powerful people bestowed themselves to get it for him. He wanted introductions for his daughters among the French nobility; he wanted George the Fourth to bank with him; he wanted the King's leave to drive his carriage through St. James's Park. But he wanted some things that not even the Duchess of Devonshire could procure. He wanted health. He wanted a son-in-law.

There was, Mr. Coleridge, says, "a singular dearth of suitors for his daughters and his ducats." Was it that Mrs. Coutts had in her household days thrown soapscuds over Lord Dundonald? Or was it that the presence of madness in the Coutts family showed itself unmistakably in the frequent " nervous complaints" of the three sisters? At any rate, Sophia, the youngest, was nineteen when she became engaged to Francis Burdett; and heeresies presumably should be wearing their coronets years before that. Then her two elder sisters pledged their affections suitably enough. But love always came among the Coutts, wearing the mask of tragedy or comedy, or both together in greatest combination. The two young men, thus singled out, against all advice and entreaty rushed the Falls of Schaffhausen in an open punt. Both were drowned. Two years later Susan recovered sufficiently to marry Lord Guilford, and after mourning for seven years Fanny accepted Lord Bute; but Lord Bute was a widower of fifty-six with nine children, and Lord Guilford fell from his horse when in the act of presenting a basket of fruit to Miss Coutts, and so injured his spine that he languished in bodily suffering for years before, prematurely, he died.

But from all those impressions and turns of phrase which, more than any statement of facts, shape life in biographies as they do in reality, we are convinced that Thomas Coutts loved his daughters intensely and sincerely, pitying their sufferings, devising pleasures and comforts for them, and sometimes, perhaps, wishing to be assured that when all was said and done they were happy, which, upon the same evidence, it is easy to guess that they were not. Even in these days Sir Francis Burdett caused his father-in-law some anxiety. The following extract hints the reason of it:

"Going to Piccadilly yesterday at twelve o'clock, I met Mr. Burdett . . . I asked him where he was going . . . I asked him if he had been under any engagement to Mr. Whiteford, upon which, to do him justice, he blushed—and, with great signs of astonishment, confessed that he had entirely forgotten it, though he had particularly remembered it a day before . . . To us, except people, these things seem strange. Probably Mr. Burdett was not altogether surprised to find that a man who was capable of forgetting an engagement could defy the House of Commons, sit in a house, be taken forth by Life Guards through a crowd shouting "Burdett for ever!" and suffer imprisonment in the Tower. Later, Coutts had to insist that his son-in-law should leave his house; but on that occasion our sympathies are with the banker. Like most people, Sir Francis lost his temper, his manners, his humanity, and everything decent about him when he was in danger of losing a legacy. But for the present the legacies were secure, and the surface of life was splendid and serene. Mr. and Mrs. Coutts lived in the great house in Stratton Street; they travelled from one fine country seat to another, the guests of a Duke here, of an Earl there; their wealth increased and increased, and Thomas Coutts was wont to make a secret note of all by Prime Ministers and Kings. He acted as ambassador between the House of Hanover and the House of Stuart—almost equally to his delight, he transmitted winter petticoats from Paris to Devonshire House.

But the splendid surface had deep cracks in it, and when William the Fourth dined with the Coutses, Mrs. Coutts—so he declared—would always whisper to him on the way downstairs, "Sir, are you not George the Third's father?"

"I always answered in the affirmative," said the King . . . "there's no use contradicting women, young or old, eh? She was losing her wits. For the last ten years of her life she was out of her mind. But old Coutts would have her lead the King down to dinner, and would tend her faithfully himself when doctors and daughters besought him to put her under control. He was a devoted husband.

At the same time he was a devoted lover. During the ten years that Mrs. Coutts was going from bad to worse and being tenderly cared for by her husband, he was lavishing horses, carriages, villas, sums in the "Long Annuities," upon a young actress in Little Russell Street. The paradox has disturbed his biographers. Leaving to others the task of determining how far the relation between the old banker and the young woman was immoral, we must admit that we like him all the better for it; more, it seems to prove that he loved his wife. For the first time he hears the birds at dawn and notices the spring leaves. Like his Harriot, birds and leaves seem to him innocent and fresh.

You who can look to Heaven with so much pleasure and so pure a heart must have great pleasure in viewing such beautiful skies . . . eat light nourishing food—mutton roast and boiled is the best—porter is not good for you . . . I kiss the paper you are to look upon and beg you to kiss it just here. Your dear lips will then have touched what mine touch just now . . . The estate of Otham, you see, I have enquired about. Your 3 p. c. Consol and Long Annuity . . .

So it goes on from birds to flannel nightcaps, from eternal devotion to profitable investments; but the strain that links together all these diverse notes is his recurring and constant adoration for Harriot's "pure, innocent, honest, kind, affectionate heart." It was a terrible blow to his father and son-in-law to find that at his age he was capable of entertaining such illusions. When it came out that, four days after Mrs. Coutts was buried, the old gentleman of seventy-nine had hurried off to St. Pancras
Church and married himself (illegally, as it turned out, by one of those misadventures which always beset the Coutts family when they were in love) to an actress of no birth and robust physique, the lamentations that rent the family in twain are bitter in the extreme. What would become of his money? As they could not ask this openly, they took the more roundabout way of “imputing to the servants” at Stratton Street that Mrs. Coutts was poisoning her husband and was in the habit of receiving men in her bedroom when half undressed. Coutts replied to his daughters and his sons-in-law in bitter, agitated letters which make painful, though spirited reading after a hundred years. How they tortured him! How they grudged him his happiness! How grateful he would have been for a word of sympathy! Still, he had his Harriot, and though she was only gone into the next room, he must write her a letter to say how he loves her and trusts her and begs her to come to him in the house, as they say about her. “Your constant, happy, and most affectionate husband” he signs himself, and she invokes “My beloved Tom!” Indeed, Harriot deserved every penny she got, and we rejoice to think that she got them all. She was a generous woman. She was bountiful to her stepdaughters; she was always burying broken-down actors in luxury, and putting up marble tablets to their memories; and she married a Duke. But every year of her life she drove down to Little Russell Street, got out of her carriage, dismissed her servants, and walked along the dirty lane to have a look at the house where she had begun life as a “poor little player child.” And once, long after Tom was dead, she dreamed of Tom, and noted on the first leaf of her Prayer Book how he had come to her looking “well, tranquil, and divine. He anxiously desired me to change my shoes,” which was, no doubt, true to the life: but in the dream it was “for fear of taking cold, as I had walked through waters to him,” which somehow touches us as if Tom and Harriot had walked through bitter waters to rescue their little fragment of love from all that money.

V. W.

THE ITALIAN PEASANT

Among Italian Peasants. Written and illustrated by Tony Cyriax. (Collins. 12s. 6d. net.)

ONE is inclined to approach an English book on Italian peasants with suspicion, but a few minutes with Miss Cyriax set one’s mind at rest. Her title does not belie her. This is not a book about Italian peasants. From the very first page we are, as she promises us, among them, in the heart of the little Northern village of Campià, sharing their lives in every detail and in the greatest intimacy. Perhaps one of the reasons why she is so successful in creating the illusion is the completeness with which she is able to exclude the outside world. She is absolutely absorbed in the life around her, and the England she has left behind hardly ever intrudes except when the delightful idle little Riccardo, who is so persistent in securing the leisure he requires from the endless impatience upon him of his family and his workers whose taste for work he cannot share, comes to demand a kiss from the Sì’ora before he will deliver up her letters, or when she nearly misses the train that is to carry her away because either her host or her hostess—she could never make up her mind whether it was Bartolo or Rosina—had put the clock back half an hour to compel her to stay another day.

Miss Cyriax took her first plunge into the village life at the dance at the inn, where she made the acquaintance of most of the little world which she came to know so well; and as the inn belonged to Nino, of course the carabinieri raided it and found the door open after hours, though luckily the dance was over. Nino seems to us to embody most of the tragedy of the life of the Italian peasant to-day.

It is true he was the unlucky one of the village. Indeed, in South Italy he could not possibly have escaped a reputation for possessing the Evil Eye. But perhaps Campià lies north of the zone of the Malocchio. If there was a storm, it was sure to be his that suffered most, and he would be equally sure to inform the insurance agents of the damage too late. His agricultural methods may help to explain some of the ill-luck that dogged his footsteps. He would take a handful of seeds and scatter them on the ground, then break up the soil with a pick. He admitted that it might be better to dig it over first, but he had too much land and too little time to be able to afford to be particular.

Yet it was only in degree that he differed from the rest of the village. They were all—or at least all those who worked on the land—living on a starvation margin; and yet they were, as always, patient and hard-working, simple and hard-swearin. Miss Cyriax gives a number of amusing instances, typical throughout agricultural Italy of the combination of Italian and American profanity. Vines and olives are still the standard crops even in these mountain regions, though each year there is the same gamble with the hail. Miss Cyriax was living in a little mountain cottage with the De Marchesi, one of the more aristocratic peasant families of the village, when the inevitable hailstorm arrived. So severe was it that they all knew at once that it meant ruin to most of them. The one hope of salvation lay, in the departure of another batch of the best manhood of the village for a period of years across the Atlantic. It never occurred to them to try a change in their agricultural methods or to undertake to obtain relief at home, and the Signore of the place seemed astonished that Miss Cyriax should mention such a thing, speaking of America as the natural consequence with the utmost indifference. One is reminded of that Slovak peasant song which runs on Canada and attributes to it both the milk and honey of the land of Canaan and the miracle of Cana—the land of all promise, though no Italian will ever make more than a temporary sojourn in America if he can help it. And poor, one-eyed Nino’s only way of avoiding the doctors and reaching his promised land in Buffalo lay through Canada, though even in the States he was still pursued by his ill-luck. The woman’s hardships appear in the description of Rosina and her cavalieri, as she called the silkworms. After forty days’ incessant work, which at last went on almost continuously day and night and made her temper unendurable, she possessed 56 kilos of silk, for which she received 4 lire the kilo.

But it is unfair to dwell on the gloomy side of the picture, for Miss Cyriax takes these hardships as part of the natural course of events, as do her peasants, and by no means allows them to spoil the fun of it all. We are introduced to the scandals and love affairs of the village, and learn that even a De Marchesi will use the broomstick freely upon her daughter’s shoulders in order to guide her towards a marriage of interest rather than that of love. The only chance for a daughter to get her way is apparently to threaten the danger of a scandal. No wonder the peasant women gloved with enthusiasm on hearing of the prowess of the militant Suffragettes; and even the men were with them.

Miss Cyriax was at pains to see every side of village life from the lime and charcoal burning to the life in the cattle-huts in the mountains. And it was not long before the people opened their hearts to her, once they realized how genuine was her sympathy and interest. The book is, perhaps, a little too long and the return from the mountain to the village, brought its disillusionments, especially about the honesty of Rosina. For ourselves, we prefer Miss Cyriax’s pen to her brush or her pencil.

L. C.-M.
PARIS IN FICTION

THE PARIS OF THE NOVELISTS. By Arthur Bartlett Maurice. (Chapman & Hall. 12s. 6d. net.)

The streets of London would be appreciably the duller without those white-lettered plaques of blue or red which bear witness to the one-time presence of greatness within the houses to which they are affixed. It is pleasant, to be reminded at time one goes to lunch in Soho that Hazlitt was born, or lived, or died in a house just opposite one's favourite restaurant; pleasant to know that next door to the London Library is a maison that has been inhabited by three Prime Ministers; while every time the bus rattles down Baker Street one shoots out myopic glances in the hope, never fulfilled, of discovering who it was that lived in the be-plaused house near the Underground station. Who is responsible? Is it the Society of Arts or the County Council. We are grateful to the commemorators, whoever they may be. Many a tedious walk has been cheered by the sight of one of those round halos of greatness let into a stucco wall.

Mr. Maurice carries the plate-sticking process a step further. All the great men and women of real life have already been commemorated. And so, finding it necessary to satisfy that sense of pietas, that feeling for old sentimental associations which characterizes our American cousins, Mr. Maurice has made it his business to go round marking the houses that have belonged to the great men and women of fiction. He has already blazed his literary trail in New York. Now he descends on Paris with a trunk full of memorial tablets: " In this house Vautrin was captured by the police"; " Here Trilby lived"; and so on with a thousand names from all the novels one has, or ought to have, read. Travellers who love sight-seeing for its own sake will find his book a new source of joy and interest as they visit Paris. Personally, we find we have quite enough to get through in the way of museums and ancient architecture. Your true sightseer is born, not made; and we are not among the congenitally rubber-necked.

On our last visit to Paris there was only one fiction-hallowed spot that we tried to locate, and that was a certain petite plate-forme au pied d'une grande cheminée marquée d'une aigle impériale on the roof of the Louvre where César Capéran lay outstretched in the May sunshine with his pipe and a bottle of his own home-grown wine of Barbazange. We wish that Mr. Maurice had found a place for this enchanting character, the solitary but perfect creation of one of the many French writers whom the war destroyed, Louis Codet. Capéran is worth all the Maupassant heroes, all the personages from the pages of Sue and Paul de Kock and W. J. Locke and Booth Tarkington, whose haunts Mr. Maurice has been at such pains to locate.

Being, as we have said, no sightseer, we should have preferred it if Mr. Maurice had plunged rather deeper into his subject. What an interesting chapter might be written, for example, on the myth of Paris, the fabulous prestige that has made it, partly to its own profit and partly to its detriment, the centre to which all the civilized world has gravitated! The novelists have had their share in creating and fostering the myth. There is Balzac, for instance, with his romantic belief that there were certain things that could only happen in Paris and nowhere else. There is, for Balzac, "ce souvire particulier aux gens de Paris," there are certain mots affreux of which only the fashionable Parisienne knows the withering secret. And then the cynicism of Parisian morality! " A Paris, une belle vertu a le succès d'un gros diamant, d'une curiosité rare"; or again: "Comme tous les Parisiens, Molineux éprouvait un besoin de domination." Other things may happen in Touraine or even in benighted London, but for the real excitements there's no place like Paris.

Or, again, one might have drawn from the novelists of recent years an admirable chapter on the character of modern Haussmannized Paris. Here in England the most important streets are always the narrowest and the crookedest, and have a pleasant habit of leading nowhere at all. In Paris they have run to the opposite extreme, multiplying round-points and stars and vast open places till the life of the pedestrian in these later days of the taxi and omnibus is never out of danger; they have carried the passion for noble vistas and long perspective to the pitch of planting the Trocadéro, rafish and abandoned, to grime between the straddling legs of the Eiffel Tower, down the whole length of the Champ de Mars, at the massive solemnity of the Ecole Militaire.

There are plenty more chapters that Mr. Maurice might have written. As it is, however, he has chosen to confine himself to a more modest, more immediately guide-bookish form. To any one who wants to give his fiction actuality and would like at the same time to enliven his walks in Paris, we can commend Mr. Maurice's volume as a storehouse of amusing information.

A L H

A CHEERFUL LADY

MISS EDEN'S LETTERS. Edited by her Great-Niece, Violet Dickinson. (Macmillan. 18s. net.)

HOW interesting life is! The mere reflection of its most insignificant aspect from a polished surface is delightful. Or is it the surface we admire? But it is inopportune to grub here round the very foundation of existence, and were we not close upon an inquiry about the Thing-in-itself? In this instance let us content ourselves with the polished surface of Emily Eden's mind, and its reflections. They will stimulate metaphysical questions in things only in a very irritable subject, and then by reaction.

She moved in that great world which is so curiously simplified by the exclusion of almost all facts save those relating to well-connected people. A world of this kind takes a long time to produce, and can be kept rolling only at considerable expense; most people have to be satisfied with cheaper methods of ignoring the bulk of reality; but on a comparison of methods, that of the little group of people to which Miss Eden belonged will prove among the most comely.

Emily, having accepted in her sensible way the fiction in which she was brought up, troubled herself no more about it, and turned her very keen and intelligent attention to the people and things about her. She found them amusing, and especially she found it amusing to exist among so many heterogeneous objects, to take them up one after another into her clever consciousness, and then write letters about them. And it is remarkable that she should have found it amusing, since her consciousness really was clever. For the impression conveyed to us, while we enjoy her letters, is that the experience on which they are founded presents, in the handsome binding of an édition de luxe, the plain text of social amenities among commonplace people, with which we are all familiar in one of the popular editions. She was saved from boredom by her humanity; its quality may be gauged partly by the fact that while finding diversion, and only gently ironical, in these surroundings, she had a rich appreciation of solitude, of gardening, and of reading.

If you are in the habit of writing intelligent letters, intelligent correspondents become urgently necessary. These she found in Miss Villiers (Lady Theresa Lewis) and in Pamela, Lady Campbell. These two, and her brother, Lord Auckland, met the imperative need of friendship she had, with all her capacity for pleasing and finding pleasure in a large circle of acquaintance and kin.
Up to 1835, her thirty-eighth year, when she left England with Lord Auckland, who was appointed Governor-General of India, her life was uneventful, so far as we can judge by the letters. Keeping house for her brother, on a small and a great scale, as his fortunate career progressed, alternated with visits to her friends. In either phase we are struck by the absence of general ideas; it is clear that she moves in an atmosphere singularly unruflled by intellectual disturbances; even her interest in politics resolves itself mainly into an interest in personalities: "I have never had a thought of my own, and I do not believe any of us can, in the way we are all educated."

But if she has no ideas about things in general, she has a perpetually renewed interest in the immediate; it is this, with the firm, easy texture of her style, and a delicate oddity of perception, which makes her letters so eminently readable. It is this, but something more; for of all the qualities named she is perhaps fully conscious; but she appears admirably unconscious of the qualities of heart and character she has, and leaves us the pleasure of discovering for ourselves that, for instance, she is unselfish, or that she is capable of a plain seriousness of outlook when occasion calls for it.

She mentions literature only incidentally, but her appreciation of Shakespeare, and still more of "Pride and Prejudice" and of "Puckwic," is of good omen. "Puckwic" is "the only bit of fun in India." "I have not read it through in numbers more than ten times, but now it is complete I think of studying it more correctly."

The letters afford here and there an amusing glimpse into the domesticities of eminent persons. The subject of Lord Goderich to the caprices and tantrums of Sarah his wife is documented with much particularity. Lady Goderich was the stepdaughter of Eleanor, Countess of Buckinghamshire, Miss Eden's sister. "Only to think," exclaims Miss Eden in 1827, "of Lord Goderich being Prime Minister . . . And if he is Prime Minister, what is Sarah? Queen of England at least." Miss Fitzgerald contributes a lively picture of the Lansdowne household at Bowood, where a happier state of things prevails than in the Goderich menage, "for the Wilt woman [Lady Lansdowne] liveth bounden in subjection and loving obedience unto her husband, and filleth her time duly in catering and ordering for her household."

Not the least delightful part of the book is that containing the letters of Miss Pamela Fitzgerald (afterwards Lady Campbell) to Miss Eden. They are especially frequent in the earlier pages, and for a time they eclipse, by their brilliance, vitality and humour, the more sober colouring of Miss Eden's style. Apart from the intrinsic merit of the correspondence, we admire in it a record of undeviating affection. As Lady Campbell puts it . . . "You know, Emmy, we do belong to one another upon some Geometrical System of fitness that we cannot well describe."

The years spent in India removed Miss Eden from the surroundings best suited to her quiet contemplative curiosity, thrusting her into circumstances of pomp and ceremony which she bore a little impatiently. On the whole, the experience proved too large and complicated to be recorded successfully by the delicate mechanism.

Of the remaining years of her life (from 1832 to 1869) we obtain but an imperfect notion from the fifty pages given to her letters over this period. And we miss here perhaps something of the charm of the earlier correspondence, though to the last page she exemplifies the principle with which the book fittingly concludes: "... Please do not spoil them [your children]," she writes to her niece. "Life does not spoil anybody, and so teach them early to take it as it comes—cheerfully."

F. W. S.
ERASMUS AND LUTHER

ERASMUS AND LUTHER: THEIR ATTITUDE TO TOLERATION, BY

It is, perhaps, rather a pity that Dr. Murray, in choosing a title for this very learned and interesting book, did not content himself with the first three words. For the fact is only that it contains a good deal about its two name-givers than a mere discussion of their "attitude to toleration," but that impatient persons, who have to wait for more than half the volume before that attitude makes a definite appearance in the discussion, may make the well-known and always dangerous inquiry, "When are you going to begin?"

This is the more likely in that the book—though, as we have called it, interesting, and even extremely interesting when you are well engaged with it—shows, at the beginning especially, its learning more conspicuously than its interest. One has sometimes of late years heard complaints that books of real learning—of plentiful citation, of footnotes not excursive or decorative, but giving half a hundred authorities of source and comment for half a dozen words of text—are now sadly to seek. To such complainers, if they happen to be sincere, this book may be cheerfully commended. But, except to people who cannot take an interest in serious matters at all, there is no class of readers to whom it need be discommended. For its subject in period and its subjects in personage are such as must maintain a perennial interest for all whose range of interest itself is not brutishly (the word is used in its proper meaning) contemporary. You can hardly find anywhere two such strikingly contrasted and conditioned examples of the eternal types of the active and the contemplative man as Luther and Erasmus. There is hardly a century in history where the world is more often to dispute in all history than the latter part of the sixteenth century and the early part of the sixteenth. With such subjects the more each generation feels itself confronted with its own problems, the more important it is for it to compare and comprehend these others. To Erasmus, indeed, a good deal of attention has for some time past been paid in England, from Froude's characteristic dealings with the Lile to Mr. Allen's masterly handling of the Letters. We have not had quite so much about Luther lately, and just now it is perhaps as well that he should not be too vulgarly handled. It is impossible for anyone who is a critic of literature not to admire him as a man of letters, and to consider the handwriting in which his controversial and the humanum in him: but, to adapt Matthew Arnold's phrase, his composition certainly gives a good many opportunities to anyone to abuse the German paste in it.

Dr. Murray's book—which is, in fact, an extremely minute and admirably documented analysis of the attitudes of the two men not merely to toleration, but to all the mighty quarrels of the time in which they took part in such curiously divergent ways—is a sort of literary history of that quarrel, with pretty frequent apergus of a directly historical character, and not infrequent glances outside the period, which add to the interest. One can be least complimentary to the author on his method, which does too often recall the hackneyed saying about wood and trees. But even in this respect careful reading—at any rate for those who have some knowledge of the subject—will discover clearings and "rides" of thought which make the confusion not quite trackless.

To Luther Dr. Murray is perfectly fair throughout, though, like most people perhaps, he finds his hero's behaviour over the Peasants' War a stumbling-block. He rather "looks through his fingers" (though through shocked fingers) at the condonation of bigamy, and merely mentions the "marriage with Catherine Bora" without any discussion of it or her. He does lay regretful and repeated stress on Luther's encouragement of what has been more recently called "Prussianism," but one is not quite certain to what extent he recognizes the intimate connection of this with the reformer's views on Free Will.

It is on this point that Dr. Murray seems to us not quite so fair to Erasmus, though he analyses the "Diatribae" with just praise. He seems to think that the scholar's view was mainly that of a scholar and a humanist influenced by ancient philosophy and respect for the ancients generally—that it was not so much with him a matter of Christian theology. Now no one would regard Erasmus as first of all a theologian; but it is certain that there are points of view purely Christian—Theological, and not to be found in the classics at all—from which the doctrine of servum arbitrium might be regarded as a sheer "sin against the Holy Ghost." However, that need not be dwelt upon here. Erasmus is undoubtedly a more difficult person to be just to than Luther, except in the case of those for whom "Martin" is either a devil incarnate or a fifth Evangelist miraculously doubled with a second St. Paul. His genius in using the vernacular may be balanced by Erasmus's wonderful command of Latin; the enthusiast who said that, if all Roman literature had perished, it would be worth while to learn the language in order to read the "Colloquies" was not quite a madman. But Erasmus has nothing to match Luther's vivid and exuberant humanity, if he also escapes the Yahoo degradation of that humanity to which Martin sometimes too nearly succumbed. One can understand, and in a way sympathize with, the pathetic "Can you let it—and me—alone?" which the great scholar is always saying to himself, and not infrequently to other people; but it is certainly difficult to make a hero of him.

Besides the two most famous persons, and of their somewhat distant friendship and their very decided enmity, and the things that conditioned and caused these, and of the circumstance and atmosphere of their time, Dr. Murray has written, as has been said, not, perhaps, with absolute clarity, but with satisfactory abundance, and every now and then with a dominating survey which is more satisfactory still. That the Reformation "drifted without statesmanlike guidance" is the absolute, if also the unfortunate truth; and from the results of that misfortune the world has suffered to this present day.

The period is so rich that, though Dr. Murray has cast his net widely, he has only been able to give us glimpses of the whole. Not the least fortunate of these, perhaps, is his account of Melancthon and something of Erasmus's numerous correspondents. The ever-beloved Obscuri are, of course, mentioned, but not much more; and, indeed, they came a little before the main time of the tale. The references to Rabelais are not infrequent, and are judicious; to Ulrich von Hutten Dr. Murray, like some other people, seems rather kind. And we get, once or twice, glances at that most refreshing controversialist, Coelhau.

Besides abundant bibliographical matter (there are more than a dozen pages of it at the beginning, and more than two dozen at the end) there is a very remarkable appendix (fifty pages of smaller type than the main text) on "The Conception of Progress in Classical and Medieval Writers." It is practically a separate work, and might well form the subject of a separate review, though, of course, the connection of the subject with a discussion on Toleration is much more than fortuitous. But to review it adequately would take space nearly as ample as its own, for one would have to deal not merely with classical, medieval, and Renaissance writers generally, but more specially with Seneca, St. Augustine, Roger Bacon, Postel, Bodin, Montaigne, Machiavelli, Rabelais again, Campanella and Francis Bacon, to all of whom Dr. Murray gives special attention. Now there are not many of these on
THE CASE FOR THE CENSORSHIP

SIR EDWARD COOK puts a good case. He does it by the very powerful and popular method of invoking general principles. Do you agree that, in a country at war, a censorship is desirable? You can scarcely be daring enough to say "No," but in case you do, Sir Edward explains the probably disastrous consequences of unlimited free speech. Sooner or later you must give in; you are opposed by such a phalanx of distinguished military men, of awful examples drawn from history, of distressing anecdotes furnished even by the present war, that finally, if you have any respect whatever for specialist opinion and the teachings of history, you must concede Sir Edward his first premise. But having done this you have delivered yourself bound into the hands of those same specialists. It is implicit in the argument that they, and they alone, know what should be censored. No matter how much their particular decisions revolt your intelligence—you have admitted the preliminary hypothesis that, in all cases, they know better. But Sir Edward very graciously tries to loosen the knots of your bondage a little by pointing out that you still control your censors. It is incredible but true. For in every case the censors are bound by the Defence of the Realm Act, and the object was made by—i.e. the persons of your representatives, naturally. It is perfectly legal and aboveboard. You may object that in practice the censorship did several things which were flagrantly unjust or obviously idiotic. Perhaps you are a journalist and have some particular case in mind. The answer is, Not at all. You are referred to Reg. 27, in which occur the words (endorsed by you) "spreads reports or makes statements intended or likely to cause disaffection to . . . ." That is the general principle. If you object to the particular application, you must remember you are not an expert. Thus you are neatly impaled on the other horn.

The fact is that, if you accept Sir Edward's assumptions, then, like the simple schoolboy entrapped by Euclid's axioms, you must accept the rest. The question is, Is victory the first consideration for a country at war? May you lie, suppress the truth, commit injustice, inflame bad passions, deny your religion, if any or all of that gives you a greater chance of winning? May you lose your own soul to gain the world? If you say "No," then where do you differ, logically, from the conscientious objector? What half-way house is there between that depraved object and the patriot who says, "My country, right or wrong"? But we are not a logical people—there is no such thing as a logical people. A people at war is not a collection of logicians, it is a community of individuals torn by conflicting instincts. Consequently, we are neither pacifists nor out-and-out "patriots," and as a further consequence the censorship was both felt to be necessary and fiercely condemned.

Sir Edward, arguing his case as a logician, has no difficulty in concluding it to a triumphant conclusion. But he does not meet the objections to his case, for they were not logical. There is no contradiction in his case for the censorship; the contradiction was in those who were called upon to suffer it.

GEORGE SAINSBURY.
Marginalia

The rewards of literature—there is something deliciously round and episcopal about the phrase. Interested with this swelling title, the thin occasional guineas assume an air of importance—fictitious, alas! For when the guineas come to be turned into food and clothing, they prove to be just as scarce and as meagre as they were before their ennoblement. For us—poor, but honest, or, rather, intelligent and therefore poor

—it is adding ironic insult to injury to call the sweated wages of literature "rewards." But the real rewards of literature, the thousands and ten thousands of which we enviously hear tell, are they inevitably unattainable?

After all, we tell ourselves, we are intelligent enough, we have a sense of humour. Why shouldn’t we be able to beat the authors of best-sellers at their own game?

It ought not to be insufferably difficult to turn out a few “wholesome love stories” or a volume of Wilcoxian gems.

It is only a question of trying.

The genius, whose “genial” works are despised and misunderstood, and who earns his living by writing best-sellers, is not an uncommon character in fiction. But, in real life, does he exist? We have some doubts. There are plenty of people who can counterbalance third-rate journalism with a passable novel; there are few, or none that we know of,

who can produce simultaneously works of genuine merit, and works of genuine popular badness. Would it have been possible for Henry James to have made a fortune by throwing off, in his leisure moments, the novels of Nat

Gould? Or could Mr. Yeats have paid for the luxury of being a poet by writing “Laugh and the world laughs with you”? We can hardly be certain that, however hard he had tried, he would have found the task impossible.

But genius is exceptional; it has nothing to do with the case in point, which concerns only poor, but honest men of letters like ourselves, who are neither geniuses nor Garvices, but simply educated persons with a certain measure of intelligence, even of talent. Surely we might, by the expense of a little patience and ingenuity, hatch from our brains the literary geese that should in their turn lay a few golden eggs. But no; if nature has made it impossible for the man of genius to be pompier, education has done the same for the honest man of letters. Do what he may, he will never be able to write those wholesome love stories, his play will never run for a thousand and one nights, his rhymes will never be sold in cheap editions.

Readers of M. Proust’s enchanting novel will remember how Swann, in what is perhaps the finest episode in the book, finds himself drawn by his unfortunate love affair into a social system revolving round the dinner-table of the Verdurins. The Verdurins—how well we know their English equivalents—are rich, more than circles that are not the highest, and have intellectual pretensions. Lion hunters excluded from the best-stocked game preserves, they have collected a menagerie of the mangiest specimens

—a second-rate man of science, a professor or two, an indolent infant prodigy, a bad painter, with a few members of that section of the bourgeoise which believes itself to be the intelligencia. Into this dismal coterie Swann’s deporable weakness for the fair sex has lured him—Swann, the exquisitely cultured, Swann, the aristocrat, Swann, whose intellectual refinement is as sensitive as that of the princess who could not sleep for the crumpled rose-leaf under her mountainous feather-beds. M. Proust has, naturally, spent all his delicate and elaborate art in describing the discomforts of the situation. We are shown poor Swann faintly and painfully smiling at the Professor’s puns, trying not to be too ironic at each exhibition of bad taste, wincing at the crude (compared with the half-words, the mere suggestions by which his own over-cultured intimates are in the habit of communicating their thoughts) of completed statements, repetitions and the labouring of obvious ideas.

In the presence of what is really popular in literature and drama, most of us feel rather like Swann among the Verdurins. We suffer from the education which it has been our fortune, or, perhaps, our mischance, to receive.

Accustomed to all manner of reticences and restraints, we are constantly and profoundly shocked by the immodesty of the best-sellers and the stage successes. Our delicate intellectual constitutions are appalled by the crudest send-iment; we shrink as the obvious is rubbed into us, like salt into an open wound. It may be, indeed it almost certainly is the case, that our susceptibilities are too tender.

It is true, as Wordsworth said in his Preface to “Lyrical

Ballads,” that “the human mind is capable of being excited without the application of gross and violent stimulants;

and he must have a very faint perception of its beauty and dignity who does not know this, and who does not further know, that one being is elevated above another, in proportion as he possesses this capability.” But it is also true that a human being may become so much elevated above his fellows that he will finally shrink, not merely from familiar and violent stimulants, but from the occasional primary emotions of whatever sort. He will, in fact, become a highbrow. At the present time we see only too many of these persons, self-elevated to an enormous height above the ordinary level of humanity.

But this is a digression from our theme. What we have to ask ourselves is this: Is it possible for a Swann to imitate a Verdurin well enough to escape detection?

Can a person of high, or even of medium brow suppress his natural susceptibilities, overcome all his disgusts and write a best-seller? It seems very doubtful. For even if he has successfully made the moral effort, has braved an ordeal which will cost him as much as for a sly man it would to take off his clothes in the street, even if he has brought himself to handle the unpleasant slush of popular sentiment, will he be able to prevent a cloven hoof of irony from peeping through? No; to be done well, these things must be done with love and conviction. And within their category these things must be well done, or else, to the great credit of those who buy, they will not succeed. Love and conviction work together; and precisely the things that the highbrow cannot, by any possibility, put into it. It looks, alas! as though those glittering rewards of literature were fated to remain for most of us a mirage on our horizon, seductive and unattainable.

Autolycus.

The Public Library Rate in Scotland

The exclusion of Scotland from the advantages of the new Public Libraries Act—particularly as regards the removal of the rate limit—has been very disappointing to Scottish public library authorities, many of whom find the institutions for which they are responsible verging on bankruptcy. The Scottish Library Association has repented to the Secretary of Scotland that the needs of Scottish public libraries are no less urgent than those of similar institutions in England and Wales, and their work of no less importance, Scotland should receive, without delay, equality of treatment in this matter.

At the request of the Committee of the Sandeman Public Library, Perth, the Council of the Scottish Library Association has invited all Public Library Committees to send delegates to a meeting to be held in the Council Chambers, Perth, on Thursday, the 18th inst., to discuss the question of urging upon the Government the claimant need of immediate financial relief for Scottish libraries.

NOTES FROM IRELAND

Dublin, March 5, 1920.

There was a little too much optimism in the reference made here a fortnight ago to the Thomas Davis Society of Trinity College. It appears that, although the Society has not yet been "founded," the members are not allowed by the College authorities to meet in the University. It was, therefore, in a hired room in the city that an audience came together to hear Lord Dunsany when he lectured last week on "Drama in Ireland." Ignoring the existence of every Irish dramatist except Synge, the lecturer's work is to demonstrate that we do not appreciate our dramatists in this country, and held up America as a reproach to both England and Ireland. One gathered that his personal experiences in America recently have convinced him that in one case, at least, the verdict of America to-day will be the verdict of posterity in these islands too-morrow. Yet two of his plays were produced at the Abbey Theatre before his work had ever been seen in London or New York.

In the current number of the London Mercury there is an appreciation of the Misses Somerville and Ross which illustrates most appropriately that divergence of English and Irish opinion regarding Irish literature to which these notes alluded a few weeks back. In the first place, the writer of the article in question, while clearly aware that criticism in Ireland does not agree with his unreserved enthusiasm, has failed to understand it. We do not deny the many fine qualities of humour and observation which distinguish the authors of "Some Experiences of an Irish R.M." from the more obvious qualities of the Irish Romantics. Unlike Mr. Orlo Williams, we agree with the writers of "The Real Charlotte" in considering that book their best. If, as he says, we accuse them of "following in the brightened footsteps of those who have given us the dreary horror of the traditional stage Irishman," it is not because their work is equally bad. At the same time, we have not forgotten that the chief patrons of those "dreary horrors" remarkably resembles the varied classes of the admiring public which Mr. Williams describes. This fact has a significance which seems to have been overlooked by him, when he so confidently guarantees that we shall find in the pages of Somerville and Ross a part of the Irish heart "pulsing with true Irish blood and throbbing with truly Irish emotion."

It is this admission that "a part" only of the Irish heart is revealed which is important. The question is: Which part? And in the answer lies the whole explanation of the difference which is insinuated in conflicting estimates of Irish literature in and outside Ireland. An intimate knowledge of this country is necessary to a proper understanding of the relationship of what may be called the R.M. class to the majority of the Irish people. To describe in terms of politics that relationship would be to transgress the hospitality of these columns. Let it be sufficient to say that, apart from the serious and facile sentiment which make up the popular novels of Miss Somerville and her collaborator, there is no point of decently human contact between the minority and the majority. They are divided, not only by the usual social distinctions, but by deep national antipathies. These majors and horse-women may be "delightfully Irish" to outside observers—many of them, indeed, are more thoroughly Irish in race than the prominent leaders of the Nationalist movement; but so far as the nation to which they belong is concerned they are alien. The writings of those who have been almost exclusively preoccupied with the superficial aspects of what is, to the majority of the Irish people, a tragic problem, cannot be regarded in Ireland with the literary detachment of Mr. Orlo Williams and others.

This is no doubt a barbarous confession of aesthetic blindness, an example of the incurable Irish habit of dragging "politics" into everything. You will notice the same lamentable tendency in the occasional attacks in the review columns of the newspapers which is, Hansi's "Professor Knatschke" is the only form of humor which an Alsatian could reasonably be expected to appreciate in a comapatrict attempting to deal with the lighter side of life in a community without self-government. If any Pole or Dane, reconciled for personal reasons to the régime from which Schleswig and East Prussia have been liberated, had written humorously of the feudal charm of the relations between the governing class and the mere natives, he would expect more applause in Berlin than in Copenhagen or Strasbourg. His all-too-human compatriots would be prepared to risk the accusation of having neglected a masterpiece. Without attempting to belittle in any way the art of Miss Somerville and the late Miss Martin Ross, within its strictly defined limits, Irish criticism will prefer such stories as Thomas Kelly's "The Weaver's Grave," a perfect little masterpiece of real Irish humour. For the rest, nous en avons vu d'autres!

THE LATE A. H. BULLEN

The sudden death, at the age of 63, of Mr. A. H. Bullen, on February 20 last, at Stratford-on-Avon, where he had established the Shakespeare Head Press, reminds us of the finest of Elizabethan scholars, and certainly the one to whom students of Elizabethan literature owe the debt of deepest gratitude. Bullen's scholarship was devoid of any tinge of pedantry, and refined to the highest purposes by an exquisite appreciation of his author. His emendations of the text of Marlowe are a conspicuous example of his gifts.

His published works began with the edition of the works of John Day (1881) and the now rare "Collection of Old English Plays" (1882-5). This was followed by "A Christmas Garland" of carols and poems from the fifteenth century onwards (1885), from the volume which had the general public, and exercised an indubitable influence on the development of modern poetry—"Lyrics from Song Books of the Elizabethan Age" (1886), followed by "More Lyrics from the Song Books" (1887) and "Lyrics from the Dramatists of the Elizabethan Age" (1891). His standard editions of Marlowe, Middleton and Marston, and "England's Helicon" had meanwhile appeared (1885-7). Once more he reached the larger public by his edition of "The Works of Dr. Thomas Campion" (1889), a revelation of a neglected genius, for which the gratitude of English men of letters was admirably expressed by Mr. Edmund Gosse in a memoir on the poet, who followed the lover of literature under a still greater debt by beginning the publication of that invaluable "Muses' Library" from which so many have derived a part of their knowledge of Elizabethan poetry. Bullen, indeed—and this is the highest praise—was infinitely removed from the mere bibliophile. Throughout his laborious career he was dominated by the desire to make the Elizabethans accessible to the widest possible public, and he lavished himself and his none too generous means on this object. His foundation of the Shakespeare Head Press at Stratford-on-Avon was his final effort towards this aim, and it is devoutly to be hoped that a way will be found to maintain this institution, if only as an adequate memorial to one who has deserved supremely well of lovers of our literature.

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL NOTES

Science

EMPIRICISM

"Experientia docet."

Science as a study and a method grows daily in importance. Its progress has become proverbial, and its discoveries fill the world with wonder, for we live in a scientific age. We are led to review our lives and habits in the light of knowledge gained by the scientific method, and in the appeal that Science makes to reason we are sometimes forced against our will to discard long-cherished beliefs and well-established practice. The aim of Science is to establish the truth of material things, and the method employed is that of observation, record and analysis. The most complex processes, even life itself, are reduced to their component units; the relation of unit parts to one another in any complex process is determined by observing the result of varying one unit while other variables are kept constant or eliminated. That the result is due to the introduction of a single variant is proved by a "control" experiment in which identical circumstances are reproduced, but without the introducing of the single variant whose effect is to be determined. The repetition of any sequence is expressed in terms of Cause and Effect, and, given identical circumstances, any sequence is capable of repetition. Following this process of analysis comes a process of synthesis by means of which related sequences find expression in general terms, while generalizations of greater significance are recognized as "Laws of Nature."

This presumptuous phrase realizes the dogmatism of Science. Scientific results brook contradiction only by results obtained by scientific method, for its observations are those of fact, its sequences are based on experiment, and fallacies are avoided by "controls." We may hesitate to accept in the light of knowledge gained by the scientific method, and in the appeal that Science makes to reason we are sometimes forced against our will to discard long-cherished beliefs and well-established practice.

We are tempted to inquire then if there is not an alternative method to that of Science by which material truth may be established, if indeed there are not criteria by which the validity of scientific conclusions may be judged. We have an alternative method in Empiricism, which may be defined as practice based on experience.

"Empiricism" is a word which the medical faculty have so successfully usurped that it has come to mean a method employed in the treatment of disease, based on experience as opposed to experiment. So great is the vogue of Science that empiricism is coloured with a sense of quackery, and to this extent its meaning has some slight reproach. But there is a broader meaning to the word than is contained in its common application to a sect in medicine.

Empiricism is a method based on mass observation, as much as Science is a method based on detailed observation; it is for the most part unconscious, whereas Science is largely experimental; its material is so vast and its period in time so long that it may be simply summed up in the word "experience." Action based on empiricism is as direct and simple as any action that scientific conclusion may lead to, but as its premises are less definite, so its teaching is neither positive nor dogmatic. Science is the child of a recent age, empiricism is as old as all ages, and so it is not a wonder that empiricism is in advance of Science in the discovery of many truths; often empiricism runs alone, and only when Science comes in second is it realized that there was a race; or, from another point of view, we see in scientific results an explanation of what has long been known as fact.

As an illustration of this, let us consider the menu of an evening meal. The order is: Hors d'oeuvre, soup, fish, meat with vegetables, sweet, and savoury; variations occur, but in the main outline this sequence is followed among all civilized people who eat a dinner of many courses. It is an empirical order based on experience, and we are hardly interested in discussing the reason of it. It is like the law of the Medes and Persians, which altereth not, and to that extent more stable than a Law of Nature, such as that of Gravity, which an Einstein may throw doubt upon. For those who care for a reasoned order of things, Science has lately supplied the reason for this sequence of dishes that form an evening meal. The hors d'oeuvre by sight and smell stimulate the cerebral cortex which promotes secretion of saliva, and in themselves they attain a balance of spicy taste and oil that sets all digestive juices in the length of the alimentary tract into an ordered activity. The meat extractives in soup reinforce the stimulatory effect of the hors d'oeuvre on the secreting machinery of the stomach, while the liquid of the soup dilutes any excessive irritability that might result from the spicy food. All is now prepared for the meal, which begins gently with easily digested fish. Meat, largely proteid, with its modicum of fat, balanced by potatoes, largely carbohydrate, and bulked by green vegetables, which also contain some essential foods, forms the pièce de résistance of the meal. The sweets that follow require little effort in digestion, for they are assimilated without need of much internal preparation. The nicest touch in physiology is given by the savoury; this may be a taste of anchovy or kipper, designed to stimulate the appetite again and brush away the feeling of repletion, or in the form of egg and cheese it may give the coup de grâce to an appetite that refuses else to be appeased. This pretty explanation is no fairy tale. We know it all as fact, and it is the result of exact and most intricate observation and experiment, forming as it does one of the most brilliant chapters in the record of physiological research of the last thirty years.

Another example of empiricism confirmed by Science comes from the land of Paraguay, where there are snakes whose bite is poisonous at one time of the year and harmless at another. It is a native custom to catch these snakes and to be bitten by them at a certain time of the year, for the natives thus escape the ill-effects of their bite if they chance to be bitten at a time of year when they are poisonous. In this native custom we have an example of the efficacy of preventive inoculation discovered in a land where the scientific method is unknown. The history of vaccination against smallpox illustrates the same point, for Jenner's work, based on the scientific method, only established and confirmed the empirical knowledge of the day. In the succeeding years, with the discovery of the causative organism of various diseases, preventive inoculation has found increasing scope, and the war has made us familiar with its value. More recently, scientists have discovered that the absence from our dietary of certain essential food factors termed vitamins leads to wasting conditions and to distinct diseases, such as Beri-Beri, Scurvy, Rickets and Pellagra. It is therefore suggested on scientific grounds that wasting conditions should be treated by giving these vitamins, and that Consumption, for instance, in the light of this present knowledge would be best treated by giving cod-liver oil and butter, which contain the fat soluble factor that prevents Rickets, while olive-oil and margarine, which do not contain these constituents, would be valueless. And this in fact is the long-established treatment of Tuberculosis, founded on experience, ignorant of the reason why, which scientific method but tardily comes forward to explain.

These are but three illustrations of knowledge gained by the empirical method, knowledge which is gained by observation in mass, made almost unconsciously and spread over so great a period of time that it is recognized merely as experience, which does not spring from direct inquiry or controlled experiment, and often in empirical knowledge the truth contained is so fundamental that it is not lightly to be cast aside. In fact, in empiricism we have the necessary criterion by which some claims made by Science may be judged when they affect us too nearly; it gives us some standard of comparison when Science speaks dogmatically or hastens foolhardily to interfere with customs or habits that have been evolved through the ages. "Tempora mutantur, nos et mutamur in illis," and "Festina lente" are two proverbs that stand well side by side in the margin of articles that tell the tale of progress in Science.

SOCIETIES

ROYAL.—February 26.—Sir J. J. Thomson, President, in the chair.

PHILOLOGICAL.—March 5.—Sir I. Gollancz in the chair.—Mr. A. C. Wood read a paper on "Leicestershire Place-Names." There is little evidence for the forms of Leicestershire place-names before Domesday Book, the Leicestershire charters in the collections of Kemple and Birch being late copies, even when they are not forgeries, as a large proportion are. For the Middle English period there are many authorities, the most interesting being the Leicestershire Survey of 1244-6. — The Leicestershire, and the Leicestershire Subsidy Roll of 1327. The Scandinavian element in the county is very important, especially in the east and north-east. During the discussion after the paper the President called attention to the very primitive Scandinavian forms which some of these names show. A special feature was made of modern popular pronunciations of names, and forms were quoted from sixteenth- and seventeenth-century documents to illustrate their development.

ROYAL INSTITUTION.—March 1.—Sir James Crichton-Browne, Treasurer and Vice-President, in the chair.

The Chairman reported the death of Dr. Emerson Reynolds, a late manager of the Institution, and a resolution of condolence with the relatives was passed. — Professor W. H. Lang, Mr. W. Carter, Mrs. Stanton Cott, Major-General T. M. Corker, Mr. J. F. Crowley, Sir Charles Cust, Mr. C. F. de Ganah, Mr. K. Gray, Miss Kershaw, Miss Kinnair, Miss McGhee, Brigadier-General E. Makins, Capt. H. G. Mason, Dr. C. G. Morrell, Lady Rayleigh, Mr. W. B. Saville, Mr. K. R. G. Vaizey, Miss Wagner, Professor F. Womack, and Lieut.-Col. V. Wright were elected members.

ROYAL METEOROLOGICAL.—February 18.—Mr. R. H. Hooker, President, in the chair.

Captain C. J. P. Carev read a paper on "The Status of a Meteorological Office and its Relation to the State and to the Public." — A paper by Mr. W. H. Dines, entitled "Atmospheric and Terrestrial Radiation," endeavoured to follow the flow of radiant energy, other than solar, both upward and downward across any horizontal plane in the atmosphere.—Mr. D. Brunt read a paper on "Internal Friction in the Atmosphere."

The meeting passed a resolution stating that the Society were of opinion that before the future constitution of the Meteorological Committee and the status of the Meteorological Office were finally settled, it was desirable that an inquiry by a representative Committee should be held.

ROYAL NUMISMATIC.—February 19.—Prof. C. Oman, President, in the chair.—Dr. G. H. Abbot and Messrs. A. C. Montagu and J. R. Thomas were elected Fellows. Mr. Percy H. Webb read notes on a find of late third-century Roman bronze coins from Egypt, a portion of which he exhibited. Mr. G. C. Brooke read a paper by Mr. R. C. Lockett on the "Coinage of Offa." The date of the earliest pence of Offa was certainly before 760-91 A.D., the date of Jaenberht's death. It was probably late in the reign, as a large number of Offa's moneys also struck coins for Coenwulf. The most reasonable suggestion for the date of the beginning of the Mercian coinage was after the battle of Oxford, in 727, when it might be as well as the Council of Chelsea, 786. The mint was probably Canterbury, as seven of his moneys struck coins for Coenwulf, and three of these also worked for Eadberht, Cuthbert, and Aldred. Cuthbert's name appears in the Eadberht's coinage were probably to be attributed to Eadberht, Bishop of London 772-87. Another penny with a name hitherto not read satisfactorily should probably be attributed to Hubert, Bishop of Lichfield, who was archbishop in 806. The coinage of Offa was evidently struck in Offa's lifetime, either as a complimentary issue or in a period of regency during Offa's absence. A classification of the pennies of Offa was proposed, based on their affinity to the coinage of Jaenberht and Aethelheard.

FORTHCOMING MEETINGS

Fri. 12. King's College, 4 p.m.—"Ecclesiastical Art," Lecture IX., Professor E. Deaner.

Arts League of Service (Big School, Dean's Yard, Westminster), 5.30 p.m.—A Method of Developing an Understanding of Art," Miss M. Bulley.

King's College, 5.30 p.m.—"Historical Theories of Space. Time and Movement: The Modern Relativity—Einstein, Minkowski," Professor H. Wildon Carr.

University College, 5.30 p.m.—"The Social Life of the Romans," Professor H. E. Butler.

Mon. 15. Society of Arts, 5.15 p.m.—"Army Hygiene during the Recent War," General Sir John Goodwin. (Chadwick Lecture.)

King's College, 5.30 p.m.—"Portugal: II. How Portugal Helped in the War," Professor George Young.

King's College, 5.30 p.m.—"New Light on Pestanevel Issues," Lecture III., Dr. A. S. Yahuda.

King's College, 5.30 p.m.—"The History of Learning and Science in Poland," Lecture V., Professor L. Tatarkiewicz.

King's College, 5.30 p.m.—"Outlines of Greek History: The Militaristic Emperors, 963-1025," Professor A. J. Toynbee.

University College, 5.30 p.m.—"Guillaume de Machault's Literary and Musical Work," Lecture VI., Miss Barbara Smythe.

Royal Institute of British Architects, 8 p.m.—"The Planning of American Departmental Stores," Mr. H. Austen Hall.

Surveyors' Institution, 8 p.m.—"The Dodecanese," Professor J. L. Myres.

Royal Statistical, 5.15 p.m.—"The Philosophy of Kant," Lecture IX., Professor H. Wildon Carr.

King's College, 5.30 p.m.—"Contemporary Russia: I. The Tsard and Fourth Dynas," Sir Bernard Pares.

University College, 5.30 p.m.—"The Golden Age in Danish Literature," Lecture VI., Mr. J. H. Helweg.

Royal Anthropological Institute, 8.15 p.m.—"The Ovia Secret Society," Mr. N. W. Thomas.

Royal Meteorological (Royal Astronomical Society's Rooms), 5.30 p.m.—"Clouds as seen from an Aeroplane," Capt. C. R. M. Douglish in 757. Cynethrith's coinage was evidently struck in Offa's lifetime, either as a complimentary issue or in a period of regency during Offa's absence. A classification of the pennies of Offa was proposed, based on their affinity to the coinage of Jaenberht and Aethelheard.

Thurs. 18. Royal Institution, 3 p.m.—"The Spirit of America after the War," Mr. Stephen Graham.

Royal Society, 4.30 p.m.—University College, 5.30 p.m.—"August Strindberg," Lecture VI., Mr. I. Björkhamn.

Royal Numismatic, 6 p.m.—"The Amphilph Coin of Coins of Henry II.," Mr. L. A. Lawrence.
Fine Arts

TITIAN AND GIORGIONE

THERE is a peculiar fascination about the problems raised by a certain relationship between two individual artists; a relationship that can be found more than once in the history of art, when at a critical moment some supreme genius follows close on the heels of a man less richly endowed than himself, and yet at the same time his true precursor, the originator of some far-reaching change in method or in outlook that only finds its full expression at the hands of a greater successor. It seems probable that this relationship subsisted between Giovanni and Nicolo Pisano, between Jan and Hubert van Eyck; it is certain, to take an example from yet another art, that this was how Shakespeare stood to Marlowe. But no more characteristic example of such a relationship could be found than that of Titian to Giorgione. From Vasari onwards it has been recognized by the generality of critics that Giorgione belongs the credit of introducing into painting that new manner which was to replace the technique of Giovanni Bellini and his kin. His romantic reputation, his tragically short life, the enigmatical glamour as well as the rarity of his pictures, have combined to enhance his glory; and yet his place in the hierarchy of painters is for ever below that of Titian. There is an inevitable tendency to over-estimate the claims of the precursor. The very hesitations of his art make it all the more attractive. And when, as in the case of Hubert van Eyck and Giorgione, the problems raised by the attribution of most of the pictures concerned are intricate, the temptation to indulge in such a tendency becomes very strong indeed.

A large part of M. Hourticq's new book is the expression of a reaction against this in the case of Giorgione. Some years ago the same author wrote a short and excellent book about French art in that series of "Ars Una" which belongs to the vanished days when simultaneous editions in the various languages of Europe were a matter of practical politics. It must have required a good deal of self-discipline to compress so much, illustrations and bibliography and all, into four hundred or so pages of a pocketable size. And there is another book to his credit which covers with much discretion and some originality the history of painting in Europe from the shadowy Old Masters of ancient Greece down to the end of the sixteenth century. Since then M. Hourticq has walked much and meditatively in the Louvre, backwards and forwards in the old Salon Carré that we shall never see again. And now, escaping with an almost audible sigh of relief from the Procrustean bed of that pocketable series, he has let himself go over the large paintings of Titian. The book is by no means negligible. It contains a good deal of independent thinking and observation, and nobody who is studying Titian's early work and the vexed problem of his relation to Giorgione would be well advised to ignore it. But taken as a whole it is perhaps hardly what might have been expected from a French art critic of standing; the best French art criticism is the best in the world.

To begin with, it hardly pretends to furnish a connected treatment of its subject. Each chapter reads like a detached essay; the subject-matter of one chapter has indeed appeared with little change as a "Promenade au Louvre" in the Revue de l'Art Ancien et Moderne for 1912. The same material often recurs with a wearisome and disturbing effect of repetition. And the chapters themselves tend to an inordinate diffuseness which obscures the argument and makes the book uneasy reading.

One of them (it is perhaps characteristic, the third and not the first) deals with the correctness—or rather the incorrectness—of the accepted date of Titian's birth. Now it happens that this subject has been discussed in some detail by Mr. Herbert Cook, and his two articles are reprinted as an appendix to the second (1904) edition of his little book on Giorgione, together with a reasoned reply by Dr. Gronau. The arguments in favour of believing that Titian habitually overstated his age in the ad misericordiam appeals of his later life, and that his birth-date has in consequence been fixed ten or twelve years too early, are strong; and Mr. Cook has stated them effectively. He has converted M. Hourticq. But the disciple is not above his master in persuasive force.

The first chapter is devoted to an attempt to prove that the famous "Concert" or "Fête Champêtrée" in the Louvre is by Titian and not by Giorgione. There are passages in that most lovely painting which have led others to doubt whether it is, at any rate in its entirety, the work of Giorgione's hand, although—for readers of English—Rossetti's sonnet and Pater's essay have made it the very symbol and touchstone of his art. But it would require much stronger evidence than M. Hourticq can bring—he relies largely on the very questionable assertion of a drawing in the Malcolm Collection at the British Museum—to persuade most people that Titian painted a picture so strangely dissimilar in colour and atmosphere from the rest of his early work. There is a whole world between the sultry languor of the "Concert" and the fresh warm air of the "Sacred and Profane Love." For this latter point of view, by the way, M. Hourticq finds yet another explanation, based upon a passage in the "Hypnerotomachia," not more convincing than the scores which have preceded it; less so, indeed, if he would really persuade us that the sculptured marble trough in which Cupid dabbles his little hand is filled not with water, but with blood. There is a good deal to be said for leaving the picture its absurd old title. How many mothers and daughters, Baedeker in hand, have stood in front of it in the Borghese gallery, discussing whether the lady with next to nothing on was intended to be sacred or profane?

Perhaps the most valuable parts of the book are those dealing with the identification and interpretation of the pictures from the Mantuan collection now in the Louvre (though many of the names suggested are based on quite unsupported conjecture), and with the genuine and often overlooked religious feeling expressed in Titian's work. But the general effect is spoiled not only by diffuseness, but by a disquieting carelessness as to details. The Crespi portrait (p. 62) has been for years in the Cook collection; Titian would not have taken it as a compliment to be told that the "Christ appearing to the Magdalene" in the National Gallery (p. 110) suggests the atmosphere of a summer evening; and when Ridolfi published his "Meronighe" in 1648 the Mantuan pictures (p. 188) were still in England. But these are trifling points. It is less excusable to support an argument by the suggestion that the Kingston Lacy "Judgment of Solomon," with its only two obvious hesitations and "intentiments" is the copy of a fresco (p. 42); to linger over an idea so wildly improbable as that the rather gloomy allegory of "Religion succoured by Spain" once represented "Women Bathing" (p. 26); or to base confident ascriptions on such trivial correspondences of pose or landscape as must inevitably abound in pictures produced under the studio conditions that prevailed in Venice at the end of the fifteenth and the beginning of the sixteenth century.

E. M.
EXHIBITIONS OF THE WEEK

ALPINE CLUB GALLERY.—War, Peace Conference, and other scenes; paintings by Augustus E. John.

ELDAI GALLERY.—Pastels by Leonard Richmond, Brabazon, John, Conder, and others.

Compared with Mr. Sargent, Mr. Augustus John is not a professional portrait painter. He is not primarily a portrait painter at all. He made his great and merited reputation in quite other fields, and he developed the art which made him famous under conditions and in surroundings quite different from the conditions and surroundings of the professional portrait painter. For the purposes of his art he surrounded himself with a world of his own creation, composed of enthusiastic young artists (who copied, of course, the superficial features of the master's art), pretty Slade School girl students in flowered frocks, half-caste gipsies, and the beautiful lady whom the public knows as "The Smiling Woman." In this world the artist was as beguiling as he was marvellous. He was a king in a milieu of which the raison d'être was the creation of his pictures. As a result of the success achieved by the pictures painted under these conditions, the world of wealth and fashion invaded his studio and offered him their patronage in the usual form—the form of portrait commissions. Mr. John now found himself plunged into a new world which, artistically speaking, was quite foreign to him, and which had quite other raisons d'être than the providing of material for his pictures. It was impossible to graft the new world on to the old; great ladies and Cabinet ministers could not be persuaded to join the devoted troupe; they had neither the time nor the inclination to recognize or patronize then outside activities, and so the master's favourite stance. Mr. John soon found that, so far from being willing to dance attendance upon his moods, they expected him to dance attendance upon theirs. He was thus faced with an entirely new proposition, which the experience of his previous work in no way helped him to solve. He had to engage in a fight where for equipment he had nothing but his marvellously keen eye, his marvellously trained hand.

There were only two courses open to him—unless he was prepared to send the invaders back to Mayfair and Belgrave. He could either acquire a serviceable formula and fit all his sitters into it—become, in fact, a professional portrait painter like Mr. Sargent and the rest—or he could submit himself to the influence of each sitter in turn. He chose the latter course. He approaches every portrait as if it were his first picture, and the sitter the first man or woman he had ever seen. He opens his sensibilities to receive a single instantaneous impression, and he uses his great technical accomplishment to transform his impression into a canvas with the utmost dispatch. The moment the picture corresponds to the impression he leaves it—even if only half the canvas is covered. In contrast to portraits by Mr. Sargent, his portraits reflect not himself but his sitters. Everything in them is suggested by the men or women they portray; not only the attitudes and arrangement of the figures, but even the technical features such as the handling of the paint and the quality of the surface, are determined by the surface character of the sitter.

This method of approach makes a certain proportion of failures inevitable (though it does not excuse or explain such a lapse into mere picture-making as the portrait of La Duchesse de Gramont), and when the artist is Mr. John it guarantees a certain number of works which will compel our admiration. The latter class predominates in the present exhibition. The Canadian soldiers are beautifully seen and powerfully expressed; they have that pathetic appearance of clumsy gentleness and that bewildered expression in the eyes which one notices so often in young soldiers during the war. They are fearless caracterizations in the contrasted social types, "Lady Ottoline Morrell" and "La Marchesa Casati"; and we are convinced by the portraits of Lord Colwyn, Sir Robert Borden, Mr. Hughes, Mr. Massey, and a number of others.

The central piece at the Eldar Gallery's collection of pastels is, by a coincidence, an early pastel by Mr. John, formerly in the Judge Evans collection. It is a spirited and accomplished little drawing possessing few features in common with the bulk of the artist's later works: at first glance it suggests a French genre painting of the late nineteenth century. It is flanked on one side by Charles Conder's "At the Keyhole," an attractive little study, and on the other by Albert Moore's "The Pink Mill." Paintings by Mr. Frank Brangwyn, "The Metal Workers," by Frank Brangwyn, which hangs opposite, contains passages revealing Mr. Brangwyn's powers as a stylistic draughtsman. But we can only see this artist at his best in drawings made with a hard point. The softness of pastel tempts him into those dramatic effects of tone which make his oil paintings and engravings often so obvious. The softness of the medium proves a snare also for Mr. Leonard Richmond, who shows a number of landscape drawings in this gallery. They lack definition of form, without which it is impossible to make even the most romantic of landscape effects intelligible to the spectator. The Brabazon "Sketch in Italy" is as slight as Mr. Richmond's least elaborate drawings, but there is far more form in it and a much subtler sense of colour.

R. H. W.

ADDITIONS TO THE VICTORIA AND ALBERT MUSEUM

The Department of Paintings and the Department of Engraving, Illustration and Design at the Victoria and Albert Museum received several important bequests and gifts during the past year. Sir Frank Short, R.A., P.R.E., presented 100 of his mezzotints, aquatints and etchings in memory of his late Captain Leonard Short, who was killed in action on June 3, 1916. This gift, in addition to prints already in the Museum, makes the Museum collection of Sir Frank Short's work probably the largest and most complete in existence. In memory of Sir Charles Holroyd, R.E., late Director of the National Gallery, two of his water-colours and 43 etchings were given by Lady Holroyd, again making the Museum collection of special value to students. Shortly before her death in 1919, Mrs. Merrick Head—to show her appreciation of the historical collection of water-colours in the Museum—presented 17 water-colours and 13 etchings by Samuel Palmer, who, at the beginning of his long career, was in close association with Blake and Calvert. A set of the drawings bequeathed to his honeymound tour through Italy in 1849-50, and belong to a period of the artist's finest work, not hitherto adequately represented in any public collection. Bernard H. Webb, the architect, was always a warm friend of the Museum, to which, at his death in 1919, he bequeathed all his collections. Among these are a large number of water-colours, pastels and drawings by the British School; a considerable collection of drawings by Old Masters, and a large series of modern drawings, etchings and woodcuts. The family of the late Captain Guy Baker, in accordance with his expressed wishes, presented 27 water-colour drawings by Mr. Wyndham Lewis. This collection is representative of the artist's work in the years preceding the war, and strikes a modern note among the Museum collections. The same remark applies to a series of drawings presented by Messrs. Ezra Pound and C. Lovat Fraser, showing different phases of the work of H. Gaudier-Brzezka, who died on active service in France at the early age of 24. A selection from these gifts and bequests is on view in the East Hall of the Museum, and among other gifts there are water-colours and drawings by J. Baverstock Knight, H. Etridge, John Glover, Burne-Jones, C. A. Hunt, A.R.W.S., Romilly Fedden, Blamire Young, R.B.A., John Wright, A.R.E., and Lovat Fraser. Among some purchases on view is a series of 4 studies by Degas for his oil painting in the Ionides Collection of the Ballet scene from Meyerbeer's "Roberto il Diavolo.

It is hoped shortly to place on view in Room 132 a large number of other gifts and purchases made during 1919.

ETCHINGS AND DRAWINGS

On Monday, February 16, Messrs. Sotheby sold modern etchings and drawings, the property of Sir Henry Peto, Sir Herbert Raphael, and the late Mr. Lawson Thompson, the chief prices being: Monet, Landscape, £85, and Impression of a Circus in War-Time, £85; Demolition of St. James's Hall, interior, £5s. Anders Zorn, Zorn in a Fur Cap, £7s; The Swan, £6s; Mona, £15s; The Letter, £6s; Vicke, £80. D. F. Cameron, Palazzo Dario, £95; Robin Hood's Bay, £422. Sir F. Seymour Haden, Shermil Pond, £82; Sunset in Ireland, £50. C. Meryon, L'Abide de Notre Dame, £210.
Music

THE PROBLEM OF "DON GIOVANNI"

There is no opera which presents greater difficulties to a producer than "Don Giovanni." In most of Mozart's operas, as in practically all works of Mozart, the interpreter may be sure that as long as he sings or plays his notes accurately in time, in tone and in phrasing, the composer may be trusted to do the rest. If there was ever a musician who knew exactly what he wanted, and how to get it, it was Mozart. With Gluck or Moussorgsky the whole work is so unfinished and untidy that it cannot be put on the stage at all until it has been trimmed and straightened up and licked into shape. They were not quite sure what they wanted to do, and often very vague as to how to get their results. With Mozart, all one need do is to begin at the beginning and go straight through to the end without making the slightest alteration. The one great exception to this rule is "Don Giovanni," and it is curious that this in some ways most unsatisfactory opera should have been acclaimed universally as Mozart's greatest work, even as the greatest of all operas. Perhaps it is so indeed, in that its greatness has survived all its accidents and misfortunes.

Da Ponte, the librettist, began the trouble. He was in a hurry and overburdened with other work, so instead of writing out a new libretto of his own, he borrowed an old one and rearranged it. As the composition of the opera progressed, it was further rearranged by Da Ponte or by Mozart himself, and after the first performance at Prague, further alterations and additions were continually being made. Finally, after Mozart's death, there came the Romantic movement which misinterpreted the opera from beginning to end and saddled the nineteenth century with a thoroughly-false tradition from which it has hardly ever been set free.

The first thing of all to remember is that "Don Giovanni" is a comic opera, not a tragedy. But it is a very queer kind of comic opera. It originated with that favourite old-fashioned type of burlesque, the rehearsal of a serious but ridiculous drama. Its ancestors are "Pyramus and Thisbe," "The Rehearsal," "The Critic." The opera from which Da Ponte borrowed his libretto was not just a Don Juan opera; it was a Don Juan opera within the framework of an opera dealing with the absurdities of operatic singers and managers. Da Ponte dropped the framework, and Mozart, in some queer spirit of devily, set certain episodes of the story with a terrifying seriousness of inspiration. It is hardly likely that Da Ponte ever read Shadwell's play 'The Libertine'; but to see "Don Giovanni" makes one consider what might have happened if Da Ponte had come across the plays of Webster and had suggested 'The Duchess of Malfi' or 'The White Devil' as a comic-opera libretto for Mozart to set.

The Romantics loved everything that was grim and grizzly, and they yielded easily to the temptation to believe that while men were often wicked, perhaps all the more attractive for their wickedness, women were always virtuous—if not in fact, at least in intention. There is no doubt whatever that Da Ponte and Mozart both intended Don Giovanni himself to be fascinatingly attractive; but it was an attractiveness that, so far from being derived directly from his wickedness, was calculated much more to distract all attention from it. Donna Anna has been exalted into a heroine, but really poor affectionate Donna Elvira is much more heroic, for in spite of all Don Giovanni's ill-treatment of her, she is the only one of his lady friends who stands by him loyally up to the end. But it is clear from the construction of the play that none of the ladies is more than 'a woman of no importance.' Da Ponte's predecessor provided Don Giovanni with four of them; but probably the Prague company could not raise more than three competent singers. It does not much matter what their names are, or what their characters may be—Handsome, ugly, all are women.

Oh, the Spring, the Spring, the Spring!

Yet there are many people still who refuse to admit that "Don Giovanni" can be a comic opera. Rape, murder and sacrilege are to them very serious matters, and they are incapable of realizing the force of what is really the most convincing and incontrovertible proof, namely, the musical structure and style of practically the whole opera, and most especially of the ensembles. It is no use telling them to compare "Don Giovanni" with "Idomeneo," which is a real opera seria, because "Idomeneo" is utterly unknown in this country, and is hardly ever performed even in Germany.

There was a performance of "Don Giovanni" given a few years ago in London at a popular theatre which, in spite of very rough singing and playing, did at least present the work continuously as a comic opera. At the Surrey last week it was almost a comic opera, but not quite. Mr. Milner's conception of the hero was too romantic. It suggested Baudelaire rather than Da Ponte, and both his first costume and the make-up reminded one oddly of the Flying Dutchman. The Flying Dutchman is in fact the German romantic presentation of the Latin Don Juan type. The whole production was more or less on conventional lines. But it had several features which deserve to be noticed. To begin with, there was a notably good singer as Elvira. As the opera proceeded it seemed that it would have been more appropriate to cast Miss Maryn Elmar for Anna, and Miss Ida Cooper for Elvira; Elvira demands the more emotional type of singer, whereas Anna must always be hard and severe. But the point to be observed is that Elvira is a part which requires an actress of real personality, and that at the Surrey that requirement is fulfilled. Another part which generally comes off badly was also very well filled—Don Ottavio, very convincingly sung (and it is by no means easy to make Ottavio convincing) by Mr. Lyon Munro. The two things about the Surrey performance was the courageous attempt to tackle the recitativo secco in English. It was not sung throughout, but the singers all showed that they were quite capable of it. It had the real quality of recitative; it was not oratorio singing, and the dialogue was delivered so pointedly and vivaciously, that the late Lady Macfarren's translation began to appear a good deal less insipid than it has generally been reputed.

Taken all round, there was much in the performance that was makeshift and unfinished; but it was clear from the outset that it could be gradually pulled together and polished up. An intelligent makeshift performance of this type is far better than a complete and unalterable production on fundamentally wrong principles.

Edward J. Dent.
MORE ÄSTHESSICS
The Foundations of Music. By Henry J. Watt, D.Phil. (Cambridge, University Press. 18s. net.)

"THE earlier part of this volume," says Dr. Watt, "is more or less a careful and straightforward (‘dogmatic’) exposition of the fundamental notions of the psychology of tone. I think the musician should find it both useful and helpful." We wish we could agree with Dr. Watt, but, after brooding a good deal over these pages, we have to confess that our own feeling is one of complete bewilderment. To illustrate our perplexities is out of the question; it would involve quoting virtually the whole of the second, third and fifth chapters. So let us pass at once to Chapter X., from which point onwards the general drift of Dr. Watt’s argument is fairly clear, though frequently clouded by a needless obscurity of style.

The main thesis of the musical part of the book may perhaps be summed up in a single sentence of the author’s own wording: "All music is primarily and essentially paraphonic, and only in the second place polyphonic," or has paraphony for its foundation. "As the term ‘paraphony’ is probably unfamiliar to many musicians, it may be as well to explain that, for the purpose of classifying intervals, Dr. Watt borrows the old Greek terms ‘symphony,’ ‘paraphony,’ and ‘diaphony,’ which he substitutes for the ordinary text-book headings of Perfect Concord, Imperfect Concord, and Discord. He establishes his thesis by induction, based mainly upon an ingenious tabular investigation of the principle underlying the prohibition (in varying degrees of vigour) of certain familiar consecutives. He has no difficulty in disposing of explanations hitherto offered for these prohibitions. The line of argument he substitutes for as follows: (1) Symphony means a momentary loss of dissonance, a unit in the chain of confusion (it would be simpler to say that in the former case the tones blend too perfectly, in the other they refuse to blend at all). (2) These effects of symphony and diaphony are, of course, more pronounced when two intervals of the same species follow one another than when there is only a single one of them. (3) Hence sequences (or, as we call them, ‘consecutives’) are forbidden, the suggested reason being confirmed by a comparative study of the different formulations put forward by various theorists, which agree in making the strictness of the prohibition vary directly as the degree of symphony or diaphony concerned, the stringency being greatest when the interval of octave has preceded, second in the order of importance, the interval of the perfect fifth, third in the order of importance, the interval of the perfect fourth, and so on. This being established, it seems easy to follow Dr. Watt to the further conclusion that ‘Paraphony is the basis of music,’ or, as he expresses it elsewhere, ‘For the proper flow of simultaneous melodies intervals must either be themselves actually paraphonic or they must be used paraphonically.’ There are, however, two considerations that make us hesitate to accept Dr. Watt’s argument.

First as to the conclusion itself. It will be observed that intervals need not themselves be ‘actually paraphonic,’ provided they are ‘used paraphonically.’ It is what this modification really means that we have to determine. Dr. Watt devotes a special chapter to this purpose, and the chief modifying factors admitted by him are (1) contrary and oblique motion, (2) melodic cogeny in any of the parts, (3) duplication of parts, and special spacing of harmonies that becomes possible as the number of parts increases. This is all right as far as it goes, but we do not think it goes far enough. Dr. Watt trusts too much to the ‘absolute’ view of concord and discord. From the physical point of view (which he disclaims) this is no doubt correct; from the psychical, or ‘tones-as-they-are-heard’ standpoint, it is surely necessary to admit that discord is susceptible of degree, and depends to some extent on the context, and possibly (this is more dubious) on aesthetic convention. The whole course of musical history supports this view, yet Dr. Watt will have none of it;

On our interpretation, all this line of speculation is completely cut out. The series of fusions has its neutral point—or its region of natural ease and familiarity as it were—in the middle, in the thirds and sixths. Once we have found the true system of functions of intervals, the false motive suggested by the apparent course of history entirely loses its value. Here many musicians—we cannot speak as to psychologists—will join issue with Dr. Watt. "Admit the relativity of discord as one of your modifying factors," they will say, "and we can accept your principle; otherwise we cannot. It does not leave us scope enough for the enlargement of our musical vocabulary, and we think that your rejection of our amendment rests on a failure to distinguish physical from psychological truth; whereas your whole book is supposed to be the outcome of your recognition that purely physical truths are not in themselves of any assistance to us."

Apart from this, however, is it so certain that Dr. Watt has found the ‘true system of functions of intervals’? Our own inclination is to accept Dr. Watt’s conclusion (subject to the reservation made above) as being in accord with what we might call aesthetic common sense, but to reject entirely the chain of reasoning by which he arrives at it. There has been (and is) an enormous amount of humbug and hypocrisy mixed up in this matter of prohibition. It must be remembered that consecutives are only forbidden if they occur between the same pair of voices. No one has any objection to their harmonic occurrence. Palestrina does not hesitate to place two triads of the CEG type in juxtaposition, even in three-part writing, provided they are not in the same voice at the same time (which is the true prohibition by shading the parts. (A good example is found at the end of the 8th and beginning of the 9th bar of the first ‘Kyrie’ in the ‘Missa Brevis.’) The prohibitions, therefore, imply the ability of the listener to follow two or more melodies simultaneously as melodies, and from our own experience, and from the inquiries we have made of others, we are doubtful if this power exists, except in abnormal cases. No doubt you can be vaguely conscious that they are melodies, and not mere harmonic filling-up; but that is a very different thing from tracing each melodic curve in absolute detail. It is enormously difficult to do that, even when two parts only are going (to read two melodies simultaneously, even the higher has the power) and of course the difficulty increases with each additional part that comes in to claim a share of the attention. The apprehension of a fugue is largely harmonic; each entry gives a clue, from which the melodic continuations (in the middle parts at any rate) are inferred by the mind rather than heard by the ear. If you choose to concentrate on one of the inner parts, no doubt you can follow it melodically (though with increasing difficulty as the texture thickens); but as soon as you do this you find your apprehension of the outer parts becomes blurred.

For the time being, therefore, we are inclined to suspend judgment as to the soundness of Dr. Watt’s argument. It must be recognized, however, that musicians are bound to tire sooner or later of mere harmonic exploitation, and the next step forward will probably be the development of the power of simultaneous melodic apprehension. That should lead us to a simpler type of musical art, which is much to be desired both on aesthetic and economic grounds. The whole question of these prohibitions (present virtually in abeyance) will then very likely be raised again, and Dr. Watt’s explanation of them will have to be reconsidered. Even now it may well be historically correct, for in pre-harmonic days (when these prohibitions arose) the power of horizontal apprehension was conceivably greater than it is to-day. In the meantime it would be premature to take the book as gospel, though much of it is suggestive and stimulating in a high degree.

R.O.M.

CONCERTS

Miss Muriel Hughes, who gave a vocal recital on Feb. 25, is evidently a keen admirer of Mr. Phanket Greene, for she faithfully reproduced some of his interpretative mannerisms. Her voice is, at present, rather uneven in quality, and her diction more energetic than easy, but she sings with much initiative and with charm, especially in songs of a slow and sustained character.

Mrs. Anne Thursfield's programme of songs on March 2 ranged from Handel and Scarlatti to Negro Spirituals. She is equally at home in all styles, and her pure singing and delicate enunciation never fail to charm her audience. There were few modern English songs in this recital, but the one small group included a very poetical and beautiful song of Arnold Bax, "To Eire," and a song by James Lyon, "Wild Geese," the restraint and simplicity of which were more effective than many more up-to-date ingenuities. Miss Daisy Backstrook contributed a notable share to the success of the recital by her admirably playing of the accompaniments. Her clear and elastic touch was especially valuable in the older music.

At the London Trio's concert the same day a Trio in D major by Serge Tanéiev was played, but like most of the composer's works it proved a very dry and uninspired work. Mr. Pécskai gave a fine performance of Bach's Chaconne, and Mr. Amendt sang magie songs of Fauré and Duparc with real understanding. He also sang Brahms' "Immer leiser" in French; but he may rest assured that London audiences are now quite happy to listen to German songs in their original language.

Miss Vivien Hughes, who played the Violin Concertos of Beethoven and Saint-Saëns with the London Symphony Orchestra at the Queen's Hall on March 2, has a delightfully broad and free style of bowing. The dignity of her phrasing is almost excessive; Saint-Saëns gained considerably in weight, but Beethoven would have been the better for a little more jollity, and even as for considerably less of Leopold Auer's cadenzas. Between the concertos Mr. Hamilton Harty conducted a good performance of the Love Scene and Scherzo from Berlioz's "Roméo et Juliette."

Some songs by a new composer, Alec Robertson, were introduced on March 4 by Mr. Douglas Marshall, whose extremely intelligent playing of the accompaniments showed them off to the best advantage. Mr. Robertson has set several poems from the Chinese, but he writes very much better music when he associates himself with contemporary English poets. Miss Ethel Walker played two preludes and fugues of Bach in a very neat and musicaally style.

The return of Richard Strauss to the Queen's Hall programmes was the occasion of a great demonstration of enthusiasm last Saturday afternoon. "Don Juan" was placed last on the list, presumably in order to allow those who disapproved to make their exit. The concert was on the whole a dull one, and the orchestra were hardly at their best, but they suddenly woke up for the Strauss, and gave a most exhilarating performance of it. The programme included also Mr. George Dyson's fantasias "Sienna," inspired by the Festa del Palio. Its opening promises more than it performs.

The beginning and the end suggest that Mr. Dyson might have painted a vivid Italian picture after the manner of Tchaikovsky's "Procesion del Rosario," but he is unable to keep up the interest, and there are frequent lapses into a sadly English dulness and sentimentality.

The first performance of the new season of the Independent Theatre, which has now revived its activities, will be given on Sunday, March 21, at the Civic Theatre, Hammersmith. The programme will be "The Deluge," by Bernard Shaw; "The Glittering Gate," by Lord Dunsany; and "Et Puis Bonsoir," a mime play by Ruby Ginner. The cast will include Milton Rosmer, Suzanne Shelton, Mona Limerick, Gordon Bailey, Allan Jeayes, Hector Abbas and Arthur Phillips.

MUSICAL NOTES FROM PARIS

The announcement of the reapparition of Isadora Duncan attracted an enormous audience to the Trocadero on March 6, and the immense hall was not only full but overloading when the dancer appeared on the platform, against a background of grey-blue draperies, and illuminated by an orange "tint," to give her interpretations of Strauss' "Salome." It must be said at once that the whole performance was singularly ineffective. The almost complete immobility of the white-draped figure was only disturbed by an occasional step, forwards or backwards, or by a slight variation in the elevation of the outstretched arms. One can imagine the effectiveness of a statueque immobility adopted for a brief moment, and in contrast to rapid, or, at least, continuous motion; but Isadora Duncan's series of slowly changing statuesque (or rather stained-glass-window) poses, coupled with the desolating "longeurs" of Schubert's music, produced an impression of almost intolerable horordon, and not at all one of Consolation, which Miss Duncan, in her message "To the Public," declared it was her intention to communicate. The second part of the programme consisted mainly of Tchaikovsky's sixth symphony (the "Pathetic"), in which the dancer accompanied the orchestra (or was it vice versa?) throughout. Here again we were invited to seek "consolation" in Tchaikovsky's "sobs," (to quote the "message" once more), but that crying found our associates with "pathetic" music in general, and Tchaikovsky's in particular, refused to be driven away, and was probably intensified by the stifling heat of the overcrowded hall and the general demeanour of the audience.

The latter, one felt, were assisting at a ritual rather than a purely artistic ceremony, and many of those present would probably never have crossed the street in order to see Pavlova dance, or the Russian Ballet perform works of art. But cults exist in Paris, as in London, and elsewhere under the sun, and after all they never do anybody much harm. Only, it is pleasant afterwards to get out under the night sky and breathe the real fresh air...

The "S.M.I." gave their sixty-third concert on the 4th, and the programme was made up, as usual, entirely of first performances. Incidentally, Lord Berners' "Poison d'Or" was played for the first time in Paris. It did not arouse much enthusiasm, which is, perhaps, scarcely astonishing. Honegger's "Sept Pièces Brèves" for piano solo, on the other hand, aroused, if not enthusiasm, various other emotions of a lively kind, some of the audience being moved to laughter, others to audible indignation (someone had provided himself with a whistle), and a third section to a state of mild amusement tempered with boredom. A fourth contented itself with applauding loudly in order, we suppose, to show its appreciation of the pianist. "Seven Pièces" as a whole being very original, and on the whole uninteresting. Inghelbrecht's new "Sonatine" for Flute and Harp (published by Lesse) was also played, and proved very pleasing in a cool and refreshing way. A series of twelve melodies on Tuscan popular songs by Castellnuovo Todesco contained real musical interest.

Busoni is back in Paris, and will give three recitals during March.

The printers' strike has had the effect of slowing up the publication of almost all the magazines, and the chief musical monthlies have not been able to appear.

R.H.M.

From the Year-Book Press come a Magnificent and Nunc Dimitiss for double choir (4d.), another for four voices set to the metrical version of Sternold and Hopkins (4d.), a motet for six voices "Hoc Dies" (4d.), and "Expectans Exspectavi," a short poem by Charles Sorley set as an anthem, all by Dr. Charles Wood. The last seems too personal and intimate for a choral setting, but the others are excellent models of that dignified and austerely formal style which Dr. Wood has always so gracefully recommended to be the only appropriate one for the services of the Church.

The 26th James Forrest Lecture will be delivered at the Institution of Civil Engineers on Tuesday, April 20, at 5.30 p.m., by Sir Douglas Clerk, the subject being "Fuel Conservation in the United Kingdom."
Drama

IN THEIR DEGREE

TAGORE

THE semi-private performances of a "dramatic society" should not, perhaps, be exposed to the full rigour of public criticism; yet the milk-and-water mystery plays of Rabindranath Tagore, presented with very amateur talent diluted or made lurid by a touch of musical-comedy stock, bore one less, just a little less, than the standardized drama of commerce. Tagore has practically no ability as a dramatist; in his descriptive passages such phrases as that about the snipe "wagging their tail" lead one to believe that there may be something fresh, or at least first-hand, in the idiom of his Bengali, even though there be no distinction in the English translation. Moreover, he has, in our opinion, been shamelessly exploited—exploited until we are weary of him, and annoyed that praise given to what his first admirers divined to be the possible charm of his lyricism in his own tongue, of the metrical intricacy and finesse of his prosody in his own tongue, should be paraded as an estimate of increasingly unmeritorious versions in English.

Neither "Autumn Festival" nor "The Post Office" had either a dramatic merit in making, or a technical stage efficiency in presentation, equal to, let us say, "Puss in Boots," as done by Miss Morris' juvenile company, yet the plays were less of a bore than various "successful" pieces now running at the commercial theatres. This is due, possibly, to the fact that even the very mild infant-school didacticism of Tagore's religion is a more mysterious urge than the equally simple avarice, the unutterably patent desire to get gate receipts, which prompts the "creation" of the "normal" commercial play.

We cannot promise the public any reward for attending these plays of Tagore. But Nissanka Mendis (alone out of both casts) managed to play his small part with such unaffected feeling that one could discern, faintly, the possibility that a full company of Indians might create an illusion of reality if they tried the play in Bengali.

SHERIDAN

THE Old Vic, welcomes one with at least the aroma of a place dedicated to the Muses; here, at any rate, plays may have been played before Semitic luxuries had wholly dominated the scene and before the light of Belasco had emphasized the errors of Columbus.

"The Rivals" is an excellent argument for our quixotic belief that the dramatist should contribute something to the general effect of the play.

The text is feminist, it was at its first performance, perhaps, as didactic as Shaw; it is an anti-duelling play, it advocates slightly better education of women, it is a "revel of youth" play; and, despite these sins against utterly-utter aestheticism, it has escaped the corruption of time.

The construction is correct, though the joining is not so close that in a modern farce-comedy by Mr. Maltby, Patter and wit have preserved it, as they have preserved the atrociously unconstructed "Merchant of Venice" (not that the present critic professes an ability to sit through the horrors of Mary Gray's Portia and a Potash and Perlmutter Shylock).

Sheridan's text is so good that the play holds even with rather moderate acting. Mr. Warburton, Mr. Montague Shaw, and Mr. Hawkins sustain their roles; Mr. Shaw's Capt. Absolute is sympathetic; Miss Carlton has stray moments of charm in the first act. O'Trigger is defective, he is the stage Irishman without a brogue; Absolute's imitation is not of him, but of what he ought to be.

Lydia's age is several times stated to be "seventeen." As Sheridan reiterates this specification, he may have intended it to have a functional value in the play. What is pardonable impulsiveness at this tender age is dangerously near to seeming like ineradicable and idiotic repulsion if the stage heroine appears twenty-five. In fact, this discrepancy between the stated and the apparent age of Lydia in the Old Vic. performance is enough to throw the whole play out of scale; and we may open discussion as to the very different "value" of Absolute's little trick if we suppose him to be nineteen or twenty indulging in a schoolboy lark, or twenty-five or six, genuinely fond of Miss Languish, and deceiving her for her good, or merely a fortune-hunter.

Mr. Montague Shaw's interpretation was, on the whole, the best in the play; and, indeed, a very good way to take the character. The art of play-writing from Shakespeare to Moliere, and from Moliere to Sheridan, is the art of making a certain number not of wholly empty "types" nor yet of absolutely "solid" individuals; but of, as it were, half-hollow, half-transparent, reservoirs into which the actor can pour his colouring interpretation.

Every company of players now in London might play "The Rivals," and we should still have a different play at each theatre—we should, indeed, have a set of plays considerably less monotonous than the series to be found in the "Entertainment Index" for this morning. We come to comment, and not to reform, but an edict ordering the same Sheridan or the same Webster play at all theatres would expedite the rebirth of drama.

In detail we noted that Acres, despite attributing a Cockney accent to his unspecified rural district, made good in his scene with Absolute, before sending the challenge; Faulkland made a good curtain in Act III. sc. iv. The performance would be improved by shortening the intervals between scenes, and by shortening Lydia's skirts; this latter abbreviation might be an anachronism, but it would help her to feel her true age.

RUSSIAN MATINEES

BULL - BAITINGS, loins and extremities have given place to the arts of the theatre, and the spectre of Bolshevism has driven the Spectre of the Rose and the Russian aesthete to London. We have, therefore, a chance for honourable exploitation of the sorrows of Moscow and "St. Petersburg." Messrs. Comisarjevsky and Rosing have opened their season a little before they are really ready, but the venture is a brave one, and deserves support on the quite selfish basis that if they go on they can quite probably purvey very enjoyable programmes.

For the moment Mr. Rosing himself is the only "unique attraction," the only "one and original" of their repertoire; but given the "high" ideals, the definite and visible intention to refuse nothing because it is "too good for the public," the Russian Matines of the Duke of York's should serve as a foil for much of the known and latent talent in London—talent that is for scene, for ballet-invention, for music-drama, and for both decorative and poetic devices.

The devotees of ballet of the Pavlova-Nijinsky period will for the moment find their pleasure in the current bill, though Miss Bedells is a nervous rather than a sinuous dancer, and though her capacity seems limited to an expression of the "lighter emotions"; and though she has a playful girlliness, a rather faintly coloured eroticism, none of the Slavic "surge and thunder," none of the "Oriental" richness of the old Russian performers. She is, in brief, one to dance Dobson rather than Swinburne, but able to captivate her audience in the old story "False Caprice," and certainly able to fill a good quarter of the afternoon if not called upon to be the mainstay of three quarters.

She had a sympathetic rôle in the second ballet, though we have as yet no authentic communiques to fortify the implication that Dutch costume has been adopted in Riga, Vladivostock, or any other typically Russian or Slavic seaport.

The corporation needs enriching; it needs more brain, new inventions, old bits of “Swan” and “Bow and Arrow” can sink into memory. Dolls also have been somewhat fully exploited; Comisarjevsky’s performance contains, however, some novelty, and Margot Luck has just the touch of personality which might “make” a dancer. The doll movements are not maintained with the consistency which solidified “La Boutique Fantasque.” If this laxity gives a chance for some pretty moments, it is, nevertheless, a weakness of aesthetic; it leads nowhere, and cannot, in the long run, succeed.

The kidnapping of the smallest doll child by the ogre at the end of Scene Two leads nowhere at all; it is merely a piece of byplay having no structural function. There are probably better-written ballet scenarios lying in various juvenile desks.

But the important thing, and what might, with a reasonable measure of success, become even a significant thing, is that an art theatre has been started, under some auspices other than imbecile. Here is a company to whom the finest perceptions are welcome rather than unwelcome. This potentiality should not be neglected.

Of the announced programme for next week, two items have already been performed at the Lahta (Russian art society). The Nursery is frankly a bore, but the Russian Folk Scenes were an up-to-the-minute success on the restricted Wigmore Hall platform, and should gain greatly by their transfer to more commodious quarters, providing M. Rosing continues to act as “The Showman.”

T. J. V.

Correspondence

MR. CLIVE BELL AND “WILCOXISM”

To the Editor of THE ATHENÆUM.

Sir,—Since so much of Mr. Bell’s “querulous hospitality” (ATHENÆUM, March 5, p. 311) appears to come into my direction, you will perhaps allow me the publicity of your correspondence columns to pay him a compliment he has more or less deserved; that is, to examine his pronouncements.

First of all, Mr. Bell has discovered that “the Imperial Painters at Burlington House”; and the whole warlike array of painters marshalled before that mighty Empire is the monster before which he abusively struts. He is concerned for the honour of his country. The military character of the spectacle is alone sufficient to vex and disturb him; and, of course, he had no hand in marshalling it—not even that of the non-com. barking at its heels.

But Mr. Bell knows as well as anybody else that this vast display does not represent the serious painting being done in England, any more than a promiscuous exhibition of the same extent and nature in Paris would represent that of France. Furthermore, had Derain, Matisse, Vlaminck and those painters of his choice working in Paris been employed by a similar authority in France, they would have been unlikely to produce work at all comparable to the best of their independent and unconditioned work.

It must be admitted at once, however, that beneath his parade of dishonesty and effrontery, Mr. Bell is really a sincere, if hallucinated, soul. For he regards Paris with something of the awe-struck glee and relish of a provincial urchin at the sight of a Cockney guttersnipe. Is there anything that almost any artist with a little prestige in Paris might not tell him that he would not swallow unhesitatingly? He is, almost, you might say deliberately, the comic “Anglais” of French caricature. He is a grinning, effusive and rather servile Islander, out on his adventures among French intelligences. Besides, when you consider the five long years he has been exiled from France it is no wonder that he should give proof of an almost ecstatic contentment at being able at last to get there again.

As regards the details of his conceit, “Wilcoxism”: to write one week that his friend Mr. Grant is greater than William Blake or Hogarth, and the next to your contributor R. H. W. asserting that “Mr. Lewis possesses certain affinities with Leonardo,” is just a droll essay in impudence. R. H. W. does not, as far as I can find, say that “Mr. Lewis was a match for Leonardo”; so Mr. Bell has, not unutterably, indulged in a little dishonest shuffling of words.

To write, “Mrs. Wilcox has no reason to suppose that her friends were not the greatest writers alive,” is to challenge the reflection which must come to anyone’s mind that, if ever it were so, Pot is calling the Kettle black; and calling it black with the full consciousness that those conversant with the tenderly sympathetic attitude of Mr. Bell and his friends to each other would say either, “What charming effrontery on the part of Mr. Bell!” or “Mr. Bell is overreaching himself!” according to their attitude of mind with respect to that gentleman.

But already a method is apparent, directing Mr. Bell’s utterances. Any offence Mr. Bell indulges in this week we must expect to be allowed by him during the course of the following week. Any vice of mind that is essentially Mr. Bell’s you can wager he will attribute to you at the first opportunity, with many a sly shake of the finger, and splutter of the mouth.

So when he writes, “To talk of modern English painting as though there were the rival of French painting is silly;” it is a silliness that Mr. Bell would be far more likely to be guilty of than anyone else. With his “French colts 7 lb. below English;” “English normally a stone below French;” and all the rest of his Winstonian sporting parallels, does he not show himself, indeed, very apt at such stupidities, only the other way on! For Intellectual champions are of more individual growth than physical ones. There are always a few good artists in every country. A country can have a monopoly of general taste, as it can of general athletic efficiency, for a time: but hardly of individual triumphs of the intellect. Supposing a Brazilian of genius or a talented Turk see the light; must he settle in Paris in order to take his place beside an ineffable Four, who, alas! (Mr. Bell “bravely recognizes the disagreeable truth”) are even more compelling than Mr. Duncan Grant!

But Mr. Bell mixes Empire with Art, and Art with Sport, in his excitable nature. And moth-like he returns without cease to the “Ville Libre.” But has it never occurred to Mr. Bell that, to undertake such a comparatively comfortable task as that of critic of Art, a permanent residence in Paris may be essential? Is the critic in this more privileged than the painter? Or is Mr. Bell’s calibre as a critic to be reckoned only as minus avoido? However this may be, his “return from the flanks” which pulls itself out more and more, until it has made him one of the most ridiculous figures we possess.

At least in this little matter of the comic Mr. Bell’s unfortunate provincial native land is not a stone, nor yet 7 lb., behind her seductive and so “artistic” neighbors in France. This should be some consolation to Mr. Bell’s distressed patriotism.

Yours faithfully,

26a, Campden Hill Gardens.

JOHN CLARE

To the Editor of THE ATHENÆUM.

Sir,—Every lover of nature and of poetry will be grateful to you for giving him Mr. Edmund Blunden’s article upon John Clare. May I refer to the Editor of the Atheneum, perhaps more particularly to correct it? If the world is to be reminded of a great and neglected man, it is surely desirable that its information should be accurate.

The treasure-hunt to which Mr. Blunden refers is, I think, almost ended. He and I have located the treasure, and we hope soon to give to the public poems from Clare’s unpublished manuscripts. For our discovery we cannot claim much credit: the trail has all the way been very clear; it seems curious that hardly anyone has followed it through before.
And now to correct the article in a few minutes. "Almost thirty years afterwards," though we call it a round number, is a misleading exaggeration. From his admission till his death Clare was in the madhouse twenty-two years. Nor is it only to quieten the insatiable admirers of Birket Foster that Clare has been anthologized. Poems of his are included in at least three anthologies of the Clarendon Press, in Mr. Ernest Rhys's companion to the "Golden Treasury," and, I don't doubt, elsewhere.

This brings me to the third objection, the only objection of importance. It saddens me to find Mr. Blunden quoting from the version of "I am" given in J. L. Cherry's book, and reprinted by almost every subsequent editor. There is, it happens, a version of infinitely higher poetic worth, equally well authenticated. For the benefit of those who have the "Oxford Book of the English Verse" or the "Oxford Book of Victorian Verse," why I call attention to the more important differences of reading?

In J. L. Cherry we have the living sea of waking dream,

Where there is neither sense of life, nor joys,
But the huge shipwreck of my own esteem
And all that's dear. Even those I loved the best
Are strange—nay, they are stranger than the rest,

The last couplet he gives as Full of high thoughts, unborn. So let me lie,

The grass below—the vaulted sky.

In the Annual Report for 1864 of the Medical Superintendent of Saint Andrews the first passage is given as the living sea of waking dreams,

Where there is neither sense of life nor joys,
But the vast shipwreck of my life's estemes;

And 'n the dear—on the two and talk of "the shipwreck of his own estemes"?

Yours truly,

Queen's College, Oxford.

ALAN PORTER.

THE FIRST FOLIO POEM INITALLED "I. M."
To the Editor of The Athenæum.

SIR,—Were I to leave unnoticed the criticism by Mr. Robert Little to the effect that quite evidently "no satisfying meaning can be assigned" by me to the supposedly signalled letter F, it might be held that my silence gave consent. As a matter of fact I have ready for publication, in the event of being called upon therefor, and of being allowed the requisite two columns or so of space, a tentative completion of the cryptogram, uniting a certain other letter with the F, and explaining the details of each letter in accordance with a common plan that is mathematically "satisfying."

The bother is, that it might not be deemed sentimentally "satisfying"! And my position is that of a student who, wishing to advance matters a stage with as little obstruction of a so far insufficiently debated personal opinion as possible, has submitted in public, and to readers of the leading literary journal, fewer particulars of a supposed cryptogram than he has more or less privately submitted to certain unrespective authorities, and only so much as can easily be shown to be beyond reasonable dispute purposed coincidence, in order that other readers, cleverer than he, may provide (if they can) a solution of the extent and interpretation of the cryptogram that shall be "satisfying" sentimentally as well as mathematically.

Respectfully yours,

J. D. PARSONS.

43, Sutton Court Road, Chiswick.

SIR A. E. GARROD, recently appointed Director of the Clinical Unit at St. Bartholomew's Hospital, has been recommended for appointment to the Regius Professorship of Medicine at Oxford University in succession to the late Sir William Osler. Sir A. E. Garrod is also well known in his capacity of Consulting Physician to the Great Ormond Street Hospital for Children.

The principal item in the January number of La Critica (Bari, Lateran & Figli, 3 lire) is Professor Crocke's essay, in four parts, dealing with Corneille; and there are reviews of M. J. Roger Charbonnel's "La Pensée italienne au XVie siècle et le courant libertin," Señor D. Miguel Asín Palacios's "La Escatología musulmana en la Divina Comedia," as well as of other works.

For the FLAUBERT TRADITION

DANSONS LA TROMPEUSE, Par Raymond Escholier. (Paris, Grasset 5 fr.)

"DANSONS LA TROMPEUSE" is a delicate and beautiful novel. It has no plot, no love motif, no dramatic action; but the reader who could put it down unfinished or fail to take an interest in Mme. Lestelle, the central figure, would reveal himself abnormally insensitive to art and abnormally insensitive to life. The rhythm of the life which animates the pages of this book is extremely simple; its fluctuations are almost imperceptible; it is gentle, continuous, inevitable, like the rhythm of human life itself, and the art which controls it is perfectly balanced. M. Escholier's method is the method of Flaubert, and the result is the same.

Mme. Lestelle, like Mme. Bovary, is a provincial woman who might have found the stimuli necessary for her happiness in the minor diversions of town life. But she is condemned to languish in solitude in her remote country house. When we first meet her she is a childless widow of fifty, still attractive after a few minutes' work before the mirror and terribly afraid of old age. She tries again and again to persuade herself that the dreaded day when she must confess herself old is still remote but, in her heart she suspects that it has in fact already dawned. A series of small incidents, falling upon her like little poisoned darts, convert this suspicion into a relentless certainty. Basilisse, her peasant servant, blurts out the truth with "Quand on commence à entrer dans l'âge," the Abbé Roumens rolls it forth in well-meant attempts at consolation, the Marquis de Sénaboug delicately barbs his dart. Then comes a sudden fatigue at a ball, the sight of lovers locked in an embrace, the departure from the country of her one man friend, failing health, financial worries—the shower of darts becomes thicker and thicker. In vain she attempts to restore her moral by pathetic little expedients: by clothes, by increased care at the dressing-table, by renewed interest in a collection of breg-a-brac which projects her imagination into a distant past. Her spirit succumbs to a heavy lassitude, and she bows her head to the knowledge that she is now a poor lonely old woman who can barely afford fire and food. Quietly, unabtrusively, undramatically, the sands of her life run out.

M. Escholier tells the pathetic story with great skill—so great that we do not at first realize the degree of his artistry. But only an author very sure of his art could succeed in the frail barque between the rocks of the capriciousness of Sentimentality and Tedium. M. Escholier has, however, the necessary confidence in the power of art to synthesize. He throws the action back to the eighties, discarding telephones and motor omnibuses and the thousand and one stage properties of the soi-disant realistic novelist. He has no use for actualities or obvious realism. He stands a little aloof from life, out of range of its multitudinous small appeals, in order to focus his selected subject in perspective. But he never gets out of earshot of Mme. Lestelle or misses the significance of her most trivial gesture.

We congratulate M. Escholier on this charming work in a severe tradition.

March 12, 1920
O RIANI'S ideas, which lie scattered among novels and books of general literature, are strongly philosophical in character, and are specially prominent in two books of more than usual importance: "La Lotta Politica in Italia" and "La Rivolta Ideale," in which he expresses, as one writer from its title, a description of the political struggles of his own day, but a historical introduction on broad lines—too broad, perhaps, for a mere introduction, since it begins with the mediæval origins of modern Italy. As, however, Oriani's promised inquiry into the real struggle was never forthcoming, the introduction stands by itself as a history of Italy, the only one we possess that is worthy of the name. It is sharply divided into two parts, differing widely in originality of outlook and in adequacy of treatment. The first part, from the Middle Ages to the Nineteenth Century, is hurried, and to a great extent modelled upon the works of earlier writers, especially on Ferrari's "Storia delle Rivoluzioni d'Italia." From this he derives the two categories of Unity and Federation which form the arbitrary framework of the whole story. Oriani is obviously ill at ease here. His material is not well digested, but he did not dare to neglect it on account of the naturalistic belief that the sources of a movement must be sought in its environment. If this be true, then the history of Italy cannot possibly be written without going back to the Middle Ages, Rome, and perhaps even the far-distant pre-Roman period, round which eighteenth-century writers had spun so many fables. But the moment he turns to the true history of Italy, which begins with the first revolutionary movements stirred up by his nation, his subject becomes very different, and in a couple of volumes he gives us a rich, vivid, well-ordained picture of our Risorgimento.

Here the guiding principles of Unity and Federation acquire the concrete character of the facts among which they move, and which shape them and are in their turn shaped by them, whereas in the earlier period they are being applied to a material that rebels against them, and therefore the recurrence is merely a wearisome and mechanical interplay of antitheses. Indeed, the whole historical outlook of the author, which had formed itself on the fruitful soil of these ideal contrasts, enters bodily into the struggle for unity, and when it at length emerges, it does not stand delivering abstract judgments in isolation, but appears almost as the conscience of this historical movement, critical, and essentially a part of it.

The most profound historical experiences of the "Lotta Politica" are collected in the "Rivolta Ideale," which is a work of Oriani's mature years. Its outlook is wider, but as it is in a historical narrative, it is more monotonous and abstract. Here history is presented, the biography of the human race, still young after all these thousand years, and not having reached even yet a world-embracing consciousness. The first century which has approached such an ideal is the nineteenth, the "century of individualism, and therefore the most world-wide of all in its outlook, the century that was to initiate the greatest period of universal history." Individualism and universalism centre in Europe, whence the new history of the world radiates; all the conquests of civilization outside Europe are, in fact, European in spirit and impulse. Africa especially is the supremacy of the highest achievement of the history of Europe in the Nineteenth Century. This work does not bear the name of a man or a people because the greatest creations are anonymous. "Genius can sum up that of which a people is unconscious, but it cannot stamp its own likeness on the consciousness of a people."

Its ideal character is expressed even in the two philosophies representing its triumph and its degradation:

After Hegel's vast dazzling philosophy, which summed up the whole of the ancient world and opened the way to the modern period, degeneration became rapid. Hegel had raised the world to the status of a living being, while Pitti's destructive ideas in the facts. Their philosophy was the only one suited to an industrial period that isolated individuals, levelling them instead of unifying them. The unknowable, the instinctive interpretation of which is the idea of life, giving it its grandeur, was pronounced useless. History ceased to look for revelations of the past in great ideas.

* Part I. appeared in last week's Athenæum.
RICHH. DEHMEL

The death of Richard Dehmel, which took place on February 8 at his home at Blankensee, near Hamburg, where he had lived since the year 1902, has deprived contemporary German literature of one of its outstanding representatives. It would not be correct to speak of Dehmel as a leader. He had no such profound influence on the other writers of his generation as that exerted by, say, Stefan George or Paul Ernst. Except Alfred Mombert there is no important modern German poet who can be called in any way one of Dehmel's disciples. His actual fertile literary influence has been comparatively small and his work has stood alone, an individual achievement of interest to the readers of poetry rather than to its writers.

Dehmel was born on November 18, 1865, in Wendish-Hermsdorf, in the district of the Spreewald. His father was a forestry student at the University of Berlin. He went to Leipzig, where he obtained his doctor's degree with a thesis on insurance. This was his qualification for becoming, shortly afterwards, secretary to an insurance company. It was at this time, about the years 1891 and 1892, that he began to write poetry, and to contribute literary essays to various periodicals. In 1895 he gave up his position and entered definitely upon a literary career. Three volumes of his poems had appeared: "Erlebnisse" ("Reminiscences"), "Aber die Liebe" ("Love's Chaoz"), and "Lebensblätter" ("Leaves of Life"), Of these the first and second attracted much attention. In verse of a rhythm which revealed the influence of Heine, Dehmel set forth the dynamic, individualist philosophy of Nietzsche, which was to be the dominant intellectual influence upon him for the rest of his life. On its technical side his poetry, particularly these early volumes, and above all "Aber die Liebe," owed much, in addition to Heine, to Detlev von Liliencron, Dehmel's friend for several years.

Side by side with the Nietzschean influence just mentioned there was also, in Dehmel's not very clear or consistent philosophy, a strain of intellectual socialism. This is worth a reference, not only because it did not accord with his otherwise intensely individualistic temperament, but because certain recent commentators appear to have given it too much prominence, and to have spoken of Dehmel as if he were the poet of the German working-class. That he was read in that class is not to beoubted, and at least one poem, the familiar "Arbeitsmann," with its beginning Wir haben ein Bett; wir haben ein Kind, Mein Arbeit, was a commonplace of Social Democratic clubs in all parts of Germany. But to place Dehmel among the Socialistic poets on account of a few poems such as this would be ill-proportioned criticism. He remains, in practically all his most important books, a poet whose artistic inspiration came first from his own interpretation of an individualistic philosophy carried into literary form in his own conceptions of passion and revolt. This is true not only of his greatest work, the sequence "Zwei Menschen" ("Man and Woman"), but of the erotic poems collected under the title of "Die Verwandlungen der Venus" ("The Transformations of Venus"), as of his drama, "Der Mittmenschen" ("The Fellow-Man"). It may be remarked that, with the exception of this last, a "pantomime" entitled "Lucifer," a tragi-comedy, "Michael Michael," a prose-drama, entitled "Die Menschenfreunde" ("The Friends of Humanity"), written during the war—-with these exceptions and two volumes of critical reflections, all Dehmel's work was in verse.

The content of Dehmel's work is not of great importance. It is too much "dated"; already we feel its doctrine of non-moral unrestrained passion, self-realization as the highest virtue—we feel that this is well on the way to the lusub room where the crude atheism of the eighteen-eighties has been banished forever. Yet for this, however individual and solid poetic value remains. The technical mastery shown in "Zwei Menschen," which consists of thirty-six poems, each of thirty-six irregular lines, is unequalled in modern German poetry, and in our own might be held to challenge Swinburne. The varying passages of description and impression of natural scenery add to the charm of the individual, and the particular episode in Dehmel's passionate story—this is an achievement one can appreciate for its own sake.

List of New Books
Prepared in co-operation with the Library Association.

The method of classification adopted is a series of groups roughly corresponding with the Dewey Decimal System, the sub-classes being indicated, for the benefit of librarians and others familiar with the system, by the class-numbers given at the end of each entry. The first numeral in these represents the main class, the second one of the subdivisions, and so on.

These works in the list which appear most suitable for purchase by Public Library Authorities are marked with an asterisk.

GENERAL WORKS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY, ENCYCLOPÆDIA, MAGAZINES, &c.

Cook (Sir Edward). The Press in War-Time. Macmillan, 1920. 7 in. 200 pp., 7/6 n. 070

See review, p. 338.

Peisker (J.). Geschichte und Verwaltungstechnik eines zweifach buechenden Bibliothekssystems. Graz, Leykam, 1919. 9* in. 37 pp. paper. 025.8

The pamphlet issued by Dr. Peisker, Director of Graz University, describes a method of stocktaking employed at the University of Prague. It is carried out by three officials using three lists, viz., an alphabetical card-catalogue by authors, the catalogue of the 38 classes into which the library is broadly classified, and a catchword catalogue on cards. The method is worth the consideration of libraries in this country.

100 PHILOSOPHY.

See review, p. 337.

O'Donnell (Elois). The Menace of Spiritualism. Werner Laurie (1920). 8 in. 220 pp., 5/ n. 133.9

It is a little bewildering to find Mr. O'Donnell, who has written about haunted houses and the like, and has repeatedly asserted his belief in spontaneous ghostly manifestations, taking up the cudgels against spiritualism. However, he delivers some shrewd blows, and in a popular manner sets forth a strong case against spiritualists and their operations. Occasionally his criticisms are directed against theosophy; but the two systems or cults are for the most part, we imagine, widely dissimilar in essentials.

200 RELIGION.

The Coming Catholicism. By Six Anglican Priests. R. Scott, 1920. 8 in. 79 pp. app. paper, 2/6 n. 283.0

These addresses by the Revs. N. E. Egerton Swan, S. Proudfoot, Gordon Milburn, A. E. J. Rawlinson, Harold Anson and Harold Buxton (some of whom are members of the Liberal Catholic Union, the body responsible for the volume) have as an introduction a brief paper by the Dean of Manchester and Bishop Designate of Lincoln, who points out that the six essays illustrate three "characteristic features of the religious thought of to-day," namely, that religious truth is a living and growing thing; that concern for the Kingdom of God is for increasing number of people, as urgent as their concern for personal salvation; and that we are learning to emphasize the social character of the Gospel and the ethic of Christ.

Contains, with other matter, noteworthy papers entitled "Bail-dog, or Bail-dock" (A. Neave Brynshaw), "London Year Meeting during 250 Years," "Presentations in Episcopal Visitations, 1662-1679" (Professor G. Lyon Turner), and "Life and Letters of Jean de Marsillac," part 4 (Norman Penney).

Kane (Robert). Worth: lectures. Longmans, 1920. 8 in. 238 pp. boards, 6/6 n. 294

In these thoughtful addresses, some of which were delivered at the Church of Corpus Christi, Maiden Lane, Strand, the author at first deals with general principles, and discusses true and false standards of worth. He then treats of person ality, intellectual excellence, the evolution of the soul, the worth of patriotism, and other topics.

This edition, revised and enlarged, of this simple and altogether admirable exposition of the Friends' religion, life, and polity.

300 SOCIOLOGY.

At the present time any authoritative discussion of the subject of Labour is sure of careful attention and study. Professor Hammond in this volume depicts the social background in England before the outbreak of the war, and the state of English industry and labour after hostilities had begun. He deals with the relations of the Government and the trade unions; the supply, distribution, dilution, and hours of labour; wages; the cost of living; welfare work, and the like. Industrial unrest and reconstruction are also discussed by the author, who refers at some length to the housing question.

The greatest lesson the author learned on the battlefields of the great war was to think earnestly and ruthlessly, and he offers the results of his observations and reflections, limited and fragmentary though they be, as first-hand information to American readers on the state of mind of European Socialists. He served on the Belgian, British and Roumanian fronts, and went on a mission to the Russian revolutionary Government, and on another to the United States. He had been a prominent labour leader, but refuses to label himself as either Socialist or Bolshevik.

400 PHILOLOGY.

When M. de Beafront, the enthusiastic leader of the Esperanto movement, submitted his suggestions for an international auxiliary language to the committee of delegates in the Collège de France, they were unanimously approved, and referred to a permanent commission for the settlement of details. This has few grammatical rules and these have neither exceptions nor irregularities: it is a neutral language of ideal simplicity and can be acquired with a minimum of brainwork. This is a complete manual for learners.

Although so small as to be convenient for the waistcoat pocket, this dictionary comprises, in addition to ordinary matter, useful grammatical notes and conversational phrases.

The art of writing a lucid and concise summary of a document or series of documents is described by the author, whose clear explanations are followed by numerous examples of matter suitable for condensation, and by a series of exercises.

500 NATURAL SCIENCE.

Coleridge (Hon. Stephen). The Idolatry of Science. Lane, 1920. 7 in. 100 pp. 3/6 n.

Mr. Coleridge adopts towards science the attitude of the Augustan writers of the early eighteenth century. Butler and Shadwell had begun the game with their "Elephant in the Moon" and "Virtuso": Pope and Swift perfected it by the invention of Laputa and Martinus Scriblerus. It is not a difficult game to play; the specialist absorbed in Hexamethyleneetramine can be made to look a fool by any literary man of moderate intelligence. Mr. Coleridge's fire of rhetoric and irony is effective; the Aunt Sally he has chosen to set up and call the Man of Science is knocked to pieces by the coconuts of his eloquence. It is an amusing performance; even the scientists will admit that if they have sense and humour enough not to take the book too seriously.

A simple introduction to the elementary facts of chemistry, physics and biology. The book is well illustrated, and should be useful to those who have no previous knowledge of any science. Theoretical principles and practical applications are treated together, a method which will probably be successful in stimulating interest on the part of the young student.

600 USEFUL ARTS.

Although the author in one chapter considers different theories of sleep, and puts forward one based on vibration to which he has given several years' consideration, his book is mainly practical. By reforming certain habits and practises both the quantity and quality of our sleep may be improved. He touches also upon dreams and their causes, sleep-walking, sleep-working, why some are light sleepers, and such-like topics.

Whale (George). British Airships, Past, Present and Future. Lane, 1919. 7 1/2 in. 244 pp. 24 pl., 7/6 n.

629.17

A useful account, well illustrated, of different types of British airships, with a discussion of their relative merits. Useful suggestions are made for the employment of airships to help in solving some of the problems of the future.

700 FINE ARTS.

Four partial translations of Hegel's "Aesthetik" in English, and one in French, are known to Mr. Osmaston, who states in his preface that the present version is the first complete translation in English of the three volumes devoted to the subject in the collected edition of Hegel's works (Berlin, 1885).

759.5

See review, p. 343.

In an announcement at the beginning of this catalogue it is stated that no permanent arrangement of the pictures can be completed until all the portions of the Gallery which were lent to the Government are again available; and, owing to the need of certain structural alterations, "some two years may elapse before all the rooms can be reopened."

800 LITERATURE.

824.4

This brochure is an example of comedy typography executed on paper of fine quality and adorned with happily-inspired artistic designs.

822.9

A serviceable and skilful adaptation, for dramatic purposes, of Bunyan's allegory, with verses by Vaughan, Heber, Faber, and others added, as well as illustrations by Mr. Harold Copping.
The old story of Admetus and Alcestis is retold in a dramatic trilogy—Apollo in Hades, the Death of Alcestis, and the Doom of Admetus. The plays are all written in the heroic couplet, and follow the classic traditions of tragic sternness and simplicity.

Mencken (H. L.) and Nathan (George Jean). Helio

The authors of this play have carried the Shavian method of brightening up the classics to its logical conclusion. The characters speak the language, not of the modern European drawing-room, but of the modern American saloon. Helio gabalus and his eleven wives, a tiping admiral, two doctors, and a pair of Christians, male and female, revolve in an agreeable manner, part the poems included that Puritans and Pussyfoot reformers of every sort are unpleasant and disgusting creatures. We could wish that these two talented writers had combined to produce something rather more ambitious than this bufoonery. It is too easy.

POETRY.

In this volume Miss Betham-Edwards has given us versions of a number of those pleasantly sentimental pieces beloved by the French reciter. A few of the classical great have been admitted; but by the most part the poems included are by such minor writers as Nadaud, Delpil, Paul Drouëlée, Florian. In these versions Miss Betham-Edwards has been too often content with a rather vague à peu près. Thus, she translates the first verse of Fabre d'Eglantine's enchanting "'Il pleut, il pluit, bergère," as follows:

The rain is falling, shepherd maid.
A storm is rising fast;
Let's hasten to some friendly shade
For shelter till 'tis past.

This is not really good enough: the precision and simplicity o: the original have disappeared, and something slightly stilted and "poetical" has taken their place.

Low (Benjamin R. C.). The Pursuit of Happiness: and other poems. Lane, 1919. 73 in. 136 pp. boards, 5/ n. 811.5

Mr. Low is perhaps the most interesting of the traditionalist poets of America. The sonnet sequence which gives its name to the volume shows a remarkably high level of accompl ishment, and is illuminated by frequent felicities of expression. The theme of the sequence is stated in the opening lines of the first sonnet:

There is a beauty, after all is said,
Unachieved for ever;
and through the remaining fifty sonnets Mr. Low pursues this unachievable loveliness in all its Protean changes. He writes his sonnets with a happy appearance of ease. There is a certainty, an assurance, about such an opening as:

Words are to dreams a wired and golden cage
Wherein, made captive, some enchanting bird
Is listened to for music that is heard
In wooded freedom only;
which many less articulate poets may envy. At his worst Mr. Low is too articulate; some of his last lines, for example, are too triumphantly neat and conclusive to be quite spontaneous.

Some of the most poignant of these careful pieces, such as "Sheep-Shearing," "The Common Round," and "At Sea," are short, direct, unelaborated expressions of the pangs or the joyous thrills of some typical contingency of the common round. More lofty in aim are such things as the dramatic "Return of Alcestis" and "Dedicata," the latter a lyrical picture of the sacrifice of a Joan of Arc.

FICTION.

Of these nine stories "The Headsman in the Courtyard" (an episode of the Terror), "The Invisible Marquis of Gallanique" (dealing with a penless youth's succession to estates squandered by his father), and "The Castle of the Four Outlooks" (a somewhat humorous account of a baronial feud), have France as a background, and are the most consp uously imaginative. The other tales are chiefly set in the New World.

Bretherton (Ralph Harold). Two Sisters. Allen & Unwin [1920]. 7 in. 302 pp., 7/6 n. 823.09

Mr. Bretherton has chosen the contrasted characters of two sisters as the theme of his story. Ethel, the elder, considers herself a model of propriety, and her husband thinks her perfect; but she wishes everyone to conform to her standards. She puts the worst construction on the conduct of her younger sister, who is fond of music and gaiety; and she calls her brother a "slacker." The testing time comes, however, when misfortune overtakes her father and mother.

Escholier (Raymond). Dansons la Trompeuse. Paris, Grasset, 1919. 73 in. 240 pp., paper, 5 fr. 843.9

See notice, p. 350.

The authors discourse pleasantly and informatively on such novelists as Meredith, Gissing, Henry James, Hardy, Bennett, Wells, Conrad, etc. A distinctly scrappy chapter is devoted to "The Younger Generation." We have the impression that the authors regard each writer as "good of his kind," but they tell us nothing about the relative values of the different "kinds."

Whether this detective yarn is meant for children is not clear; it will hardly do for anyone else. Lady Betty Baltimore does up her glorious hair, burgles the houses of rich war-profiteers, and with the proceeds founds an orphanage for five hundred children, and incidentally gets married.

Philip Kane, the hero of this novel, is a journalist who arrives at the conclusion that only in human brotherhood is there any hope for the future of the world. Among his associates are Anne Drummond, a delightful girl from whose "make-up" snobishness has fortunately been omitted, and Ivan Smirnoff, an idealistic Russian genius and a convinced supporter of the proletarian revolution. Ivan believes that Vladimir Oulianoff will be the new leader of men—the coming deliverer. The book contains much scathing criticism of war. Ivan, Philip, and Anne (who becomes Philip's wife) are all internationalists and pacifists; and the last-named dies a martyr in the cause of human solidarity. Mr. Goldring's story is arresting and stimulating.

A translation into Spanish of J. K. Huysmans' "En Rade."

Reid (Forrest). Pirates of the Spring. Dublin, Talbot Press (Fisher Unwin), 1920. 73 in. 356 pp., 7/ n. 843.9

See review, p. 338.

These further passages in the thrilling career of the "Lone Wolf" deal with a German conspiracy of such magnitude and importance that all the waters to be crossed by a certain limer, on board of which is a British agent conveying intelligence of the secret to America, are punctuated by U-boats and sown with mines. It is unmasked by the acumen of the brilliant hero; and at the end of the tale he receives a great and unsought-for reward.
THE WAY TO FINANCIAL COMFORT.

Hundreds of men and women over 55 years of age doubling and, in some cases, trebling their income from investments.

Much attention has been given in the papers lately to a fact which has made itself painfully apparent in the home—the alarming decline in the purchasing power of the pound.

The hardest hit are those whose only source of income is from investments. There are cases, almost without number, where the income was just comfortably sufficient before the war. Now it is hopelessly inadequate. Food costs more than double; many other essentials are three and four times their old price. And the income remains the same!

What is to be done?

The case calls for drastic treatment. One per cent, increase will not do. Yet the investor dare not plunge into speculative ventures. He dare not risk losing all. It would, indeed, be the height of folly to do so.

What, then, can he or she do?

Follow the example of hundreds of retired professional and business men who have sold their stocks and shares and purchased with the capital a Sun Life of Canada Annuity. One case just closed was that of a man, 61 years of age, who obtained an annuity of £305 2s. with only £3,000 of capital. His income last year from this same amount was well under £150. Another case also recently closed was that of a widow, 67 years of age, whose income was about £80 a year—certainly not enough in these times to keep body and soul together. Acting on sound advice she sold her shares and bought a Sun Life of Canada Annuity, amounting to £166 16s. This means financial comfort where before was penury.

It must also be remembered that these people have exchanged an income which was not absolutely certain for an annuity which, besides being very, very much bigger, is guaranteed for life. The Sun Life of Canada has assets of over £23,000,000 under strict Government supervision. The future income is, therefore, drawn from a source which is as safe as anything in this world can be.

Everyone with money invested, whatever their age, should get in touch with the Sun Life of Canada, through the Manager, and find out something more of the many financial advantages offered by this great and progressive Company. Investigation does not commit one in any way whatever, and it may be that the information supplied will be a boon to the inquirer for the rest of his or her life. Write in confidence, stating exact age and amount of money at disposal, to F. F. Junkin, Sun Life of Canada, 10, Canada House, Norfolk Street, London, W.C.2.

PLEASE HELP

THE

CHURCH ARMY

TO HELP OTHERS.

Its EVANGELISTIC BRANCHES include TRAINING COLLEGES for evangelists and sisters; evangelists and sisters working in hundreds of town and country parishes; 70 MISSION-VANS itinerating the country districts; Missions of many kinds, including those in PRISONS, WORKHOUSES, and SLUMS; and many others.

For Men still serving it has RECREATION CENTRES in Rhineland, and in France and Belgium.

FOR EX-SERVICE MEN it has a flourishing EMPLOYMENT BUREAU, HOSTELS for the LIMBLESS AND DISABLED, and for men learning trades or seeking work; care of SOLDIERS’ MOTHERLESS CHILDREN, &c., &c.

Its SOCIAL BRANCHES include Hostels, Homes, Clubs, &c., of many sorts for men and women, boys and girls, relief of DISTRESS by non-pauperising methods; uplifting DISCHARGED PRISONERS; OVERSEAS SETTLEMENT, and many others.

Prebendary Carlile, D.D., Hon. Chief Secretary, Headquarters, Bryanston Street, Marble Arch, London, W.1 will gladly give all information and gratefully receive gifts towards the heavy expenses; cheques being crossed "Barclays', ½ Church Army," payable to Prebendary Carlile.

ASK YOUR MEDICAL MAN what he thinks of the gas water heater, and its value in sudden illness.

Send for a simple pamphlet "Gas Economy Series" No. III.

THE BRITISH COMMERCIAL GAS ASSOCIATION,
47, Victoria St., Westminster, S.W.1.
Appointments Vacant

UNIVERSITY OF BRISTOL.

DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION: MEN'S DIVISION—SIX TEMPORARY ASSISTANT LECTURERS will be appointed for the session 1920-21, at salaries of £800 each. If admissions justify it, the appointments may be continued for the following session 1921-22; and it is hoped that one or two at least may be continued permanently.

Applicants must be trained graduates with good teaching experience. Well-qualified women applicants might be considered.

Particulars from the Registrar, to whom applications should be addressed not later than March 20.

COUNTRY BOROUGH OF WEST HAM.

PUBLIC LIBRARIES.

SENIOR ASSISTANT.

APPLICATIONS are invited for the position of SENIOR ASSISTANT at the CANNING TOWN LIBRARY (open access), at a salary of £91 per annum, rising to £120, with a further £10 upon obtaining two of the following I.A. certificates, namely, Classification, Bibliography, or Zerary History.

In addition to the above, a war bonus on the scale of the Civil Service, with a maximum of £101 8s., on the initial salary, and £101 8s. on the maximum, will be paid.

Applicants must not be less than 21 years of age, and possess four of the Library Association certificates.

Applications, stating age and qualifications, and accompanied by copies of not more than three recent testimonials, must be enclosed in an envelope endorsed "Library Assistant," and reach me not later than the first post on Tuesday morning, April 6, 1920.

Canvassing will disqualify.

GEO. F. HILLIARD,

Town Clerk.

THREE CITIES OF BRADFORD.

THE Libraries, Art Gallery and Museums Committee are prepared to receive applications for the post of DEPUTY CHIEF LIBRARIAN. Salary £550 per annum and war bonus (at present £88 per annum).

Practical experience and capacity in Public Library organization and administration are essential. Applications, endorsed "Deputy Chief Librarian," stating age and qualifications, accompanied by copies of three recent testimonials, must be delivered to the undersigned not later than March 29, 1920.

N. L. FLEMING,

Town Clerk.

STORE NEWINGTON PUBLIC LIBRARY.

LIBRARY ASSISTANT.

APPLICATIONS are invited for the post of MALE ASSISTANT. Salary £150 per annum, including War Bonus. Public Library experience essential.

Preference will be given to candidates holding Library Association Certificates, or who, by reason of service in His Majesty's Forces, have been prevented from qualifying for these Certificates.

Applications endorsed "Assistant" to reach me not later than March 24, 1920.

GEORGE PEECE,

Librarian & Clerk.

Appointments Vacant

EAST SUFFOLK COUNTY EDUCATION COMMITTEE.

WOMAN INSTRUCTOR AND INSPECTOR OF PHYSICAL TRAINING.

THE COMMITTEE invite APPLICATIONS from WOMEN for appointment as INSTRUCTOR AND INSPECTOR OF PHYSICAL TRAINING. The applicants must be prepared to devote the whole of their time to the work. They must have full knowledge of Swedish Drill and of the requirements of the latest syllabuses issued by the Board of Education. The selected candidate will be required to organise and inspect Physical Exercises in Secondary and Elementary Schools maintained by the Committee and to give instruction to teachers and children of such Schools. Salary will be at the rate of £250 per annum, rising by £10 to £900, with travelling expenses according to scale.

Applications, giving full particulars of qualifications, including experience in similar positions (if any), and stating age, together with copies of not more than three recent testimonials, must be sent to the undersigned not later than March 31, 1920.

W. E. WATKINS,

Secretary.

MANCHESTER EDUCATION COMMITTEE.

1. ASSISTANT MASTER is required to take charge of the work of the Design Section, and to assist in the general work of the School.

Candidates must hold recognised qualifications. It is desirable that candidates should have experience in the teaching of design and allied subjects.

Commencing salary £400, rising to £500 by annual increments of £25.

2. An ASSISTANT MASTER is required to assist in the Design and Crafts Section and in the general work of the School.

Candidates must hold recognised qualifications.

Commencing salary £250, rising to £350.

Particulars and forms of appointment for the above appointments may be obtained from the undersigned, to whom applications must be returned by March 31, 1920.

S. Y. PERLEY,

Director of Education.

BALSHAW'S GRAMMAR SCHOOL.

L Leyland, Lancs.

WANTED May 1, 1920, FORM MASTER, honours degree, to teach science. Salary according to Lancashire County Scale allowed for not more than seven years' previous experience. Evenings work likely at some time. Apply E. Jackson, M.A., Headmaster, Tom Dodd, Clerk to the Governors, 47, Lime Street, Preston.

BALSHAW'S GRAMMAR SCHOOL.

Leyland, Lancs.

TEMPORARY TEACHER OF MATHEMATICS, Master or Mistress, Wanted at Once. Salary according to Lancashire County Scale.—Apply E. Jackson, M.A., Headmaster.

THOS. DODD,

Clerk to the Governors, 47, Lime Street, Preston.
Appointments Vacant

NORTHAMPTON COUNTY BOROUGH EDUCATION COMMITTEE.
SCHOOL OF ART.

THE EDUCATION COMMITTEE invite APPLICATIONS for the APPOINTMENT of PRINCIPAL of the SCHOOL OF ART. Applicants should be qualified as required by the Regulations of the Board of Education, Salary £400 per annum, rising by yearly increments of £25 to £500 per annum.

Further particulars and a form of application may be obtained from the undersigned, with whom applications should be lodged not later than 1st April, 1920.

HERBERT C. PERRIN, Acting Secretary to the Committee, Borough Education Offices, 4, St. Giles' Street, Northampton.
March 6, 1920.

HUDGERSFIELD TECHNICAL COLLEGE.

Principal: J. F. Hussey, M.A., B.Sc.

APPLICATIONS are invited for the following posts:—

ASSISTANT LECTURER IN BIOLOGY, with good qualifications in either BOTANY or ZOOLOGY. Initial salary £300.

ASSISTANT IN THE SCHOOL OF ART, well qualified in Design. Initial salary £200.

Further particulars may be obtained on application to T. THORP, Secretary.

BRADFORD GIRLS' GRAMMAR SCHOOL.

VACANCIES in September for SPECIALISTS in (1) History (2) French, (3) Mathematics, (4) Classics. Honours degree or equivalent essential. Advanced Courses recognized in Modern Studies and Science in Mathematics. Salaries according to revised scale rising to £350. Also VACANCY for MISTRESS FOR THIRD FORM offering Geography or Elementary Mathematics, and for experienced SECOND FORM MISTRESS. Apply to the Head Mistress.

SOUTHWELL, MINSTER GRAMMAR SCHOOL.

REQUIRED, next term, TWO ASSISTANT MASTERS—(1) for French, (2) for Chemistry and Mathematics. Initial Salaries up to £250, according to qualifications and experience. Accommodation can be had near the School. Apply Headmaster.

LAUNCESTON, CORNWALL.—DUNHEVED COLLEGE.

SCIENCE MASTER, required, for higher work. Minimum £140/150. Resident. Also, Master for Form Work and efficient Drawing.—Apply Head Master or SECRETARY.

COUNTY BOROUGH OF DERBY.

EDUCATION COMMITTEE.

MUNICIPAL SECONDARY SCHOOL FOR BOYS.

WANTED.—MATHEMATICAL MASTER, Hons, Graduate Scale, of £120 to £150 per annum to £200 and thence by £10s., to £240. Experience and special qualifications taken into consideration in fixing salary. Applications should reach the undersigned not later than March 29.

F. C. SMITHARD,
Secretary to the Education Committee.

Education Offices,
Becket Street, Derby,
March 6, 1920.

BOURNEMOUTH SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

WANTED, for September, to meet increase in numbers at the Bournemouth School for Girls, FOUR MISTRESSES.

(a) ONE PROFESSIONAL JUNIOR SCHOOL MISTRESS, to take Junior Form and some Art Work.

(b) TWO SPECIALISTS. 1. Science, Physics, Chemistry, Botany and some Mathematics; the Mistress appointed will organize the department. 2. English and French, with Phonetics.

(c) ONE FORM MISTRESS, graduate preferred, to take some Scripture, History and Geography. It would be a recommendation if one of the candidates could offer special training in Voice Production, Phonetics and Elocution.

Salary according to scale, with allowance for experience, Graduates £170—300. Non-graduates, £150—220.

Apply to the DIRECTOR OF EDUCATION, Municipal Buildings, Yelverton Road, Bournemouth.

Appointments Vacant

COUNTY BOROUGH OF DARLINGTON.

SUB LIBRARIAN.

THE PUBLIC LIBRARY COMMITTEE require a qualified SUB LIBRARIAN. Commencing salary £200 per annum. Candidates must have had practical experience in a Public Library and hold at least two of the Library Association Professional Certificates.

Applications in candidates own handwriting, endorsed "Sub Librarian," stating age and experience, and accompanied by not more than two recent testimonials to be delivered to my Office not later than April 3.

H. G. STEAVENS, Town Clerk.
March 11, 1920.

EAST SUFFOLK COUNTY EDUCATION COMMITTEE.

STOWMARKET COUNTY SECONDARY SCHOOL.

ASSISTANT MISTRESS (Graduate preferred) wanted May 4, to teach History and English to the lower forms and assist with Physical Training of girls.

Scale salary—Graduates, £175 to £300; Non-Graduates, £150 to £240. Commencing salary according to experience.

Apply not later than April 10 on Form 23, copy of which may be obtained from W. E. WATKINS, Secretary, County Hall, Ipswich.

Appointments Wanted

YOUNG MAN, literary tastes, wide clerical experience, capable correspondent, present position Office Manager, seeks CHANGE from Commerce to Literary Work or Secretarial Post. Interested Politics, Social Affairs. Any congenital position affording scope desired.—Box 98, Nation Advertisement Office, 170, Fleet Street.

Financial

PARTNERSHIPS.—EMPLOYMENT with investment wanted by fully qualified YOUNG MEN who have £1,000 to £10,000 to invest. THE OFFICERS PARTNERSHIP GUARDIAN, 53, Victoria Street, S.W.1. Calls preferred.

PUBLISHING BUSINESS.—Adviser desires to PURCHASE a small Publishing Business, preferably one specializing in text books, either technical or general. Price should not exceed £10,000, and negotiations will be opened only with actual owners or their accredited agents. All communications will be treated as strictly confidential.—Apply in first place to the Advertiser's Solicitors, MESSRS. RANGER, BURTON & FROST, Langbourn Chambers Fenchurch Street, E.C.3.

Educational

ACCOUNTANCY, SECRETARSHIP, BUSINESS TRAINING. An Appointments Bureau (free) is open to all qualified students of the Metropolitan College—the 'Varsity of Secretarial and Accountancy Training.' Specialized Postal Courses (practical training and exam. coaching) taken at home in spare time, under the most highly qualified staff in the Kingdom, comprising many Final Honourmen, Chartered Accountants, and Barristers-at-Law.

Fees are most moderate, and may be paid by instalments.—Write to-day (postcard will suffice) for list of recent appointments vacant, particulars of scholarship scheme, and copy of "Student's Guide," free of charge or obligation. METROPOLITAN COLLEGE, Dept. 319, St. Albans.

Typewriting &c.

TYPEWRITING OF EVERY DESCRIPTION carefully and promptly executed at home, 1s. per 1,000 words; carbon copy, 2d. per 1,000 words. Duplication, Cambridge Local.—Miss NANCY McFARLANE, 11, Palmira Avenue, Westcliff Essex.

TYPEWRITING. — Authors' MSS., Examination Papers, Letters, Circulars, Testimonials, General Copying, Duplication, etc.—J. TRIMBULL, 8, Moira Terrace, Cardiff.

EASY COMPETITION.—Send your MSS. to be TYPEWRITTEN by Professional expert. 5s. inclusive.—Miss MAGGOT, 10, Manor Road, Folkstone

HOLBORN EMPIRE

HOLBORN TUBE STATION.

LEWIS CARSON AND BRUCE WINTON'S SEASON OF DAILY MATINEES at 2.30, INCLUDING SATURDAY.

Next Week—SYBIL THORNDIKE in "TROJAN WOMEN" (Mon. & Wed.)

TOM TROUBLE (Tues. & Thurs.)

MEDEA Fri. & Sat.)
The London Literary Lounge

The BOOKSHOP that appeals to BOOKLOVERS

WORKS

on

Science,

Travel,

Technology,

Porcelain,

Handicrafts,

Agriculture,

History.

"It is a seductive retreat with most agreeable possibilities and a veritable paradise for the bookish person."—PALL MALL GAZETTE.

Your true lover of books has always desired a place of quietude where he can leisurely look through book after book, until he finds the right companion for his mood, or the choice copy of a favourite author he would present to his friend.

Such a place—quiet, comfortable, and with a large range of books to choose from—is the London Literary Lounge, where may be found works on every subject. The Book-lover is invited to call and inspect the contents of the shelves, and is assured that in doing so he need not feel any obligation to purchase.

A Catalogue of Books, at Greatly Reduced Prices, may be had on application.

TRUSLOVE & HANSON, LTD.,
48, CLIFFORD STREET (One Door from BOND STREET, W.1).

The Swarthmore Press Books.

"THE GREATEST BOOK THE WAR HAS PRODUCED."

CIVILISATION: 1914—17.
By GEORGES DUHAMEL. Translated by T. P. CONWIL-EVANS. Crown 8vo. 6s. net.

'Civilisation' is a marvellous book—perhaps with 'Vie des Martyrs' the greatest book that the war has produced, perhaps the only book, indeed, to which the word great can be applied at all. ... There is no reason why 'Civilisation' should not have the success this country that it has had already in its own. We have not ourselves produced a war book to compare with it."—Everyman

THE MISADVENTURES OF ATELSTAN DIGBY.
By WILLIAM F. HARVEY. Crown 8vo. 6s. net.

"An uncommonly good book of short stories. The hero of the series is a Yorkshire blanket manufacturer, who is also an art collector, a financier, and a patron of foreign missions, so that the scope of the 'misadventures' is wide. Mr. Harvey has good ideas and develops them well."—The Star.

Ready Immediately. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

POEMS: 1912—1919.
By GILBERT THOMAS. Author of "Birds of Passage," "The Further Goal," "Things Big and Little," etc., etc.

A STANDARD WORK.

BRITISH WILD FLOWERS:
Their Haunts and Associations.
By WILLIAM GRAVESON. New edition, published in two forms. (a) A handsome Library Edition, with extra plates, at 10s. 6d. net. (b) A Popular Edition at 6s. 6d. net.

THE SWARTHMORE PRESS, LIMITED,

Macmillan's List.

Life of William Booth, the Founder of the Salvation Army.
By HAROLD BEGBIE. With Three Photogravures and numerous other Portraits and Illustrations. Two Vols. 8vo. £2 2s. net.

Through Deserts and Oases of Central Asia.
By Miss ELLA SYKES, F.R.G.S., and Brigadier-General Sir PERCY SYKES, K.C.I.E., C.B., C.M.G. With Illustrations and Maps. 8vo. 21s. net.

The Daily Chronicle:"'One of the most fascinating books I have read for some time. ... Sir Percy Sykes and his sister, whose books on Persia have already become standard authorities in their two degrees, have placed the reader public under a fresh indebtedness for their latest volume.' "

EIGHTEENTH THOUSAND.

The Economic Consequences of the Peace.
By JOHN MAYNARD KEYNES, C.B. 8vo. 8s. 6d. net.

Thoughts on the Union between England and Scotland.
By ALBERT V. DICEY, K.C. Hon. D.C.L. of the Inner Temple, and ROBERT S. RAIT, C.B.E., Historiographer-Royal for Scotland. 8vo. 16s. net.

Rudyard Kipling's Works.
UNIFORM EDITION. 21 Vols. 7s. 6d. net per Vol. POCKET EDITION. 22 Vols. Printed on thin paper, with gilt edges. Limp leather, 7s. 6d. net; blue cloth, 6s. 6d. net per Vol.
THE SERVICE KIPLING. 26 Vols. Blue Cloth 5s. net each.

The Reign of Religion in Contemporary Philosophy.
By S. RADHAKRISHNAN, M.A., Professor of Philosophy in the University of Mysore, Author of "The Philosophy of Rabindranath Tagore." 8vo. 12s. net.

THIRD EDITION.

The Philosophical Theory of the State.
By BERNARD BOSANQUET, L.L.D., D.C.L.
Third Edition. 8vo. 15s. net.

Implication and Linear Inference.
By BERNARD BOSANQUET, Fellow of British Academy, Author of "The Philosophical Theory of the State," "The Essentials of Logic," &c. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

The object of this book is to develop and elucidate the non-syllogistic principle on which the author's "Laws" was founded.

The Hope of Man:

Christian Freedom.

Macmillan's List of New and Forthcoming Books with Descriptive Notes: post free on application.
MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON, W.C.2.
THE HOUSE OF CASSELL

OUT OF MY LIFE

MARSHAL VON HINDENBURG

With Photogravure Frontispiece. 528 Pages Cloth, 31s. 6d. net. World Publishing Date—April 9th.

The most important book about the War which can come out of Germany. But it is not entirely a war book. Von Hindenburg traces his association with the German Army from the days of his youth. He shows that Army in the creating, the great military machine being slowly and carefully perfected for its assault against the world's peace.

GERMANY'S HIGH SEA FLEET IN THE WORLD WAR. PERSONAL RECOLLECTIONS OF ADMIRAL SCHEER

Transcribed from the German. With Portrait of the Author, Maps and Plans.

Beginning with the historic Kiel week of 1914, the ex-Commander-in-Chief of the German Navy tells of the doings of the High Sea Fleet through the war down to the time when the Revolution destroyed it as a fighting force. The U-Boat, the Blockade and Zeppelin Raids, etc., are discussed in detail, his report on the battle of Jutland gives vital historical material which must be reckoned with when the truth of this battle is finally thrashed out.

All the explorations among the mountains of the world made by the author during his years of climbing are here-described in one delightful book—delightful from every point of view—travel, description, mountaineering, side-thoughts, rippling humour, quiet philosophy.

WITH THE "DIE-HARDS" IN SIBERIA. By COL. JOHN WARD, C.B., C.M.G., M.P. With 8 Plates. Cloth, 10s. 6d. net.

A straightforward, manly book, dealing with the adventures of the 25th Battalion of the Middlesex Regiment in Siberia. Will throw light on much that has been obscure in the story of Admiral Kolchak's fight with Bolshevism.

"Bunt and outspoken."—Daily Chronicle.

A collection of materials relating to the most significant and arresting figure of the modern world, and those brilliant men and women who circled around him.

PRACTICAL AMATEUR GARDENING. By H. H. THOMAS (Editor of "POPULAR GARDENING") With Coloured Frontispiece and 48 Half-tone Illustrations. Cloth, 8s. net.

Deals with the cultivation of fruits, flowers and vegetables, insect pests, and plant diseases. A brief calendar of garden work for each month is included. A book full of plain and practical information for the guidance of amateurs, which will be found invaluable.

FIRST-CLASS FICTION

COMPTON MACKENZIE. M. LEONORA EYLES. (Author of "Margaret Protests.") OLIVE WADSWLEY. MAY SINCLAIR. ALICE PERRIN. VINGIE E. ROE. CYNTHIA STOCKLEY. ETHEL M. DELL. WILLIAM LE QUEUX. H. RIDER HAGGARD. H. A. VACHELL. WARWICK DEEPING. PERCEVAL GIBBON. JOHN HASTINGS TURNER.

"The Vanity Girl" (8/6 net).

"Cptivity" (7/6 net).

"Belonging"

"The Romantic" (8/6 net).

"The Vow of Silence" (6/- net).

"Tharos of Lost Valley" (7/6 net).

"Pink Gods and Blue Demons" (6/- net). With 4 Plates.

"The Top of the World" (7/6 net).

"The Red Widow" (7/6 net).

"The Ancient Allan" (8/6 net). With 8 Plate.

"Whitewash" (8/6 net).

"The Prophetic Marriage" (7/6 net).

"Those Who Smiled" (7/6 net).

"A Place in the World" (7/6 net).
THE RESPONSIBILITY OF DIARISTS

THERE are (as the fashionable comedies like to say) two sorts of people—those who keep diaries and those who do not. While there is little enough in a general way to be said for such arbitrary classifications, perhaps there is something to be said for this one. One either does, or one does not, keep a diary, and if one does not one cannot imagine one's self beginning. The distinction is as profound and as firmly based upon temperament as another distinction, that between the people who are, and who are not, letter-writers. One kind of person sets his identity upon paper (without prejudice to other expressions of it) for the benefit of a correspondent as naturally and spontaneously as another kind of person gets on with existence and keeps epistolary silence. The first writes letters because he likes writing them; the second writes them not as occasion but only as dire necessity arises—and not always then.

While it may be said that the diarist is in general the letter-writer, the converse by no means follows. The letter-writer finds his satisfaction in the simple act of addressing an audience. He puts himself upon paper as he is (or wishes to be thought to be) at the moment, and that is an end of the matter until he responds to the impulse to put himself upon paper again. The essence of the diarist is that his satisfaction in self-expression is cumulative, and is to be enjoyed in the future. Was there ever a diarist who threw his sheets over his shoulder with the rapidity of Count Fosco, and who never wished, at least, to see them again? One hardly thinks so. One thinks that the consciousness, "This is my diary; one day I will read it all through," must always be present in the diarist, and must be his principal stimulus in the formidable task on which he is engaged. The war, for those who took part in it and survived it, was a good school of experience, and in the war one saw the diarist at his simplest and, as we should be inclined to say, his most heroic. How many were the little books that (contrary to regulations) were kept; and how sublime the faith that what was written to-day would be added to tomorrow, and that what was written in all the days would be enjoyed at the finish!

But diarists who have not gone west with their little books with them have also failed sometimes in their intention of revision, and it is the responsibility of the diarist as such that is in question here. The point has recently been raised with regard to a contemporary who has kept a diary and who has published it in his own lifetime. Mr. Scawen Blunt has enjoyed great social advantages, and if there is one thing more likely than another to make a man a diarist (although, if he is born one, he will stand in need of no temptation) it is the knowledge that the figures and events he moves among will be the certain object of interest to posterity. Mr. Blunt has been reproached for publishing his diary in his own lifetime and in the lifetime of many of those who figure in it; but this, we should have thought, was a matter on which he ought rather to have been felicitated. To publish a work is to assume responsibility for it, and to publish one's diary is to afford at least presumptive evidence that its cumulative effects have been considered. Besides, Mr. Blunt is still here, and the authenticity of his records may be challenged. If Mr. Belloc wishes to explain that he was not seriously disappointed of a peacetime at the time of the House of Lords crisis, but was indulging Mr. Blunt in a faculty of credulity, he has only to write to the papers. If Mr. Churchill does not relish some of his earlier table-talk it is open to him to announce that he finds Mr.
Blunt’s report of it marked by the extreme of terminological inexactitude. In these, and in any other cases, the denial or the qualification, if made, would at least be on record as well as the assertion; and both would be equally before that portion of posterity which is likely to be interested. How much better, how much more responsible a proceeding, to publish one’s diary in one’s lifetime, than to go on accumulating it, to go on promising oneself that one will revise it, and then to die, with one’s daily jottings unrevised, but safely secured of immortality.

The truth of this has recently been brought home to us by some investigations we happen to have made into a diary so preserved, whose least word, since it was once written, is indestructible. It is there, in its thirty-five or so leathern-covered notebooks, covering a period of fifty years, and every word true of course, or at least to be reckoned with, because it is there! Great is the responsibility of diarists. To give one instance only. A hundred years ago in England political feeling ran high, not without good reason; and a certain man of letters succeeded in conveying with peculiar point and incisiveness in a footnote, his opinion that a certain other and more famous man of letters was, in respect of the political influence of his later writings, and in spite of his poetic merits, no better than a turncoat. The second man of letters, being of an extreme probity, was justly enraged; and happening to be called upon immediately by our diarist, who was in the state of receptivity induced by recent and flattering acquaintance, he threw out in the latter’s hearing the “true reason” for this attack upon him. It had nothing to do, it appeared, with differing sympathies or convictions of a public character, expressed over an independent career of twelve years’ standing; but was entirely owing to the circumstance that, early in youth, the first man of letters had committed himself to a moral indiscretion within the cognizance of the second man of letters, a misfortune which the first man of letters had been unable to forget or to forgive. The details followed, and, running home to his little book, pop (as Bayes would say) our diarist: flapped them down. He flapped them down, with obvious verbal slips, with little blanks and vacancies, that still stare and wink at us from the yellowing page; and the next day he was off after new events, and the next after still newer ones, and so on until the age of more than eighty, when he died with his diary written up to the angel’s knock, but with his promised plan of revision in essentials unattempted. To keep a diary is a matter of temperament and habit, but to read one’s diary after one has written it calls for an independent act of resolution, as well as for more time perhaps, in spite of his intentions, than the really born diarist ever finds upon his hands.

Diaries, we think, which are so important to history if they are written, and so unimportant to history if they are not written, should be read in the light of the evidence they afford as to whether their writers have found time to read them. For what, after all, is the subject-matter of diaries, save that personal information which most of us hear to-day and hear essentially qualified to-morrow? The subject-matter of diaries, as it circulates in club-rooms, has been very well treated in a chapter of a contemporary satire, Mr. Mackenzie’s “Poor Relations.” Rumour is a lying jade, but her words, when written and preserved for long enough, take on a strange and incontrovertible dignity. Of this process the diarists and the letter-writers are the handmaidens. It is the consolation of those who are neither that if they do not add to posterity’s rewards, at least they abstain from adding to its labours.

P. P. H.

DE QUINCEY’S MOTHER

II.

THERE was talk at one time of sending Thomas to Eton. Thomas, a shy, studious and somewhat effeminate boy, made inquiries among his aristocratic young friends, and came to the conclusion that the discipline and discomfort of a public school would not suit him. These are the words in which he dissuades his mother from her project: “Eton is certain you will not like. From all I hear, the discipline of the school is certainly not what one would expect, and surely not what it should be. Westport and Dominick Brown his cousin have told me enough to make me sure of that; and the morals of the place are evidently at a low ebb.” De Quincey was not sent to Eton, but, as every schoolboy knows, to Manchester Grammar School. Every schoolboy also knows that he ran away from the Manchester Grammar School. His correspondence with his mother during his last term at school is not so well known—and is instructive.

This running away from school was no mere act of boyish caprice. He was 16, a singularly gentle and studious boy, a born scholar, recognized as such by masters and schoolfellows alike. The régime of school (which, indeed, to the twentieth century appears little short of homicidal) did not suit his health. He suffered from a series of slight, but almost perpetual liver disorders, and their consequent agonies of depression. He wrote to his mother a perfectly sensible and respectful letter, explaining his sufferings, and begging to be allowed to spend the eighteen months which must elapse before he entered College at home, instead of at a school which had reduced his health and spirits to a level at which study was impossible.

Such a letter to a mother of Mrs. De Quincey’s means and position at the present day would normally result in visit to a specialist and a prescribed course of holiday, diet and exercise. Morality and religion would have about as much to do with it as if the boy complained of short sight or rheumatism.

With Mrs. De Quincey the physical side of the case was soon dismissed: “Your misery I sincerely lament, and with tenfold concern because it is produced by your sick mind, which no earthly physician can cure.” But Thomas was not left even to the care of an “earthly physician,” but to the care of a mere apothecary, who “with sublime simplicity confined his treatment to one horrid mixture that must have suggested itself to him when prescribing for a tiger.” Thomas took two doses, but the instinct of self-preservation asserted itself and prevented his taking a third.

His mother concentrated on the moral aspect of her son’s case, and indeed his proposition revealed a state of mind which, in her own words, “filled her with anguish and amazement." She saw in it a deliberate design to revolt—to renounce not merely the authority of a "living parent," but to trample on the last wishes of a dead father. His opinions had probably been suggested, certainly swelled into importance, by the advocates of early emancipation and other preposterous theories. It was the result of Thomas's overweening pride, "the spirit of heathenism; and if any one temper of mind may singly be put to describe the whole anti-Christian character, it is self-glory—and its monstrous adjuncts are independence and pride, which cast angels from Heaven—where such tempers are no more admissible now than then."

At the same time it was the result of a purely childish desire to idle away his time at home—free from the disagreeable accidents of school. It would damage his material prospects, and lose him the chance of an exhibition of £100 a year at Oxford. In short, Mrs. De Quincey was "well assured that a year spent at home in desultory reading without an object is an evil of such incalculable extent that I shall never consent to it, except to avoid something very dreadful to be escaped in no other way."

So Thomas was to remain at school, not, however, without spiritual help for his "sick mind."

As your parent, my very dear child [writes his mother], I command you, in the name of that God whom you must serve or lose, that you do conscientiously read every day at least a chapter in the Gospels and Epistles; there you will learn, at any rate you may learn, to know yourself, your end, your duty. Ask of God to enlighten your understanding to receive the truths of His Word. Let your daily reading be the works of men who were neither infidels nor Jacobins: read history; it will show you the corruption of human nature and the overruling power and providence of God.

This remedy Thomas treated as he had done the apothecary's pills, and, this time taking his case into his own hands, ran away from school. After wandering for nearly a year in London and Wales, enduring all the horrors of destitution, Thomas was finally reconciled to his mother and guardians, spent the remaining months which elapsed before he could go to Oxford in the desultory reading so much to be dreaded, and went up to Oxford without an exhibition. He thus gained by open defiance everything which had been denied to his reasonable request, and in addition a constitution shattered for life.

The lesson which Mrs. De Quincey seems to have drawn from her dealings with Thomas was the necessity for an increased severity in the upbringing of her sons. This is exemplified in her dealings with her second surviving son, Richard.

Richard, known in his family as Pink, was four years younger than Thomas, equally gifted and far more attractive. As a boy he was constantly put to shame by the ladies of Bath who stopped and kissed him on his way to school. But for all his exquisite, almost feminine beauty, he was strong, high-spirited, even aggressively manly as the toughest of his schoolfellows.

He was originally put to school under a clergyman in Lincolnshire, a gentle, learned reclusson, under whom Pink was both happy and well taught. Mrs. De Quincey soon discovered that this man's yoke was too mild and easy for her son, and Pink was removed to the care of one better fitted to counteract the latent evil of his disposition. This man was an active, bustling bully, with the ideals and methods of a horse-tamer.

He not only thought that physical coercion was the sole engine by which man could be managed, but, on the same principle, he fancied that no pupil could adequately or proportionately reverence his master until he had settled the psychological proportion of superiority in animal powers by which his master was in advance of himself. Strength of blows only could ascertain that.

Pink was not exempt. In De Quincey's own language, "Pink the beautiful, but also the haughty, the proud, he beat, kicked, trampled on." In less than two hours' time Pink was on the road to Liverpool. He was discovered in an inn, and taken to an uncle, who restored him at once to the headmaster with the stipulation that he was not to be thrashed in future. No inquiries were made. The uncle was, if anything, mildly amused at his nephew's exploit. As soon as he had gone, the master took his revenge in a second thrashing more brutal than the first. Pink again set out for Liverpool.

Pink could profit by experience, if his elders could not. This time, avoiding public inns and high roads, he made straight for the docks. He was taken on board a merchantman. His family heard nothing of him for three years. They did not see him for seven. At the end of that time he reappeared among them, by an extraordinary combination of good luck and industry, as a midshipman in the Royal Navy. But for seven years he had passed through the horrors of shipwreck, piracy, and constant confinement with the most brutal and degraded characters. His health was completely ruined and his spirit broken.

The stories of Pink and Thomas would have given most mothers pause. For Mrs. De Quincey they were full of instruction. The lessons which she drew from them are shown by a letter written to her youngest son Henry when she had just heard news of Pink:

Thus, my dear Henry, you must see to what lengths a rebellious spirit can carry a person. A boy with Richard's pride, who fancied himself equal to the first in society, and was disgustèd with the thought of the condition even of his own family, and of everything in the shape of rule, voluntarily sinks himself to be the companion of common sailors, submits to the very tight discipline of a ship, and the orders of a coarse captain but a few, if any, degrees above his own crew. And again, oh Henry, your brother's sufferings have been so great, and I fear are likely to be so that they might well deter others from like rebellious conduct.

Of such exhortations Mrs. De Quincey was never weary. As she writes to Thomas:

In this letter I purpose faithfully to point out to you where you are departing from the rectitude of your first principles, and I charge you that no science, no aim, no destination under the sun can ultimately be good which grows out of a dreadful fallacy. . . . The increasing love of a mother is figuratively used as the most immutable of human things, to express the absolute unchangeableness of God to His children. My tenderness shall follow you through every change and period of life. If the world forsakes you (a probable thing, though not in the catalogue of your present expectations), I cannot.

She did not. At every stage in her children's career she is ready with appropriate exhortation, advice and reproof. Never did she fail in her sacred duty of pointing out to her children the error of the way in which they were walking. To Thomas, a man of fifty, the father of three children and of established literary reputation, she writes:
I must now enter on some very painful subjects.

1st. I have heard and noticed before, though you replied not, that you are still an Opium Eater, and this dreadful Drug thus acts upon you.

2nd. That you write in a disreputable Magazine, and in a spirit afflicting, as I hear too, to your real friends.

Another report I rejected as quite incredible, namely, that your children’s education is neglected.

Having thus performed its last duty, the maternal pen was laid aside for ever. One cannot but pity her. She may not have been a wise or sympathetic mother, but she was a devoted and most unhappy one. “I can see at the bottom of your calamities no better hope than that which has ever cheated my unfortunate children,” she writes on one occasion. Truly she suffered in the sufferings of her children.

Of her eight wonderful children, four were tubercular, two ran away from her in childhood, three died before the age of 16, and only two survived the age of 30, and of these one after sufferings so hideous that, in comparison, his brothers and sisters were happy in their early deaths.

“Wilt thou bring down my grey hairs with sorrow to the grave?” The cry is exquisitely pitiful. There is nothing of which we can remind ourselves which will harden our hearts against it.

D. HUSSEY.

A VISION
In a paradise I lie of leaves and flowers:
Long boughs hang from above in luminous showers:
Rose-scented the warm air.
A hidden water mingles its lisping sound
With the sultry music of bees, and the sense is drowned
In a pool of warm delight. But as it drowses
Deep and to outward things serenely closes,
Some freak of the uncharted mind lays bare . . .
No richer summer, deeper-hearted roses,
But greyness, rain, and ruin, and in the air
A flying sorrow as some forlorn shell whines
From silence into silence over the still
Brown deserts of torn earth, and the charred stains
Of shell-bursts, and the scrawled unending lines
Of battered trench where, blackening in the rains,
The dead lie out upon the naked hill.

MARTIN ARMSTRONG.

THE LOVER
Under the silver thatch, where dwells my love,
About her dormer window, in the straw,
The sparrows build and with their morning talk
Often awaken her.

And by the lattice climbs a crimson rose,
Who, if you could but see my dinky dear,
Before her loveliness, so wonderful,
Would pale with jealousy.

When the first glow of honeysuckle dawn
Cuddles her cottage in the dayspring light,
I pass upon my woodland road to work
And whistle as I come;

And if she hear and twinkle out of bed
To wave a kiss, then all my toil goes well;
But if she heed me not for weariness,
How long the working day!

EDEN PHILLPOTTs.
Street is awakening to the indisputable fact that while circulations steadily increase, political influence is steadily on the decline." Such a conclusion, with its related facts, might be taken to show that this great journalist has an argument to make out of his intimate evidence. But is it so?
For turning again in perplexity to his book, one sees it is not any of his confessions, his exposures of the gear of newspaper stunts, his casual admissions, his sporadic business axioms, which prove to us that our war is entirely right about the popular press. It is in the aroma of the book—the native quality which made it and pervades it. It is no doubt true that the influence of the press on the trend of common political thought is rapidly decreasing and may now almost have gone; though the brightness of our own faith lights no such ultimate good.
But the five years' war-work of the press, with the aid of the official censors, in giving public opinion that shape, through the doctoring and suppression of the facts, which the men in control of us and our fate thought most suitable for their purposes, about the war, about its origins, its conduct and progress, and the factors which should deter-dine its length and outcome—or, in other words, its work in shaping circumstances which certainly have the appearance to-day of the wreckage of European industrial society—that work of the press on public opinion is indisputable. We know its readers were eager; the material was willing and plastic. Yet to what a profound sense of responsibility that helpless plasticity should have moved those who had the moulding of it! Did their own limitations ever caution those responsible men? For they knew well enough how scrappy was their knowledge of the foundations of our complex society when they were so casually shifting its traditional beams. Well, examine this book, and remember that, though its author retired in 1912 from what control he had of that publicity machine which (when Lord Northcliffe was at his height and set the pace, yet that it worked to his design, and was the one which, it can claim, gave the main weight to the popular vote.
Now listen to this:

"Don't forget you are writing for the meanest intelligence," was a favourite maxim of mine.

When we have appraised to what degree of responsibility that instruction would work on a leader-writer, reporter, or sub-editor who had news or a message to give the public, we may consider this:

"You must remember," I replied [to John Morley] "that you left journalism a profession. We have made it a branch of commerce."

Having advanced in our knowledge of newspaper inspiration to that stage, we are now ready for this:

What sells a newspaper? ... The first answer is "War," War not only creates a supply of news, but a demand for it. So deep-rooted is the fascination of war and all things appertaining to it that I am persuaded, despite the League of Nations, wars will not cease until human nature has radically changed ... Only a dream has to beat a trend which is so strong and so going, that bring people to their windows, and a paper has only to be able put on its placard "A Great Battle," for its sales to mount up. The effect of the French war on popular thought, is evident to everyone.
Notwithstanding the Census, it brought back "The Times" from a penny to three pence, and restored its old prestige and prosperity; it destroyed the halfpenny sneer at the popular dailies, and by doubling their price, improved equally their finance and influence.

Could the most joyous whoop tell us more? Indeed, the book, in a sense, is a whoop. It is the sweep of the revenues of the lucky realization that one is addressing, not only the meanest intelligence, but the great-grandchildren of those who used to gape at old women in ducking-stools? Is there any danger to the community when that quality of Fleet Street can give Downing Street just that support it needs in the public opinion which precedes war, which helps in conducting war, and supports the makers of that sort of peace which is merely 'the interlude to war'? Of course there is danger, and an excellent thing too, for, as Mr. Jones doubtless would admit, the danger makes the money.

"So deep-rooted is the fascination of war and all things appertaining to it." All things? Let a soldier, though not of the meanest intelligence, examine the files of the great dailies from August, 1914, to the end, for news of those matters which to him were the things appertaining to war that were predominant in it, and obscured all the rest. How much of them will he find recorded? A battle was never so described in any newspaper during the whole war, nor since. But, as Mr. Kennedy Jones knows full well, there was a sound reason for that omission. The fascination of war might have lost its "deep roots"; and those roots are so intermingled, as he himself declares, with that other root which is said to be the radical of all evil.

And is there any release for the community from a press which is inspired by such a concept of its duty?
Not much of a chance of release. The book points out that the modern press enjoys, by reason of its costly organization and upkeep, its hold on the advertisers, and its control of the means of distribution, what amounts to a monopoly of the public ear. It would be almost impossible for a newspaper with a different inspiration to be successful. So now, thanks to Mr. Jones, we shall know where we are when to-morrow and afterwards we pick up our favourite newspaper.

H. M. T.

"GOING IN FOR GOD"

WILLIAM BOOTH, FOUNDER OF THE SALVATION ARMY. By Harold
Begbie. 2 Vols. (Macmillan. 42s. net.)

WHEN General Booth, by living long enough, had took Cecil Rhodes and Lord Loch down to Essex one day to see the Salvation Army Farm Colony at Hat-leigh. On the way back, in the railway carriage, Booth laid his hand on Rhodes' arm and said: "I want to speak to you about yourself. You're a man with much depending on you just now. Tell me, how is it with your soul?"
Mr. Rhodes said that it was not quite so well with his soul as he could wish, and, in answer to a further question that he did not pray quite so often as he should. The General then said: "Will you let me pray with you—now?" Mr. Rhodes consented, and the two knelt down together in the railway carriage, and 'the Salvationist prayod that God would guide, direct, and save the soul of the South African Colessee.' Meanwhile 'Lord Loch turned his face away and looked out of the window.'

In reading Mr. Harold Begbie's book we often found ourselves in the position of Lord Loch: we felt a great desire to turn our face away and look out of the window.
But that is not the right way to treat this phenomenon of William Booth. The world, indeed, may be divided into two classes, who pray with General Booth, people who are angry with General Booth, and people who turn their face away and look out of the window. Mr. Begbie, unfortunately, seems to have considered that it was necessary for his official biographer to pray perpetually with the General, and his 1,000 pages of biography even conform to the tradition of prayer in their repetitions, vagueness, and verbosity. But the only right way to treat the Salvationist would be with cold and sympathetic, scientific analysis, and, as a social and psychological phenomenon, the General is worthy of such treatment and investigation.
In the narrow confines of a review it is, of course, only possible to indicate in the roughest and most inadequate outlines the fascinating path which the scientific historian would have to follow.

William Booth was one of those rare persons who really believe what they think that they believe, and who act upon their beliefs. Being an Englishman born in the first half of the nineteenth century, nearly all the important beliefs inculcated into him in infancy dated from the first century A.D. He believed, for instance, in a personal God and a personal Devil, and he believed that every infant is born in original sin, so inherently corrupt as to be predestined, except upon one condition, to eternal damnation. The one condition is conversion, or the giving oneself to God, and this conversion is a sudden and revolutionary psychological and physical experience, in which the Devil (if cast out) and the spirit of God enters the human being. The best description of such a conversion may be found in an account by Ballington Booth, one of the General's sons, of a "Holiness Meeting" of the Salvation Army held in England, designed to induce the spirit of God to enter sinners. Preaching, prayer, and singing go on for many hours, until an intense excitement is manifested among the audience in weeping, groans, and cries. People shout, sing, laugh, cry, dance, roll on the ground. Then in ones and twos they are "smitten," converted. Soon the spirit of God enters them in ones and twos, but in sixes and sevens.

"Everyone," [says Mr. Ballington Booth] "was overpowered by the Spirit. One young man, after struggling and weeping for nearly an hour, said: 'Glory! glory! glory! I've got it! Oh! Bless God!' ... Another brother said: 'I must jump.' I said, 'Then jump,' and he jumped all round.'

Such were the fundamental beliefs, on the universe, life, and society, of William Booth, who had in him what he used to call a "queer thing, Booth blood," but who also had in him something as queer as Booth blood, namely, Jewish blood. Chance brought him into contact with the Methodists and revivalists, and at the age of fifteen he was himself "converted" during a service in the chapel. Being a man who really believed what he believed, he gradually came to see that it followed from his beliefs that everything else in life should be subordinated to the saving of other people from the appalling fate of eternal damnation which, if they were not converted, inevitably awaited them. Experience with revivalists showed him that with the help of oratory, singing, and noise it was not difficult to get the spirit of God to enter a considerable number of sinners. During the day he worked as assistant to a pawnbroker; his evenings and his Sundays were devoted to his new beliefs; and of his own beliefs eventually drove him to give up his worldly ambitions for wealth and to devote himself entirely to, what he himself called, "going in for God."

"Going in for God" meant, at first, for William Booth, becoming a Methodist clergyman and rushing up and down England converting sinners. But he not only acted on his beliefs, he was a man of enormous and indomitable energy. The Methodists shared his beliefs, but he began to go in for God too fast and too whole-heartedly for any respectable Church in England. If conversion were the supreme thing in life, and if noise was a powerful stimulant to the spirit of God and to conversion, it followed that noise would be a co-conspirator in a phenomenon destined to be a mistake to imply that Booth reasoned in this way, because he had an instinctive dislike of reason: he never did reason; he hopped, like some gigantic sparrow, from one belief to another belief. At any rate he developed, as a Methodist preacher, the method and ritual with which the world subsequently became familiar in the Salvation Army, and which had as its ultimate object "conversion." But his methods, his restless energy, and his autocratic temperament proved incompatible with the respectability of a Church or sect, and at the age of thirty-five Booth found himself outside all the Churches and without an occupation. But he always had one and only one occupation: the salvation of sinners by conversion, and this he continued to pursue by his own peculiar methods in a Mission in the East End of London. This Mission he transformed, when he was already fifty years old, into the now highly organized, disciplined, and sensational Salvation Army.

Such was the psychological phenomenon of William Booth; as a social phenomenon he is even more interesting. There are hundreds of pages in this biography filled with his letters, diaries, and other writings. There is no evidence in them that he ever had an original thought, or, indeed, that he was capable of thinking at all. He believed in God and conversion, and any other mental operation was unnecessary. His love letters, speeches, diary, books, are all indistinguishable from his prayers. Thus one of his first letters to Catherine Munford ends: "I pray for your entire consecration, and believe in you." Young in the Army meeting hall, spirit and body, for time and eternity, for earth and for Heaven, for sorrow and for joy, for ever and ever. Amen. William."

A man in that frame of mind, and with such a belief, has no need of thought. William had a profound mistrust of thought, and would have nothing to do with it throughout his life. When he was nearly thirty he suddenly went to a Theological College and tried to learn Greek, but his effort was short and unsuccessful, because he was often found "on his face in an agony of prayer when he ought to have been mastering Greek verbs." So, too, he never allowed any breath of reason or thought to enter his public organization or social activities. One of the wise rules which he made for Field Officers of the Salvation Army was:

In dealing with infidels, or any other unbelievers, the F.O. should not argue. ... It is his business to convert him, and not to refute him.

It was probably due to this fact that the Salvation Army was at first so extraordinarily successful in converting sinners among the poorer classes, and appeared to be so dangerous to orthodox Churchmen and the Church, to the Liquor Trade and publicans, and to atheists and agnostics. It is remarkable now to look back at the hatred which Booth and his Salvation Army roused among these classes when it seemed possible that he really might convert large numbers of the population to sobriety and a belief in Christianity. The press fomented, and the police protected, organized bands of roughs and hooligans who created disturbances in the same way in which pacifists are treated during war. Bishops and famous scientists gave their authority to the most lying rumours about the honesty of the General or the sexual morality of his Army. Charles Bradlaugh is said to have died repeating the words: "General Booth's accounts, General Booth's accounts," hoping against hope that the public inquiry would convict the General of embezzlement. In the eighties General Booth was the most disreputable and unpopular figure in England. Before he died he was one of the most popular men in the world, was received in audience by Edward VII. and all the crowned heads of Europe, and was presented with the freedom of the City of London. The most important change was, we suggest, two. Personally General Booth accomplished what, in England, always confers immense popularity: he became very old; he took his place by Queen Victoria, Gladstone, and " W.G."; he was 83, and still "not out." But he and his organization also became popular and respectable as soon as it was seen that they were not really dangerous. The drums beat, the people were converted, General Booth still went about saying: "We must shake the world in some way. Oh that I knew how!" But he did not know how. The shums still continued, and the public-houses, and science, and the Church of England. And the Bishops and publicans, the Times, the police, and the Professor Huxleys soon saw that there was no danger from General Booth. So they opened their arms to him and to the Salvation Army.

L. W.
THE MOSQUE

MOSLEM ARCHITECTURE. By G. T. Rivoira. Translated by G. McN. Rushworth. (Oxford, University Press. 42s. net.)

MOST of us see our first mosque at Woking. As the train slackens a small bulbous building appears among the fir trees to the left, and perhaps someone in the railway carriage says, "That’s Oriental." Our attitude is vague; and years afterwards, despite visits to the East, the vagueness remains. Whereas a Christian church or Greek temple wakens definite sentiments, a mosque seems indeterminate. We can recall its component parts, but have no architectural concept. It can make a pretty picture of it against the blue sky, but its central spirit escapes. And before we grapple with the late Commendatore Rivoira’s book it may be worth while to do what he would scarcely think of doing: to question our memories, and through them the mosque itself, and to listen to what it has to say.

"I was built," comes the answer, "in the first place at Medina, where I was a courtyard, and if you would understand me to-day you must still think of me as a courtyard, decorated by the accidents of history. Attached to the Prophet’s house, I was the area to which he proceeded when he would worship God, and where his companions joined him, summoned for this purpose by a cry from the top of my wall. I contained no sacred edifice, but the whole was one part of me more holy than another. Near me was a well for ablution; in me was a fallen tree where the Prophet stood to preach; and against my north wall lay a stone to indicate the direction of Jerusalem, city of the prophets Abraham and Jesus. My inmates prayed northwards at first, but afterwards turned south, their aspiration being Mecca. Before long I was built at Mecca also, but (strange though this may sound) you should not think of Mecca if you would understand me, because there, contrary to my spirit, I enclosed a sacred object and became a shrine. Dismiss the Caaba with its illusion of a terrestrial goal. Recall the courtyard of Medina, construct upon its wall a tower for the crier, raise a pulpit upon its fallen tree, contrive from its well a lavatory or tank, and enclose the sides of the courtyard, in particular the side that indicates the direction for prayer. Then you will see me as I am to-day at Cairo, Mosque of Ibn Touloun.

In the above reply the Mosque sets itself against a profound tendency of human nature—the tendency to think one place holier than another—and this is why it is rather a vague and unsympathetic object to a Westerner, and why its own architects have tended to modify its arrangements. It does not fail what is to most of us the function of a religious building: the outward expression of an inward ecstasy. It enjoys no crisis, leads up through no gradation of nave and choir, and employs no hierarchy of priests. Equality before God—so devoutly proclaimed by Christianity—lies at the very root of Islam; and the Mosque is essentially a courtyard for the Faithful to worship in, either in solitude or under due supervision. In the later centuries, under the influence of idolatrous surroundings, the original scheme was overlaid, and it is instructive to glance at the changes. The Mosque that the Emperor Akbar built in 1560 for his new city near Agra is a good example. It has moved very far from the Medina model, and its air is almost that of a temple or church. The prayer niche, usurping the functions of an altar, has become the core of a vast and gorgeous building to which the eye and heart naturally turn, while the uncovered part of the courtyard sinks into the unimportance of a cathedral close and is dotted with tombs. When we leave the courtyard and pass through the "west door" of the façade and through the smaller and darker apertures in the red sandstone beyond, we seem to near a sanctuary; and when the prayer niche at last appears and our eyes discern the ravishing but delicate colours that adorn its chamber, we have emotions appropriate to Canterbury or Chartres, and should not be surprised if priests arrived from the subordinate chapels on either hand, to mediate between the world and God. The emotion in such a Mosque is religious, but scarcely Islamic; we do not experience it in the buildings of earlier date.

It is with the early mosques that this sumptuous but intractable volume deals. The title "Moslem Architecture" is misleading, for in the first place the survey is carried down only to the twelfth century, thus excluding most of the Persian and Indian work, and much of the Egyptian, and in the second place, half the book is about churches in Armenia and Spain. The early mosques are examined with thoroughness, but the method is bewildering, and though scholars will doubtless find their way about, the layman had better retire to the comparative clearness of Saladin’s "Art Musulman," where he may pick up some notion of the five main architectural schools of Islam. From every point of view the book is difficult to read. The translator praises the author’s knowledge of English, but between them they produce sentences that have neither form nor colour, and they load the text with matter that ought to be dropped into the footnotes. For example, it is hard to understand why, after a complex account of the Mosque of Walid in Damascus, we find ourselves wandering among the Pustem temples, and being asked to wonder which of them should be more properly called the Temple of Neptune. And the illustrations, though magnificent, only increase our confusion. We spring from the colonnades at Baalbek into an Indian cave and thence to the Cathedral of Aachen, while the pages are still headed "Damascus." For the book is of the controversial type. All the buildings of Asia and Europe are shuffled together for an architectural deal, and though the author duly makes his tricks, one feels that the result would have been different if another player had done the shuffling—Mr. Havill, for instance, or Professor Lethaby. Rivoira has many antagonists. He is opposed to the "Indian" theory of Moslem Art, which not only finds in India the origin of certain architectural forms (e.g., of the horseshoe arch), but which also believes that Indian craftsmen built many of the early mosques. Then there is a "Spanish" theory, which likewise makes trouble with the horseshoe arch, declaring that it was used in vast quantities in Visigothic churches before ever the Moors arrived—an error, due mainly to a mistranslation of a passage in Isidore of Seville. Then there is the theory of Strzygowski, which exaggerates Oriental influence, and the "Egyptian" theory, which attributes too much to the Copts. Rivoira’s own theory, not unnaturally, is of the Roman colour. When in doubt as to the origin of an architectural feature he finds it at Rome, and he keeps the rotundas and baths of the Imperial city rather busy, making domes and niches for Islam. A Catholic in sympathy and an expert by temperament, he regards the Mosque as a grounded for architectural jousts rather than as a place of emotion, and he brings us no nearer to the spiritual or aesthetic understanding of it.

Since the edifice under consideration is a courtyard and not a shrine, and since the God whom it indicates was never incarnate and left no cradles, cots, handkerchiefs, or nails on earth to stimulate and complicate devotion, it follows that the sentiments felt for his Mosque by a Moslem will differ from those which a Christian feels for his Church. The Christian has a vague idea that God is inside the Church, presumably near the east end. The Moslem, when his faith is pure, cherishes no such illusion, and, though he behaves in the sacred enclosure as tradition and propriety enjoin, attaches no sanctity to it beyond what is conferred by the presence of the devout. Such mystery as accrues is the work of men. A Tunisian who visited Cairo in the thirteenth century found the famous Mosque of Amr there littered with dirt; “nevertheless,” he adds, “I experienced in it a soft and soothing influence without there being anything to look upon which was sufficient to account for it. Then I learned that this is a secret influence left there from the fact that the companions of the Prophet (may God accept them) stood in its court while it was building.” He was conscious of an atmosphere which, though supernatural, was not divine; men had produced it.
And whereas men may perfume some Mosques, they may defile others; for example, the Mosque which Anrangezeh built upon the ground of his murdered brother Dara, and which is reckoned unfavourable for prayers. Legends such as these, though they lapse from the spirit of Medina, do not oppose it. Islam, like Christianity, is troubled by the illogical and the idolatrous, but it has made a sterner fight against them. The Taaba, the worship of saints, the Mecca-position, do not succeed in obscuring the central truth: that there is no God but God, and that even Mohammed is but the Prophet of God; which truth, despite occasional compromises, is faithfully expressed in Moslem Architecture, and should be remembered by those who would understand it.

E. M. F.

A VOICE IN THE WILDERNESS

A BRAZILIAN MYSTIC: BEING THE LIFE AND MIRACLES OF ANTONIO CONSELHEIRO. By R. B. Cunningham Graham. (Heinemann.
15s. net.)

IMAGINE a remote upland region, where day and night alternately burn and freeze; cattle roam over a light soil, which changes with the seasons from choking dust to mud; the tropical forests, which crowd impenetrably on the lower slopes, are replaced here by scrub. This is the Brazilian Sertao, with a thinly-scattered, half-wild population of breeders and tenders of cattle. It is separated from the civilization of the coast by tracts of difficult country; inland, a range of mountains bars the way.
In a lost corner of this far-off world, a desolate countryside backed by wild hills, there existed in 1893 a small village, named Canudos, nestling beside the reed-grown banks of a river.

In that year its stagnation was violently moved by the appearance of a band of fanatical wanderers, led by a guant, fiery-eyed, elderly man. Antonio Maciel, known as Conselheiro, the Councillor, having brought his followers so far, elected to dwell with them at Canudos. Within five years a city of some 15,000 inhabitants had sprung up in the wilderness, and had been swept out of existence again. In its flourishing time it was a labyrinth of reed-built hovels, dominated by a vast church of stone, never completed. In this Cyclopean fane Antonio preached his dangerous doctrine. The end of the world was at hand; the faithful must prepare for the new dispensation by repentance, prayer and fasting; they must resist to all extremity the decrees and forces of the Republic, in whose liberalism and innovations the visionary eye could easily discern the baleful characteristics of Antichrist’s reign.
This teaching was received with ecstatic fervour; Antonio’s other-worldliness had caught the imagination of the dwellers of the Sertao. They were a race of mixed breeds, European, African and South American blending to form strains at once emotional and tenacious, tempered by hardships in a climate of extremes to an almost incredible pitch of physical endurance. Whatever had been their former course of life—and with many it had doubtless been outrageous—they repented now, and turned for salvation to the utmost rigour of religious observance, inspired by their leader’s precept and example. It is reported, presumably by their enemies, that their fasting, singing and praying alternated with furious orgies; it is not clear that this accusation was supported by trustworthy evidence;
in any case, it was not extended to the founder of the sect.
The Republic, openly defied, sent, one after another, four expeditions against Canudos. The approach to it was rendered difficult by the nature of the country; the town was fortified by a system of trenches; but the defenders were ill-armed, and it was thought at first that a small force would speedily settle the difficulty. The first expedition consisted of a hundred soldiers of the line and the ill-equipped militia of a small town. The last expedition, before it attained success, numbered over 10,000, with cavalry and artillery; the siege of the town lasted four months; in it perished the Councillor and all but an insignificant remnant of his followers.

Here was a theme for the flame and thunder of Carlyle’s pen. Antonio Conselheiro was one of those who impress their fellows as standing in direct communication with the Divine, as being charged with a message from it. His message has no clear meaning for us; it led the faithful to disaster; but can it be held that his career and influence were of other than portentous and absorbing interest?
In the process by which one man’s faith becomes the life of ten thousand there is a mystery that touches nearly the heart of our humanity. “Every new thing was at its starting,” says the Lecturer on Heroes, “is precisely in a minority of one . . . One man alone of the whole world believes it; there is one man against all men.”

Mr. Cunningham Graham gives us the story with a certain graphic effect and some picturesque detail.
Unfortunately, the picturesque detail is not chosen so as to throw light on the points that are most obscure and of deepest interest. The relation of the Councillor to his followers, his methods of organisation (which appear to have been so effective), his manner of life, especially during the sojourn at Canudos—these are but faintly presented.
Insufficient records may be to blame, but more probably the historian neglected to investigate these points simply because they did not interest him. He enjoys the general aspect of the movement, the fighting, the wild setting of the incidents, the physical prowess of the Sertao horsemen; and we enjoy these with him. But to the inner significancence of the events he brings nothing beyond a half-hearted rationalism, and a flimsy superficial comparison of the Conselheiro following with early Christian sects.

It is a pity that the value of a book containing so notable a record should be impaired by grave defects of style and taste. Mr. Cunningham Graham treats English syntax with a disregard which would appear slyly in a private letter, and which at times involves simple statements in annoying obscurity. This confusion extends to the order in which he presents his subject. He begins his Introduction. More serious is the frequent intrusion of commonplace reflections. Worst of all is an occasional pretentiousness, which cannot be too much deplored; it appears in peculiarly virulent concentration in the expression “Centaur’s before the Lord” applied to expert horsemen, which occurs twice. When his narrative is running at full flood, these blemishes tend to disappear.
He has a gusto for adventure, a genuine appreciation of certain aspects of experience, of the movement, colour, freedom of open-air life. With the power he shows at times of swift and adequate narration, he might, had he undertaken his task more simply and humbly, have presented this tragic history with tenfold effect.

F. W. S.

The fifth annual Henriette Hertz Lecture on a master-mind will be given by Mr. A. Clutton-Brock on “Raphael,” on Wednesday next at 5 p.m. at the rooms of the Royal Society, Burlington House. Sir F. G. Kenyon, President of the British Academy, will preside.
THE MINERS’ CASE

NATIONALISATION OF THE MINES. By Frank Hodges: (Leondard Parsons. 4s. 6d. net.)

Mr. Hodges has obtained a reputation, not confined to members of the Labour Party, for clear-headedness. If we may judge from his book this reputation would seem to be deserved. He has arranged his matter in a logical sequence, he confines himself to essentials, and he writes throughout with, at least, an appearance of scientific detachment. His case, briefly, is, that there is inevitably waste in the production, in the consumption, and in the distribution of coal under the present system of private ownership. He insists that the coal industry should be regarded as a whole; that the accidental frontiers of private ownership are not geological frontiers; that the prime consideration of an industry developed by shareholders’ capital, namely, that a certain monetary return should be obtained within a certain time, is not compatible with the most efficient and scientific development of that industry; and that different and competitive systems of distribution involve needless expenses for superfluous labour. His conclusions are based on facts, and the figures are taken from Government reports. We are already familiar with most of them from the evidence laid before Mr. Justice Sankey, and Mr. Hodges’ book is, in essentials, an exposition of the case then brought forward by the miners. We cannot withhold our opinion that it is a very strong case; Mr. Hodges’ points are really salient points. His argument is, in fact, the old argument that one great trust controlling a whole industry can work more efficiently and economically than a number of small and overlapping concerns. From the economic side, and as confined particularly to the development of such natural products as coal and oil, we believe the argument to be sound. So far as the legal part of his argument is concerned, it points, as Mr. Hodges admits, to an amalgamation of all the present coal-owners in one great trust.

But here he develops his second argument. We have to consider the psychology of the miners. Rightly or wrongly, they are now reluctant to work for the purpose of creating private profit. No system of profit-sharing will content them; they insist on a radically new status. They insist on the dignity of being regarded directly as servants of the community; they have lost all faith in the divine right of employers. That is why the country, and not a trust, must own and develop the coal-mines. Mr. Hodges does not deny the validity of the employers’ complaint that the nationalization output. He denies, however, that the men slacken their efforts in obedience to a conscious policy; it is a manifestation of their dissatisfaction with their present status—they have no heart in their work. And here Mr. Hodges changes from an economist to a miners’ leader. This, he informs us, is going on. Either nationalization or—more wages in order to reduce the employers’ profits. Mr. Hodges knows the figures; he admits that a stage can easily be reached when the present profits are wholly swallowed up by wages increases. Well, he says, and what then? Will the community pay more for coal in order to provide profits for the employers? Will they continue to pay more indefinitely? The miners are determined that the employers shall not have those profits. In other words, Mr. Hodges now says that the choice is not between nationalization and present conditions, but between nationalization and completely unworkable conditions—that is, in view of the temper of the miners, there is no alternative at all. Abuse of the miners is useless, for, as Mr. Clynes says in his foreword, their strength lies in the fact that “however much we may mowr the demands which they make, we will not go down the pits to take their place.”

ON THE ROAD

PILGRIMS OF CIRCUMSTANCE. By G. B. Burgin. (Hutchinson. 7s. 6d. net.)

"PILGRIMS OF CIRCUMSTANCE" is Mr. Burgin’s fifty-ninth novel. We have not read the fifty-eight which preceded it, but, if we may judge by this one, the author is not concerned with anything more serious than to amuse, or, perhaps it were truer to say, to distract his readers. For a long acquaintance with popular novels forces us to make the distinction between amusemen and distraction. By far the greater number of them aim at nothing more positive than a kind of mental knitting—the mind of the reader is grown so familiar with the pattern that the least possible effort is demanded of it, and yet this ravel of wool is just enough to keep one from facing those grim uncomfortable creatures who are only too ready to stare one out of countenance.

O Life! why is it that so many of thy children are homeless, for ever doomed to have a little time to spare between the stages of the tedious journey? What can they do? They cannot spend time staring out of windows. Is there nothing to go to see or hear or buy? Are there no books? Up and down the miles and miles of bookstalls range the unworldly dwellers. There are so many books that the cities are darkened, the country is buried, the sky is blotted out by them. And somewhere on the shelves there are Mr. Burgin’s fifty-eight novels, and a hand hoppers, slipping in the fifty-ninth.

"It must be wonderful to write novels," says somebody. "It must be the most wonderful feeling, even if you don’t take it desperately seriously, to be able to sit down and first create a small world of your own, where anything can happen that you choose to let happen, where the most enchanting beings can meet one another. There needn’t be a soul in it whom you don’t want; you can just, being God, remove people by one of those dreadfully unfair ‘Acts of God.’ I think the moment you sit down to a fresh notebook and decide whom you’ll have and where you’ll put them must be more thrilling even than sitting down to a Bulb Catalogue...." Well, let us see whom Mr. Burgin, after fifty-eight essays, has chosen: the comic landlady, the swerving parrot, the ranting old actor roaming of Shakespeare and whiskey glasses, the handsome young man whom the bright girl loves, but whom the reckless beautiful woman, married to a brute of a husband, adores.

"Mrs. Pipples, I’m not sure, but I think I’m on my legs again." "I’m glad to hear it, sir. And though I’m a widow woman as says it, you don’t often see such legs as yours, sir." "Polly screaming another comprehensive oath that would have delighted the soul of a buccaneer. "... Said the Wreck sarcastically... "I have a devilish thirst upon me which is but partially slaked." She turned for a moment, faced him, then walked slowly down the mossy path, an occasional sunbeam filtering... upon her beautiful face and curly, beautiful hair. "...Take me away from him. I would be your slave, your mistress, anything to get away from the awful degradation of my present life." Breathes the reader who, furnished with these quotations, could not imagine "Pilgrims of Circumstance" for himself? But that is not the question. Come, let us begin at the beginning and go on to the end, and then stop. Let us discover that there are even two comic landladies and the second is called Mrs. Wanks, and she lives at daggers drawn with Mrs. Pipples. Let us hear how the parrot uses "un’ly language" to the butcher. Softly—softly, dear reader, and perhaps by the time we have finished, and if we are still waiting, Mr. Burgin will have made the grand choice again, and his sixtieth volume will be ready for our empty hands.

K. M.
AN UP-TO-DATE ANTHOLOGY

CAMBRIDGE READINGS IN ITALIAN LITERATURE. By Edward Bullough. (Cambridge University Press. 8s.)

WE confess that we had not ventured to hope that the revival of interest in the study of Italian would have so speedily resulted in a volume of selections of this kind. Anthologies of the less-known literatures have a way of plodding stolidly along the beaten track, stopping only at the recognized halting-places. They make no attempt to put us on familiar terms with a whole period by introducing us to the smaller men, who often give a clearer insight into it than the great men who habitually represents it in the parliament of literature. Mr. Bullough realizes that if this revival of interest in Italian studies is to have any significance, it must do something more than increase the number of students of Dante or Petrarch or Manzoni, and that nothing short of a long residence in Italy can help to bring an Englishman into touch with the Italian of to-day so successfully as a familiar knowledge of contemporary Italian literature. Hence his book should find its way into all classes of advanced Italian. He does not waste space on the great names, nor does he seek to reverse the verdict of time in the earlier part of the nineteenth century. He has concentrated his energies on the writers of the last sixty years in Italy, and has wrestled with the difficulties of copyright with such success that he has been able to include almost all living writers of importance, even young men like Prezzolini and Papini, Govoni and Luigi Siciliani. Such a method has its dangers. Time will doubtless winnow these authors. We doubt, for example, whether Aldo Pallazzeschi, though certainly the ablest of the Futurists, has any real importance except as a specimen of that strange intellectual influenza which has now virtually worked itself out in the land of its origin.

We are glad that Mr. Bullough has not neglected dialect poetry, though we are sorry to miss Salvatore Di Giacomo, and also that he has snubbed Belli, who has so often been chosen to represent his less polished brother provincial in histories and anthologies. But surely the dialect poems should have been provided with notes. Nor do we often quarrel with the specimens given. A peculiar interest attaches to Niccolò Tommasso’s poem on Dalmatia, over the interpretation of which the Italian Nationalists and the Yugo-Slavs have split untold quantities of ink. Is it Mr. Bullough’s cunning that makes him regret in his preface his inability to find room for a number of writers, most of whom could not really claim a place in such a collection, interesting though they undoubtedly are, in the hope of inducing his readers to taste them independently? For ourselves, the most interesting poet in the book is Roccagagliata-Ceccardi, who appears to be little known even in Italy and to whose work our author was introduced by Eleonora Duse. We shall look forward to the promised edition of his poems, for the specimens before us display a depth of thought and feeling that promises much.

Mr. Bullough has, on the whole, succeeded in his attempt to “present a picture of Italian thought in the nineteenth century,” though passages from philosophers like Spaventa or Croce are bound to be something in the nature of bricks as samples of houses. For one thing we are particularly grateful, and that is that he has taken the trouble to give us some specimens of modern Italian inscriptions. The traditions of the art of epigraphy have been handed on without a break from classical days through Papal Rome to our own time; and when we remember that Italian is not a language that seems at first sight to lend itself to the conciseness of the epigraphical style, we would earnestly commend these inscriptions to the attention of those responsible for our own public monuments.

L. C.-M.

ERNEST HARTLEY COLERIDGE

In supplement of the brie obituary notice printed in last week’s Athenæum, it seems right to mention one or two other publications which entitle the late Mr. Coleridge to more than the transient gratitude of the reading public. In 1888, his “Poems,” a third volume, but of definite charm and quality, more resembling the work of Hartley his uncle than that of his grandfather Samuel Taylor. There is, however, constant reference to that Priest of invisible rites behind the veil of the senses; and one of the most beautiful of these poems begins:

What if we gained a summit, you and I,
Who step by step his wandering footsteps trace,
And high on sunny Quantock, suddenly,
Met Coleridge in a vision face to face?

Twenty years later, during the European war, he was rare courtesy, in answer to a communication regarding Coleridge, sent a stranger four additional stanzas:

Or by the moonlight we may find him still,
In Halford Glen, beside the ash-tree dell,
Wandering alone and at his own sweet will
In visionary quest of Christabel.

Or where the beeches climb the heathery steep
Or 'mid the hollows on Alfoxden's knoll
Shall we not find him wrap'd in converse deep
And call him by his own dear name, 'Dunstan and one soul'?

And we shall know him by his dusky hair
And eyes that flash with one wild inward light,
And he would talk with us—Oh, joy it were—
The live-long day and half the babbling night.

But ah! my fancies fail, for thou art fled
To those great shades! to-morrow I must go;
But yet the fume will bloom on Quantock's head,
And in the glen the hidden brook will flow.

Such verses are a fair example of the grace, melody, and human kindness combined in his best work; and it is to be hoped that, if more of them remain in manuscript, they may presently be collected and brought to light.

Mr. Coleridge won wider recognition as editor than as poet. If his great edition of Samuel Taylor Coleridge has not superseded that of Dykes Campbell, it is at least wonderfully thorough and practical; work at once able and affectionate. A small selection produced by him in 1905 was in every way admirable; his object being “not to do justice but to give pleasure—to gather the choicest blossoms in the garden, as if for a flower-glass or beaupart.” In 1907 he brought out a magnificent edition of Christabel with a colotype of the author’s portrait and his name surmounted and his inscriptions. In these volumes, as in all his critical work, Mr. Coleridge has surpassed all his rivals in keeping green the fair fame of S.T.C. It was with reason that he wrote two years ago: “I doubt if by me or anyone else a much fuller or bigger edition will be attempted for many long years to come.”

Theology as an Empirical Science. By D. C. Macintosh, Ph.D. (Allen & Unwin, 12s. 6d. net.)—The title of Dr. Macintosh’s work recalls a saying of Professor Santayana in criticism of the a priori philosophy: “Why any reality—such as God, for instance—should not be just as empirical as the other side of the moon, if experience suggested it and reason discovered it.” If Kant never tells us and never himself knew.” Dr. Macintosh, appealing to no other criticism than experience and reason, endeavours to find a justification for the postulates of religion in mankind’s “personal experience of the divine Reality.” This psychological treatment of the religious problem is one that is likely to inspire much popular discussion. It is true, Dr. Kant never tells us and never himself knew.”

E. B.
MARGINALIA

I

WAS summoned a few days ago to attend one of those grand assemblies of specialists, general literary practitioners, enthusiastic and curious amateurs who come together periodically for consultation round the bed of the moribund drama.

At the last gasp of Shakespeare's latest breath, When, his pulse failing, Drama speechless lies, Revive goes sniggering round the bed of death, And Repentance, losing up his eyes—

Now if thou wouldst—

that is the pious ideal (it is hardly as much as a hope) of the medicine men—

Now if thou wouldst, when all have given him over, From death to life thou might'st him yet recover.

"Thou" in this case is the younger generation, to whom we all look for the miraculous transformation of the death scene into one of triumphal birth.

The cure, then, according to the most expert authorities, is that all the younger generation should take to writing plays which the existing play-producing societies, or combinations of them, or new societies of the same nature should perform. It is certainly possible that if great masses of youthful aspirants could be got to write in the dramatic form—and they would need more solid bribes than can be offered by single-performance societies—it is possible that buried talents might be unearthed. But the thing is by no means necessary and inevitable. Take, for example, the case of the novel. Young men have every inducement to write novels, and they do write them, in large numbers. But among these masses of novels the good ones are extraordinarily few. The same is true of our much advertised renascence of poetry. After all, when we come to look at it dispassionately, what has the whole amount to? Precious little. Is there any reason, then, to suppose that something quite different will happen when the younger generation sets to work on the drama? Will the health of the drama be materially improved when the Stage Society receives, not ninety, but nine hundred manuscripts a year? To these questions we can only doubtfully shake our heads.

The fact is that good work in any branch of literature is always scarce. There is no relation between the quantity of output and its quality. Ten thousand playwrights might write and not a single good play be produced. The good play will only be written when chance sends us some man of genius who feels disposed to express himself dramatically. And after all, we have not very much to complain of. There have been periods in English history when the drama sank to levels far lower than that to which it has now declined. The eighteenth century produced no tragedy which it is possible to take seriously—unless one excepts the heartrending and edifying "George Barnwell"—and, after Vanburgh's death, surprisingly few comedies. The nineteenth century was yet more sterile. The Cambridge historians of literature were reduced, to talk about such masterpieces as "Box and Cox."

Compared with these two periods, our age can count itself hugely fortunate in the possession of such playwrights as Shaw and Synge. Furthermore, it has seen a marked rise in the average level of dramatic efficiency. (Not that that makes much difference; for a bad play is always bad, and will always ultimately be recognized as such, however thickly veiled by good technique.) We possess as many great dramatists as we do novelists of genius, that is to say, none (Mr. Hardy belongs to an older generation). And if talented and interesting playwrights are not so plentiful among us as talented and interesting novelists, that is simply due to the fact that it is less of an undertaking to print a book than to produce a play. Make it easy and moderately profitable to produce plays, and we shall soon have as many reasonably good playwrights as novelists. If this be a consumption devoutly to be hoped, then, by all means, let us work at it. Perhaps, in the end, for interesting and improving the public taste, it will be found that the theatre will certainly be a rather more amusing place than it is at present. At the same time, we have to remember that reasonably talented and interesting playwrights will no more be geniuses than the many novelists of the same class whom we possess to-day. To lure the intelligent into writing plays the various societies which exist for this purpose can only offer the fleeting glory of, at the most, two performances, and, in place of material rewards, a few phrases about art for its own sake. Nobody can be surprised that the intelligent prefer to spend their time in some employment more lucrative than the writing of plays which only the societies will perform. If the play-producing societies really want to discover new dramatists, let them found a dramatic club with large and sumptuous premises in St. James's, where members might eat, drink, sleep and read the papers as comfortably as at any other club. The club buildings would contain a small and well-appointed theatre where performances could be given at least once a week. To step from the dining-room into the theatre, and from the theatre into the smoking-room; to be able to see the play in comfort and without risk of catching cold or disturbing digestion by the post-prandial scramble for the cab—one could become almost lyrical about the delights of such a club. The immense prosperity which it could not fail to enjoy would make possible a moderate generosity. Authors would be tempted to write. And the public, in turn, would have the opportunity of experimenting free of charge. In a word, the whole scheme sounds so Utopian that one cannot help suspecting the presence of some hopeless flaw.

But enough of this. There is a passage in Tchehov's letters where he speaks of an article on Tolstoy, a passage which every literary journalist ought to hang up like a text over his writing-table. "It's a good article," says Tchehov, "but it's strange. One might write a thousand such articles and things would not be a step forward, and it would still remain unintelligible why such articles are written." Perfectly unintelligible! It is enough to chide the gayest, the liveliest fluency.

BOOK SALE

On Thursday, March 4, and the following day, Messrs. Sotheby sold books and manuscripts. The chief prices were:

The following came from the Rowfant Library, and in many cases were presentation copies from the authors or illustrators:

- R. Browning, Panaceus, 1833, £50; Stradford, 1837, £70; Bel's and Pomegranate, £45-6, £429; Dickens, A Christmas Carol, 1843, £150; Kate Greenaway Almanacks, 21 vols., 1884-97, £240; Grimm, German Popular Stories, 2 vols., 1823-5, £175. The Humourist, 4 vols., 1819-22, £50. G. Meredith, Poems, 1851, £15. W. Morris, Love is Enough, 1874, £80. R. L. Stevenson, Child's Garden of Verses, with MS. poem, 1885, £60. Swinburne, Rough Sketch of Act I. of Bothwell, n.d., £67. Tennyson, Poetical Works, 1869-72, £90; Poems, 2 vols., 1852, £50. The Lover's Tale, 1808, £78; Idylls of the King, 1890, £70. M. Corker, The Skibbereen, Prof. impressions of the plates to illustrate the Fairy Library, 1853-64, £100. The total of the sale was £11,572.
Science

A POPULARIZER OF SCIENCE

Silvanus Phillips Thompson, D.Sc., F.R.S.: His Life and Letters. By J. S. Thompson and H. G. Thompson. (Fisher Unwin. 21s. net.)

There are men who impress us as having gifts, but no gift—as having, that is to say, exceptional abilities, but no one predominant ability. Such men may achieve distinction in more than one direction: usually, however, the mental accidents of circumstance narrow their life to one mortal career, and they become specialists, but with an unusual number of “outside” interests. The late Dr. Thompson, Principal of Finsbury College, was a man of this type. In the public mind he was classed as a “scientist”: amongst other scientists, while in scientific circles he was regarded as an authority on Technology, particularly the technology of dynamo-electric machinery. He was known to be an exceptionally good lecturer, he was known to have an exceptional knowledge of the history of the physical sciences, and it was generally admitted that his linguistic and artistic achievements could not be matched amongst his colleagues. It was always felt that there was something a little unusual about his position in the world of science, or, rather, in the world of scientific men. There seemed to be a discrepancy between his reputation and his purely scientific work. It must be frankly admitted, as is done by his biographers, that his scientific research work was not of a very high order. If we compare it with that of some of his contemporaries, Lord Kelvin, Sir George Stokes, Rayleigh, we see that no real comparison is possible. Compared with the work of such men it is doubtful whether his own was even second-rate. Yet he stands out much more prominently than the score or so of comparatively undistinguished men who were doing work of equal value.

It might be thought that he followed the well-known second path to official eminence—that he was a great administrator. It is true that he was a good college Principal, but he never had to administer on a large scale. Here also his actual achievement could be paralleled by many men who lived in comparative obscurity. The solution of the puzzle is to be found, we think, in the fact that Thompson was not predominantly a scientific man at all; he was that much rarer thing, at least in his own circle, a cultured person. Having no particular itch, having an active mind, and living at the time he did, for him a certain interest in science was inevitable. He had the scholar’s mind, he was a good student, he liked lecturing, and it is therefore not surprising that he decided not to be a painter, but to embrace the surer and equally interesting livelihood offered to a science teacher. From the very beginning he took a keen interest in the technique of teaching. As a mere boy he writes that Tyndall pleased him, but was quite eclipsed by Huxley. His efforts to make himself a good lecturer were remarkably successful, and shortly after his appointment as Lecturer in Physics at Bristol he was in great demand as a popular lecturer. A popular audience was, in fact, precisely the audience best suited to his peculiar gifts. He had no temptation to enter into obscure technicalities, and his knowledge of painting, music, the literatures of six languages and of the frequently entertaining oddities belonging to the history of his subject, enabled him to deal with such topics as “The Rainbow in Science and Art,” “Colour,” “Ancient and Modern Science,” in a way that could interest the most unscientific mind. Later on he became fascinated by the practical applications of science, particularly the applications of the electric phenomena discovered by Faraday, and he made himself a genuine authority on this subject. His purely scholarly leanings, his interest in history, the attention he paid to prose, combined with his capacity for lucid and simple exposition, enabled him to write a number of text-books which enjoyed remarkable success, edition succeeding edition with a celebrity a novelist might envy. The labour of bringing these successive editions up to date was sometimes very considerable, and was a recurrent task throughout the rest of Thompson’s life.

On his removal to London, as Principal of the Finsbury Technical College, Thompson’s activities increased. He sometimes had to give as many as ten lectures per week, besides doing his administrative work. Nevertheless, he still found time for detailed historical research, for travels on the Continent, where he lectured in German and Italian, and for painting pictures of the Alps, which were exhibited at various art shows, including the Royal Academy. He produced more than one elaborate monograph on William Gilbert, the Elizabethan investigator of magnetism and electricity, translated Huyghens’ Treatise on Light, gave courses of lectures at the Royal Institution and wrote an elaborate Life of Lord Kelvin. At the same time he continued to publish occasional papers on original research work, but this activity, the raison d’être of the truly scientific man, perhaps the least important of all Thompson’s activities. That this was not the result merely of his versatility is seen when we turn to the career of Maxwell, a man whose versatility was quite comparable with that of Thompson, but who also did the most important original work in Physics that was done during the nineteenth century. Thompson’s interest in science was that of a cultured man; he was not, except in official position, a specialist. The letters to Thompson from other scientific men are interesting from this point of view. Kelvin writes:

I have looked in vain in encyclopaedias and text-books for something that everyone doesn’t know regarding the phosphorescence of luminous paint. Cantor’s phosphorus, etc.; so, as you know more than the encyclopaedias and text-books put together, I apply to you.

The application was quite successful. Thompson was always able and willing to supply out-of-the-way information, to give useful hints on lecture experiments which even experimenters of the calibre of Sir Oliver Lodge found useful, and to act as interpreter and general master of the research ceremonies, at international gatherings. In the very best sense of the word, he was a popularizer of science, and the fact that his great contemporaries were pursuing their researches rather over his head, as it were, merely means that he was not a genius. He touched three worlds, the scientific, the artistic and the “practical,” and he did his considerable best to make them better acquainted with one another. As was fitting, he was an internationalist in politics. It was his function to be an intermediary between grown men and to be a wise and enthusiastic teacher of youth. In each of these ways he accomplished work of permanent value, although it is probable that none of his work, in the narrower sense, scientific or artistic, is destined to immortality.

Societies

Royal.—March 4.—Sir J. J. Thomson, President, in the chair.

The following papers were read: “The Protoplasmic Factor in Photo-synthesis,” by Dr. F. F. Blackman,—”The Beginning of Photo-synthesis in the Green Leaf,” by G. E. Briggs,—”Sunlight and the Life of the Sea: Studies of the Photo-synthesis in Marine Algae: (1) Fixation of Carbon and Nitrogen from Inorganic Sources in Sea-water; (2) Increase of Alkalinity of Sea-water as a Result of Photo-synthesis and as a Measure of that Process; “Relative Photo-synthetic Activity of Green, Brown, and Red Seaweeds in Light of Varying Intensity,” by Dr. Benjamin Moore, E. Whitley, and T. A. Webster.
THE ATHENÆUM

FORTHCOMING MEETINGS

Fri. 19. King's College, 4.30.—“Ecclesiastical Art,” Lecture X., Professor F. Dearmer.
University College, 5.30.—“Greek Religion,” Professor E. A. Gardner.
Institution of Mechanical Engineers, 6.—“Exact Data on the Performance of Mechanical Stokers, as applied to ‘Lancashire’ or other Narrow-Flued Boilers,” Mr. D. Brownlie.
Egyptian Society (Royal Society's Rooms), 8.30.—“The Study of Egyptian Art,” M. Jean Capart.
Royal Institution, 9.—Leonardo da Vinci,” Mr. Edward McCurdy.

Mon. 22. Bibliographical, 5.—“Colard Mansion,” Mr. Seymour de Ricci.
Societies, 5.30.—“The Future of Army Hygiene,” General Sir John Goodwin, (Chadwick Lecture.)
King's College, 5.30.—“Portugal: III. Portugal and a Permanent Peace,” Professor George Young.
King's College, 5.30.—“New Light on Pentateuchal Problems,” Lecture IV., Dr. A. S. Yahuda.
King's College, 5.30.—“The History of Learning and Science in Poland,” Lecture VI., Professor I. Tatarkwicz.
King's College, 5.30.—“Outlines of Greek History: The Militaristic Emperors, 963-1025,” Professor H. O. Coates.

Institution of Civil Engineers, 5.30.—“The Work done by Railway Troops in France during 1914-19,” Col. D. Lyell.
King's College, 5.30.—“The Philosophy of Kant,” Lecture X., Professor H. Wildon Carr.
Paraday (Chemical Society's Rooms), 5.30.—“Discussion on ‘Rassenlehre’ and its Application to the Biology of Man,” Mr. Bernard Pares.
British Academy (Royal Society's Rooms), 5.—“Raphael,” Mr. A. Clutton-Brock.
Geological, 5.30.—“On Two Pre-Glacial Floras from Castle Eden, Durham, and a Comparative Review of Pliocene Floras, based on the Study of Fossil Seeds,” Mrs. E. M. Reid.
University College, 5.30.—“Wergeland, Welhaven and Collect,” Lecture VII., Mr. I. G. Grundal.
University College, 5.30.—“English Intonation,” Lecture IV., Mr. H. E. Palmer.

Thurs. 25. Royal Institution, 3.—“The Hope for Russia,” Mr. Stephen Chesterton.
University College, 5.30.—“August Strindberg,” Lecture VII., Mr. I. Björklund.
Child-Study (90, Buckingham Palace Road, S.W.), 6.30—“Adolescence and the Continuation Schools,” Mrs. E. Sloan Chester, M.I.

Fine Arts

BONNARD

In France, where even amateurs of painting enjoy a bit of rhetoric, for two or three days after the death of Renoir one could not be long in any of their haunts without being told either that "Renoir est mort et Matisse est le plus grand peintre de France," or that "Renoir est mort et Derain etc." Also, so cosmopolitan is Paris, there were those who would put in the query: "Et Picasso?" but, as no Frenchman much cares to be reminded that the man who, since Cézanne, has had the greatest effect on painting is a Spaniard, this interjection was generally ill-received. On the other hand, those who quivered: "Et Bonnard?" got a sympathetic hearing always.

M. Léon Werth deals neither in rhetoric nor in orders of merit. Bonnard is his theme; and on Bonnard he has written thirty-six pages without, I think, pronouncing the name of one rival, leaving to his readers the agreeable task of putting the right heads in the way of such blows as he occasionally lets fall. Of Bonnard he has written with a delicacy of understanding hardly to be matched by the panegyric of the poetical critic. He has sketched exquisitely a temperament, and if he has not told us much about its fruits, about the pictures of Bonnard that is to say, he can always refer us to the series of reproductions at the end of the volume.

What M. Werth would say to the distinction implied in my last paragraph I cannot tell; but I am sure it is important. Certainly, behind every work of art lies a temperament, a mind; and it is this mind that creates, that causes and conditions the forms and colours of which a picture consists: nevertheless, what we see are forms and colours, forms and colours are what move us. Doubtless, M. Werth is right in thinking that Bonnard paints beautifully because he loves what he paints; but what Bonnard gives us is something more significant than his feeling for cups or cats or human beings. He gives us created form with a significance of its own, to the making of which went his passion and its object, but which is something quite distinct from both. He gives us a work of art.

To consider a picture by Vuillard, whose work is often compared with that of Bonnard, might help us here. Vuillard loves what he paints, and his pictures are attractive, as often as not, chiefly because they represent lovely things. A picture by Bonnard, for all its fascinating overtones, has a life entirely of its own. It is like a flower, which is beautiful not because it represents one of, something beautiful, but because it is beautiful. A picture by Bonnard escapes from its subject, and from its author too. And this is all-important because it is just this independent life of its own that gives to a work of art its peculiar character and power. Unluckily, about this detached life, about a work of art considered as a work of art, there is little or nothing to be said; so perhaps M. Werth has done well to confine himself to the task of giving his readers a taste of the quality of an artist's mind. This task was difficult enough in all conscience; the mind of Bonnard is subtle, delicate and creative, and it has needed subtlety, delicacy, and not a little creative power, to give us even a glimpse of it.

The first thing one gets from a picture by Bonnard is a sense of perplexed, delicious colour: tones of miraculous subtlety seem to be flowing into an enchanted pool and chasing one another there. From this pool emerge gradually forms which appear sometimes vaporous and sometimes tentative, but never vapid and never woolly. When we have realized that the pool of colour is, in fact, a design of extraordinary originality and perfect coherence, our aesthetic appreciation is at its height. And not until this excitement begins to flag do we notice that the picture carries a delightful overtone—that it is witty, whimsical, fantastic.

Such epithets one uses because they are the best that language affords, hoping that they will not create a false impression. They are literary terms, and the painting of Bonnard is never literary. Whatever, by way of overtone, he may reveal of himself is implicit in his forms: symbolism and caricature are not in his way. You may catch him musing on himself, "That's a funny-looking face," he will never say, "That's the face of a man whom I expect you to laugh at." If you choose to take his "Après-Midi Bourgeoise" (which is not reproduced here) as a sly comment on family life you may: but anyone who goes to it for the sort of criticism he would find in the plays of Mr. Shaw or Mr. Barker is, I am happy to say, doomed to disappointment. What amused Bonnard was not the implication, social, moral, or political, of the scene, but the scene itself—the look of the thing. Bonnard never strays outside the world of visual art. He finds significance in the appearance of things and converts it into form and colour. With the pompous symbolism of the grand-mannerist, or the smart symbolism of the caricaturist, or the half-baked symbolism of the philosophico-futuro-dynamitard he has no truck whatever. His ambition is not to convey, without the aid of words, certain elementary ideas, unimportant facts, or obvious sentiments, but to create forms that shall correspond with his intimate sense of the significance of things. The paraphernalia of symbolism are nothing to his purpose: what he requires are subtlety of apprehension and lightness of touch, and these are what he has. So M. Léon Werth meets people who complain that "Bonnard manque de noblesse."

Bonnard is not noble. A kitten jumping on to the table moves him, not because he sees in that gesture a symbol of human aspiration or of brute-instinct, but the spirit of youth or the pathos of the brute creation, nor yet because it reminds him of pretty things, but because the sight is charming. He will never be appreciated by people who want something from art that is not art. But to those who care for the thing itself his work is peculiarly sympathetic, because it is so thoroughly, so unimitatedly, that of an artist; and therefore it does not surprise me that some of them should see in him the appropriate successor to Renoir. Like Renoir he loves life as he finds it. He, too, enjoys intensely those good, familiar things that perhaps only artists can enjoy to the full—sunshine and flowers, white tables spread beneath trees, fruits, crockery, leafage, the movements of young animals, the grace of girls and the amplitude of fat women. Also he loves intimacy. He is profoundly French. He reminds one sometimes of Rameau and sometimes of Ravel, sometimes of Lafontaine and sometimes of Laforgue.

Renoir never reminded anyone of Ravel or Laforgue. Renoir and Bonnard are not so much alike after all. In fact, both as artists and craftsmen, they are extremely different. Renoir's output was enormous: he painted with the vast ease of a lyrical giant. His selections and decisions were instinctive and immediate. He trusted his reactions implicitly. Also, there is nothing that could possibly be called whimsical, nothing critical or self-critical, about him. Bonnard, on the other hand, must be one of the most painstaking artists alive. He comes at beauty by tortuous ways, artful devices, and elaboration. He allows his vision to dawn on you by degrees: no one ever guesses at first sight how serious, how deliberately worked out, his compositions are. There is something Chinese about him; and he is one of those rare Europeans who have dealt in "imposed" rather than "built-up" design. Bonnard's pictures grow not as trees, they float as water-lilies. European pictures, as a rule, spring upwards, masonrywise, from their foundations; the design of a picture by Bonnard, like that of many Chinese pictures and Persian textiles, seems to have been laid on the canvas as one might lay cautiously on dry grass some infinitely precious figured gauze. Assuredly, the hand that lets fall these beauties is as unlike that which, even in the throes of rhapsmatism, affirmed with supreme confidence in the making of Renaissance master, as the easy accessibility of our last old master is unlike this shy, fastidious spirit that M. Léon Wurth, by a brilliant stroke of sympathetic intelligence, has contrived to catch, and hold for an instant.

Clive Bell.

EXHIBITIONS OF THE WEEK

Grafton Galleries. — Women’s International Art Club.

Twenty-One Gallery, Adelphi.—Water-Colours, Woodcuts and Paintings by Edgard Tytgat.

Goupil Gallery.—Paintings and Drawings by British and Foreign Artists.—The East: Paintings and Drawings by Sidney W. and Richard Carlile.

Leicester Galleries.—Drawings in Colour by Charles Ginner.—Landscape in Oils by James L. Henry.

Greater Art Galleries.—Gardens Gay and Joyous: Water-Colour Drawings by Beatrice Parsons.

Mr. Tytgat’s portrait of himself at the Twenty-One Gallery portrays a very different man from the Byronic apparch evoked by Miss Walker. He appears here as a sober, gentle, unaffected man seated with his wife in an unpretentious room, and the works which hang round the gallery convince us that the real Tytgat is here and not at the Grafton Galleries. He is obviously what the French call ‘œuvres simples’; he seems to have preserved—marvelously intact—his recollections of child-pleasure and to have set himself to create art in tune with his recollections. As a result we have this series of charming drawings, woodcuts and book-illustrations. As an oil painter Mr. Tytgat is still in the experimental stages, still bothered by the complication of the medium. But this is relatively unimportant; what matters is his art, which is real and delightful—a sensitive plant which we trust he will know how to protect from the onslaughts of modes and theories.

The most notable work at the Goupil Gallery is the Balzacian “ Emile,” by Mr. Sickert, who never fails to impress by the range of his interest and the strength of his sympathy. It is painted with perfect assurance, and it reveals a great reserve of knowledge. If our descendants care at all for pictures they will value such work as this as a characteristic product of an important artist. They will value too, we imagine, Mr. Nicholson’s “The Coast of Brittany.” Compared with Mr. Sickert, Nicholson is undoubtedly superficial, but within the small circle which he has traced for himself he is quite sincere, and he can sometimes point—as in this picture—with astonishing skill and beauty. “Hammer- smith Bridge on Boat Race Day.” shows once more that Mr. Greaves was not only an excellent disciple, but also an artist capable of using his eyes to considerable advantage; the naif vision exemplified in this picture is quite his own and not without charm. The evident sincerity of these three works makes the Rococo appeal of the adjacent Conder fans (rather poor examples, by the way) seem a little too sophisticated and the Baroque appeal of Mr. Pryde’s incompletely realized “Classical Landscape” seem pretentious and affected.

Mr. Ginner’s work has much in common with that of the late Harold Gilman and he has learned much from Mr. Sickert. It has the seriousness which characterizes the so-called Camden Town Group, and also displays that personal reaction to landscape and town; it is so good that it challenges comparison with first-rate work, and suffers, of course, from the comparison. His drawings are realized with unflinching intellectual tenacity and executed with unrelenting perseverance. It would be impossible to find a faked or hap hazard passes, and there is something in the method of the execution which strikes us as over- elaborate and laborious. It is not that Mr. Ginner expresses too much in a small space—Dürer and Meryon expressed much more—but that he has an unfortunate habit of saying the same thing three times over—first in line, then in dashes and dots, and finally in color. This is surely tiring the half-penny stamp, and far removed from the economy of means which we find in the great masters. It also results in unpleasant colour when a close filigree of black lines and dots shows through a wash of water colour. The successive statements instead of increasing the emphasis impede it, and very often they cancel one another out of existence, so that we fall to hankering after the classical water-colour draughtsmen with their simple formula of single lines and limpid washes. But it would be ungrateful to stress what is after all only a technical redundancy, and we hasten to append our conviction that Mr. Ginner is obviously an artist capable of good work, if not in this particular medium, then in others—in pure black-and-white drawing or in oil paint, or, most likely of all, in etching.

Miss Beatrice Parsons’ ”Gay and Joyous” gardens are very like many other gay and joyous gardens which are always to be seen in Bond Street shop windows, and which, we understand, never fail to find ready purchasers. Old-fashioned people presumably think this type of drawing artistic; artistic people certainly think it old-fashioned. For ourselves we decline to hazard an adjective. But we confess to admiration for a lady who has the courage to attempt to make a water-colour drawing of an apple tree in blossom and the ability to produce from the loveliness of it a first glance, so uncomically like the original. But oh! the green- ness of the grass that grows all round!

R. H. W.

REPRODUCTIONS OF ETCHINGS

The Charm of the Etcher’s Art. (“The Studio,” 44, Leicester Square, 7s. 6d.)

The first of “The Studio” Graphic Arts Folios is devoted to reproductions of etchings by Sir Frank Short, D. Y. Cameron, James McJey, E. S. Lumsden, and W. P. Robins. Many of the plates (notably those of Mr. Lumsden) suffer considerably from the reduction in size, and all lose the special qualities of impressions taken from the plates. But the shortcomings of the reproductions have an educational value, for we realize, as we turn the pages of this folio, how much the majority of etchers depend for their effects upon external factors, such as the richness of fat biting, clever printing, carefully selected paper and so on. We miss these factors here, and with them the peculiar distinction, the aristocratic air which contributes largely to the popularity of etchings with the bourgeois collector. The artists selected for this folio are all, as it happens, primarily craftsmen, and when we see their work shorn of the medium’s special attributes we are amazed at the relative slightness of the art behind. But slight art is not necessarily bad art, and students will be well advised to acquire this book and analyse the artistic equipment of the etchers represented, which they will thus be able to do more easily than by the study of the actual etchings enhanced by the veneer of craft.

The “Nouvelle Revue Française” has commenced the publishing of an extremely interesting series of monographs on Modern French Painters. The first of these, by Mr. Charles Sensevant, is before us, and contains about forty excellent reproductions of Matisse’s work, and is of a very convenient size. This admirable series is to be continued by monographs on Friez, Marquet, de Segonzac, Derain, Briaque, Vlaminck, Marchand, Lhote, and others. The enterprise deserves—and will assuredly obtain—complete success.
Music

IN DEFENCE OF TRANSLATIONS

THERE appear still to be some people who object to the singing of German songs in German before English audiences. Those who agree with them will say that their objection and their method of expressing it is dictated by proper feeling; those who disagree will call it foolish prejudice. In any case argument with such people is out of the question; prejudice and proper feeling are alike indifferent to reason. As far as can be gathered, there is little or no objection to German music in itself, at any rate to the music of composers who are deceased. The chief hostility seems to be towards the sound of the German language. Probably the people who object to the sound of the German language are people who do not understand it. Fear and hatred are most generally associated with things that are not properly understood. To those who understand only a few words or perhaps nothing, the sound of German may well call up painful associations. If they understood completely, and if the words which were sung were really great poetry, those painful associations would be forgotten, because really great poetry would be strong enough in its own right to overwhelm all other feelings. Unfortunately, there are few people in this country who understand German well enough to apprehend German poetry when it does happen to be great; and perhaps still more unfortunately, a good deal of the poetry which the great classical composers set to music does not really deserve the epithet of "great" at all.

Yet there is no doubt that the singers want to sing Schubert, Schumann, Brahms and Hugo Wolf; and equally no doubt that audiences enjoy hearing them. At the present moment, therefore, the songs are generally sung in translations. These translations, however, are only rarely translations into English. French translations are frequently preferred. That an English singer should sing German songs in French translations to an English audience might seem inconceivably ludicrous to anyone who stood outside the concert-going world. But the singers have perfectly sound reason for it. The original German being barred, the choice lies between an English translation and a French one. But the English translations are mostly so bad that no singer with any pretensions to be a person of education dare sing them in public. The French translation may be equally absurd to the ears of educated French people; but English audiences do not know that. English audiences are always flattered to think that they know French: English singers always like to think that they sing French with a perfect accent. Some of them indeed do sing French very well; in fact they sometimes sing French better than they sing English.

Here we touch the root of the matter. Neither English singers nor English audiences have any proper respect for their own language. Any Frenchman, any Italian, takes a pride in speaking his own language really well. An Englishman who speaks beautiful English is generally an object of suspicion. To speak beautifully is not considered good form. There exists a society for the protection of pure English, and another society—the Society of English Singers—for the protection of pure English singing; but the tasks which they have set to themselves are as arduous as they are noble. If singers really cared, if audiences really cared, about fine English, they would never tolerate either Brahms in indifferent French or Brahms in music publishers' English. They would insist on good English translations, and insist on them until they obtained them.

Far be it from me to discourage any English singer from singing foreign songs in the original languages. There are certain singers who can do so, and certain audiences which can understand them. The more foreign languages an English singer learns—learns, that is to say, to speak fluently, not merely to sing—the more care he is likely to take over his pronunciation of English; and the more listeners are encouraged to learn foreign languages and appreciate the beauties of their literature the better. But the fact must be faced that the great majority of English people know no language but their own. For them songs and operas must be sung in English, and they must be sung in the best English possible. There are, I believe, many English people who do not really care to listen to vocal music in English, even though they know no other tongue. One would like to hope that among their reasons was a hearty dislike of that conventional, barbarous, semi-Italian "singers' pronunciation" which the Society of English Singers has set itself to combat. But their dislike of English singing is more probably part of their whole attitude to music. If they hear English, they are bound to refer it in some degree to their normal world, to the world of common sense, and it is exactly from the world of common sense that they wish through music to find momentary escape. They enjoy an opera so much more, they tell us, when they do not understand the words, because the words of an opera are always so silly. But there is not the least reason why the words of an opera should be silly. Even if the original foreign words are silly it is not impossible for a clever translator to improve upon them, to recreate rather than to translate, to produce in fact the ideal libretto which the composer ought—had he had the good fortune to be born an Englishman—to have set to music.

If singers and audience took a proper pride in the English language, they would realize that it has its own powerful individuality, in close association with the English type of voice. Dryden and Purcell understood it a hundred years ago. If songs and operas were properly translated, they would not sound, they could not sound, exactly like the originals. But they would be better suited to the English style of singing and the English interpretation. It is impossible to throw a foreign opera, whether it be "Faust" or "Tristan," at an ordinary English audience and expect them to take it as its native audience does. The English audience has a totally different cultural background, and it is the task first of the translator and secondly of the singer to present the work in such a way as to make the clearest possible impression upon the cultural background of this country. We do not want great foreign works to remain exotic and strange; we want them to be welcomed and absorbed into our musical consciousness as some of the oratorios were absorbed by our forefathers.

The need is urgent for really good translations, both of songs and operas, because it is through good translations that both singers and listeners can be led to take a logical common-sense view of music. Musicians, if they are not charlatans, do want the public to take a common-sense view of music. They do not want the public to think that musicians are a race apart with which the listeners have no real contact. They want to feel that every listener is potentially a musician: that every man and woman who hears a song or an opera may be thereby stimulated to sing themselves, to realize that they too have voices, the power of musical expression, the feelings, emotion, thought, or whatever they may be, for which music is the language that nature has provided.

EDWARD J. DENT.

At the meeting of the Royal Society on June 3 the Bakerian Lecture will be delivered by Sir Ernest Rutherford on "The Nuclear Constitution of the Atom."
CONCERTS

If Mr. John Coates’s recital of English song at Central Westminster Hall on March 13 was not wholly enjoyable, it was not through any shortcoming on the part of the singer, for he was in admirable voice, and his phrasing and diction were impeccable. But he tried to cover too wide a field; no composer was represented by more than one short song, and the attempt to include as many notable composers as possible from the time of Henry VIII. to the present day resulted in scrappiness and want of cohesion. There was little heard that could be called bad work, but a good deal was undistinguished work, and the recital would have gained on the whole by the inclusion of more examples of the two or three first-raters and the elimination of some of the smaller frills.

A good deal of curiosity—shall we say?—had been aroused by the announcement of Miss Mischa Léon’s “Lieder-Abend” on March 13, but the event was of little musical significance. All we had was a handful of old chestnuts, sung in a way that made one look vaguely round to see why none of the windows were open. We should feel more obliged to M. Mischa Léon if he had given us the opportunity of judging whether any modern German composers are producing decent songs. But evidently the great heart of Mayfair still beats true to “Nimmersattie Liebe.”

BEETHOVEN’s Seventh, the “Siegfried Idyll,” Elgar’s Introduction and Allegro for strings, and “Prometheus” formed the bill of fare at the last of the L.S.O.’s interesting series, given under Mr. Coates’s direction on March 8. The performance was of unequal merit; the Idyll sounded more disjointed than usual owing to the excessive employment of tempi rubato, whilst in Elgar’s work—one of his best—the tone both of the soloists and the orchestra lacked refinement, and the playing generally was of a somewhat rough-and-ready character. The best playing of the evening was probably in “Prometheus,” which sounded very straightforward, though far from exhilarating. The chorus adds singularly little to the general effect. Where, by the way, does the annotator find the programmatic explanation now invariably quoted when this work is performed? So far as we can discover, there is not the slightest authority for it in the score, and it is hopelessly inconsistent with the musical structure.

If Miss Marga Stella had chosen her songs with a little more discrimination, she would have made better use of the agreeable variety offered by her numerous helpers at her concert on March 10. It is perhaps natural that singers who wish to sing operatic excerpts, just as violinists who want to play concertos, in small halls, but it is not a practice to be commended, though Miss Stella’s singing of arias by Handel and Mozart certainly put forward a very good defence. She sings Italian and French words marvellously; the sort of words that Handel set, and in Cherubino’s song from “Figaro” she showed a great power of real characterization. Her florid passages are not always very highly finished, but her phrasing is clear, and her vocal tone, if she could acquire more even control of her lower notes, would be extremely pleasing.

The true personality of a singer is often best revealed in encore. Mme. Anita Sutherland at her recital on March 10 was heard in operatic selections, in German classics, and in modern French songs. She added to her programme the Habanera from “Carmen,” sung in a harsh and stumpy manner, and a song of Chaminade, delivered with all the arts of the accomplished ballad-concert singer. But her real vocation is to sing Spanish popular songs. In these she was evidently at home; there was no sense of careful restraint; her voice seemed to take on an entirely different quality and colour, and her native temperament found its natural outlet, especially when she sat down to the pianoforte and accompanied herself. Mme. Sutherland might well find a series of Spanish songs to the guitar, which she no doubt plays, at least as attractive to an audience as the numerous folk-songs of other countries, with and without native instruments, that are so continually set before the public nowadays.

Drama

WEBSTER’S “WHITE DEVIL” AT CAMBRIDGE

THE difficulty for the producer of a Webster tragedy is to make up his own mind what it is all about. He has a choice of two main interpretations, though the possibilities of variation upon either of these, when chosen, are infinite: he may conceive the play as an extravaganza, in the sense that the scenes, played straightforwardly, are bound to work themselves out, because a play is, after all, an objective work of art; or, intrigued by the problem of reconciling Webster’s unique poetic gift with the somewhat threadbare coarseness of his dramatic mechanism, he may try to work out the play in terms of temperament, of atmosphere. In this case he will conceive of Webster as a man with a very curious, super-subtle attitude towards life, a connoisseur in inhibitions and intricate reactions, as a playwright ruthless in his method of making realistically possible the expression of his own emotions. In the former case he will be primarily the expert provider of a new melodramatic thrill. This is the easier method. It was turned to admirable purpose by the members of the Marlowe Society at Cambridge last week, in a performance which had the great merit of making us think out the Webster problem again. “The White Devil” became a limpid theatrical entertainment played with a gusto and a swing that fully justified the usual necromant in the final scene. That the clouded perversity which is to some a vital part of Webster had been cleaned as it were by chemical precipitation was of no great account; nor, in comparison with the success of the whole, was the failure to make anything particular of the mad drce scene of great importance. Once or twice, however, the dangers of the straight-line method in presenting a Webster character were apparent. Flamino’s extremely equable performance allowed at one critical moment precious little room for his heroic strain; and Vittoria’s icy passion of contempt was at times left severely to the imagination of the audience. But Vittoria is, in any case, hardly a fair problem for innocence; certainly no one left the Marlowe Society’s performance with any grudge against a creature so amazingly beautiful in the true tradition.

The Society adopts the excellent practice of not printing the names of the performers. It is not without a sense of guilt, therefore, that we single out Braccio. He held his part together, we think, better than Flamino. It was, indeed, easier to hold, but his realization of a characteristic Webster effect in his death-scene was a very startling achievement, which must not go unrewarded. To the Society as a society, however, our sincerest praise is given. In the matter of production and company discipline (perceptibly transgressed only—and only for a moment—by the Cardinal) the Marlowe could give points to the Phoenix. We do not wish to set either of these most admirable institutions by the ears, but for the sake of clearness we must compare them thus. The “Duchess of Malfi” touched at moments the subtler overtones of Webster; but it was a chaotic production. The Marlowe “White Devil” ignored the overtones; but it was an admirable unity.

The Friday evening meetings at the Royal Institution will be resumed on April 16, when Professor J. A. McClelland will deliver a discourse on Ions and Nuclear. Succeeding discourses will probably be given by Professor H. Maxwell, Lefroy, Professor F. O. Bower, Lord Rayleigh, Professor Karl Pearson, Professor J. A. Fleming, Professor W. L. Bragg and other gentlemen.
A TCHEHOV PLAY

Court Theatre (The Art Theatre).—"The Three Sisters." By Anton Tchekhov.

A FORTNIGHT ago we had occasion to write of a play which, in spite of all its plausibility and ingenious construction, was nothing more than a superior melodrama. Melodrama deals with harrowing emotions in vacuo, with hypothetical agonies that have no real connection with life as we know it. However painful these emotions may be, they affect us only temporarily and superficially; we recognize them as something apart, inapplicable to our own lives or to life in general. Tragedy is distinguished from melodrama by possessing this universal applicability; it affects us intimately, for we recognize in tragedy a truthfulness which is absent, whatever its realistic plausibility, from the melodrama.

Tchekhov’s "Three Sisters" possesses to a remarkable degree this truthfulness of tragedy. It makes no difference that the scene is laid in a provincial Russian town; an environment fantastically unlike anything of which we know; it makes still less difference that there is no conventional plausibility about the play and that the characters are quite unrealistic (facts that were emphasized, rather than concealed, by the producers and actors, who were at moments, especially in the first act, completely floored by the unfamiliarity of Tchekhov’s dramatic methods). The fundamental truthfulness is always there, and even in the moments of almost farcical exaggeration we recognize the features of life as we have lived it.

The tragedy of The Three Sisters is the gradual, undramatic tragedy of time—the time of the coarser, time that blunts the line point of youthful hopes and aims, time the destroyer. The play covers a period of years, and Tchekhov shows us the slow destruction wrought by time in each of the characters and their different reactions. The three sisters realize the deterioration and the coarsening of fibres that have come about in them, and they protest—vainly, for fate as well as time is against them, and besides, they are not strong enough to resist. Their brother Andrey, in whom the years have made profounder ravages, remains almost unconscious of them, contented in the hopeless second-rateness into which lie sinks. The old, inefficient army doctor, who has forgotten all he ever knew, finds comfort in reading the papers, drinking vodka and smoking. In this grotesque world of fantastic unreality, nothing matters. The colonel makes his present miseries tolerable by philosophizing about the happiness of the human race two or three centuries hence. The school-master, case-hardened by twenty years of teaching into a ludicrous pedant, is aware of, and completely satisfied with, the effects of time upon him. He is only less happy than Andrey’s wife, who is totally unaware of her growing vulgarity and whose self-satisfaction is tinged by no trace of doubt. Through four acts we watch these absurd, suffering beings. The play ends in a crisis of misfortune; but we leave the theatre with an uncomfortable sense that, for all the characters, this crisis marks not the end but the beginning of the real tragedy; time still runs, still performs its horrible work.

Considering the enormous difficulties of the piece, the acting was passable. After scrambling through the first act as best they might (Heaven and, perhaps, the directors of the Moscow Art Theatre alone know how that first act ought to be performed), the actors found themselves fairly comfortable and self-confident. The last three acts were traversed without any serious breakdowns, though with occasional hesitation and lapses of assurance. Of the three sisters, Miss Dorothy Massingham, as Irina, was perhaps the best. But the parts required superlatively good acting, and none of the three performances was wholly satisfactory. Mr. Harcourt Williams as the philosophizing colonel pleased by that very agreeable delivery which made it possible for us to listen, a year ago, to the choruses in Mr. Drinkwater’s "Abraham Lincoln." The part of the schoolmaster, a character approximating more nearly than any of the others to a whimsical "humour," was probably the easiest to play, and Mr. Armstrong played it extremely well.

—H.

PSEUDOHELLO

New Theatre.—"Carnival."

Silvio Steno is the perfect Christian and humanitarian gentleman, also an aristocrat in the Venetian sense, also a great actor and leading theatre manager. He lives among human wild cats, and the existence of a sister like Ottavia should constitute sufficient grounds for divorce in any fully civilized country. Simonetta, the child-wife (and mother of a healthy offspring already about ten years old), goes out half-naked in a gondola with Mr. Neilson-Terry, but is alarmed that her bacchanalian costume arouses emotions somewhat more heady than the higher-kindliness to which she has become accustomed within the domestic circle. She therefore refrains from infidelity. Silvio has a brain storm, but does not quite kill her in the pillow scene in their performance of "Othello." When she recovers from the shock he also has recovered his composure sufficiently to take her home without removing his make-up. The authors can no more resolve to write a tragedy or a true satire than can the protagonists to commit murder or adultery; the child-wife only dresses up as a bacchante: all of which is intentionally "modern" and true to some facets of life on the "laughter and tears" theory. As art, it may not be inherently defective.

Mr. Neilson-Terry has to be the bold officer, the Shavian young man and the traditional Mephistopheles of the Romantic period (1830-80) with rather too bewildering rapidity; and the general confusion of musical-comedy atmosphere, tragic paraphernalia, post-Ibsenian self-analysis, together with the gypsyish scenes where the characters explain their modern and humanitarian feelings, and where Simonetta shrinks from "Pash-hion," all combine to make one long for coherence, and for Sir Anthony Absolute’s idiom. Caught between these incongruities and the farce tradition that people ought to commit adultery, and the artistic truism that humanitarian virtues are rather dull on the stage, the authors have had recourse to an unsolved and unsolvable series of indecisions. Even so, if the actors behaved like Italians they might create more illusion than do Italian acts with English manner and mannerism. It is perhaps part of our prudery that, despite the daily proceedings of the divorce courts, certain situations and impulses are always ascribed to "hot-blooded Southern races."

All the colour is put on with a shovel. Ettore, a sympathetic old fool, is the one person who knows his own mind and has, at least, decided on a consistent table of values, but he is made a caricature as are the rest of the cast. There are a few jokes, and the stars do occasionally wake up and act for a few minutes here and there. In the present condition of British Drama the play should have a fairly good run.

We must not ask meticulous questions, such as how long it would really take to get to the ferrovia or half-way there and back; and whether Venetian balconies can be climbed with such ease, frequency and agility.

—T.J.V.

The Romans Lecture at Oxford University will be given by Dean Inge, l.on. Fellow of Hertford College, on Thursday, May 27. The subject will be "The Idea of Progress."
REALITIES

AMBASSADOR'S THEATRE.—" Grierson's Way." By H. V. Esmond.

"GRIERSON'S WAY" is serious tragedy carefully written and well acted. Grierson is as much a reality as "Steno" is a falsity. The daily press has damned the play as "gloomy," and that presumably ends the matter so far as the bull-necked sections of the public are concerned. In reality the author has been over-generous, that is, he has tried to write two plays in one. The shadow of the bowler hat on the glass door would end the play as well with the third act as with the fourth. Keen is a fifth wheel; the essential situation is between Grierson, Pamela and the man with the bowler hat. The author may like acting the part of Keen; to ask him to eliminate it is perhaps asking a good deal; yet up to the end of the third act his tragedy is inevitable; it is inherent in the situation, it moves as solidly as any great Greek plot. Grierson does a generous act, which is ineffective, or rather its utility serves its turn and comes to an end.

The suicide problem is a different problem altogether; it is by far too deep a problem to be started in the fourth act of a play and terminated (not solved or even decided) by Keen's somewhat hysterical cry that "Jim winks." If Mr. Esmond's ethics is hyper-Ibsenian altruism he might argue that Grierson has developed a sense of possession and that his death is the penalty for it. This wouldhook the suicide into the general plot of the play. But there is not the slightest indication that such an argument has ever entered his head. As it stands the fourth act is an irrelevant postscript. Not that one objects to any of the things Mr. Esmond is trying to say, or that they are not perhaps true to life, but simply that they will not fit into the design. The suicide needs probably three acts to itself. And a six-act play is, academically, impracticable. The suicide is as fortuitous as Keen's loss of his hand. There is doubtless room for an indictment of the universe on the ground that these fortuitous calamities happen, but that again is outside the main plot. It might be woven into it? Perhaps. But the dignified tragedy of the play is the futility of Grierson's first generous act. There is ample material for a play with three main characters, the excellent chorus of Miss Anne and Capt. Ball, and three acts. Keen is interesting but superfluous. I admit he enriches the play, but he also prevents its becoming a certitude. With this reservation we may give thanks to Mr. Esmond for having something to express, and for giving us a tragedy which permits one to leave the theatre without the usual sense of intellectual degradation. To Ambrose Manning and Constance Eburne we are grateful for unbroken acting, Mr. Esmond and Mr. Dyall act almost uninterruptedly, and Miss Nesbitt is more serious than we have before seen her. If there were more plays of this grade there would soon be a new, if small and decidedly different theatre audience.

Correspondence

WILCOXISM

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sir,—I should be sorry to quarrel with Mr. Wyndham Lewis about anything so insignificant as his art or my character; neither would I bother you and your readers with such trites. But Mr. Lewis has shown so much good will in recognizing his symptoms that I feel bound to come again to the rescue. Am I not his doctor?

Yes, I fear he has got it. If he will consult our leading authority he will find that unmeasured personal abuse and who do not admire us sufficiently is the normal accompaniment of Wilcoxism in its advanced stages (vide "The Worlds and I") passion). He will find that exquisite sensitiveness to the least reflection on one's professional reputation is highly characteristic of this distressing complaint. It is my duty to tell him that only by playing remorselessly on this last humour can one hope to make a cure.

Frankly, the symptoms disclosed in his letter are grave. I observe with alarm that when Mr. Lewis touches what one might call "the reputation complex" he loses his wonted candour and confidence. For instance, he seems to deprecate the comparison with Tolstoi, saying that R.H.W. spoke only of his possessing "certain affinities" with that master—Rhoda Hero Dunn, you will remember, had only an almost Shakespearean quality in her verse. He forgets that R.H.W. added that "(Mr. Lewis) has less skill of hand (than Tolstoi da Vinci), but more sense of humour and the same passion for experiment and contempt for an easy task." And, positively, he does not remember, or did not at the time of writing, that R.H.W. was so obliging as to discover that certain of his (Mr. Lewis's) drawings were "strange scribbles, very unlike the drawings of Sir William Orpen, but not unlike the note-books of Tolstoi." What a wretched memory! And Mr. Lewis is so modest in his forgetfulness, too, that I hardly care to remind him of that statement by R.H.W. which, though he forgets it, was the occasion of my article—that Mr. Lewis could, if he so desired, become the Fourier of Expressionists and beat Matisse and Derain at their own game." If only books were so easily read as picture galleries are visited, Mrs. Wilcox would have said that Zona Gale could have beaten Tolstoi and Tosti at their. So it was in the critic, not the artist, that I detected signs of this poor lady's trouble. But, of course, Mr. Lewis is right in speaking out the moment he discovers signs of it in himself.

If Mr. Lewis takes my advice he will run through "The Worlds and I," underlining every sentence that gives him pain. It is a brutal remedy, but the best I can devise. After that I prescribe rest. Let him keep quiet for a few months and, at the end of them, he may find himself blest not perhaps with all that R.H.W. gives him, but with a better memory and better manners and a sense of humour which, if not quite equal to that of Tolstoi, will at least preserve him from publicly losing his temper because someone admires him less than he admires himself.

Yours faithfully,

C. IVAYE BELL.

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Dear Sir,—Mr. Wyndham Lewis writes: "There are always a few good artists in every country." This might well be underlined. The point of view which sees foreign art as French art only is as narrow as that which sees no foreign art at all.

We are promised a Gallery of Modern Foreign Art at Millbank; but no healthy growth can be looked for there unless we have a body of knowledge and critical opinion concerning modern activity in sculpture and painting. The neglected field is very large; but it is probable that many would study in it if they were given any encouragement.

International Art Exhibitions are possibly inclined to be unkindly and indiscriminate; but we need some such displays in London. Narrow prejudices should be set aside, and opportunity given of studying, side by side, such sculptors as Alvaro Machado, Mestrovic-Frank, and Such painters as Hodler, Klimt, Malczewski, Matisse, Roerich, Van de Woestynne and Wyspianski, to name a few outstanding artists.

Only by broad-minded comparative study fearlessly undertaken can the vital forces which, rather than narrow aesthetic canons, attest the value of a work of art, be appreciated and understood.

Yours faithfully,

18, RAVENSWOOD ROAD.

ERNST R. R. COLLINGS.

WINDSWORTH COMMOW, S.W.12,

March 12, 1920.

JOHN CLARE.

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sir,—Mr. Porter's letter itself is not beyond reproach. He could, perhaps, explain how Clare appealed to the nineteenth century in "three anthologies of the Clarendon Press" published well on in the twentieth, after Mr. Symons' selection. With less individuality he might have confronted me with such works as Sharp's "Sonnets of the Nineteenth Century," or E. P. Hoot's "Peerage of Poverty,"; where Clare appears quite unsupported by Birkelet Foster.

If the whim of memory which caused me to write "estees" for "esteem" so disturbs Mr. Porter's sensibility, let him thank God that Elian neverlongermisquotesinourliteraryjournals.

I am, Sir.

Yours truly,

EDMUND BLUNDEN.

A BOOK-ROOM FOR THE EAST END

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

DEAR SIR,—Plans have been laid to start, in the East End, a library which was long used by both officers and men of the B.E.F. at Havre, under the name of the Y.M.C.A. Book-Room.

Thanks to the kind co-operation of the Y.M.C.A., it is now possible to re-open this library at Mansfield House, in Canning Town, where it is hoped that it will serve as an East-End centre for men and women interested in literature, art and thought. It is to be run in as human a way as possible. The books will be on shelves accessible to the reader, who will thus handle them personally instead of having to rely on a catalogue. Advice about books and reading will be available from the librarian, a lady who acted in this capacity in Havre. A certain number of periodicals will be available. There will be flowers in the room, a feature much appreciated in France. It is intended, also, to have a small amount of good literature and pictures for sale, as it is not easy to get these in the East End. The place aims at being not only a library, but a centre where discussions, poetry readings, etc., will take place.

In order to carry out this piece of pioneer work, at least £200 is needed. Any help in raising this sum will be very much appreciated. Donations will be acknowledged by Mr. A. Reade, Warden of Mansfield House, Canning Town, E.16.

Yours faithfully,

GILBERT MURRAY.

H. G. WELLS.

ART AND THE SCHOOLBOY

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

DEAR SIR,—Like the President of the Clayesmore Fine Arts Club (Athenæum, February 20, p. 282), I, too, have been much interested recently in the various criticisms that have been consequent upon a certain article entitled "A New Year Suggestion."

Will you extend me the privilege of a small space in your columns, in which to state what I know of "Art and the Schoolboy" from a knowledge of this school's literary and artistic institutions?—in fact, of Art as it is known here.

1. The annual performance of one of Shakespeare's plays, suitable for enactment in an open-air theatre, is a regular practice—a tradition of the place.

2. Music recitals of a voluntary nature are held on Saturday evenings in the winter and Easter terms, whilst organ recitals are given on Sunday afternoons in the summer. Attendance at such recitals is, on the whole, very good, and has much improved recently. One hundred and three people were present at a voluntary recital (February 28) out of a total of about 240 boys, including Junior School: at the same time it must be remembered that the recital was a very good one, appreciate, it did to a wide variety of tastes, by which I do not mean that anything of a second-rate nature was, or is, ever, included.

3. There is an "Architectural Section," incorporated with "The Natural History Society," in that it has studied have direct practical bearing on a survey of the "natural history" of the district—"natural history" being used in its widest sense. The Section includes the "reading of papers" and archaeological work in its curriculum.

4. There is the "English Literature Society," of many years' standing, and recently revived after it had undergone a period of some three years' inactivity. A successful start was made by a "Reading from the Georgian Poets," and this is to be followed up on March 13 by a "Reading of Prose Selections," subject necessarily to certain conditions of period, length, and style. Other objects of the Society are to read "papers" and to read plays. Thus, for example, there is to be a reading of Bernard Shaw's "Cesar and Cleopatra" on March 28, in which all members of the Society will take part.

Enough has been said to prove that the artistic feelings of the school are encouraged in every direction, and that the standard of art-appreciation is high, whilst growing broader and becoming increasingly popular.

I hope that the above details may shed some fair light upon the question under discussion, and may, therefore, be of interest to your readers.

I am, Sir, yours, etc.,

G. R. HAYWARD,
Sec. English Literature Society.

Gresham's School, Holt, Norfolk.

THE SOCIETY OF WOMEN ARTISTS

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

SIR,—In your criticism of the exhibition of the Society of Women Artists you take for granted that this exhibition is exactly representative of women's art. Nobody despises the New English Art Club, yet I believe it is true that the men's Art, the work of the best women artists is absolutely equal to that of men, and to judge women's work by a past Victorian standard of "female" accomplishment is absurd.

Yours faithfully,

MARY MCCROSSAN.

126, Cheyne Walk, Chelsea, S.W.10.
March 8, 1920.

ITALIAN BOOKS

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

SIR,—The note which you have added to Mr. Del Re's letter (The Athenæum, March 5, p. 316) prompts me to a reply.

Your argument that "The Athenæum is an English and not an Italian journal," and that "foreign books have to be brought into line with English books," is controverted by the practice followed in your List of New Books.

If in an English periodical books must be quoted as they are in the titles of the reviews of The Athenæum, why are they not so quoted in the List of New Books, prepared in co-operation with the Library Association and published in The Athenæum?

Mr. Del Re was not arguing for the adoption of a style of quotation unknown and distasteful to the English reader, but merely for a consistent adherence to the style which seems to have the authoritative support of The Athenæum and of the Library Association.

You further assert that "da" is the nearest Italian equivalent of "by." No doubt a dictionary would give "da" as the first meaning of "by," but the fact is that, in such abridged expressions as titles, "da" is seldom used, and in any case never separated from a participle such as composto, annotato, curato, etc., whereas "per" and not "da" would be used by Italians, and has sometimes been used by them with the omission of a verbal particle.

In conclusion, if the plea for consistency were to fail (and I cannot conceive how it could fail unless stronger reasons are suggested than those put forward in your note), I should venture to advocate the adoption of "per," which, if archaic and hardly pleasing, is at least correct.

Believe me to be, Sir,

Yours faithfully,

CESARE FOLIGNO.

Queen's College, Oxford.
March 7, 1920.

[The List of New Books is primarily an index to authors, and for this purpose the name of the author stands first. To adopt the same order in the headings of reviews would be an undesirable departure from the traditional practice of English criticism.—Ed.]
Foreign Literature

THE PROPHET OF MODERN FRANCE

Gambetta. Par Paul Deschanel. (Paris, Hachette. 12fr. 50.)

"Le dernier mot lui restera devant l'histoire, non de son vivant," says Gambetta's latest distinguished biographer, speaking of his premature death before he was ever really in a position to govern France. M. Deschanel is right. Gambetta ought to be judged by his ideas rather than by his performance, and it is only in the light of the very latest history that the worth of his ideas can be properly appreciated. M. Deschanel, while he wrote his book, was, he tells us, "vivant, en quelque sorte, les deux guerres à la fois.

That was exactly the moment at which to be writing it.

Gambetta—it is no doubt a truism to say this of any big historical figure—has suffered in reputation both from his adherers and his detractors. The former have claimed that he ranks among the ideal heroes and liberators of history, the latter have denied his political competence. Each side in the dispute has been wrong. No really fruitful or emancipating idea ever entered Gambetta's head, but within the circle of harsh and arid maxims which regulated European politics in his day, as still in ours, he moved with the insight of a master. Possibly, as a practical politician, he could not, had he wished, have escaped from that vicious circle.

It has pleased some of his conservative critics to assert, on the strength of the Italian strain in his parentage, that he was at bottom a spiritual alien in France. No greater mistake could be made. His ideas were the ideas that have dominated the mass of the French nation since the Revolution. And Gambetta not only understood their aspirations, but perceived the means whereby they might be satisfied. Bismarck realized this when he warned the German Ambassador at Paris that the rule of Gambetta meant "une république à la Danton." More or less than that Gambetta never desired. His Republic was just the bourgeoise Republic of theoretical Jacobinism; when he declared "il n'y a pas une question sociale," we believe, in spite of M. Deschanel's ingenious explanations, that he meant exactly what he said. It was the passion for efficiency, not for humanity, that inspired him. The diplomatic and military fiasco of the Empire had afforded fresh proof, if such were needed, that a democracy, for all its surface incoherence, had more chance of producing a strong and well-organized State than any system of centralized rule. "Il faut un gouvernement" was Gambetta's insistent refrain, and by that he meant a Government that would make his country formidable in the clash of nations. The burden of all his preaching was, in M. Deschanel's words, "l'amour du drapeau, le culte de la discipline et des lois. 'Le devoir militaire est le premier,' disait-il." It would be logical for the descendants of the Commune to execute the man who prepared the Republic of Clemenceau, but it is strange that French nationalists have so often insulted the memory of the man who prepared the Republic of the Marne.

M. Deschanel finds himself at grips with critics of this school in more than one chapter of his work, and though, as becomes a public man who was already, when he wrote, nearing the highest office in the Republic Gambetta created, he is a loyal admirer of the great tribune, he shows rather more embarrassment in defending certain passages in his career than one would have thought at all necessary. It may be that he shares with the critics a difficulty in understanding that side of Gambetta's character which was undeniably Italian, his sagacious opportunism. History scarcely contains a more ironical chapter than the contrast between the Comte de Chambord refusing, with pitiless French logic, to accept the crown he had only to pick up, because it involved a compromise over a flag, and Gambetta manoeuvring legitimists, Bonapartists and Republicans, with a delicacy that Cavour might have envied, to carry a constitution which none of them at heart desired. M. Deschanel, again, is clearly uneasy over Gambetta's flirtation with Bismarck in 1878. This shows that, writing during the war, he was, perhaps inevitably, a victim of the prevalent illusion that the antagonism between France and Germany was a matter of eternal moral principles and not of legitimate national interests. There he unhesitatingly, but it is clear he never forgot the reckoning that would have to come with Germany, but, if he thought he saw a chance of using Germany to promote his designs for the recovery of France, he was perfectly right to seek her alliance.

The struggle with Germany was not a crusade. Even M. Murrahas admitted that such a temporary breach of continuity in foreign policy would have been legitimate, if it had been made by a king and not by a roturier.

In any case the charges that can be brought, on points of detail, against Gambetta's consistency and competence sink into insignificance when his policy is judged in its main outlines, as the events that have happened since his death allow us to judge it. The Constitution which he proclaimed amidst the shrugs of modernists and the sighs of republicans has lasted longer than any Constitution France has had since the Revolution, and has in the last few years survived one of the most fearful tests that any State has had to endure. The army of which, with an interesting prescience of the importance of civilian organization in modern warfare, he sketched the first outlines during his delegation at Tours, grew into the terrible fighting organization controlled by Marshal Foch—something beside which the army of Macmahon and Bazaine appears a coloured toy. The protest of the "Severed Provinces" in which he was the leading spirit never ceased, as M. Deschanel was saying only the other day at Bordeaux, to resound through the intervening years till its object was attained. The Triple Entente itself was the materialization of an ideal that he was always pursuing, though it necessarily eluded grasp in his lifetime. There was nothing, down to the importance of Yugo-Slavia, that he did not foresee, except perhaps the price of victory in the wars of the future. In domestic affairs, too, it is to his ideas that the French Republic seems to be returning. We see his views on "the social question," more and more prevailing, and his "anti-clericalism," which meant really respectful aloofness from all religions, replacing the sectarian violence of the Combes régime. We do not acclaim these principles as the summit of political wisdom, but their practical efficacy can hardly now be denied. "Son nom," says M. Deschanel, in a sentence that we may take as a summing-up, "restera synonyme de foi républicaine et patriotique." That faith has been strongly justified by its works.

D. L. M.

The third production of the Phoenix Society will be "The Fair Maid of the West," by Thomas Heywood,—the dates of performance being fixed for the 11th and 12th of April, Sunday evening and Monday afternoon. "The Fair Maid of the West" is a play of typical Elizabethan adventure, and has not been seen since the closing of the theatres in 1612.

The Committee propose to follow this early in May with another of Shakespeare's great historical plays, the production of Ben Jonson's "Volpone." For these three productions a reduced subscription has been arranged, particulars of which may be obtained from the Secretary, at 36, Southampton Street, W.C.
ALLIGATOR OR CROCODILE?
Cento Pagine di Poesia. By Papini. (Florence, La Voce. 2 lire.)

AFTER an hour or two upon the corpse-strewn battlefields of Papini's critical and polemical writings one is apt to go away with the idea that he is an alligator born, who came into the world biting and snapping and would have brought his teeth together in your finger before he was half out of the egg; and since there is always fun to be got out of watching a good fight as a sound business man like Papini is well aware, it is only natural that he owes much of his popularity to work of this kind. Yet "Stroncature," for instance, is not the true Papini, or at least not the whole Papini. Volumes like "Uomo Finito" or these "Cento Pagine di Poesia" not only afford ample scope for his pure, limpid, racy Tuscan, but they make us begin to doubt the soundness of our earlier judgment. For obviously we have wronged Papini. He is not really an alligator, but a crocodile capable of being tamed, possibly even already domesticated. So long as all other men, or at least all other intellectuals with ideas and theories to be torn to pieces, are kept out of his reach, he does not even show his teeth. Indeed, he assures us that he is the victim of that divine song which he dare not utter as to do so would mean instant death.

"I have to shut my poor heart tight like the door of a prison . . . and must be, for all my tenderness, a ferocious mortal, unapproachable by the weak." Even the printer is here his brunt has squeezed his heart dry, like an orange, but the little sweetness that clings to his skin, the little love lingering in his heart, "I have kept them for you, the humble and indispensable accomplice of my every pleasure and crime." His real friends, the friends to whom he introduces us in the early pages, are the toad who wades in the dog-days, the great, harmless snake, the scorpion, and the jay he has rescued from a child. For at his time of life and with his habits "there is no good to be got out of men."

People want him, he tells us, to be a poet altogether, so he has produced this volume; and poetry it may be called, though written in prose.

After the last carriage has disappeared along the unmoving procession of the gas-lamps, after the last night hawkers, as the cold begins to feel the cold, has returned to his hovel, those who love to contemplate the eternal flow of the river come to the parapet. There is a spiritual philosophical sight than a flowing river. The boy who throws a stone into the water and stands watching the overpowering ripples till they are carried away by the current knows more of the dangerous than the pedant who calls him idle.

Unless we are mistaken, not a few of the "poems" were among the most admired features of "Lacerba" of lurid and chequered memory; and in those Futurist pages Papini actually made full confession of his "bourgeois" origin:

"A bourgeois" of the meanest and most close-listed kind that flourishes like a fungus on the ancient stones of Europe; a "bourgeois" who is a little brave from cowardice, a little impertinent from nervousness, a little generous from avarece and too clever from stupidity. A bourgeois," I tell you, a genuine bourgeois — one of those who read their papers in the tram and lunch out of two-franc luncheon baskets in second-class railway carriages.

Towards the end the changes sometimes; Tuscan still, it is "tutto spirito, tonfo e spuma"; but even here Papini barely shows his teeth.

L. C.-M.

The Trustees of the Birmingham Art Gallery have purchased two of the portraits by Mr. Augustus John now being exhibited at the Club Gallery, "The Emir Feisul," and a portrait of a Canadian Soldier. Under the Felton bequest the National Gallery of Melbourne, Victoria, has purchased the "Portrait of a Boy." The exhibition of Mr. John's work will remain open until April 29.
List of New Books
Prepared in co-operation with the Library Association.

The method of classification adopted is a series of groups roughly corresponding with the Dewey Decimal System, the sub-classes being indicated, for the benefit of librarians and others familiar with the system, by the class-numbers given at the end of each entry. The first numeral in these represents the main class, the second one of the subdivisions, and so on.

These works in the list which appear most suitable for purchase by Public Library Authorities are marked with an asterisk.

GENERAL WORKS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY, ENCYCLOPAEDIAS, MAGAZINES, ETC.

*Jones (Kennedy). Fleet Street and Downing Street. Hutchison [1920]. 16 n. 672
See review, p. 364.

100 PHILOSOPHY.

Mellor (Stanley A.). Jesus Christ and Social Change. Swarthmore Press, 1920. 71 in. 184 pp., 3/6 n. 171.1
The social significance of Christ's Gospel, and the urgent need that Christians should recognize that no limitations of family, country, race, colour, creed, social rank, or the like should be made into barriers and permanent distinctions, and allowed to confine or condition love, are pressed home by the author, who pungently remarks that "Jesus Christ is still the greatest thorn in the side of Christians: they cannot get along without Him, but they do not really know what to do with Him."

Sinnett (Alfred Percy). Tennyson an Occultist, as His Writings Prove. Theosophical Publishing House, 1920. 7 in. 83 pp. paper 2/6, el. 5. 185.8
The author states that in successive lives Tennyson was Virgil, Omar Khayyam, Dante and Spenser before he culminated as a greater than any of these." Mr. Sinnett declares that he has had recent conversations with Tennyson, and we learn that the poet has been so good as to assure Mr. Sinnett that "he, as Spencer, was absolutely the author of 'The Faerie Queene.'"

200 RELIGION.

Fletcher (J. S.). The Cistercians in Yorkshire. S.P.C.K., 1919. 9 in. 244 pp. il. biblog. index, 17/6 n. 271.72
This account of the establishment of the Cistercian Order in Yorkshire, and of the causes which led to the suppression of the eight houses in that country—Fountains, Rievaulx, Selby, Meaux, Byland, Jervaulx, and Kirkstall—should be sufficient for the ordinary reader. Mr. Fletcher states that he has relied throughout upon well-known authorities of which he gives an extensive index. He gives a clear account of how the communities failed to be true to their principles, how the friars supplanted them in popular esteem, why the religious houses had proved a failure, and how these institutions came to an end. The narrative passes in review the work in Yorkshire of Thomas Cromwell's agents, Richard Layton and Sir Thomas Legh; and there is an especially stirring account of the celebrated armed rebellion known as the Pilgrimage of Grace, in which many of the religious were concerned. Mr. Fletcher's book is an endeavour to deal in a judicial spirit with the theme he has selected, though he hardly shows himself competent to deal with original authorities.

See notice, p. 370.

300 SOCIOLOGY.

*Debrett's House of Commons and the Judicial Bench. Edited by Arthur G. M. Heslirige. Dean & Son, 1920. 8 in. 540 pp. il. 21/ n. 328.42
The fifty-fourth issue of this useful work of reference is as well produced as its predecessors. The book is full of information; hundreds of illustrations of armorial bearings constitute an important and attractive feature. Revision has been carried down to a very recent date.

The ninety-sixth issue of "Dodd" comprises besides a list showing the personnel of the third Parliament of King George V., a variety of acceptable official information, a brief description of the constitution of the League of Nations, and much other new matter.

Hobson (S. G.). National Guilds and the State. Bell, for the author, 9 in. 426 pp. app. index, 12/6 n. 398.6
The first part of this book is devoted to a theoretical discussion of the relations between producer and consumer, and their joint relations with the State. It is presupposed that readers are acquainted with the principles and purposes of the National Guild movement. The argument is largely the outcome of correspondence between Mr. S. G. D. H. Cole, in which different stresses were laid upon the status of the consumer, "and, in consequence, upon the structure of the State." At the end of the second part, which deals with "transition," Mr. Hobson avers his belief that National Guilds are inevitable. There is no student of industry, he declares, who "would deny the possibility of a revolution"; and the author expresses his belief that wage-abolition, "with its logical sequel of an infinitely more humane structure of society," will mark a great epoch in the history of Western civilization.

*Hodges (Frank), Nationalisation of the Mines ("The New Era Series," vol. 1). L. Parsons, Portoagul Street, 1920. 8 in. 152 pp. app., 4/6 n. 333.8
See review, p. 385.

Kirkaldy (Adam W.). Industry and Finance (Supplementary Volume). Pitman, 1920. 8 in. 159 pp. tables, index, 5/ n. 331-332
This supplementary volume to the published inquiries instituted by the Economic Science and Statistics Section of the British Association consists of a statistical account of the employment of women in industry and of a chapter on Banking, Currency and Finance. This latter section strongly condemns the financial policy adopted by the Government during the war. The whole volume is a mine of information for writers on present-day economic questions.

*St. Clair (Oswald). The Physiology of Credit and of Money. P. S. King, 1919. 7 in. 170 pp., 5/ n. 332
A clear discussion of the function of credit and money. The author's views are not always orthodox, but they are always stimulating and well expressed. His chief thesis is that credit does not increase prices. His concluding remarks on the Government method of printing paper money show what he considers to be a main cause of the present increased prices.

400 PHILOLOGY.

The majority of these words and phrases are not distinctively Australian—e.g., "streave," "scrag," "scounge," "backstep," "shout," "squint," "and many are not slang—e.g., "bank," to turn on its side in changing direction (of an aeroplane), "air-pocket," "side-slip," "vermouth-cassis," "parades." Some additions to the slang vocabulary may, however, be gleaned here.

Willis (George). The Philosophy of Speech. Allen & Unwin [1920]. 8 in. 286 pp. app. index, 7/6 n. 401
In his latest "linon" he shows us how much the "linon" of time immemorial has signified flax. "Homer's 'linon upo kalon aedon 'ealn the flax sung beautifully in answer." "That 'linon is a natural and effective way of imitating a musical note we can see from Tennyson's 'The mellow linon-lone of evening bells.' Thus, without considering which came first, or whether Homer's use was anything more than a metonymy, the author derives the Greek 'mellin,' 'to delay, from 'mel' honey;' 'luck' from 'click,' the sound of a tossed coin, etc. He is, indeed, 'ingenious,' as the dust-cover puts it, but hardly historical. Why not trace 'cash' to 'French 'cache,' because people often secrete it; or explain ' rashful' because some members of the R.A.F. are sometimes like that?
600 USEFUL ARTS.

*Bulman (H. F.), COAL MINE AND THE COAL MINER. Manchester, 1910, 500 pp. ill. app. index, 15/ n. 622

An interesting review of the technology of coal-mining, describing each of the multifarious operations which are necessary in the industry. The latter part of the book describes some model miners' villages, but Mr. Bulman does not tell us what percentage of the miners of Great Britain live in such desirable circumstances.

Mills (G. Percival), PRACTICAL HINTS ON MINOR OPERATIONS. Birmingham, &c., 1910, 115 pp. index, 5/ n. 617.4

Concise instructions, accompanied where necessary by clear diagrams, intended primarily for students and practitioners, and especially for practitioners in country places, who do their own minor surgery.

*Staward (Richard), PRACTICAL HARDY FRUIT CULTURE. Swarthmore Press [1920]. 7 1/ in. 216 pp. il., 6/ n. 632

More especially for fruit-growers on a fairly large scale, but also for anyone who has a garden and some fruit-trees, bushes, vines, strawberries, etc., this is a business-like manual. The information is well tabulated, condensed, and comprehensive; the coloured illustrations are pretty, and the photographs clear enough to make identification even of a particular variety of apple easy.

700 FINE ARTS.

See review, p. 374.

See review, p. 367.

800 LITERATURE.

*Bullough (Edward), ed. CAMBRIDGE READINGS IN ITALIAN LITERATURE. Cambridge University Press [1920]. 8 in. 343 pp. index, 8. 850.8

See review, p. 370.

Bywater (Ingram). FOUR CENTURIES OF CREEK LEARNING IN ENGLAND. Clarendon Press, 1919. 9 in. 20 pp. paper, 1/ 6 n. 889.7

The Delegates of the University Press have done well to print the late Professor Bywater's inaugural lecture delivered in 1894. It is eminently characteristic of the man: no one had a better right than himself to put forward as the two points of the true classical scholar:

1. He has to take more thought of quality than quantity in his work; he does not seek to make an imposing demonstration.
2. He has to avoid all parade of learning, and not only this but also the parade of cleverness; there is a certain sincerity, caution, modesty and reserve in his thoughts as well as in his utterances.

Have more than thou dost know,
Speak less than thou knowest,
A rule for him, as it is for all wise and reasonable men of the world also.

Hamilton (Clayton). PROBLEMS OF THE PLAYWRIGHT. Allen & Unwin [1920]. 8 in. 354 pp. index, 7/ 6 n. 808.2

The American author presents this as a companion volume to his "Theory of the Drama in Literature." It consists of a series of essays on the principles and the technique of play-building, and critical appreciations of both actors and playwrights, e.g., Yvette Guilbert, Sir J. M. Barrie, Lord Dunsany, and M. Mterlinck. Mr. Hamilton rejects the Brantamé formula of the conflict of wills as the essential element of drama, and also Mr. Archer's formula of crisis, arguing that the indispensable element is contrast. Mr. Hamilton is optimistic, but rather inclined to grandiloquence and exaggerated admirations.

Mans (S. P. B.), BOOKS AND THEIR WRITERS. Grant Richards, 1920. 8 in. 343 pp., 7/ 6 n. 820.4

A light and sketchy, appreciative and not over-critical, yet useful contribution to the history of current literature, this is this of Mr. Mans, composed largely of articles from the Fortnightly and To-Day; in short, many were ordinary notices of books or authors. The omissions bulk large, and the author candidly admits there are many novelists writing to-day whose works "I infinitely prefer either to those of Thackeray or Dickens"; but the error here—not the grammatical one—is an error in the right direction.

Platt (Agnes). PRACTICAL HINTS ON PLAYWRITING. Stanley Paul [1919]. 7 in. 167 pp., 3/ 6 n. 808.2

In this excellent manual aspirants to success as dramatists will discover a fund of useful information, shrewd counsel, and noble suggestions concerning the choice of plot and characters; the art of writing "telling lines"; practicability and the like; casting, production, and other matters. A glossary of theatrical terms is appended.

POETRY.

These poems have a refreshing energy and vitality. In the best of them the authoress displays skill in the handling of the verse.

Coutts (Francis). THE SPACIOUS TIMES, AND OTHERS. Lane, 1920. 7 1/ in. 134 pp. boards, 5/ n. 821.9

Of all the species of poetry, the political sonnet is perhaps the most difficult to write well. Milton and Wordsworth produced about a dozen good ones between them: it is difficult to think of any others. It needs an enormous imaginative force to sublimate the political theme into poetry—a force which only very few, and those the greatest, possess. Mr. Coutts is no exception to the general rule. The sonnets on the war which all the greater part of his volume are not poetry in the sense that "On the Extinction of the Venetian Republic" or "Toussaint L'Ouverture" is poetry. For all their fourteen lines and their Petrarchan rhyme-system, they have the quality of newspaper articles. On subscription, the conscientious objector, national dress for women, and pacifists Mr. Coutts adds nothing to what was said, at the time these topics were exciting discussion, in the Sunday papers. The greatness of a Milton or a Wordsworth lies in the fact that he does add something more than rhyme and metre to the bald prosaic version of the political theme.

Newbolt (Sir Henry). A NEW STUDY OF ENGLISH POETRY. Constable, 1919. 9 in. 314 pp., 12/ 6 n. 821.98

First published in 1916.

Papini (Giovanni). CENTO PAGINE DI POESIA. Florence, La Voce, [1915]. 8 in. 117 pp. paper cover, 2 lire. 851.9

See review, p. 382.

FICTION.

Beresford (J. D.). AN IMPERFECT MOTHER. Collins, 1920. 8 in. 288 pp., 7/ 6 n.

See review, p. 369.

Hume (Fergus). THE SINGING HEAD. Hurst & Blackett [1920]. 8 in. 320 pp., 7/ 6 n.

The contriver of "The Mystery of a Hansom Cab" mystifies, excites, and shocks the primitive lover of murder stories with the same skill and certainty as of yore.

A collection of short stories by one of the most distinguished writers of the younger generation, who is better known, and we think better inspired, as a poet.

The story opens in the salon of Madame Roland on August 27, 1792, and of one of the guests is Hubert Mostyn, a young man of valuable suggestions who is acting as the correspondent of a Whig journal. The plot is somewhat intricate, and is concerned with the parentage and fortunes of Camilla, who in an irregular way is descended from the Neapolitan family of the Torribelli, and is known as Camilla North.

Charlotte Mashall, the heroine of this tale of the days of George II., is unfortunate in her choice of a parent, who, though a man of position, is an inveterate gamester and a
Mr. Leonard Parsons’ Spring Announcements.

First large edition exhausted. Second large impression now ready.

THE “NEW ERA” SERIES (VOL. 1.)

Nationalisation of the Mines.

By FRANK HODGES (Secretary of the Miners Federation).

With a Foreword by Rt. Hon. J. R. Clynes, D.C.L., M.P.

Quarter Cloth. Crown 8vo. 4s. 6d. net.

The book is written on broad and logical rather than narrow and partisan lines, and it concludes with a simple, clear statement of the form of administration and control which will take the place of the existing system immediately the latter is legally abolished. It is the work of an expert, writing for the general public on a subject of vital importance to the community.

Other Volumes in the “New Era” Series.

Quarter Cloth. Crown 8vo. Price 4s. 6d. net.

VOL. II. A NEW ARISTOCRACY OF COMRADESHP
By WILLIAM PAINE.

READY IN MAY.

VOL. III. THE NEW LIBERALISM.
By THE RIGHT HON. C. F. G. MASTERMAN.

READY IN MAY.

VOL. IV. PUBLIC OWNERSHIP AND CONTROL OF THE LIQUOR TRADE.
By ARTHUR GREENWOOD (Vice-President of the Workers’ Educational Association).

READY IN JUNE.

VOL. V. THE NEW LABOUR OUTLOOK.
By ROBERT WILLIAMS (Secretary of the Transport Workers’ Federation).

READY IN JUNE.

Other Volumes by PHILIP SNOWDEN, GEORGE LANSBURY, etc., will be announced later.

Miscellaneous.

THE EDEN PHILLPOTTS’ COUNTRY. AN IDEAL GIFT BOOK.

A WEST COUNTRY PILGRIMAGE.
By EDEN PHILLPOTTS. With 18 three-colour illustrations by Hardaker. Crown 8vo. Price 2s. 6d. net.

MY YEARS OF EXILE.
By VON EDUARD BERNSTEIN (the well-known German Socialist). Cloth. Demy 8vo. Price 12s. 6d. net.

THE GREAT REBUILDING.
By H. DEXSTON PUNNELL, F.S.A. Cloth. Demy 8vo. Price 12s. 6d. net.

SEX EDUCATION AND NATIONAL HEALTH.

Fiction.

CLOTH. Demy 8vo. With three-colour Picture Jackets. Price 7s. 6d. net.

THE BURIED TORCH.
By CORALIE STANTON AND HEATH HOSKEN.

THE GREATER DAWN.
By NOAH KENT.

MIRIAM AND THE PHILISTINES.
By ALICE CLAYTON GREENE.

THE BISHOP’S MASQUERADE.
By W. HAROLD THOMSON.

SIDE ISSUES.
By JEFFREY E. JEFFERY (author of “Servants of the Guns”). Price 6s. net.

Send to the Publishers now for Descriptive List, including details regarding “The Contemporary Series,” which is now in preparation.

LEONARD PARSONS LTD.
PORTUGAL STREET.

THE ATHENÆUM 385

Mr. Leonard Parsons’ Spring Announcements.

First large edition exhausted. Second large impression now ready.

THE “NEW ERA” SERIES (VOL. 1.)

Nationalisation of the Mines.

By FRANK HODGES (Secretary of the Miners Federation).

With a Foreword by Rt. Hon. J. R. Clynes, D.C.L., M.P.

Quarter Cloth. Crown 8vo. 4s. 6d. net.

The book is written on broad and logical rather than narrow and partisan lines, and it concludes with a simple, clear statement of the form of administration and control which will take the place of the existing system immediately the latter is legally abolished. It is the work of an expert, writing for the general public on a subject of vital importance to the community.

Other Volumes in the “New Era” Series.

Quarter Cloth. Crown 8vo. Price 4s. 6d. net.

VOL. II. A NEW ARISTOCRACY OF COMRADESHP
By WILLIAM PAINE.

READY IN MAY.

VOL. III. THE NEW LIBERALISM.
By THE RIGHT HON. C. F. G. MASTERMAN.

READY IN MAY.

VOL. IV. PUBLIC OWNERSHIP AND CONTROL OF THE LIQUOR TRADE.
By ARTHUR GREENWOOD (Vice-President of the Workers’ Educational Association).

READY IN JUNE.

VOL. V. THE NEW LABOUR OUTLOOK.
By ROBERT WILLIAMS (Secretary of the Transport Workers’ Federation).

READY IN JUNE.

Other Volumes by PHILIP SNOWDEN, GEORGE LANSBURY, etc., will be announced later.

Miscellaneous.

THE EDEN PHILLPOTTS’ COUNTRY. AN IDEAL GIFT BOOK.

A WEST COUNTRY PILGRIMAGE.
By EDEN PHILLPOTTS. With 18 three-colour illustrations by Hardaker. Crown 8vo. Price 2s. 6d. net.

MY YEARS OF EXILE.
By VON EDUARD BERNSTEIN (the well-known German Socialist). Cloth. Demy 8vo. Price 12s. 6d. net.

THE GREAT REBUILDING.
By H. DEXSTON PUNNELL, F.S.A. Cloth. Demy 8vo. Price 12s. 6d. net.

SEX EDUCATION AND NATIONAL HEALTH.

Fiction.

CLOTH. Demy 8vo. With three-colour Picture Jackets. Price 7s. 6d. net.

THE BURIED TORCH.
By CORALIE STANTON AND HEATH HOSKEN.

THE GREATER DAWN.
By NOAH KENT.

MIRIAM AND THE PHILISTINES.
By ALICE CLAYTON GREENE.

THE BISHOP’S MASQUERADE.
By W. HAROLD THOMSON.

SIDE ISSUES.
By JEFFREY E. JEFFERY (author of “Servants of the Guns”). Price 6s. net.

Send to the Publishers now for Descriptive List, including details regarding “The Contemporary Series,” which is now in preparation.

LEONARD PARSONS LTD.
PORTUGAL STREET.

Messrs. BELL’S New Books.

National Guilds and the State.

By S. G. Hobson. “Everyone who wishes to understand the social forces which are at work today and whether they are carrying us as should read Mr. Hobson’s book,” says the Daily Mail. “They will find him always clear in his thought and agreeable in manner.” 12s. 6d. net.

A List of Books on the Guild Movement will be sent on request.

Pioneers of Land Reform.

The Life and Struggles of William Lovett.

The Life of Robert Owen.

By Himself. With Introduction by M. Beer, Author of “A History of British Socialism,” etc. (End of March)

These volumes are published in Bells’s Popular Library. Price 2s. 6d. net for volume. Full list on application.

The Social Worker.

By G. R. Attlee, M.A., is the first volume of a new series—The Social Service Library. “The book,” says The Times “is a singularity thoughtful and instructive study of a subject in which a widely interested public really needs well-considered guidance.” 6s. net.

Subsequent volumes will deal with particular fields of Social Service.

Christian Essentials of Reconstruction.

Being twelve essays delivered at the Sunning Summer School, 1910 Edited by Lucy Gardner. 5s. net.

Hellenic Architecture.

Messrs. Bell’s Announcements.

By Maurice Baring.

READY SHORTLY

In a Green Shade.
By Maurice Hewlett.

READY IN MAY.

The Passion of Labour.
By Robert Lynd.

READY IN MAY.

The Collected Prose of James Elroy Flecker.

READY IN MAY.

Messrs. Bell here in preparation an important popular science volume by Professor W. H. Bragg, F.R.S., entitled “THE WORLD OF SOUND.” It will be published, it is hoped, in May, and will be well illustrated. An ideal book for School Prizes.

G. BELL & SONS LTD., PORTUGAL ST., LONDON, W.C.2.
hard drinker. He plays for his fortune and his daughter's hand with a bird of his own feather. The dice are loaded, and the drunkard loses. Rescue comes to the lady through Terence Warren, a servitor at Oxford. Of course, "Terry" marries Chloris. The story is readable and alive.

Philpotts (Eden), MISER'S MONEY. Heinemann, 1920. 7½ in. 375 pp., 7½ n.

Poore (Isa Margaret, Lady). RACHEL FITZPATRICK. Lane, 1920. 7½ in. 312 pp., 7½ n.

The author's name in heroine is skilfully and naturally drawn. It is quite in accordance with the fitness of things that the artless young girl from Ballymore cannot adapt herself to the stiff inanition in Grosvenor Square, and that she escapes from the horrid old uncle who takes her to Germany on the eve of the outbreak of war. By good luck Rachel meets her loved governor in Germany, and the two come home together. The heroine eventually marries an old drake.

Rae (Lettice Milne), MR. SUFFER-LONG. R.T.S. [1920]. 8 in. 314 pp., 7½ n.

A pleasant costume story of "The Forty-five." The noble-minded but dreamy hero, Adrian Balbirnie, is an enthusiastic supporter of the Young Tredirect, whose cause he regards as "The Holy War." In later years, impoverished and completely disillusioned, Adrian is succoured and made happy by the love of Lorraine Heriot, whom he meets as a child.

Spender (Hugh F.), THE BANNER. Collins, [1920]. 8 in. 242 pp., 7½ n.

920 BIOGRAPHY.

Booth (William).

See review, p. 365.

Conselheiro (Antonio).

See review, p. 368.

Gregory VII. (Pope).

Great in himself, but greater in the effect his "gigantic character" was to leave upon Europe for centuries to come, Pope Hildebrand is here depicted in clear and vivid lines. His reforms in the Church, his re-establishment of the Holy See as a spiritual and temporal Power, and his vindication of the laws of God in the conduct exacted from clergy and laity towards the poor and weak, are the facts most powerfully brought out.

Thompson (Silvanus Phillips).

See review, p. 372.

930-990 HISTORY.

Horgan (J. J.), ed. THE COMPLETE GRAMMAR OF ANARCHY: by members of the War Cabinet and their friends. Nisbet, 1919. 7½ in. 64 pp. paper, 1½ n.

941.5 Extracts from speeches by Sir Edward Carson, Mr. Bonar Law, Sir James Craig, and other prominent Unionists, accompanied by a chronological record of political events during 1912-19.

Moncrieff (A. R. Hope), THE COCKPIT OF EUROPE. Black, 1920. 9 in. 210 pp. il. index, 20½ n.

In this account of the Low Countries the author begins at the beginning with Cæsar and the Nervii, and carries us—sometimes whirrs us on the flood of an overwhelming rhetoric—down to the Congress of Paris. On the whole, we consider this a spirited piece of bookmaking. The illustrations are unequal; at their best they are properly appropos to the author's narrative style.

949.4 An interesting address by Professor G. de Reynold, of the University of Berne. The unity of Swiss history he succinctly describes as unity in endeavour. To conquer the land and vanquish foes; to establish the nation in the land, and democracy in the nation; and by free will, order, and liberty to bring about unity and collaboration of races, of language, and of different religions, antagonistic and sometimes hostile: "voilà bien ... celle qui fait de ce petit pays une grande nation."

940.7 The contents of this volume, which are taken exclusively from the republican archives at the Frari, relate partly to comparatively trivial internal affairs; but they also deal at considerable length with the representations made at the Hague and in London by the ambassadors of the Venetian Doge and Senate, whose endeavours to arouse the northern Power to vigorous resistance to Habsburg encroachments are apparent in the correspondence. An amusing comment upon our national characteristics is that of Alvice Contarini, Venetian Ambassador in England, to Zorzi Zordan, his colleague in France (April 20, 1629): "... in England things move but slowly, the climate generating cold humours and tardy circulation."

940.9 THE GREAT EUROPEAN WAR.

Bishop (H. C. W.), A KUT PRISONER. Lane, 1920. 7½ in. 260 pp. il. index, 6½ n.

940.9 The experiences of a subaltern of the Indian Army Reserve of Officers, who fought at Csehszlovak, was taken prisoner by the Turks, and succeeded in escaping from Asia Minor. The book is interesting.

940.9 A volume of considerable interest, in which the direct war expenses of the various Governments are stated with approximate accuracy, and the indirect costs of the war are set forth, to some extent conjecturally, but with as much precision as is possible at the present time. A separate section is devoted to each of the principal Powers. Professor Bogart remarks: "To anyone who doubts the responsibility of Germany for bringing on the war, a study of the financial measures prior to and immediately following the declaration of war must bring conviction that it was carefully planned and provided for."

Felstead (Sidney Theodore), GERMAN SPIES AT BAY: being an actual record of the German espionage in Great Britain during the years 1914-1918, compiled from official sources. Hutchinson, 1920. 7½ in. 296 pp. il. index, 8½ n.

940.9 An absorbing account of the activities of German spies in this country during the war. The details are authentic, and some painful incidents are described. The extent of the German espionage in England was much less considerable than it was commonly supposed; seemingly, the game was not worth the candle. The measures adopted by the British authorities to cope with what was at one period a serious menace were admirable—and brilliantly successful.

940.9 Scenes and stories of a French military hospital, described and told with a pitiless and ghostly realism; and studies of character tortured by suffering, madden and brutalized by despair—the grimmest and most unpalatable brutalities and horrors of the war—with woodcuts in their simplicity as the letterpress which they illustrate.
FROM ELKIN MATHEWS’ SPRING LIST

JOHN VAUGHAN. THE REV. CANON

The Music of Wild Flowers. 1mp. 16mo. 8s. 6d. net.
F. W. MOORMAN. THE LATE PROFESSOR

Tales of the Ridings. With Memoir and Portrait. Crown 8vo. Cloth. 3s. 6d. net; wrappers. 2s. 6d. net.
D. B. JONES (of Johannesburg University).

Amethysts: A Series of Social and Ethical Essays. Imp. 16mo. 7s. 6d. net.

EDEN PHILLPOTTS.

As the Wind Blows. 1mp. 16mo. 5s. net.
STANLEY CASSON.

Hellenic Studies. With several Illustrations. Imp. 16mo. 6s. net.
EZRA POUND. Umbra of. Imp. 16mo. 8s. net.
PERCY ADDLESHAW.

Last Verses. With Memoir and Portrait. Royal 16mo. 2s. 6d. net.

VERNON BARTLETT.

Songs of the Winds and Seas. Fcap 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.
J. H. F. MEWEN.

Poems. Fcap. 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.
DAN McKENZIE.

Pride o’Raploch. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.
WILLoughby WEAVING.

Algazel: A Play. Imp. 16mo. 5s. net.
RICHARD ALDINGTON.

Images of Desire. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net. [Ready.

MABEL HOLLAND-GRAVE.

Some Welsh Children. Re-issue of a notable book. Cr. 8vo. 4s. 6d. net. [Just Out.

"Red Band."—A Prisoner of Pentonville. Crown 8vo. Cloth. 3s. 6d. net.; Wrappers. 2s. 6d. net.

London: ELKIN MATHEWS, 4a, CORK STREET, W.1.

NEW BOOKS.

By ADRIAN FORTESCUE.

THE EARLY PAPACY. A comprehensive refutation of the contention that the Early Papacy was a "constitutional" authority, and not at present an "irresponsible autocracy." Wrappers. 2s. 6d. net.

By JOSEPH RICKABY, S.J.

IN AN INDIAN ABBEY. Some Straight Talking on Theology. A series of Dialogues dealing with theological difficulties. Doeny 8vo. 6s. 6d. net.

THE IMMACULATE CONCEPTION. A new edition of Father Thomas Harper’s Essay. Father Rickaby has no hesitation in describing this Essay as the best exposition in the English language. Wrappers. 2s. 6d. net. Cloth. 3s. 6d. net.

By C. C. MARTINDALE, S.J.

UPON GOD’S HOLY HILLS. 1.—The Guides. St. Anthony of Egypt; St. Bruno of Cologne; St. John of the Cross. (The “Household of God” series.) Cloth. 3s. 6d. net.

PRINCES OF HIS PEOPLE. I.—St. John the Evangelist. (“Household of God” series.) Cloth. 3s. 6d. net.

By JOSEPH HUSSEIN, S.J.

THE WORLD PROBLEM. Capital, Labour and the Church. Here is a complete and authoritative treatment of every phase of the question. An exhaustive index renders the work doubly valuable. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

DEMOCRATIC INDUSTRY. An exposition of the doctrine which the Church advocates as a moral and economic basis for the just relationship between the employer and employed. Crown 8vo. 8s. 6d. net.

LONDON:

BURNS OATES & WASHBOURNE LTD.

28 ORCHARD ST., W.1, & 8-10 PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C.4.

ANDREW MELROSE’S DISTINCTIVE NEW BOOKS.

A Fascinating Life of Jesus.

THE SYRIAN CHRIST.

By ABRAHAM MITRICE RIBHANY

Price 6s. net. Doeny 8vo.

The Church Times says: “He has rendered admirable service to all Bible students. His work is of permanent value.”

The Glasgow Herald says: “The writer, himself a Syrian, born not far from where our Lord was born, and brought up under the same conditions, lets us see the Bible from the inside, and in his doing throws a flood of welcome light upon many passages which are otherwise apt to cause difficulty to our Western minds.

With a “Bristol Fighter” Squadron.

By WALTER NOBLE, D.F.C.

MY NEIGHBOURS. Stories of the London Welsh.

By CARADOC EVANS.

Author of “My People,” “Caspell Zoo.” Price 6s. net.

Punch says: “Undoubtedly Mr. Caradoc Evans is the bold boy... His sketches, no more than a few pages in length, contain never an idle word, and the phrases bite like vipers... they are clever, arresting, and violently individual.”

NEW NOVELS.

HAZARD.

A Romance.

By JOHN OVERTON.

Author of “Dick Decoy,” &c. Price 6s. net.

CAMILA OF THE FAIR TOWERS.

By DONALD M. MONTGOMERY.

Price 6s. net.

LIEUT. BEATRICE RAYMOND, V.C.

BY LIEUT. COL. EYRE LLOYD.

Price 6s. 6d. net. New.

By STEPHEN BLACK.

Price 5s. 6d. net.

ROMANCE AND LAW IN THE DIVORCE COURT.

By F. J. NEWMAN.

Price 5s. 6d. net.

London: ANDREW MELROSE LTD.
Art Exhibitions

“GARDENS GAY AND JOYOUS”
By BEATRICE PARSONS
At THE GREATOREX GALLERIES
14, GRAFTON STREET, NEW BOND STREET, W.1.
MARCH 3 to 31.
Daily 10 to 5. Saturday 10 to 1.
FROM THE 3RD TO 30TH MARCH ONLY.

AUGUSTUS E. JOHN’S War Peace Conference, and Other Portraits
THE GALLERY OF THE ALPINE CLUB, Mill Street, Conduit Street, W.
“There is one thing Mr. Augustus John has above his contemporaries: that is an instinct for painting.”—Morning Post.
“It needs no prophetic insight to foretell that the exhibition...will be one of the sensations of the season.”—Daily News.

GOULIL GALLERY EXHIBITIONS.
1. Spring Exhibition, including Hammersmith Bridge on Boat Race Day, by Walter Greaves.
3. Regent Street, S.W.I. 1s. 3d. with Tax. 10—5.00.

NEW ART SALON
160, Shaftesbury Avenue. (1st Floor).
Now on Exhibition: Derain, Picasso, Signac, Marchand, Frisz, etc. Following Exhibition on March 31st, Roger Fry, Blacker, Derain, Modigliani, Paul and John Nash, etc.

THE LITTLE ART ROOMS
IX. EXHIBITION.
JOSEPH SOUTHALL DRAWINGS.
8, DUKE ST., ADELPHI (near the Little Theatre). 10 to 6 daily till March 31st.

THE WOMEN’S INTERNATIONAL ART CLUB.
19th ANNUAL EXHIBITION at the GRAFTON GALLERIES.
Daily to March 24th. Admission 1s. 3d. (inc. Tax).

Booksellers & Catalogues

EARLY PRINTING
A SMALL COLLECTION OF BOOKS FROM THE FAMOUS ELEVEN, ALDINE PLANT, BASKERVILLE AND OTHER EARLY ENGLISH AND FOREIGN PRESSES.
Offered at Low Prices by:
L. C. BAUNCY OF OXFORD LTD 1. ALBEMARLE STREET, LONDON, W.C.1.
Particulars Post Free on Application.

EGYPT, PALESTINE, and the FAR EAST; Travel; Arabian Nights; and Napoleon Era. New Catalogue post free on application.—J. A. ALLEN & Co., 16, Grenville Street, London, W.C.1.

W. & G. ROYLE, LTD., 121-125, Charing Cross Road, London, W.C.2

THE AUTHORS’ ALLIANCE are prepared to consider and place MSS. for early publication. Literary work of all kinds dealt with by experts who place Authors’ interests first. Twenty years’ experience. Please note new address: 93 and 94, CHANCERY LANE, LONDON, W.C.2.

SELWYN & BLOUNT
21, York Buildings, ADELPHI, W.C.
Telephone: GERRARD 1739.

MANSOUL: or the Riddle of the World.
By CHARLES M. DOUGHTY. Crown Svo. 7s. 6d. net.
“It is not often a really notable poem is given to the world...No one who takes English poetry seriously can overlook this fine work.”—The Times.

COLLECTED POEMS.
IN PREPARATION.
By EDWARD THOMAS (“Edward Eastaway”). In Crown Svo. Cloth, 10s. 6d. net. With Photograph Portrait.

POEMS NEW AND OLD.
By JOHN FREEMAN. In Crown Svo. Cloth, 10s. 6d. net.
This collected edition of Mr. Freeman’s poems contains, with a few exceptions, all his published work with a large proportion of pieces that are now printed for the first time.

WINCHESTER CATHEDRAL: its Monuments and Memorials.
By THE REV. JOHN VAUGHAN, M.A., Canon Residentiary of Winchester Cathedral, Author of “Winchester Cathedral Close,” &c. With Illustrations by D. COLLINS. In Demy Svo. Cloth, 10s. 6d. net.
“One of the handbooks of the great church which are really worth possessing.”—Church Times.

VALMOUTH
A NOVEL
By RONALD FIRBANK
Author of “Caprice.”
Times: “All the characters are bizarre—as bizarre as the style.”
London Mercury: “He has a certain gift for inconsequence and highly exhilarating frivolity.”
Scott: “There is no particular plot.”
Irish Life: “It is a jaded mixture of Beardsleysque chatter.”
Land and Water: “This is the real decadence: Huysmans and his friends are nervous giants, playing at bizarre sensuality, compared with Mr. Firbank.”
Liverpool Daily Post: “Mr. Firbank has talents—a gift of style, a capacity to write dialogue, an appreciation of the weird and the absurd. With such gifts he might produce a real comedy of manners. It is to be hoped that he will.”

PRICE SIX SHILLINGS
LONDON: GRANT RICHARDS LTD.

TIBET AND NEPAL.
Painted and Described by A. H. SAVAGE LANDOR.
The narrative of a journey taken by the author in those regions who was able to collect a mass of fresh and interesting materials regarding the natives and the country. Exquisitely illustrated with 50 full-page coloured plates and 25 others.
Royal Svo. A. & C. Black. New copies. Published at 20s. net. Now offered at 16s.; inland postage 6d.

HELEN OF FOUR GATES.
A novel, by an ex-Mill Girl. Is described by Max Pemberton as “one of the greatest things in modern fiction.” Crown Svo. Herbert Jenkins. New copies. Published at 6s. net. Now offered at 2s.; inland postage 6d.
Many other books on a great variety of subjects—Sport, Travel, Fiction, Biography, Mythology, etc., etc. All new copies, Catalogue on application.

WILLIAM GLASHEIER, LIMITED.
265, HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.1.
GRANT RICHARDS LIMITED

Books recently published or to be published shortly:

Uncle Lionel. By S. P. B. Mais. 7/6
Sinners. By Laurence Cowen. 7/6
Cherry Isle. By Evelyne Close. 7/6
High Speed. By Clinton H. Stagg. 6/-
Double Life. By Grant Richards. 7/6
The Broken Laugh. By Meg Villars. Second Edition. 7/-
Coggin. By Ernest Oldmeadow. 7/6
Tales of a Cruel Country. By Gerald Cumberland. 7/-
Evander. By Eden Phillpotts. 6/-

George Meredith: His Life and Friends. By S. M. Ellis. Second Edition. 21/-
Ireland a Nation. By Robert Lynd. 7/6
Village Libraries. By A. Sayle. 5/-
A Golden Age of Authors. By W. W. Ellsworth. 18/-
The Philosophy of Mysticism. By E. I. Watkin. 15/-
Cricket Reminiscences. By P. F. Warner. 15/-
A Playgoer’s Memories. By H. G. Hibbert. 15/-
A Younger Son: His Recollections and Opinions in Middle Age. By G. A. B. Dewar. 12/6
The Romance of Aircraft. By L. Y. Smith. 10/6
The Manners of My Time. By C. L. H. Dempster. 10/6
Man’s Survival After Death. By the Rev. C. L. Tweedale. 10/6
The Bolshevik Theory. By R. W. Postgate. 7/6
The Taint in Politics. 7/6
Books and Their Writers. By S. P. B. Mais. 7/6
Writers of Three Centuries. By Claude Williamson. 7/6
The Powers of the Air. By T. Sturge Moore. 6/-
Broken Bridges: or, The Bolshevik. By Joseph Thorp. 5/-

Songs from an Ulster Valley. By Herbert Moore Pim. 3/6
Poems Written at Ruhleben. By Terence Philip. 3/6
Night Winds of Araby. By A. J. Eardley Dawson. 3/6
Rosalyes and Other Poems. By Gerald Cumberland. 3/6

All the above prices are net.

London: 8 St. Martin’s Street, W.C. 2.
Appointments Vacant

BEDFORD COLLEGE FOR WOMEN.
UNIVERSITY OF LONDON, N.W.1.

THE COUNCIL of Bedford College for Women, University of London, invite APPLICATIONS for the POST of ASSISTANT LECTURER in MATHEMATICS at Bedford College, University of London. The initial salary will be £280 a year.

Further particulars may be obtained from the Secretary, Bedford College, Regent’s Park, N.W.1.

BEDFORD COLLEGE FOR WOMEN.
UNIVERSITY OF LONDON, N.W.1.

THE COUNCIL of Bedford College invite APPLICATIONS for the POST of ASSISTANT LECTURER in MATHEMATICS at Bedford College, University of London. The initial salary will be £280 a year.

Further particulars may be obtained from the Secretary, Bedford College, Regent’s Park, N.W.1.

DENBIGHSHIRE EDUCATION AUTHORITY.

CARNEGIE LIBRARY.

APPLICATIONS are invited for the POST of LIBRARIAN in the Carnegie Library, which is about to be established in Ruthin.

The person appointed must devote his whole time to the duties of the Office, and preference will be given to a person who has had some experience of Library Work.

A knowledge of the Welsh Language is essential and all applicants must be under 45 years of age.

Salary £200 per annum.

Forms of application may be obtained from the undersigned, on receipt of a stamped addressed envelope and to whom they should be returned, accompanied by copies of three recent testimonials, not later than Saturday, April 17, 1920.

J. C. DAVIES,
Secretary and Director of Education.

Education Offices, Ruthin,
March 17, 1920.

NORTHAMPTON COUNTY BOROUGH EDUCATION COMMITTEE.

SCHOOL OF ART.

THE EDUCATION COMMITTEE invite APPLICATIONS for the APPOINTMENT of PRINCIPAL of the SCHOOL OF ART. Applicants should be qualified as required by the Regulations of the Board of Education. Salary £400 per annum, rising by yearly increments of £25 to £500 per annum.

Further particulars and a form of application may be obtained from the undersigned, with whom applications should be lodged not later than April 3, 1920.

HERBERT C. PERRIN, Acting Secretary to the Committee,
Borough Education Offices, 4, St. Giles’ Street, Northampton.
March 6, 1920.

LIVERPOOL.—THE BELVEDERE SCHOOL (G.P.D.S.T.).

TWO SCIENCE MISTRESSSES for September, both to teach one subject in Advanced Courses (Physics or Chemistry or Botany) and also help with elementary chemistry or Mathematics.

Salary, scale, £170–£300.

Applications, with copies of testimonials, to be sent to the Head Mistress immediately.

Appointments Vacant

OXFORD.

CHERWELL HALL.

APPLICATIONS are invited for the POST of PRINCIPAL of CHERWELL HALL TRAINING COLLEGE for WOMEN SECONDARY TEACHERS, OXFORD.

The Principal will be required to take over the direction of the College after the end of the Summer Term.

Salary, with board and residence, £800, rising by two annual increments to £850.

Applications, stating qualifications, experience, and age, with copies of testimonials, should be addressed to the Secretary of Cherwell Hall, at 34, Denison House, Westminster, London, S.W.1, before April 30.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE OF SOUTH WALES AND MONMOUTHSHIRE.

COLEG PRIFATHROFAOL DEHEUDIR CYMRU A MNYWY.

THE COUNCIL invites APPLICATIONS for the POST of PROFESSOR OF FRENCH LANGUAGE AND LITERATURE. Commencing salary, £600 per annum.

Further particulars may be obtained from the undersigned, by whom 100 copies of applications and testimonials must be received on or before Saturday, April 10, 1920.

D. J. A. BROWN,
Registrar.
University College, Cardiff.
March 4, 1920.

WARWICKSHIRE EDUCATION COMMITTEE.

LIBRARY ASSISTANT, man or woman, wanted for the Carnegie Rural Library. Public Library experience essential. Salary £104, rising by yearly increments of £10 to £114.—Apply to the DIRECTOR OF EDUCATION, Education Office, Warwick.

S. ELPHN'S CHURCH OF ENGLAND SCHOOL.

DARLEY DALE, MATLOCK.

APPOINTMENT is REQUIRED in September next.—

1. HISTORY MISTRESS. Honours Degree and Training; Latin or Modern Language desirable as subsidiary. Must be able to prepare for University Scholarship and Higher Certificate.

2. CHEMISTRY MISTRESS. Degree essential; training or experience Chemistry to Higher Certificate. Physics and Middle School Mathematics subsidiary.

In both cases the commencing salary is from £120–£1401 according to qualifications, rising by annual increments; all resident.

Applications should be sent in at once to the HEAD MISTRESS.

NATIONAL LIBRARY OF WALES.

THE COUNCIL invite APPLICATIONS for an Appointment as CURATOR of the Department of Maps, Prints and Drawings, at a commencing salary of £250 per annum. Particulars of the appointment and method of application may be obtained from the undersigned.

Applications for the appointment must be delivered on or before Tuesday, April 6.

JOHN BALLINGER,
Librarian.
March 20, 1920.

COUNTY BOROUGH OF WEST HAM.

PUBLIC LIBRARIES.

SENIOR ASSISTANT.

APPLICATIONS are invited for the position of SENIOR ASSISTANT at the CANNING TOWN LIBRARY (open access), at a salary of £91 per annum, rising to £120, with a further £10 upon obtaining two of the following L.A. certificates, namely, Classification, Bibliography, or Library History.

In addition to the above, a war bonus on the scale of the Civil Service Awards Nos. 84 and 101, equivalent to an additional £89 14s. on the initial salary and £90 8s. on the maximum, will be paid.

Applicants must be not more than 21 years of age, and possess four or the Library Association certificates.

Applications, stating age and qualifications, and accompanied by copies of not more than four recent testimonials, must be enclosed in a stamped addressed envelope, and reach me not later than the first post on Tuesday morning, April 6, 1920.

CANVASSING will disqualify.

Geo. E. Hilleary,
Town Clerk.
10th March, 1920.

RESIDENT LECTURER in ENGLISH (Degree) wanted in September for Teachers’ Training College in London, to lecture on General and Children’s literature.

Applicants should state age, qualifications, experience, and salary required.
Art Exhibitions

"GARDENS GAY AND JOYOUS"
By BEATRICE PARSONS
At THE GREATEST GALLERIES
14, GRAFTON STREET, NEW BOND STREET, W. 1.
MARCH 3 to 31. Daily 10 to 5. Saturday 10 to 1.

THE TWENTY ONE GALLERY Exhibition of Paintings of Greece by
MICHEL ECONOMOU
10.30 to 6 daily : Durham House Street, Adelphi, W.C. 2.

ETCHINGS BY IAN STRANG
THE CHENIL GALLERY
by the Town Hall, Chelsea.

DAILY and SUNDAYS, 10 till 6.
AUGUSTUS E. JOHN'S War, Peace Conference, and Other Portraits.
THE GALLERY OF THE ALPINE CLUB, Mill Street, Conduit
Street, W. "There is one thing Mr. Augustus John has above his contemporaries; that is, an instinct for painting."—Morning Post.
"It needs no prophetic insight to forecast that the exhibition...will be one of the sensations of the season."—Daily News.

NEW ART SALON
160, Shaftesbury Avenue, (1st Floor).
Now on Exhibition.—Derain, Picasso, Signac, Marchand, Friesz, etc. Following Exhibition after Easter, Roger Fry, Blacker, Derain, Nevinson, Meninsky, Paul, and John Nash, etc.

Sales by Auction

PRINTED BOOKS.
MESSRS. SOTHEY, WILKINSON, & HODGE
WILL SELL BY AUCTION, at their Large Galleries, 34 and 35, New Bond Street, W.1, on Monday, March 29, and two following days, at 1 o'clock precisely, the following:
PRINTED BOOKS, comprising the property of the late J. W. Pease, Esq, of Newcastle-on-Tyne; the property of C. H. Cook, Esq. ("John Bickerdyke."); the property of Dr. Leon; the property of the late David Richardson, Esq., of Newcastle-on-Tyne, and other properties, and including fine books with coloured plates, early printed books, English literature, a series of English Bibles, books in fine bindings, French illustrated books of the 18th Century, works on the fine arts, bibliography, &c., sport, angling, travel, and natural history.
May be viewed two days prior. Catalogues may be had.

Educational

ACCOUNTANCY, SECRETARIALSHIP, BUSINESS TRAINING.
A special Postgraduate Course in Business Administration, leading to the Degree of a Bachelor of Commercial Science, is open to students who have completed three years of successful study in business administration.

Financial

PUBLISHERS.—£5,000/10,000 offered for Partnership by young Scotch client.—The OFFICERS' PARTNERSHIP

Appointments Wanted

MUSEUM APPOINTMENT REQUIRED.—Town or country. Highly experienced. Small salary if opportunity for research and museum educational work afforded.—Box 55. ATHENEUM Advertisement Office, 170, Fleet Street, E.C. 4.

GENTLEMAN, excellent references, willing to act as COMPANION-SECRETARY to busy, lonely, or invalid man.—A.B., 376, London Road, Lowestoft.

PUBLISHERS AND OTHERS.—Ex-University Lecturer, M.A., linguist, book-lover, free lance literator, highest references. SEEKS EMPLOYMENT.—Willing to take nominal salary, e.g. in publishing or publicity department of good London firm.—M.L., 19, Venner Road, Sydenham, S.E.

Authors' Agents, etc.

—AUTHORS—
MSS. placed at highest prices; free monthly prizes; terms for stamp.—Cambridge Literary Agency, 8, Henrietta-St., W.C. 2.

PROOF READING, INDEXING, RESEARCHES, REVISION
Linguist, good experience.—Mr. F. A. HADLAND, 15, Bellevue Mansions, Forest Hill, S.E. 23.

THE AUTHORS' ALLIANCE are prepared to consider and place MSS. for early publication. Literary work of all kinds dealt with by experts who place Authors' interests first. Twenty years' experience. Please note new address: 93 and 94, CHANCERY LANE, LONDON, W.C. 2.

STUDIO 20 x 16', furnished, to let from April for six months. Suitable for sculptor. With bedroom, bath, sitting-room, etc., garden. Rent £4 guineas weekly.—2, Earl's Walk Studios (rear of 16), Pembroke Square, W. 8.

Booksellers & Catalogues

Special Offer

THE BAN OF THE BORI
Demons and Demon-Dancing in West and North Africa
by Major A. J. N. TREMBAE, M.A., L.L.M., Author of "Hauss Superstitions and Customs," etc.
Coloured frontispiece, 60 photographic illustrations and 47 figures in the text. A most interesting and exhaustive study on African customs.
8vo. 40/- post free.
L. CHAUNDY OF OXFORD LTD
2, ALBEMARLE STREET, LONDON, W. 1.

ATTRACTIVE BOOKS
AT LESS THAN HALF THE PUBLISHED PRICES.
Books on a great variety of subjects—Sport, Travel, Fiction, Biography, Theology, etc., etc.
All in New Condition as published. Catalogue on application.
WILLIAM GLAISHER LTD., 265, HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C. 1.

RICHARD JASCHKE
78, CHARING CROSS ROAD, W.C. 2
Foreign Fine Art Books.

Bonnard, Cassatt, Chevreuse, Courbet, Degas, Gauguin, Van Gogh, Hodler, Ingres, Youngblood, Matisse, Matisse, Matisse, Matisse, Matisse, Matisse, Matisse, Matisse, Matisse, Matisse.

“BONNARD,” Par Leon Weelh, With 48 illustrations. 8vo. £1 10.

“GANQUIN,” Par Ch. Monier. With 88 illustrations, of which 4 in colour. 8vo. £2 10.

NEW CATALOGUE IN PREPARATION.

March 26, 1920 THE ATHENAEUM [ADVERTISEMENTS] 403
LIPPINCOTT'S NEW BOOKS

KING JOHN
The plan of this volume is the same as in the preceding volumes, and the reader will find evidence of all the learning, care, and critical judgment that have made the new Variorum Edition of Shakespeare's works pre-eminent.

A HISTORY OF THE THEATRE IN AMERICA
By ARTHUR HORNBLOW. Editor of the Theatre Magazine. Author of "Training for the Stage," &c. 175 illustrations. 2 volumes, 8vo. 55s., net.
A complete chronological narrative of the growth and development of the theatre in this country, showing how the drama first took root in North America, and a chain of theatres was gradually built, first along the Atlantic seaboard, then stretching their adventurous way westward until they reached the Pacific Ocean. This is the first history of the stage in America which embraces the entire field from the earliest beginnings down to the present time.

PICTURE ANALYSIS OF GOLF STROKES. A Complete Book of Instruction.
By JAMES M. (JIMMIE) BARNES. 300 illustrations from Action Photographs, Decorative Cloth. Large 8vo in box, 55s., net.
Golf is now coming into the most glorious year of its history. The best instruction, by the best player in the country (according to authorities), is in this sensational exposition of the art of golf. Nothing like it has ever been produced before. Every detail of every shot is shown in action photographs, which may be used to decide any argument or question that may arise. The knowledge conveyed by these pictures, each taken during the execution of a perfect stroke, will be a revelation to those who play golf. It may be called a personal course in golf mastery under the champion, Jimmie Barnes.

THE PRACTICAL BOOK OF INTERIOR DECORATION
By HAROLD DONALDSON EBERLEIN, ABBOTT McCLURE and EDWARD STRATTON HOLLOWAY. Profusely illustrated. Quarto. Decorated cloth in a box. 30s., net.
In the first part of this book the authors have given a picture of the art of interior decoration as practised in England, Italy, Spain, and France since the beginning of the Sixteenth Century—the Renaissance, Baroque, Rococo, and Neo-Classical systems, with American modifications from British usage during the Colonial and early Republic period. The second part offers the direct application to modern requirements of the lessons to be drawn from the history of decoration, emphasizing principles; and the third part offers for the first time a logical system of decoration which avoids the narrow limitations of the one-period method and equally the pitfalls of eclectic furnishing.

THE FINE ART OF PHOTOGRAPHY
By PAUL L. ANDERSON. Frontispiece in colour and 24 other Illustrations. Crown 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.
Photography has proved a new medium in the fine arts, with which rare results have been achieved. The underlying principles of art, as these can be applied to photography, are now formulated and illustrated in this stimulating and inspiring book.

J. B. LIPPINCOTT COMPANY
16, John Street, Adelphi, London, W.C. 2

Mr. R. COBDEN-SANDERSON'S ANNOUNCEMENTS

Sonnets and Poems
By Edmond Holmes. 6s. net. selected and arranged by T. J. Cobden-Sanderson.

Wordsworth: An Anthology
With a prefatory note by T. J. Cobden-Sanderson. 8s. 6d. net.
"Almost anyone, who cares either about poetry or books as beautiful things in themselves, will rejoice in its possession."—Times Lit. Supp.

The Evolution of an Intellectual by J. M. Murry. 7s. 6d. net.

The Meaning of Democracy
by Ivor J. Brown. 6s. net.
"... Mr. Brown is admirable, lucid, often amusing, and always well balanced." The Daily Herald.

Lighting-up Time
by Ivor Brown. 7s. net.
A striking novel of the stage.
SEND FOR LATEST CATALOGUE.

Typewriting &c.

Typewriting of every description carefully and promptly executed at home, 1s. per 1,000 words; carbon copy, 3d. per 1,000 words. Duplicating, Cambridge, Address Miss NANCY MCFARLANE, 11, Palmeira Avenue, Westcliff Essex.

Typewriting. — Authors' MSS., Examination Papers, Letters, Circulars, Testimonials, General Copying, Duplicating, etc. — J. TRIMNELL, 8, Moira Terrace, Cardiff.

Essay Competition.—Send your MSS. to be TYPEWRITTEN by Professional expert. 5s. inclusive.—Miss MARGARET, 10, Manor Road, Folkestone.

Booksellers' Provident Institution
A Registered Friendly Society founded in the year 1837 for the assistance of members and their widows and children when in necessitous circumstances.
Patron: Her Majesty Queen Alexandra.
President: CHARLES JAMES LONGMAN, Esq.
An Annual Subscription of One Guinea, or a Donation of Ten Guineas, entitles the donor to Honorary Membership with the privilege of voting at General Meetings; whilst a bequest of Twenty Guineas constitutes the executor an Honorary Member for life, with power to vote.
Subscriptions or Donations will be thankfully received by the Secretary, Mr. William Poulten, Stationers' Hall Court, London, E.C.4, who will gladly furnish any further particulars that may be desired.

HOLBORN EMPIRE
Holborn Tube Station.
LEWIS CASSON and BRUCE WINSTON'S SEASON OF DAILY MATINEES at 5.30.
NEXT WEEK—SYBIL THORDONIKE in "MEDEA" (Mon. & Tues.), "CANDIDA" (Wed. & Thurs.), "TROJAN WOMEN" (Sat.).
CONTENTS

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Number</th>
<th>Title</th>
<th>Pages</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>416</td>
<td>MARGINALIA, AND OTHER NOTES:</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>The Vates Thomasa Sole</td>
<td>415</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Margiological, by A. E. Bergen</td>
<td>417</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Notes from Ireland</td>
<td>417</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>417</td>
<td>SCIENCE:</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Vitamins</td>
<td>418</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Societies—Forthcoming Meetings</td>
<td>419</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>418</td>
<td>FINE ARTS:</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Renaissance Medals</td>
<td>420</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Exhibitions of the Week</td>
<td>421</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>A New Quarterly</td>
<td>421</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>The Victoria and Albert Museum</td>
<td>421</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Engravings and Drawings</td>
<td>421</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>420</td>
<td>MUSIC:</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>&quot;A Village Romeo and Juliet,&quot; by Edward J. Reed</td>
<td>422</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Dust</td>
<td>422</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Concerts</td>
<td>423</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>421</td>
<td>LIST OF NEW BOOKS</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

EX-LIBRIS

BROWSING round my bookshelves the other day,
I picked up the "Opuscula" of that learned magician Cornelius Agrippa of Nettesheim, and was struck by the fact that it bore the library stamp of Louvain University. I do not mean to imply that this was the first time I had noticed it during the twenty years it had been in my possession, but it now spoke with a different note, of such clear significance that it is already on its way back to the reconstituted library from whose shelves it had once been expelled as an unwanted duplicate. It was something of a wrench parting with it, as it was a pleasant little volume, bound in mellowed vellum, stamped on one side with King David (from whose namesake I bought it in the market-place at Cambridge in undergraduate days), and on the other with the story of "seemly Susan and the perilous prestes"—better known, perhaps, as the Chaste Susannah and the Elders.

The incident moved me to undertake a long-intended task, the compilation of a list of my predecessors—those who had once owned my books, and who, as all good, book-worthy men should do, had left trace of their ownership in inscription, signature or bookplate. The number who had failed to show their pride of possession and to do their duty to their successors proved sadly large, but the list is not without interest. It includes a Pope, an emperor, two kings, bishops, abbots and monasteries, men of letters, and "the Bayswater Athenæum." The Pope was Alexander VII., whose arms are stamped in gold on what was not doubt a presentation copy of "Elegiarum Libri VI." dedicated to His Holiness by Sidronius Hoschius. Italian heraldry is poor stuff, and the arms of the Chigi form no exception; but, for all that, the outside is the best part of this volume, for of all dismal forms of literature the dreariest is Latin minor, or minimal, poetry—as far removed on the one hand from the grace of Horace as, on the other, from the jolly doggerel of "Nos vagabunduli." Equally unreadable, so far as I am concerned—but for a different reason—is my emperor’s book, this being a Persian manuscript of the "Shah Namah" (which I gather is an Eastern equivalent of the "Adventures of Alexander," so popular in medieval Europe). It was looted from the imperial palace at Delhi, and contains a series of delightfully absurd illustrations, painted with the childlike seriousness and simplicity characteristic of such work—warriors riding with a Tod Sloan seat on piebald rocking-horses, performing prodigies feats of arms against men, monsters and dragons, or in milder mood playing polo before a phlegmatic and bored audience. Here, by way of contrast, comes that very Western monarch, Louis XV., who has left his bookplate in the "Astronomicon" of Manlius, edited by Richard Bentley; and it was possibly an ancestor of King Louis who owned, and annotated, "Epitome Fabri Quintiliani... Rhetorici Institutionis," for on its fly-leaf is written, in a sixteenth-century hand, "Ex libris Antonii regis," presumably referring to Antoine de Bourbon, King of Navarre, father of a more famous son, that Henry of Navarre who preferred to risk his soul by bearing mass rather than risk the throne of France by abstaining.

Of my ecclesiastical predecessors the earliest is the monastery of San Bartolomeo near Ferrara, represented by a fifteenth-century manuscript of the "Grammatica Rhythmica" of Alexander de Villa Dei, the copyist of which reveals his identity in the mock-modest couplet:

Scriptor sum Talis Demonstrat Litte.a qualis
Nomen non Pono Quia Lovovicius Laudare Nolo.

Not much later in date is a copy of Augustine's Works, printed in 1489, and bought in 1491 by John Rote-necker, Abbot of St. Giles in Nuremberg—that Aegidius-Kloster in which, thirty years later, Melanchthon set up his school. An "Ordinarium Cartusiense," in a pleasant pigskin binding, stamped with the figures of St. Kilian and St. Burghard, belonged to Tuckelhausen, two of whose inmates have made corrections to suit their local use; and a "Disputatio Cabalistica . . . De Anima" in Hebrew and Latin comes from the monastery of St. Croix of Bordeaux.

Here, too, are bishops, ranging from John Hacket of Lichfield to him whose coat of arms and insignia of staff, sword and crown are surrounded by a legend enigmatic even to a generation trained by the war to think and speak in initials:—IOH. THE. D.G. EP. PRI. & RAT. UT. BA. & S.P.D.C.P.R.S.R.I.P.L.L. Of other armorial stamps the most gorgeous is that of the least worthy possessor—the Comte de Bruhl, "le courtisan damné du roi de Pologne," who was chiefly remarkable for owning three hundred suits of clothes, with shoes, wigs, snuffboxes and watches to match, but, although he had "plus de perruques que de tête," left a collection of 62,000 volumes which afterwards formed the basis of the public library at Dresden.

Most insignificant beside the Comte de Bruhl's resplendent folios is a little, dirty, thumbed and battered "Hudibras"; but the threepence I gave for it can hardly be called an extravagant price in view of the inscription on its fly-leaf—"Saml. Johnson. Feb'y. 8th 1747,"—in a hand sufficiently like the known signatures of the great Doctor to render identification probable. Unfortunately there are no marginal annotations, though certain lines and passages are marked, which, to an owner's biased vision, seem to have some bearing on the account of "Hudibras" in Johnson's "Lives of the Poets." By something of a coincidence I picked off the same stall a few days later a book stamped with the crest and name of Boswell of Auchinleck, and containing the signature of Alexander of that ilk. No question of identity arises in the case of "Robert Southey, Keswick, 15 Nov. 1829," which appears on the title-page of "Le Monde Enchanté"; whose four volumes also contain the signature of their author, Balthasar Bekker—without which none is genuine, as he informs his readers. A very pleasant little work this, with its interesting disquisition on the divining rod, and its scepticism on the subject of witchcraft, for which poor Bekker got into sad trouble. Another and more vigorous scoffer at witches was Reginald Scot, whose "Discovery of Witchcraft" was presented by William Hanbury, at some time in the eighteenth century, "Societati Northampton ad Pauperes sublevandos," with an account of the author written on a blank leaf at the beginning. At the opposite pole of credulity, or perhaps we should say of learning, was Francis Barrett, who, if he was not as fit as Scot to elevate the poor, was at least willing to initiate the wealthy into the mysteries of magic "at any time between the hours of Eleven and Two o'clock, at 99 Norton Street, Mary-le-Bonne," in 1801 (the address of his obvious successor, John Wellington Wells, was, if I remember right, "Number 70, St. Mary-Axe"). That he was not invariably successful appears from some notes jotted down on the last page of the manuscript of his famous "Magus," in my possession, recording various experiments in invoking spirits, "but nothing appeared," and "we had no vision."

Short of invoking the aid of modern imitators of Barrett, there appears no way of discovering anything about the many who have written their names in our books, but not on the scroll of Fame, and have not even managed to creep into the "Dictionary of National Biography." Who was William Smith, who called down divine vengeance on any who should take his book, and who those more amiable gentlemen, Henry Cheyne and Abel Heye, who, with rash magnanimity, appended "et amicorum" to their names? Did their friends scorn the anger of the one or take advantage of the generosity of the others? From what we know of friends we may assume they did, but we shall never know for certain. Petrus Vannes and Harry Vavasour have vanished into the void with Gabriel Scholler and Sophia Rosher; and even that "praclarissimus medicus," Henricus Layleus, who gave me copy of Dioscorides to its nameless owner about 1550, has disappeared, if not unwpt, at least unsung, into the oblivion of the grave, from which, no doubt, his skill had temporarily saved so many of his contemporaries.

L. F. SALZMAN.

SOME EARLY FRIENDS AND CONTEMPORARIES OF RUSKIN
(With many unpublished Letters)

THERE has recently come into my possession a large part of the correspondence, hitherto unpublished, of one, now almost forgotten, who was not only the intimate and trusted friend of Turner, but who included in a circle of close friends Ruskin, Francis Chantrey, and a great number of the leading men of his day. George Jones, R.A., was born in 1788, and was at various dates librarian, keeper, and acting president of the Royal Academy. He painted a large number of pictures, many of them being of military subjects, for as a young man he had served in the army of occupation in Paris after the battle of Waterloo. Examples of his work are in the National Gallery, the National Portrait Gallery, and the British Museum. He died in 1869.

It was not, however, as an artist that the influence of George Jones was most felt. It was through his character, his genius for friendship, and the trust he inspired in all who came within his circle. To this his correspondence bears testimony, and it gives us also a revealing picture of many of his great contemporaries.

The close friendship which existed between Turner and Jones was probably the reason which brought Ruskin into contact with him. The official life of Ruskin makes only a brief reference to Jones, but the extracts printed from Ruskin's diary show the beginning of the friendship between the two men. On July 6, 1841, Ruskin records that he had dined the previous day with Turner, Jones and Nesfield at Griffiths, "Jones a fine grey, quiet, Spectator-like gentleman"; and on January 27, 1843, he records a visit to Jones and a long chat with him, "he condescendingly going on with his work." Jones kept with loving care a manuscript book in which he recorded his reminiscences.
Ruskin was at this time working on the arrangement and detailed examination of the great mass of Turner drawings at the National Gallery, and probably still hoped to write Turner's life.

Another letter, undated, refers to Mr. Bayne, who in 1879 published "Letters from my Masters—Carlyle, Tennyson and Ruskin." He was the editor of the Edinburgh Witness, and died in 1896.

July 9.

DEAR MR. JONES,

I have been very long in thanking you for your kindness to Mr. Bayne, but I am truly obliged for it, and it was not thrown away on him. You might perhaps be surprised at my asking the favour for a person ignorant of art. But he is a thinker, and it makes him think. More lovers of art I can send elsewhere.

With best thanks, and regards to Mrs. Jones,

Believe me, faithfully yours,

J. RUSKIN.

The two following letters were written to Mrs. Jones after the death of her husband:

Denmark Hill, S.E.,

November 1, 1869.

MY DEAR MADAM,

I have received your note with great sorrow—having been out of England nearly all the year—seeing neither letters nor journals. I feel more than you will credit me with feeling—but my own life has been a very sad one—and has now ended in a sort of apathetic mechanism of dreamy work—in which I am lost.

I am at present far from well and not going out, else I should come myself for the book. Would you like me to come to see you?—when I am a little better.

Ever most truly yours,

J. RUSKIN.

Denmark Hill, S.E.,

November 4 [1869].

MY DEAR MRS. JONES,

I am so very grateful for your letter and for all you have told me.

I am now fifty and am doing what I can—do with quite as much sense of its being preparation for the end—as I shall ever have when the end, to me also, is visibly near. But this one thing I am going to try for in remaining time is to teach against all doctrines of Emancipation and Competition and Insolent Equality—the absolute need—to all who would be either happy or good—of a life that shall in its daily course be courteous—peaceful—patient—and open to all present joy—as this life was, of which you were the light.

Always gratefully yours,

J. RUSKIN.

Ruskin was writing this year the "Queen of the Air," and after spending the summer in Switzerland and Italy had returned to take up the Slade Professorship. It is interesting to compare the last two letters other letters which Ruskin was writing about this time to his friend Charles Eliot Norton.

On the first day of the year in which he died (1851) Turner sent the following note to Jones. It is written in a feeble and uneven hand.

DEAR JONES,

Many happy returns of this day, New-year, and many of them to come to you and Mrs. Jones.

My want of health continues on me heavily. But believe

Yours most truly,

J. M. W. TURNER.

Many of Turner's papers passed into the hands of Jones; in his capacity of executor. Some of these show us a very human world. W. Collins, the artist, and father of Wilkie Collins, writes to Turner in an undated letter:

My dear Sir,

After the manner in which you received my proposal last night I can no longer doubt the truth of the report which has lately reached me, namely, the charge you make against me, of speaking of your picture in the present exhibition, in terms calculated by their severity and injustice materially to injure you.

Now, Sir, I take this, the only method left me, of most unequivocally denying the charge, and on the contrary asserting that I have defended you as far as I could, consistently with my real opinion, and that I have always spoken in the highest terms of the distasteful part of the picture and maintained that, although the colour was in some degree violent, the want of ability to make it otherwise was not the cause of it being as it is.

That I have not been so great a hypocrite as to defend what I humbly conceive the faults of the picture I admit, and this, no man has any right to expect, and it is my firm conviction that the interests of the art are most essentially injured by attempts to praise eccentricity, and that those are their best friends who confine their plaudit to those very high qualities your pictures always possess.

I cannot conclude without confessing that I feel much hurt, that I, who have always been one of your most zealous, and I trust, one of your most prudent defenders, should be charged with aspersing you in the very quarter where I have so frequently, at the risk of injuring myself, espoused your cause, but as I do not expect applause for doing my duty, so I care not for censure where I feel confident of not having deserved it.

I am, dear Sir,
Yours faithfully,
W. Collins.

To J. M. W. Turner.

As this letter bears no date, it is difficult to identify the picture which provoked it. But the letter makes some shrewd thrusts amidst its indignation, and would not be one that Turner would receive gladly.

J. H. Whitehouse.

(To be continued.)

RED WHARF BAY

Here, where the sea begins,
The sea-birds hover,
The land's frayed border thins
And the tide flows over;
The rocky portals stand
This side and that the bay;
Seaward, from land to land,
The white surf bars the way;
The sky encloses all;
The clouds thereunder
Lift in the blue, and fall
Past wit and wonder.
On flowing, flying tide
The waters of the deep
Arrive, submerge, subside
Like the coiling surge of sleep.

F. W. Stokoe.

PALLADAS

For those who know not grief
A whole life is brief;
But for the sad one night
Is time infinite.

Palatine Anthology, x. 28.

The schoolmaster's daughter had issue to suit her:
The child was a masculine feminine neuter.

Palatine Anthology, ix. 489.

R. A. Furness.
we feel throughout that the author's aim is single, to set before us the results of his own sincere thinking on a matter of infinite moment. Perhaps better, because subtle, books of criticism have appeared in England during the last ten years—if so, we have not read them; but there has been none more truly tolerant, more evidently free from malice, more certainly the product of a soul in which no lie remains. Whether it is that Sir Henry has like Plato's Cephalus lived his literary life blamelessly, we do not know, but certainly he produces upon us an effect akin to that of Cephalus' peaceful smile when he went on his way to sacrifice duly to the gods and left the younger men to the intricacies of their infinite debate.

Now it seems to us of importance that a writer like Sir Henry Newbolt should declare roundly that creative poetry and creative prose belong to the same kind. It is important not because there is anything very novel in the contention, but because it is opportune; and it is opportune because at the present moment we need to have emphasis laid on the vital element that is common both to creative poetry and creative prose. The general mind loves confusion, best mother of haze and happiness; it loves to be able to conclude that this is an age of poetry from the fact that the books of words cut up into lines or sprinkled with rhymes are legion. An age of haddiessticks! Whatever the present age is—and it is an age of many interesting characteristics—it is not an age of poetry. It would indeed have a better chance of being one if fifty instead of five hundred books of verse were produced every month; and if all the impresarios were shouting that it was an age of prose. The differentiation of verse is a merely trivial accident; what is essential in poetry, or literature if you will, is an act of intuitive comprehension. Where you have the evidence of that act, the sovereign aesthetic process, there you have poetry. What remains for you, whether you are a critic or a poet or both together, is to settle for yourself a system of values by which those various acts of intuitive comprehension may be judged. It does not suffice at any time, much less does it suffice at the present day, to be content with the uniqueness of the pleasure which you derive from each single act of comprehension made vocal. That sentiment is the comfortable privilege of the amateur and the dilettante. It is not sufficient to get a unique pleasure from Mr. De la Mare's "Arabia" or Mr. Davies's "Lovely Dames" or Miss Katherine Mansfield's "Prelude" or Mr. Eliot's "Portrait of a Lady," in each of which the vital act of intuitive comprehension is made manifest. One must establish a hierarchy, and decide which act of comprehension is the more truly comprehensive, which poem has the complete universality. One must be prepared not only to relate each poetic expression to the nature of its kind in the past, or to recognize a new kind if a new kind has been created, but to relate the kind to the finest kind.

That, as it seems to us, is the specifically critical activity, and one which is in peril of death from desuetude. The other important type of criticism, which is analysis of poetic method, an investigation and appreciation of the means by which the poet communicates his intuitive comprehension to an audience, is in a less perilous condition. Where there are real poets—and only a bigot will deny that there are real poets among us now—we have just named four—there will always be true criticism of poetic method, though it may seldom find utterance in the printed word. But criticism of poetic method has, by hypothesis, no perspective and no horizons; it is concerned with a unique thing under the aspect of its uniqueness. It may, and happily most often does, assume that poetry is the supreme form of the spiritual life of man; but it makes no endeavour to assess it according to the standards that are implicit in such an assumption. That is the function of philosophical criticism. If philosophical criticism can be combined with criticism of method—and there is no reason why they should not coexist in a single person; the only two English critics of the nineteenth century, Coleridge and Arnold, were of this kind—so much the better: but it is philosophical criticism of which we stand in desperate need at this moment.

A good friend of ours, who happens to be one of the real poets we possess, once wittily summed up a general objection to criticism of the kind we advocate as "always asking people to do what they can't." But to point out, as the philosophical critic would, that poetry itself must inevitably languish if the more comprehensive kinds are neglected, or if a non-poetic age is allowed complacently to drift and his lyrical, is not to urge the real masters in the less comprehensive kinds to desist; but rather it is to ask—why would ask Mr. De la Mare to write an epic or Miss Mansfield to give us a novel? But he might be a wise man who called upon Mr. Eliot to set himself to the composition of a poetic drama; and without a doubt he would deserve well of the commonwealth who should summon the popular imitators of Mr. De la Mare, Mr. Davies or Mr. Eliot to begin by trying to express something that they did comprehend or desired to comprehend, even though it should take them into thousands of unpublishable pages. It is infinitely preferable that those who have so far given evidence of nothing better than a fatal fluency in insipid imitation of true lyric poets should fall down a precipice in an attempt to scale the very pinnacles of Parnassus. There is something heroic about the most unmitigated disaster at such an altitude.

Moreover, the most marked characteristic of the present age is the disintegration of the consciousness that is going on. Opportunism in politics has its counterpart in opportunism in poetry. Mr. Lloyd George's moods are reflected in Mr. —'s. And, beneath these heights, we have the queer spectacle of a whole race of very young poets who somehow expect to attain poetic intensity by the physical intensity with which they look at any disagreeable object that happens to come under their eye. Perhaps they will find some satisfaction in being reckoned among the curiosities of literature a hundred years hence; it is certainly the only satisfaction they will have. They at any rate have a great deal to gain from the acid of philosophical criticism. If a reaction to life has in itself the seeds of an intuitive comprehension it will stand explication. If a young poet's nausea at the sight of a toothbrush is significant of anything at all except bad upbringing, then it is capable of being refined into a vision of life and of being expressed by means of the appropriate mechanism or myth. But to register the mere facts of consciousness, undisguised by the being, without assessment or reinforcement by the mind, is, for all the connection it has with poetry, no better than to copy down the numbers of one's bus-tickets.

We do not wish to suggest that Sir Henry Newbolt would regard this lengthy gloss upon his book as legitimate deduction. He, we think, is a good deal more tolerant than we are; and he would probably hesitate to work out the consequences of the principles which he enunciates and apply them vigorously to the present time. But as a vindication of the supreme place of poetry as poetry in human life, as a stimulus to critical thought and a guide to exquisite appreciation—of which his essay on Chaucer is an almost perfect example—"A New Study of English Poetry" deserves all the honour that lies in our power to give. J. M. M.

A special general meeting of the Royal Institute of British Architects will be held on Monday at 8 p.m. in the council chamber of the Royal Institute, 12, Pall Mall. An ordinary general meeting will follow at which a paper will be read by Mr. Delissa Joseph, Fellow of the Institute, on "Higher Buildings for London."
ETHNOLOGICAL PROBLEMS

M.A. PAST AND PRESENT. By A. H. Keane. Revised, and largely rewritten, by A. Hingston Quiggin and A. C. Haddon. (Cambridge, University Press. 36s. net.)

THERE is a special class of problems belonging to the science of Man which it is convenient to term ethnological. These arise in response to the endeavour to account for the distribution over the earth's surface of the principal groups into which mankind is naturally divided. Such a natural group may well be described as 'ethnic,' since etymologically the word etnos simply implies a number of people living together. Now they may or may not constitute a phylum or race in the sense of participating in a common parentage and blood. The chances are, however, that in respect of breed they will turn out to be considerably mixed. When, therefore, we try to group them according to some natural order, nature here stands, not for the law of heredity, but for that wider law or tendency which governs historical process as a whole. Thus a political grouping becomes natural if it is sufficiently sustained. As a science of long perspective anthropology cannot take stock of every change which a shifting diplomacy introduces into the map of national boundaries. But when a frontier is perceived to hold good through the course of ages—when the various conditions represented by common breed, common culture, common historical associations, and common adaptation to a geographical environment conspire to keep a people together and to keep them distinct from their neighbours—then here is natural division and mankind, and the ethnologist can get to work in order to assign to each set of conditions its due share in the whole result.

To compose an adequate ethnology on a world-wide scale becomes harder, rather than easier, as knowledge advances. The sheer mass of relevant facts has by this time become so vast that no one mind can expect to cope with it, at any rate so thoroughly as to satisfy the special students who have devoted a lifetime to this or that subject among the thousand on which it is necessary to touch. Nevertheless, if it were really true that we can no longer see the wood for the trees, anthropology would be in a parlous state to-night. It is true we cannot make of those who preside over the destinies of a science to combat the disruptive tendencies incidental to all rapid expansion. Someone must undertake the rather thankless task of editing a joint report of the departments, bringing out the points of agreement and yet not unduly shurring over such differences of opinion as indicate difficulties still unsolved. It might be managed by some corporate body issuing from time to time a synthesis prepared by a congress or committee of experts. An individual, however, can alone put the breadth of life into such a conspectus of results; and such a benefactor of humanity should be protected from the shafts of a too meticulous criticism by a fortunate parallel to that enjoyed by the concert in the miners' camp: 'Gentlemen are requested not to shoot at the musician; he is doing his best.'

The late Professor A. H. Keane stood out among the anthropologists of the last generation as the one man in this country who was brave enough to undertake an ethnological survey of mankind. Though perhaps he did not stand quite in the first rank of original thinkers, he was well equipped for his proposed task, having at once a very wide reading and a faculty of clear and balanced judgment. Thus on the one hand he played fair between the different parts of the world; and, if one comes upon thin places in his work, one can confidently ascribe the deficiency to a lack, not of interest and enthusiasm in the writer, but of fulness and accuracy in the available information. On the other hand, so fair-minded was he that, though professionally and by taste a linguist, he did not make the fatal mistake of treating speech as the sole or even chief criterion of ethnic affinity, but laid at least as much stress on physical as on cultural consideration. For no one, not even the compiler, but had personal views which, though stated with extreme moderation, invested his ethnological works with a soul of their own. Unfortunately, these views of his no longer accord with modern opinion. They were in a way old-fashioned when he championed them, since he set out to establish the natural, and not merely artificial, character of Linnaeans' classification of mankind into four primary divisions—black Ethiopians, yellow Mongolians, red Americans and white Caucasians. He supposed each group to have had its pleistocene ancestor evolved from a single generalized prototype, and to have developed in relative isolation in a primeval habitat or 'cradleland,' the geographical boundaries of which he was prepared to specify. Recent research, however, does not either bring to light a single unspecialized type of early man from whom the differentiated later forms can be alike derived, or show clear traces of such differentiation as deducible from the archaeological record of each of the cradle-lands in question.

Hence in revising a book more than twenty years old the editors have had the delicate task of extracting the old soul, as it were, and supplying a new one—a transcendental operation from which anyone but a magician might reasonably shrink. Remarkable as it may seem, the trick has been done. A classification of mankind based on the main varieties of hair, the woolly, the straight, and the wavy, is dexterously substituted, with surprisingly little effect on the previous articulation of the subject. Having now but three instead of four divisions to deal with, it becomes necessary to suppress one; but this is easily done by attaching the Americans to the Mongols as an allied though distinctive branch. The only other important change relates to the Australian aborigines. Keane classed them with the Negroid peoples, and not without reason seeing that what may be termed a Tasmanian strain certainly occurs in their blood. The editors now place them in the wavy-haired group, and so side by side with the Caucasian peoples. In other words, the classification is viewed from the other and probably prevailing factor in their phylogeny, namely, what is known as the Pre-Dravidian element. This term, 'the first use of which seems to be due to Lapicque,' covers a scattered number of jungle folk whom Keane did not treat as homogeneous, classing the Sakai with Negritos, and the Korumbas with Mongols, while ignoring other peoples of the same type altogether. Since these insignificant folk extend from India by way of the Malay Peninsula to Indonesia, it is not improbable that they are survivors of the breed that gave the Australian his curly, yet not woolly, hair; though the problem of the immigrations that peopled Australia becomes more and more complex as we come to know their diversified culture better.

Meanwhile, Keane's unspecialized pleistocene ancestor has to go, and classification by hair will not apply to hairless fossils; so that on the side of prehistoric archaeology to revise or to rewrite becomes equally difficult, if the subject of man past and present is to be treated systematically. We doubt, indeed, if the old vessel could by any device be made to contain the amount of new wine which the student of the far past is prepared to contribute. On the other hand, the review of modern man has been brought up to date with some approach to completeness. To speak very generally, Europe, Asia and Africa have been revised, whereas America and Oceania had to be rewritten. Everywhere, indeed, great trouble has been taken to insert the necessary amplifications or corrections. Even so, however, one must confess to a certain consciousness of unequal value as one reads forward and backward from the old matter to the new, and could have wished that Professor Haddon had the time to compose a fresh ethnology bearing more clearly the impress of his individual opinions. No one else in this country is so well qualified to produce a book of this nature, and perhaps one day he will do it. In the meantime the present volume serves to keep the subject before the eyes of the student, and, used judiciously, will meet his needs.

R. R. M.

SENSATION NOVELISTS

THE inconveniences of coursing several hares at once receive frequent illustration, not merely in sport, but in other departments of life and literature. Perhaps Dr. Phillips has added a fresh instance. For he has not merely taken the so-called "sensation" novel to be his province and subjoined a very disputable list of three particular novelists as "sensational," but has, by the latter part of his title, given himself liberty to dwell on the extension of reading in England from the later part of the eighteenth century; the prices of novels and the rewards of novelists; the theories of their art entertained by some of these latter; and a good deal else. We must discard most of this detail, only observing that though he has taken a good deal of trouble to amass information, one may sometimes rather distrust his evidence, and sometimes also rather question his judgment and his expression. Mr. Burke was a very great man; but if the estimate of the number of habitual readers in England near the close of the eighteenth century, at from eighty to ninety thousand, rests only on "what Mr. Burke said," we should hesitate to accept it undoubtedly, and still more to build on it comparisons with the number of subscribers to the Cornhill Magazine. What is meant by saying that the term "sensation novel" was felt almost as a compound? A distinctly loose sense of literary chronology, not merely in regard to actual dates, is shown in adhering to a definition against the soundness of the change, as indicated by Dickens' earnings or Thackeray's or George Eliot's, must be placed the very dissimilar experiences of, say, Meredith and Gissing. Thackeray would have slightly raised his eyebrows if he had seen himself classed with "most other conservatives." We were under the impression that it was Swift, not Byron, who made a certain remark about "the prefaces of Dryden," and it would be interesting to know the make of the "revolver" with which Sikes battered Nancy.

But this sort of desultory comment is not very edifying. Let us take Dr. Phillips's main themes—the sensation novel, and Dickens, Charles Reade, and Wilkie Collins as representatives of it—and say something about them. There has been rather a tendency of late to object to "tickets," "labels," or whatever they may be called. This objection may go too far, but it is certainly desirable that, if they are used, they should be used with precision. That desirable quality seems to be rather absent here: indeed, the absence may be obvious enough to escape from the mere presence of Dickens in this gallery. But we shall come to that presently. Dr. Phillips seems to regard "sensational" as very nearly identical with "melodramatic," or differentiated therefrom at most by a change of taste which substituted the criminal and the abnormal in more or less ordinary life for the supernatural element of the older "Terrier" school. "The appeal to fear" is his most frequent description of its method; and more than once the storm in "David Copperfield," and the finding of Steerforth's body, are called "sensational." Thus applied, the term loses all properly differentiated meaning. It would perhaps not be impossible, from the facts which Dr. Phillips gives, to fish out or construct a better definition; but he does not give his readers much assistance in doing this. The circumstances and nature of the actual Sensational Novel, which was a creature of the late fifties, the whole of the sixties, and the seventies decreasingly—are clear enough. The older romance of adventure—which, during the earlier part of the century, was, without going back to past times, enabled by the survival of dwelling and some other things to keep its readers lively—was losing these resources. The new realist or domestic novel did without them; the newest romance proper resorted mainly to the historical form. But there was a considerable public (here Dr. Phillips give some help) which did not care for history and did want something more than ordinary incident. Hence the "sensational" novel—that is to say, the novel with appeal not exactly to "fear," but to the same sort of rather degraded appetite for excitement which is now met by "films." Its most characteristic writers could reach neither the pure romance with its poetic treatment of incident, nor the pure novel with its plastic command of character. But they could "box it about" somehow; and above all they could use that motive of "suspense" which was attributed to their Terrorist predecessors.

To rank Dickens among sensation novelists will thus seem quite uncritical. It is course true that in "Oliver Twist," on which Dr. Phillips greatly relies, and even in most of the books later, though hardly in "Copperfield" itself, there is a good store of incident that the sensational novelist would be only too glad to get hold of if he could. But with the possible exception of "Oliver Twist" itself, the treatment is not "sensational" at all; and the "appeal" is quite different.

There, of course, be people who read "Nicholas Nickleby" for the squalor, not the comedy, of Dotheboys Hall; "Martin Chuzzlewit" for the murder of Tigg Montague; and "Great Expectations" for Orlick's just prevented smashing of Pip. Probably the same persons would read Shakespeare, if they read him at all, for Comedies of Outrage and for the discovery of woman's passion for the bear-eating Paulina's husband. It may even be questioned whether Charles Reade, though he abounds in sensations, can be justly called a sensation novelist. Wilkie Collins, of course, is one, and so is Miss Braddon; and so on the supernatural side (which Dr. Phillips rather ignores) is Bulwer in the "Strange Story." Indeed, the last-named novel is in a certain way the sensation story, just as "The Notch in the Axe" is the ideal ghoul manifested by parody; and "The Woman in White," "No Name" and "Lady Audley's Secret" are, again, actual specimens in the non-supernatural kind. So, also, Dr. Phillips seems to go wide of the bow hand in another direction by making a typical sensationalist of "Ouida." Of course there is something sensational in her, but her books are really developments of the fashionable novel of the earlier century.

To sum up, the sensational novel, properly so called, arises (as Aristotle would say) when the novelist—being incapable of attaining, or unwilling to attain, true poetic romance or true plastic character-fiction—aims at and achieves surprise and suspense only or mainly. Both Dickens and Reade had too much facile au corps to let them fly at so low a level as this.

GEORGE SAINTSBURY.

Sir Edward Elgar, O.M., has been elected a corresponding member of the Institut de France (Académie des Beaux-Arts) in the place of the late Commissariato Giovanni Sgambati of Rome.
THEORIES OF ATONEMENT

THE IDEA OF ATONEMENT IN CHRISTIAN THEOLOGY. Bampton Lectures, 1915. By Hastings Rashdall, D. Litt. (Macmillan. 15s. net.)

REDEEMPTION, HINDU AND CHRISTIAN. By Sydney Cave, D.D. (Milford. 10s. 6d. net.)

FEW of Dr. Rashdall's old pupils at Oxford or elsewhere—and how many there must be to-day who acknowledge a debt which no change of views can efface to the most generous and self-abnegating of teachers!—can have had much difficulty in guessing beforehand the general conclusions of his Bampton Lectures. Indeed, when, some thirteen years ago, he published in "The Theory of Good and Evil" his vigorous strictures on the view that vindictive punishment is demanded for wrongdoing, in order to balance the scales of ideal justice, he already foreshadowed his theory of the Atonement. This theory he defends in the present volume with his customary briskness in controversy. He requires from theology the surrender of the notion that a debt of suffering incurred by Adam's transgression was cancelled by the sacrifice of Christ, and in its place the opinion of Peter Lombard that "the death of Christ justifies us, as much as through it charity is stirred up in our hearts."

This view, which Dr. Rashdall elsewhere traces back to Abelard, seems to make the sacrifice of Christ little more than an inspiring moral example. That is an eviscerate Christianity. It is due to a defect of method in the book, which only admits as the trustworthy teaching of Christ those sayings of His recorded by the Synoptists that pass the sieve of a rather fussy criticism. Yet it was a keen critic who remarked that "on ne connaît le Christ que par la tradition, à travers la tradition, dans la tradition chrétienne primitive." Of this tradition the Synoptics are but a fragment, loose leaves from the volume of apostolic preaching. Meanwhile in the Pauline and Johannine literature there is a unity of fundamental belief which is either the product of contagious illusion, or a legacy from the Founder of the religion. If it is authentic Christianity which these books contain, then the true core of the doctrine of the Atonement can be found in Dr. Rashdall's own citations from them. "It is," he himself remarks, "a matter of profound significance for the history of religion that the original idea of sacrifice should ... be shown to be not so much propitiation as communion." Moreover, unwilling as he is with his anti-sacramental bias to allow that St. Paul interpreted Christianity as the counterpart of the pagan mystery-cults, he perceives that the substance of the Apostle's doctrine was the reconciliation of man to God, effected through incorporation in Christ.

He thought [Dr. Rashdall tells us] of the participation in Christ's death as directly killing that fleshly nature which was the source of sin, and beginning that transformation of it into a new and incorruptible body which had taken place in Christ's case already, and which for the redeemed portion of humanity would be completed at the Parousia or second coming.

St. Paul himself sets forth not only the end, but the means: "All we who were baptized into Christ Jesus were baptized into His death." And again: "The bread which we break is it not a communion of the body of Christ?" This is echoed in the Epistle to the Hebrews: "We have an altar, whereof they have no right to eat which serve the tabernacle"; and in the Second Petrine Epistle, which prays that "ye may become partakers of the divine nature, having escaped from the corruption that is in the world by lust." Dr. Rashdall tries, it is true, to rationalize the doctrine of the Johannine books by contending that "most of what is said of the saving influence which proceeds from Christ, both in the Gospel and the Epistles, may be most naturally understood of His teaching." But Scott, one of the subtest of the Johannine commentators, after weighing this view, rejects it, we feel, correctly.

"In Him was life" [so he sums up the Christology of the Fourth Gospel, in the sense that He was the repository of a higher nature and destiny in kind from that of man. His purpose was to make men partakers of this life, by so uniting them with Himself that His divine essence is transfused into them. The eucharistic idea lends itself naturally to this view of life as a sort of ethereal substance.

The last phrase is, no doubt, tendenzlos, but the doctrine described is not only the Fourth Evangelist's; it saturates the bulk of the New Testament. It is also, of course, the doctrine of the Greek Fathers, and the mainspring of the Athanasian theology, with its maxim "He became man to make us divine." So far as its mystical essence is concerned, it is well appreciated by Dr. Cave, who notes that St. Paul shows after his conversion "not a mere change of character, but a new personality, over which ruled, not the old ego, with its selfish cravings, but the risen Lord." To such conceptions Dr. Rashdall seems inaccessible. His mind is of an eighteenth-century type. He is always re-editing "Christianity not Mysterious."

THE NAVY AT WAR

Naval Operations.—Vol. I. To the Battle of the Falklands. By Sir Julian S. Corbett. (Longmans. 17s. 6d. net.)

The outbreak of war found the Navy faced with an immense sphere of action. The tendency of recent political groupings, the development of commerce and the evolution of naval technique enlarged its range of responsibility, each in its way, to an extent that was hardly imagined, still less comprehended, before the beginning of hostilities. In the first period of the war, with which Sir Julian Corbett deals, the Navy began to learn the lessons it should have assimilated in time of peace; but it was already too late to prevent the critical extension of the war over the Near East, too late to prevent some of the most disastrous blows of the war. Sir Julian quite rightly pours cold water on the recent tendency to regard the historic role of the Navy as the seeking out and destruction of the enemy's main fleet. He is quite right, too, in maintaining that, historically, the Navy's paramount duty was to secure the command of Home waters for the safety of our coasts and trade and to ensure the destruction of the enemy's trade. But this is not the historian's task to say that this is the Navy's only duty or that it is the paramount duty to-day; and between his implications which place attack in the background and those of the younger naval school which tend to overlook the conditioning elements of position and tactical features there is a middle way. No serious critic will maintain that it was ever the duty of the British Navy to attack at all costs, in any circumstances, though this is what the position of the new school logically implies; but, on the other hand, a representative of the wiser tradition, to which Sir Julian Corbett belongs, must maintain that the High Seas Fleet would have been better on the bed of the North Sea and that the Navy is culpable if it neglected any chance of putting it there. And yet it is not at least a little too complacent to reckon among the most "erroneous" of prevailing impressions that the Navy was not prepared for war? Lord Jellicoe has already disclosed some of the grave handicaps with which the Navy took the seas; and there were others which he did not mention as not concerning the Grand Fleet immediately, that were more serious.

Could the war have lasted so long if Turkey had not joined the Central Powers? The question does not deserve discussion; but it suggests the most critical direction in which the Navy was unprepared. Criticism of the War Office and the Army has become tedious; but even they had visualized the broad lines of the war upon which they would embark. Plans had been concerted with France of the most suitable way in which the Army could assist. But the Navy, for which the Mediterranean had become of ever-increasing importance, had not thought out the special problems involved in co-operation with France in that area, and hence the "Goeben" slipped through our hands; and it "was many months before it was possible to appreciate fully the combined effrontery, promptitude and sagacity of the move." Until the British ultimatum to Germany expired Admiral Milan could not co-operate with Admiral de Lapeyrère; but when co-operation was possible the British Admiral was left under the impression that his primary object was to protect the French transport line, while his French colleague had decided on the convoy plan. Until too late the Navy ignored one of the most important waterways in Europe, the Dardanelles; and the other, the Baltic entrances, seems to have had no place in the pre-war councils of the Admiralty. The rôle of the Navy was regarded too much as though it could be dissociated from that of the Army; and in entering the war with its mind a tabula rasa the Navy was unprepared in a more vital way than is suggested by its weaknesses in material and bases.

The "Goeben" and "Breslau" did not enter the Dardanelles until 8.30 on the evening of August 10; but their immunity was amply guaranteed by the failure of the Admiralty to supply essential information to Admiral Milan and to cancel orders which they had become obsolete. "The sudden pressure on an embryonic staff organization was more than it could bear," and this conditioning factor influenced naval operations up to the battle of the Falklands. We see throughout the first phase the versatility, skill and heroism of individual officers thrown into high relief against the bird-witted action of the Staff. The brilliant action of the " Gloucester" in the "Goeben" incident is a case in point; and it was the same qualities which tore a success from the confused action off Heligoland on August 28. Commodores Tyrwhitt and Keyes were not informed, through some mischance, that Beatty's Battle Cruisers and Goodenough's Light Cruisers were to co-operate, and the resulting confusion, which reads almost like light comedy, came near to ending in disaster. The cruisers did their part in the battle. Indeed Beatty's intervention was the decisive factor. But in the midst of the action Keyes saw two of the light cruisers emerging out of the mist, and, not knowing of any British cruisers in his neighbourhood, signalled two enemy cruisers. Goodenough took the signal and prepared to give assistance; but, on sighting his two cruisers, Keyes reported that he was now in the presence of four of the enemy. Goodenough realized that something was wrong and held off to the west. This brought him to the outer line of the British submarines, of whose position he was ignorant; and, on sighting E6, he attempted to ram it. The submarine dive, and in error flag-ships and forebears to attack as the cruiser's nationality was uncertain. But this chapter of accidents which led to so many avoidable risks, without giving the compensation of the strong support designed by the Staff, reads more like the amateur maneuvres of a third-rate navy than the carefully organized battle plan of the mightiest fleet in the world. Good sense with a space of caution saved us from disaster until Beatty dashed into the struggle. This splendid move was made despite the thickening mist, and the danger of enemy submarines and even battle cruisers being present; and it won the day.

It was a similar confusion, moreover, that led poor Cradock to his fate. The order of October 5 instructing him to " search and protect trade," taken in combination with a later instruction that a second squadron was to be formed for the River Plate Area for combined operation," seemed to mean that he was to seek out and bring to action Admiral von Spee's squadron. He had no illusions as to the chances of such a battle. He informed the Admiralty that as long as the "Canopus" was with him his strategical speed could not exceed 12 knots. But when the battleship arrived he sailed to join the rest of the squadron at the western coaling base. On concentration he once more reported the difficulties of the task he conceived to have been laid upon him. The Admiralty appreciated the situation only when Lord Fisher took control, and then it was too late. The telegram never reached him, and when signals from the "Leipzig" were reported, he remembered that he had been told to "be prepared to have to meet," the enemy and to "search," and formed a line of search. As the unequal contest drew near neither Cradock nor von Spee knew the composition of his opponent. Each thought that only an isolated cruiser had been caught in the net; and when the position was clear, with the "Canopus" toiling away 300 miles distant, Cradock saw its hopelessness. The battle of Coronel was lost before it was fought, and Cradock went down with the knowledge that at least he had done his best to warn the Admiralty of the fatal risks into which he believed they were forcing him. The battle of the Falklands had in it the cumulative elements which we expect from Lord Fisher, and the only doubt we feel is at the duration of the conflict. For there was an immensely greater disparity between Sturdee's force and that of von Spee than between Cradock's and von Spee's.

But with this action the hand-to-mouth existence of the Admiralty became circumscribed. The Navy had had its triumphs. The masterly dispositions which covered the transportation of the Expeditionary Force to France were not appreciated at the time, but they make interesting reading. And the dispositions which put an end to the career of the "Königsberg" and "Emden," and protected the Seven Seas, showed bold improvisation. Their main fault was that they were improvisations. War is not like a game in which everything must be left to the chances of the moment; and the orders and counter-orders which sped across the seas read like the disturbed imaginations of a dream. The German Navy was immeasurably better prepared for its rôle in the British Navy for the tasks which were obvious long before the war. The first phase of the naval war saw us at our worst—improvident and reckless, if also daring and versatile. The loss of the "Cressy" reflects little credit on anyone; and it is now clear that it was the work of but one submarine. The reluctance to counter-mine when the Germans began to sow their mines in the North Sea is susceptible of a better justification. It can at least be fairly said that we broke with the prescriptions of humanity not at all, and with those of naval tradition only under the compulsion of events.

Sir Julian Corbett had a moving tale to tell, and he has told it well. It is not altogether impossible to imagine it better written. But the story is at least clear and objective. His judgments err in being a little over-kind; for these early days of the war were among the greatest in the world's history, and no one can remain insensible to the incalculable effects of the escape of the "Goeben" and "Breslau." This at one stroke negatived the efforts of all our diplomacy; and though we feel inclined to exonerate the British admirals on the spot, we cannot pass over so lightly the errors of the Staff. If we must have war it is more economical to fight with the brain than the body. But this seems alien to British traditions and Sir Julian does not deal with it as it deserves. We shall look with pleasure for the other volumes of the "official" history, and it would be ungracious not to welcome this large volume with its accompanying case of splendid maps at a price that is so unusual nowadays.
A RELIGIOUS MAN
From Authority to Freedom: the Spiritual Pilgrimage of Charles Hargrove. By L. P. Jacks. (Williams & Nor-gate. 12s. 6d. net.)

CHARLES HARGROVE, Plymouth Brother, Dominican monk and, finally, Unitarian minister, possessed the "religious temperament." His life reads like that of a man given over to some strange, almost insane, obsession, a part of his life was spent in an actual, material cell; thirty years of it were spent, even more really, in the figurative cell of a narrow religious cosmos. In the life of this man is made manifest that awful uniqueness of personality that we are accustomed, glibly and without comprehension, to attribute, as a matter of course, to every man. We are enabled to see how profoundly, finally and without appeal, a man constructs his own universe. We see how arbitrary are the assumptions we present as testifying to our sanity, how wholly our "objective" criteria, our logic, our "teachings of science," are conditioned by imperious, pre-natal requirements.

To those who lack the religious temperament the whole of Hargrove's existence may be insensible as the experiences of a madman. The following extracts from his diary, written when he was sixteen, and, it must be remembered, in an agony of sincerity, will illustrate what we mean:

March 2.—I was born in sin, and in iniquity did my mother conceive me.

May 21.—O Lord, I do indeed feel troubled about my not having been born a child of God. I cannot be. Yet must I suffer from the neglect of my parents, although to them a conscientious neglect. Disobedience to the Church.

The language and the subjects of these thoughts were very largely the result of his early training, for both his father and his mother were Dissenters of the fiercest and strictest order. But what are we to make of this genuine passion, this obsession, on the part of a boy of sixteen? There is something in him, something with a fierce life of its own, which, in its clamorous demand for satisfaction, will inhibit the indulgence of every other appetite. He was not attracted to games, he was cut off from the life of his schoolfellows; even his intellectual interests were twisted and contorted to the service of this devouring flame. He had a good brain, but he lacked the power of concentration.

His studies in various subjects, Latin, Greek, mathematics, were feeble and intermittent. But the "power of concentration"? All through his schooldays, and, later, his life at Cambridge, he was reading the Bible, studying theology, seeking out "eminent men" and asking, "Is the Holy Communion a sacrifice?" "What is the Rule of Faith? How am I to know what to believe?"

He compares the teachings of various Christian Churches; he reads ecclesiastical history, weighed down the whole time by the enormous gravity of the decision he must come to, knowing that he will "stake his eternal salvation on the correctness of the decision." He passes through a terrible period of scepticism. He rejects the teachings of his father's sect; it seems to him that his father picked and chose amongst the texts of the Bible. But this scepticism brings no feeling of freedom; rather he begins to play with thoughts of suicide. He must believe. But what is he to believe? That God has revealed His will to man he does not doubt; the question is, Which Church embodies that revelation? A very slight knowledge of religious psychology is sufficient to enable us to predict the next step. At this stage Hargrove desired, above all things, a cessation of conflict—he desired peace. And nowhere is the convert offered a more perfect and permanent absence of present and future spiritual conflict than in the Church of Rome. He becomes a Dominican monk.

This step has tragic consequences. For the proper appreciation of what followed it must be remembered that Hargrove was the child of his parents. Like him, they were profoundly religious; his alternatives were as real to them as to himself. The issue was regarded by all the family as one of eternal salvation or damnation. Hence the amazing correspondence between father and son. Their letters doubtless have their parallels, but not, alas, their counterparts. The distraught father, who was to make one desperate attempt at justification on the one side and the passionate horror on the other could not now, we are convinced, be called forth by anything whatever. For good or for ill, we have lost this moral fervour, this intensity of conviction. On receiving the news of his conversion to Rome, Hargrove's mother immediately travels from Dublin to intercede with her son. In their interviews she finds him pale, anguished, but immovable. She writes to her sisters:

I can't describe to you what followed, but he was all insensible to my agonised tears and entreaties. Yet he was not without emotion. Poor Josie [his brother] moved away, turning his back, for he was unable to stand the soul-barrowing scene. Then when I ceased to implore, Josie came up to his brother, and, with his eyes swollen with weeping, he said in a firm tone, "Charlie, will you be responsible to us for Papa's death?" The poor deceived one, with an assumed firmness, said, "I will." Oh, it was a moving scene. . . .

In his Dominican cell in Rome, Hargrove kept on his table, written out in large letters, the text, "If a man hate not his father and mother he cannot be My disciple." It was necessary, for his love of family was profound. The letters, both of father and son, are a bewildering combination of protestations of affection and theological argument. They wounded one another horribly, over the question of the doctrine of transsubstantiation. His mother's death was regarded by the whole family as largely due to Hargrove's perversion; he himself shared this belief. But he had, although at a terrible cost, obtained peace of mind. He was happy. He had no doubts, and day by day he felt that his life was being more and more identified with the will of God. He lived in a cosmos he thoroughly understood and which satisfied his deepest aspirations, bestowing a meaning and value upon every deed and thought, however trivial. Politics and the movements of nations, all outside events, he could well afford to ignore. They were details in a mighty scheme of which he knew the beginning and the end. His priestly training made him impervious to outward shocks. Philosophy and logic? He was learned in the "Summa" of St. Thomas Aquinas; he need fear no intellectual assaults. And, indeed, it was by his heart that he was ultimately betrayed. After ten years as a Dominican he suddenly leaves the Church. He gives his reason as follows:

A religion which teaches everlasting punishment is not of God. But the only religion which has any claim upon a reasonable man teaches this. Therefore there is no religion "of God"—i.e., supernaturally revealed.

He abandons, not only Rome, but Christianity. We do not know what the experience was which suddenly revealed to him the enormity of the doctrine of eternal punishment. He had always disliked the doctrine, but he had been able, in some queer way, either to ignore or accept it. But it was the rift within the lute. Other speculations had conspired to the same end. That there must have been a revealed religion became a little less apparent when he reflected on the millions in Asia who had been left for thousands of years without this blessing. The extraordinary naïveté of this reasoning is as strange to us as the intensity of his previous conviction. These adventures in thought remind one of a Cockney child's first glimpse of the sea. Hargrove was intelligent, well-
MY TRUE LOVE HATH MY HEART

A Man's Honour. By Violet M. Methley. (Hurst & Blackett. 7s. 6d. net.)

UNDERNEATH the price of this novel there is a blue hand sinister pointing to the words: "Read first turn-over of cover." We are obedient, and here is the cream: Valentina Carland, misunderstanding husband, follows him England, Ceylon. Native rising.; hunted like wild animals in tropical woods by native prince; end, happiness cost sister's life, heroic self-sacrifice. Fine story finely told, great ability, tense situations, thrilling, grim, interesting.

What is the misunderstanding between Valentina and Charles? In seeking for the answer we are confronted with a second by which all popular novelists are governed, and it is—whatever occurs in the end, the reader is left to decide what the final solution will be. It seems there is no other adventure in life but hunting the sweetest boy. Shall we be amazed then if one or the other of the captors, their first, the handle rattled, a voice heard without.—Love flies out of the window. It would seem there is no other adventure in life but hunting the sweetest boy. Shall we be amazed then if one or the other of the captors, their first fatigué over, tips toes to the window and softly opens it? Alas! we are so far from the world of fairy—to-day that the only satisfactory ending to our stories is—"they lived unhappily ever after." They never became King and Queen and lived in the castle beyond the blue mountains. Always, at the last moment, some happy accident awakened his suspicions or hers, and away flew love and the chase began all over again.

Who of us can believe that Valentina Carland, cutting roses in the old-world garden, singing "in a low, sweet voice," the old-world song, blushing and burying her face in the flower-filled basket, regardless of possible thorns in the old-world way, was only terrified by that sharp report like the crack of a whip shattering the peace of the afternoon? She never for a moment feared anything but the worst.

His heart in me keeps him and me in one, My heart in him his thoughts and senses guide. The words, she felt, described exactly what she and Charles were to each other, and then "bang," and she rushed into the parlour to find her husband and her sister struggling together for the possession of the newly-fired revolver. What had happened? Little shrill hysterical Letty cried that Charles had tried to kill himself. Is that true? He will not say "Yes," and he will not say "No." Then, of course, it is true.

"Don't you understand that I would rather have found you dead—yes, rather that!—than know you to be so utterly callous—utterly heartless, as you are!"

Any woman a shade less blissfully married might, at least, have asked her husband if he was unhappy or had lost his fortune, but there were too many roses in Valentina's garden, and so she flings the parlour window open and flies Love.

Charles's regiment is ordered to Ceylon. Before he leaves he feels it his duty—after all, he is her husband—to explain to Valentina that he was not trying to commit suicide; it was Letty. Oh, her burning scorn that he should try to shake considerable wife, and let her have his love? There is nothing to be done but to let him go to Ceylon without so much as "good-bye;" and when he is gone and Letty has explained that the story was the true one, to follow him there and ask his pardon. But by the time she arrives at Colombo, Charles has gone with an expedition to Kandy, and by the time she has followed him there he has met with a femme fatale, and as Valentina raises the curtain over the door of his room he stoops to kiss "the smiling provocative lips." As this were not enough, at this point the native prince enters upon the scene and begins his evil, unsleeping pursuit of her; and then, until the end of the book, we are in the thick of horrid native warfare, grim enough in all conscience, culminating in a hideous massacre and a blood-curdling description of death by the elephant. At the darkest hour the native prince demands that Valentia shall be given him and Charles set free as payment. But Letty goes instead, kills herself before the Old Spider has caught her, and before Charles, rushing into the Private Apartments, kills him.

And as, no doubt, always happens, with the dead still unburied, the "indescribable" horrors scarcely a day old, Valentia and Charles shut the door and shut the window again, and vow that they and Love shall dwell together until...

K. M.

SHAKESPEARE'S VERSIFICATION

A STUDY OF SHAKESPEARE'S VERSIFICATION. By M. A. Bayfield, (Cambridge, University Press. 16s. net.)

When the poet Flecknoe wrote such lines as

From's harnessing of's horses in the East
Unto's unharushing of them in the West, he was not, from the metrical point of view, doing anything new. He was simply continuing that fine old Procopius tradition of which Shakespeare, if we are to judge from his printed work, was one of the chief exponents. Flecknoe finds good precedent for every amputation:

By Heaven, I saw my handkerchief in's hand. ...
Roderigo meant t'have sent this damned villain ... Isn't lost, isn't gone? Speak, is it out o' the way? ... I say it is not lost!

Fetch't, let me see't. ...

And there are thousands more, elisions, contractions, clippings and telescoping of every kind, and all of them made, as in Flecknoe's verses, metri grauit, for the purpose of avoiding resolutions in the normal disyllabic foot.

Mr. Bayfield's purpose in the present volume is to show that Shakespeare was not responsible for the greater part of these contractions, that it was not he who wrote "o' th' best," "th' gods," "th' hot duke," "i' th' throat," "th' art," "y' are," "th' town is tame," "starke-nak'd," and all the other uncomfortable locutions with which the reader finds his plays beset. To whom, then, are they due? They are the work, according to Mr. Bayfield, partly of the scribes who made copies of the plays, and partly for their publication in quarto form, mostly to the editors of the First Folio, who prepared Shakespeare's text with a mistaken zeal for what they believed to be metrical regularity. Bad as the Quartos are in this respect, the Folio is a thousand times worse. For while the scribes contracted at hazard and through mere ignorance, just as they misdivided lines, wrote verse as prose, and prose as verse, the Folio editors worked with a set purpose and with the profound conviction that all lines ought to contain ten syllables. Armed with this idea they set to work, and wherever it was possible, by elision and contraction, to make what seemed an irregular line regular, they did their worst.

Mr. Bayfield supports this theory with a wealth of statistical evidence which makes it quite convincing:

We reach [he says] the broad conclusion that, whereas Shakespeare had an exception love for resolved rhythms, their number tended to diminish as the plays passed through the hands of the scribes, revisers and printers. We also note that the resolutions which have disappeared from the Folio are, except in the case of the "Merchant of Venice" and "Troilus and Cressida," more numerous—in the majority of cases far more numerous—than those which, retained in the Folio, are wanting in the corresponding Quarto. We need only register one obvious conclusion: namely, that, while the Quartos, in varying degree, were occasionally liable to disfigure the verse by an unwarranted abolition of resolutions, the Folio exhibits a set determination to reduce the verse as far as possible to the rhythm of the plain norm by this means. That is to say, it is continually endeavouring to give us the kind of verse which year by year Shakespeare himself was more and more bent upon abandoning.

If Mr. Bayfield is right (and it is difficult after reading his book to believe that he is not), the plays as Shakespeare wrote them will contain several thousand more "irregular" lines than they do at present. Throughout his whole career Shakespeare's tendency had been to break up the normal blank verse line of "Gorboduc" into a series of very varied shorter rhythmic periods. Foot resolution was a way of increasing the possible number of variations. We see him making use of resolution to obtain sudden changes of rhythm expressive of sudden changes of mood, as, for example, in these words of Prospero's:

It goes on, I see,
As my soul prompts it. Spirit, fine spirit! I'll free thee Within two days for this.

Mostly he employs it simply for the variation's sake and because new rhythms are interesting. Thus,

To threde the postern of a small needles eie:

(And the Folio omits "small," and so succeeds in making the line "regular");

By Heaven, I saw my handkerchief in his hand:

(And the Folio reads "handkerchief in's") and so on.

But resolutions of feet are, after all, comparatively infrequent, and Shakespeare obtains his effects of variety chiefly by divisions and changes of rhythm within the regular line of unresolved feet.

Eyes, look your last,
Arms, take your last embrace;
And, lips, O you the doors of breath,
Seal with a righteous kiss
A dateless bargain to engrossing death.
Come, bitter conduct,
Come, unsavoury guide,
Thou desperate pilot, now at once
Run on the dashed rocks thy sea-sick weary bark!

In this speech the blank verse is broken up into a comparatively regular lyric form. We are reminded of the tune-like regularity of this lyrical description of Paradise from Milton:

Not that fair field of Enna
Where Prosperin gathering flowers,
Herself a fairer flower,
By gloomy Dis was gathered—

Which cost Ceres all that pain to seek her through the earth.

In his later plays Shakespeare was to break away from such regular melodies. The lines of free verse into which the pentapodies are divided assume more subtle and various rhythms:

Cleopatra. In praising Antony I have displeased Caesar.
Charman. Many times, Madam.
Cleopatra. I am paid for it now.

Lead me from hence, I faint:
O Iros, Charrman!—
'Tis no matter.
Go to the fellow, good Alexas;
Bid him report the feature of Octavia,
Her years, her inclination;
Let him not leave out the colour of her hair;
Bring me word quickly,

Free verse within the five-foot line possesses this advantage over free verse in vacuo: that it has a tonic rhythm of rest to which it can return and refer itself. After a period of elaborate and subtle variation it can always close in the diapason of the Gorboducian decasyllable. The ear finds repose and refreshment; regularity prepares the way for irregularity and vice versa. But in free verse in which there is no tonic rhythm the ear is fatigued by trying to follow the incessantly changing rhythms; it has no repose, no standard to which to refer. In reading free verse the exhaustion point is very rapidly reached: hence its unsuitability for dealing with subjects of any magnitude.

A. L. H.
MARGINALIA

MY morning paper informs me that Mr. Albert de Courville is about to produce, or release, or present, or whatever it is that managers do, a new star, hitherto unobserved in our English heavens. Raquel Meller, for that is her name, hails from Spain, and Mr. de Courville tells us that he is paying her the highest salary he has ever paid to a foreign actress and that he considers her to be the most wonderful woman artiste of her time. Evidently, she has bowled him over, and the fact is not surprising; for Raquel Meller is something of a revelation. I saw her not long ago at a music hall in Paris. Her turn came near the end of the programme (and oh, what a long programme it was!). For hours, for years, it seemed, we had sat in a post-prandial apathy, illuminated by occasional flashes of disgust, listening wearily to songs alternately sentimental and grivois, deafened by shriil chatter, dazzled by incessant restless movement. Then, suddenly, in the midst of this senseless riot of vulgarity, Raquel Meller glided in like a swan. It was apocalyptic. Listening to her as she sang her two or three little songs—they were in Spanish and totally incomprehensible, but that made no difference at all—watching her as she moved with gestures gradual or abrupt, gestures of an incomparable dignity and tragic grace, I understood, as I had never done before, the whole beauty and solemn enchantment of the romantic. In the presence of Raquel Meller, "This," to oneself, "this is what life ought to be like—a series of intense and beautiful emotions, disembodied, as it were, from the material horrors of everyday existence." But most of us, alas! find, in actual fact, that life much more closely resembles those turns in the evening's performance that are not Raquel Meller's. Vulgarity, stupidity, triviality hugely predominate. The picturesqueness of violent contrast adds to her charm. She bowls us all over—you and me and Mr. de Courville—just because she is so deliciously remote from the roses in Picardy and the knockabout of our ordinary existence.

Raquel Meller explains for me and justifies many things in literature that had seemed fantastic and almost unintelligible. In her one can see that ideal of disembodied emotion which haunted the romantics. She is what Indiana would have been like, if that ludicrous heroine had not been a caricature. In the nobility, the passionate melancholy of her gestures and voice we recognize traits of Madame de Mortsauf and many others of her sisterhood from the Comédie Humaine. She bodied forth in her acting and makes real a whole host of lovely chimerical figures, inhabitants of that world of fiction where sorrow and pain are always ennobling, passion always divine—a world like the world of George Sand's dreams, in which the sufferings of "Elle et Lui" leave no scar and there are no Pagellos. She makes it clear what it was that De Musset meant when he said:

Les chants désespérés sont les chants les plus beaux, and what was the precise significance of the word "poésie" in such a sentence of Balzac's as the following:

Si le bonheur était à sa tête cette poésie que les peintres veulent absolument donner à leurs compositions en les faisant un peu trop pâles, la vague mélancolie physique dont sont atteintes les jeunes filles qui n'ont jamais quitté l'aile maternelle lui impriment alors une sorte d'idéal—a sentence which seems to imply that poetry and the ideal are inseparably associated with the green sickness.

Raquel Meller is one of those very few artists who succeed in making the romantic convincing. And how rare in every branch of the business they are, how few—writers, musicians, painters, actors—who know how to avoid that exaggeration which fatally transforms the romantic into the grotesque! Nothing is easier to see through than bad romantic art. It is amusing at the cinema to mark how unfailingly the children in the fourpenny places detect the slightest flaw in any would-be romantic drama. The hero exaggerates a tragic facial expression, the heroine makes a too violent gesture of passion or despair, and at once, automatically, as though a spring had been released, you hear the burst of shrill mockery from the front seats. Only the most consummate artist can allay that watchful mistrust of pretentiousness, can persuade us of the genuineness of spiritual experiences grander, more beautiful, intense and significant than those with which, in everyday life, we are familiar.

Like all good actors, Raquel Meller relies mostly on gesture. As all that she says and sings is in Spanish, her performance is, for most of us, virtually a dumb show. It is by miming that she makes her principal appeal. Excellence in miming is the supreme quality of good acting. Unless an actor can convey, by gesture and expression, as much as Charlie Chaplin is able to convey in, say, the restaurant scene of "The Immigrant," he is hardly worth going to see. I have good hopes that the cinema in general and Charlie Chaplin in particular, with the aid of the Russian ballet, may create a new school of Significant Gesture, which should do much to brighten up the modern stage. But, alas! this is something is certain to be disappointed; for, as Charlie Chaplin himself is reported to have said, when he heard that his wife refused to divorce him, "Such is life in the Great West."

Such is life in the Great West...
rejoice in the prose of Mrs. Gertie de S. Wentworth-James and her colleagues in the art.

The second complication of this apparently banal state of affairs lies in the fact that English publishers seem to connive at the consequent neglect of a great deal of the best work in contemporary English literature. A number of important books either never reach our shops at all or appear so belatedly that potential purchasers have long since forgotten them, in despair of ever finding them after prolonged and vain inquiries. Only those who are very keen—and patient—submit to the necessity of ordering a book they have not seen. The others, failing to discover what they are looking for, give up the quest, and hope that some day a borrowed copy may come their way. A surprising list might be compiled of these publications which, while being reviewed and discussed in England, remain invisible to Irish book-buyers. "The Economic Consequences of the Peace" had been reprinted before copies were shown in the Dublin bookshops. Mr. Wilfrid Blunt's second volume of Memoirs contains a quantity of matter of specifically Irish interest, but, so far, I have not seen a single copy for sale in this city, nor any review of it in the Irish press. "Eminent Victorians," too, I remember was exceedingly slow in reaching us. Mr. Max Beerbohm's Seven Men" was also suspiciously absent from shops well supplied with utterly commonplace fiction at the moment. Not one of the Cobden Society's publications is on sale in Dublin to my knowledge, and very few of Mr. Martin Secker's except the most obviously popular. Messrs. Chatto & Windus are also represented only by the least important of their new books. Most of the leading booksellers in the City have not produced Tchehov's Letters.

These names are mentioned at haphazard as they occur, and might be added to without difficulty. If it be said that the fault lies with the booksellers, I am prepared to agree to the most savage indictment of the eccentricities of these honourable but exasperating gentlemen. Certainly a publisher cannot easily impose his wares upon a recalcitrant vendor who naturally ignores or avoids every chance of learning anything concerning the literary side of his trade. But when this obstacle has been allowed for, as a factor not peculiar to Ireland, there remains another, by no means negligible. What we who are interested in the writing and publishing of books can never understand is the principle upon which review copies are distributed by English publishers in Ireland. There is only one newspaper which receives anything like a fair proportion of each season's publications, and that is the one leading paper which does not pay its reviewers, who are accordingly perfunctory and unequal. Journals which make a special feature of their literary articles get very few books, and are quite certain not even supplied with works which they specially request. If it be supposed that this is a question of circulation, I can answer that the newspaper which publishers delight to honour is not that which has the widest circulation. In any case it must be obvious that, where books are concerned, mere numbers should not be the gauge of the demand. As for such of our weekly reviews and magazines as appeal definitely to a reading public, they are enabled to discuss very few of the important current books, and their applications for review copies are frequently ignored. In short, the method, or lack of it, which English publishers follow in allotting books for review in Ireland is wasteful, and so far as it spares the few of us who are in a position to compensate for the same time, it impedes the spread and discussion of the best English literature in Ireland by withholding the books from those who can most usefully and competently review them.

On Wednesday, March 10, and the two following days, Messrs. Sotheby sold autograph letters and historical documents, the chief prices being: Mrs. Piozzi, Autograph manuscript of Thalaba, £200; Grace, W. Walpole, Copy of a letter to him from Lord Byron, July 15, 1788, £40; Correspondence of Lord Byron and the Archbishop of Canterbury asking for a special licence for his marriage, December 16, 1814, £78; Tennyson, Early drafts of portions of the Idylls of the King, £200; similar items of Merimee and Nerval's letters, £50; Miss Lady Hamilton, A long letter to the Rev. A. J. Scott, September 7, £95, £70. A large collection of material relating to Sir Henry Irving, £100. The total of the sale was £3,371.

Science

VITAMINES

PHYSIOLOGY AND NATIONAL NEEDS. Edited by W. D. Halliburton, F.R.S. (Constable. 8s. 6d. net.)

THE exigencies of the war, with the resulting shortage of essential commodities, focused the attention of physiologists on the problems connected with food, so that a great accession of knowledge was obtained in a short time. The problems were urgent—how urgent the public at large probably never realized—but the results arrived at accounted largely for the relative smallness of the degree of privation to which the people of this country were subjected. Some of the results have been summarized by various distinguished physiologists in this modest volume, and it is remarkable within how small a compass a competent writer can compress a great subject, so that it shall be easily assimilated by the general reader.

Most people will probably be chiefly interested by the much-talked-of subject of vitamins, the "unknown but essential accessory factors of diet," and it is well that clear ideas about these mystery-foods should be widely disseminated. It is the constitution of vitamins that is unknown; their properties, as the result of researches initiated by Professor Hopkins, are gradually becoming less obscure. They are "accessory factors" of diet in that they are not themselves a source of energy, but are, nevertheless, essential to the proper functioning of the vital processes. Amongst many other things, much light has been thrown on the origin of the diseases rickets, scurvy, beri-beri, and pellagra, which were hitherto imperfectly understood; "deficiency diseases" they are being called, the deficient factor that is implied by the name being one or other of the vitamins.

Up to the present time three different forms of vitamin have been distinguished, and these have been provisionally named, according to their properties, the fat-soluble, the water-soluble, and the antiscorbutic vitamins. Absence of the first of these has been shown to produce the condition known to medical science as rickets. This is characterized chiefly by pathological changes in the bony structure, which becomes in the growing animal soft and consequently deformed; it is an accompanying various condition of the teeth, and the whole development of the body and of the mind becomes affected. Absence of the second, the water-soluble, vitamin results in the condition known as beri-beri. In the young animal there is deficient growth; in adults "polyneuritis," or inflammation of the various nerves of the body, results, together with feeble action of the heart. A deficiency of the antiscorbutic vitamin produces, as its name implies, the disease known for long ages to seamen and explorers as "scurvy," the chief symptoms of which are sponginess of the gums, scattered hemorrhages under the skin, anemia, and general weakness. The disease is especially common in infants extenuating hemorrhages on the surface of the bones, sometimes with separation of their growing ends. Lastly, it is becoming evident that pellagra, a disease that results in skin eruptions and paralysis, is due to the absence of one or more vitamins, the nature of which has yet to be determined. Scurvy has long been known, and experience has shown that it only occurs in adults in the absence of fresh vegetables and fruit. The other diseases are more modern productions, the result of the extensive use of artificially prepared foods, in which the vitamins have been destroyed or rendered inactive. For all vitamins have two things in common: that they are destroyed by heat, and that they are present in the most perfect of all foods—fresh milk.

Of the three vitamins so far distinguished, the antiscorbutic factor is by far the most sensitive to heat;
it is destroyed even by the process of drying in the sun, so that dried fruits have no power against scurvy. The juice of lemons and oranges seems to contain more of the antiscorbutic factor than other vegetable substances, but even these are not necessarily active. When, during the last century, the juice of West Indian limes was substituted for that of the Mediterranean fruit, it was found that the former had no value as an antiscorbutic, though there was no other difference that could be detected.

The fat-soluble and water-soluble vitamines are more resistant, and can withstand even boiling if it be not too prolonged. In consequence of this, steamed vegetables and some of the dried milk products still contain half their amount of these vitamines. The infants of well-to-do parents, fed on expensive artificial foods, will not get rickets like the children of the poor, but are, nevertheless, not immune from infantile scurvy, unless fresh lemon or orange juice be added to their diet. The presence of the vitamines in milk renders butter another important article of diet. Margarine, when prepared from vegetable oils, still contained some vitamines, but during the later stages of the war it was prepared largely from whale-oil, which was so crude that it had to be subjected to a long process of refining at a high temperature, and, in consequence, lost all its vitamines. For the same reason lard, which is prepared by prolonged boiling, contains no vitamines.

The chief source of the fat-soluble and water-soluble vitamines is, besides milk and eggs, green vegetables. It is a humiliating thought that all the vitamines, upon which babies are so dependent, are second-hand. Some are contained in fresh meat, but even these, as well as those in milk, are ultimately derived from green vegetables eaten by the animal. An infant fed only at the breast will suffer from a deficiency of vitamines if the mother be not taking enough in her food. It is small comfort to learn that much vitamine is contained in the juice of swedes—small comfort, at any rate, to the appetite—though the fact may be of service to communities at war and to the manufacturers of whale-oil margarine. The water-soluble vitamine is, further, present in the outer layers of various grains, so that communities subsisting on polished rice, from which the outer layer has been removed, suffer from beri-beri; the same food, if eaten in the whole condition, would, no doubt, be brought about if we were to live exclusively on bread. Though in present circumstances enough vitamines are obtained from other sources to render the "wholesale" controversy of small importance.

All these results—some of them already known by experience, and therefore to empirical medicine—have been established by scientific experiment. Such an experiment, on an immense scale, is being conducted at the present time in parts of Central Europe, notably in Vienna, where rickets, scurvy, and pellagra are decimating the population. It is to be feared that supplies of tinned milk will not go far towards fighting the diseases of these unfortunate populations, who need the saving grace of vitamines, and might do better on bottles of the juice of turnip-tops.

Another interesting chapter in the history of food is to be found in "grain conservation," which is, in other words, knowledge how to preserve grain from deterioration during long periods of storage. Deep prejudices existed among those responsible for storing grain that the phenomena known as "heating" and "weevilimg" were due to causes which were apparently not subject to the ordinary principles of physiology. A large number of experiments were carried out to prove what was already known, namely, that animals, including the larvae of moths and beetles, cannot live in an atmosphere deprived of oxygen. It should hardly have been necessary to spend several months in experiments to prove that a caterpillar has to breathe, but the hard heads of "the trade" and their Governments required no less. It was, perhaps, not so obvious that a grain of corn, too, has to breathe in order to grow, and that heating, which results from the germination of grain in storage, can be prevented by the absence of oxygen, irrespective of the conditions of warmth and moisture, which were formerly supposed to govern the process. Truly the scientist has but to shunt his merest platitudes to earn the rewards vouchsafed to wisdom.

K.

SOCIETIES

ROYAL.—March 11.—Sir J. R. Thomson, President, in the chair.

The following papers were read: "The Pressure upon the Poles of Metallic Arcs, including Alloys and Composite Arcs," by W. G. Duffield, T. H. Burnham and A. A. Davis, supplementing a previous comunicación (Phil. Trans., 1921, 8, 1919).—Further Experiments on the Variation of Wave-Length of the Oscillations generated by an Ionic Valve due to Changes in Filament Current," by J. H. Vincent.—"The Theory of the Katharometer," by H. A. Daynes, with a historical introductory note by Dr. G. A. Shakespear, giving a description of the katharometer, and an account of its development by him for hydrogen purity measurements and similar work connected with lighter-than-air craft.—Mr. H. A. Daynes also contributed a second paper, "The Process of Diffusion through a Rubber Membrane."

ROYAL METEOROLOGICAL.—March 17.—Mr. R. H. Hooker, President, in the chair.

Captain C. N. Douglas read a paper on "Clouds as soon from an Aeroplane," and a large number of photographs of clouds taken from an aeroplane were shown on the screen, nearly all of which were taken by the lecturer while flying in co-operation with the Meteorological Section of the Royal Aeronautical Society in the summer of 1919. Advantage was taken of the opportunity to study cloud structure and its relation to the upper-air temperature and humidity, and to the general meteorological conditions. The observations were made at Berek, on the French coast, north of Bouligne, which lies close to the most important aeronautic routes. A number of the photographs showed thunder-clouds. Thunderstorms are caused by powerful ascending currents, and the tops of the clouds grow up to a great height, frequently exceeding 30,000 feet. It is almost impossible for an aeroplane to climb above them, but it is nearly always possible to dodge them. Sometimes the tops of the thunder-clouds stand out boldly from the lower clouds, and the pilot of an aeroplane who climbs up to about 8,000 feet, and flies above the lower clouds, can see the thunder-clouds a long way off and fly round them.

SOCIETY OF ANTIQUARIES.—March 4.—Sir Hercules Read, President, in the chair.

March 11.—Mr. Horace Sandars, V.P., in the chair.

Bishop Browne exhibited, on behalf of Major R. E. Stuart, a bamboo staff of dignity of the seventeenth century. The staff, which probably had its origin in the West Indies, is made of four joints of bamboo of unequal length, fastened together by pieces of metal ferrules: its total length is 4 ft. 4 in. On it are incised 75 oval medallions, containing figures of saints and scenes from Biblical history, each medallion having an appropriate Latin inscription in capital letters. No object of a similar character has so far been discovered.

Mr. H. G. W. d'Almaine communicated a paper on a stone circle known as the "Devil's Ninepins" at Ipsden, Oxford. The object of the communication was to put on record the fact that the circle was built in 1827, extracts from the diaries of the builder, a Mr. Read, being quoted in proof of this fact.

Mr. H. Clifford-Smith exhibited a gold ring of the Anglo-Saxon period, found at Meaux, Hertfordshire. He also exhibited a large collection of turned wooden bowls, wassail bowls, standing cups, mortars, trenchers and other objects of the seventeenth century and later.

FORTHCOMING MEETINGS

Mon. 29. Royal Institute of British Architects, 8.—"Higher Buildings for London," Mr. Belissa Joseph.

Royal Geographical, 8.30.—"Manchester, the Gateway to Arabia," Commander D. C. Hughart.

Tues. 30. Royal Sanitary Institute, 6.30.—Discussion on "The Duties of Sanitary Inspectors in relation to the Housing Acts."
Fine Arts

RENAISSANCE MEDALS

The Rhind Lectures delivered by Mr. Hill in Edinburgh in 1915 form the substance of this important work, and these lectures have been revised for the press in the light of recent research in this country and on the Continent. This is the first time that the history of the medallic art of the Renaissance has been discussed in a single volume and vivid impression is given of the rise and decay of the art from its introduction at Ferrara towards the middle of the fifteenth century by an artist—Pisanello—who at once reached a greater success than was ever attained by his successors. From Ferrara the influence spread over Italy until there were a dozen schools, each with its own distinctive style, and within a hundred years decay had set in, although here and there were artists whose work may be compared with that of the earlier masters. In Germany, some years later than in Italy, a school of medal workers, highly organized by the guilds, sprang up, which was independent of the southern countries; but after a short period, distinguished by few really great works but by great technical excellence, the art became lifeless and commonplace. In the Low Countries the medal was largely influenced by Italy at the outset of its career at the end of the fifteenth century, and it was not until well on in the next century that the former country developed a style of its own. During the early period in France the medal was largely the result of official commissions; in the sixteenth century Italian artists visited the country and the native school came under their sway completely. England and Scotland had no school of medalists of their own, and most of the work was done by Italians and by artists working in the Netherlands. In Spain, too, the medal was mostly the work of Italian artists.

In a work of this kind the author traces the development of the medal from the coin, "which was its chief if not its only begetter." Other arts, such as gem-engraving and goldsmiths' work, have supplied workers, but it is mainly when a sculptor or a painter has turned his attention to the craft that a really great medal has resulted. Broadly speaking, the sculptor favoured the production of medals by casting from models executed in wax or other materials; the gem-engraver and the goldsmith, production by means of striking from dies. From the technical simplicity of the former process a work of greater breadth and freedom is to be expected, and from the latter a work in which the first impression given is one of wonder at the skill with which it has been made. During the fifteenth century in Italy— the period in which most of the best work was done—medals were mostly cast; possibly the question of expense did not enter into the question. But towards the end of the century one or two artists began to experiment in the striking of medals from cut dies, although coins had been struck since classical times. Later, the great artificer Benvenuto Cellini was moved, whether by his restless inventive spirit or the demand for a cheaper form of production, to lessen the labour by the use of steel punches which were cut in relief instead of in intaglio, each with a part of the medal—the portrait head, the lettering and other details. These punches were then beaten into the softened steel die. To save labour still further, he also greatly improved the screw or mill which in time superseded the old method of striking with a sledge-hammer.

I advise every artist [says Cellini in his Treatise] to note well the method of striking [with the screw], for, though it be more expensive, the impressions are better and the dies not so soon worn out. Of this and other silver medals struck without softening them first, and as for the cost, perhaps after all it only appears greater, for whereas in the method of striking with the screw it takes a dozen years to finish one medal, in the method of striking with the cono process [i.e., by means of the sledge-hammer] at least one hundred blows with the stamps are necessary before you get the desired result.

Here, perhaps, Cellini unconsciously gives a clue to the general decay of the craft in the second half of the sixteenth century, when the desire to produce more medals with less labour introduced a commercial spirit which was antithetic to the conception of the art. In Germany the medals were smaller as a rule than those of Italy. The models (a great many of which still exist) were mostly cut in boxwood, pearwood or honestone, and the casting reached such great perfection, that in some cases it is difficult to decide whether a medal has been cast or struck.

The historical sketch begins, as might be expected, with Italy, the birthplace of the art, and one half of the book is devoted to the work of artists of that school. It was there that idealism in the portrait was most fully developed, in contrast with the realism—often coarse—apparently appreciated in Germany. The reverses consisted usually of a personal device or impress, and heraldry was much more a favourite subject in the other countries.

Personal ugliness, which the Italian artist understood how to dignify and inspire with pathos or interest, is allowed by the German to work with unmitigated force; grossness and stupidity are revealed with a directness which shows that the medalists regarded them without aversion. The element of imagination does not enter into the construction of the medal in Germany. What had the plain, matter-of-fact German burgher of Nuremberg or Augsburg to do with such frivolities as impresses?

Influenced, no doubt, by the Roman medallions which were constantly being dug up on Italian soil, Pisanello may be considered as the originator of the modern portrait-medal, and from 1438, when he made the medal of the Emperor Paleologus, until the middle of the century a celebrated series of medals was wrought. Among these German medals may perhaps be mentioned that of Lux Meringer by Christoph Woditz, of which the original boxwood model is in the Salting Bequest at South Kensington. Flanders produced but one important work, the medal of Erasmus of 1519, possibly the work of Quintin Metyss. In France the medal of Margaret of Austria and her husband Philibert the Fair, made by Jean Mardenne in 1502, with its two portraits behind a wattle fence against a charming background of Savoy knots and marguerites, is of peculiar fascination. These are but four medals chosen from among the many described and illustrated in this altogether admirable book—a book which will be the standard work on the subject for many years. If a criticism must be made, it is that it seems a pity that on only a third of the thirty odd plates of medals is any record of their dimensions given.

R. P. B.

The little Shakespeare volume found in a loft at Longner Hall, Shrewsbury, the property of Mr. R. F. Burton, which was to have been offered at Sotheby's on March 23 after the Yates Thompson MS. was purchased, has been sold by Messrs. Quaritch. It was described at some length in our "Bibliographical Notes" of the 5th inst. A somewhat similar volume realized £15,100 at the Britwell sale last year.
Exhibitions of the Week

Chenil Galleries.—Etchings of Battlefield and other Scenes by Ian Strang.

Paterson & Carran.—Paintings by A. Neville Lewis.

Little Art Rooms.—Drawings by Joseph Southall.

It is not easy for a young artist to reconcile the claims of art and craft. If he has a strong creative impulse he is apt to feel impatient of craft and to neglect it; if, on the other hand, he is a little vague as to the precise point of his mission as an artist—in a state of mind uncommon among young artists—he will probably succumb to the temptation to specialize in a medium. He will realize that if he concentrates his attention on a special method of painting—in spots, say, or cubes or dashes—or evolves a characteristic manipulation of water colours, if he confines himself to etching or lithography or painting on silk, he is making things easier not only for himself, but also for the critics, dealers and dilettanti; and being after all but human, he often chooses the easier way. As a result our exhibitions are overcrowded with clever work which has no artistic significance and work which, though not uninteresting, must be accepted because of its value as an object of curiosity. The exhibition is, however, successful if circles of success. The exhibition consists entirely of etchings, but it is evident that Mr. Strang is something more than a specialist in this field; we feel that he has given himself up to pictorial composition and that his selection of etching as his medium is only incidental. His earliest etchings (1909-12) show a decided impatience with craft; they are executed in dry point and the subjects are architectural. Mr. Strang bullied the plates into rendering dramatic effects of light and shade, but he was able to bully the dry-point burr into rendering the clear crisp lines suitable to the subjects. By 1916 he began apparently to see this himself, and the plates produced in that year are better in the orthodox manner; "Burgos Cathedral" and "Segovia," which belong to this period, are characterized by the same rather obvious and theatrical light effects as the earlier plates, but they show a decided advance in craftsmanship. The next year saw a return to dry point for the romantic landscape "Puente del Agua, Granada," and the interruption of the artist's work by the war. He was in khaki from the autumn of 1914 till the spring of last year, when he set to again and produced "Eglise St. Vaast, Armentieres," "Lille," "Avignon," "Pont St. Benezet," "Avignon, Palace of the Popes," "Avignon," and the charming "Provengal Landscape," which are all pure etchings and technically very accomplished. There is, moreover, in these new plates—which mark the limit of his achievement up to date—an increased feeling for traditional style and more subtle observa- tion than before. The exhibition is a creditable record of steady progress which we hope Mr. Strang will be able to maintain.

Mr. A. Neville Lewis is another young artist of promise. He is influenced by contemporary Continental methods, and affects that translation of colour into an arbitrary scale of preserved-fruit tints which was the outstanding feature of oil paintings by the Jugend artists Pfitz and Minzer in the last years before the war, and which also appears in much of the work of Mr. Duncan Grant. This translation seems to us as dangerous for a beginner as quite conventional "pretty" colouring. For the same reason, namely, that it lures the artist from the essential preoccupation with form. Both Mr. Grant and Mr. Lewis are most successful when they throw the translation overboard and adopt more severe colouring. Certainly the best pieces in this exhibition are the "Nigger Boy," "Woman with a Veil, Provence," and "Olive Trees in the Rain," which conveyed a succession of expressions expressed without resort to the affected colour-scale. There is no translated colour or affectation in Mr. Reginald Smith's aquarelle landscapes; indeed, their principal merit is a colour reticence which conveys a remarkable effect of light and air. Mr. Smith's vision is not very personal or very interesting, but his hand is skilled and his work is negligible.

The same — the water-colours with the heavy and lifeless oil paintings of the Hon. Walter J. James, which hang in the adjacent room.

Mr. Joseph Southall has a reputation as a decorator in tempera, and he has remained faithful to the aims and ideals prevalent in the art world of this country some thirty years ago. There is, at any rate, no evidence in this collection of small works that he has seen fit to respond to more modern influences. We must not look to an artist of this school for any great virility or enterprise, but we seek and find a certain delicacy and charm, and, in the portraits and studies, an echo of the art of Burne-Jones.

R. H. W.

A New Quarterly

Eclecticism is the keynote of the policy adopted by the editors of The Apple, the new quarterly published by the Colour Company (33, Victoria Street, S.W.1, 6s. net), and they have been true to their programme in the first number, which contains such diverse features as poems by Laurence Housman, articles by W. L. George, T. Sturge Moore, James Clifford and Ezra Pound; and reproductions of drawings, etchings, lithographs and so on, by Charles Shearman, J. McKnight Kaulfer, Frank Brangwyn, E. Blampied and Edward Wadsworth. This editorial catholicity is designed, presumably, to please a wide circle of readers. The editors doubtless hope that the philistines may be induced to swallow the bitter pill of good art if it comes to them well coated in mediocrity, and that the critical will pardon the sugar for the sake of the stimulating drug. Events may prove them right.

Victoria and Albert Museum

We have received the "Review of the Principal Acquisitions to the Victoria and Albert Museum during 1916," publication of which was delayed until the termination of the war. The public has always reason to be grateful to the generosity of collectors and amateurs who enrich our national collections by gifts, and we owe a particular debt to those who continued their practice during the war years, when public funds were not available for the purchase of objects d'art. One of the most important gifts in 1916 was the transference by the Architectural Association of the greater part of their collection of architectural sculpture from Tufton Street, Westminster, to the Museum. Building sculptors will doubtless take advantage of the opportunities now afforded for studying the golden age of English sculpture, and it is to be hoped that they will realize the advantage of acquiring a real sculptural outlook, which is essential if the art is not to remain side-tracked in the field of modelling. The Department of Woodwork received a number of noteworthy examples of English inlay work, including several beautiful chairs, the seventeenth-century table, decorated with geometrical marquetry and fitted with a panel enclosing a backgammon board (which now stands in the Lincoln's Inn room), the Boughton House and David Garrick beds, and the seventeenth-century English green lacquer cabinet. The Departments of Ceramics, Textiles, Metal-work, and the Library all received additions to their examples of Oriental art—the Alexander and Eumorfopoulos collections of Japanese sword furniture and the extremely interesting Van Diemen lacquer box being especially welcome. The catalogue, which is well illustrated, also gives an account of the objects loaned during the year in question.

Engravings and Drawings

On Wednesday, February 25, and the following day, Messrs. Sotherby were selling engravings and drawings, the chief lots being: C. Keating, after C. Morland, The Deserter, set of four, £74. W. Ward, after the same, Fruits of Industry, and Effects of Extrava- gance, a pair, printed in colours, £175; the same, after H. Single- ton, Industry and Extravagance, a pair, printed in colours, £160; the same, after Morland, The Hard Bargain, in colours, £150; The Last Litter, £119. After M. Kauffer, Christ on the Cross, a unique German woodcut, from the Huth collection, £73. J. Dean, after Hopper, Caroline of Lichfield, £290. C. H. Hodges, after Rembrandt, The Shipbuilder and his Wife, £74. J. Lover, Adam and Eve, £130. A collection of 72 drawings in water-colour and two engravings by Rowlandson and Bunbury, £410.
Music

"A VILLAGE ROMEO AND JULIET"

In almost all cases the greatest operas have been those founded on stories which the audience might reasonably be expected to know beforehand. The tale of Orpheus is the best opera plot that was ever set to music. The old-fashioned composers drew largely on classical mythology and ancient history; and though classical mythology and ancient history went out of fashion after the eighteenth century, the nineteenth-century composers did not forget the advantages of a familiar framework. Their operas may seem strange to modern audiences, because modern audiences have forgotten the novels and tales that were popular a hundred years ago. And so "La Dame aux Camélias" and "The Bride of Lammermoor" are forgotten, while "La Traviata" and "Lucia" are still performed and make the unhistorically-minded listener wonder why the musician chose such curious and complicated plots upon which to weave his music. In the present state of civilization it may indeed be doubted whether even the story of Orpheus would be really familiar to a modern audience. At the same time the composer who makes an opera out of the best seller of the moment stands little chance of being understood by a later generation.

Mr. Delius' opera "A Village Romeo and Juliet," which was revived at Covent Garden last week, is also based on a familiar story. But the familiar story on which it is based is not Shakespeare's tragedy, and the story is not familiar to English readers. The origin of his opera is Gottfried Keller's short story "Romeo und Julia auf dem Dorfe," which is generally recognized as one of the best short stories in the German language. Keller's story assumes in the reader a certain familiarity with Shakespeare; but the point of the story lies not in the similarity but in the difference with which he has treated the same essential idea. Mr. Delius in putting together his book seems to have assumed that his audience would remember every detail of Keller's story, and since his first audience for the opera was a Berlin audience, he may possibly have been right. Certainly it was quite clear that the director of the Komische Oper who staged the work in Berlin in February, 1907, knew the original a good deal more intimately than the producer who was responsible for it at Covent Garden. Still, it cannot have made much difference to the Covent Garden audience whether the producer understood the story or not. To an English audience the opera was intelligible only by reference to Shakespeare, not to Gottfried Keller. And if it is ever referred to Shakespeare for explanation, the plot amounts to no more than what perhaps most people would regard as a sufficient summary of the famous tragedy. Two lovers are kept apart by the mutual hostility of their respective parents. They contrive to meet, but, being unable to get married, commit suicide. This is all that one needs to know about Shakespeare's play; the rest is just poetry. So it is enough to explain Mr. Delius' opera too; the rest is just music. People come on to the stage and sing: one seldom hears any words, but the music is always charming. Then they go off again and the scene changes.

Gottfried Keller's story is a work of finely sustained beauty. It is both passionate and exquisitely reticent, with a wonderfully picturesque sense of atmosphere and environment. Mr. Delius is of all living composers the man most gifted with the power to write music that is beautiful, passionate, reticent and picturesque. It is in fact only his marvellous genius that saves "A Village Romeo and Juliet" from being a thoroughly bad opera.

It is a wise thing in constructing an opera to get rid of all superfluous detail. Puccini's librettist, Illica, so far from eliminating superfluities, makes a point of shovelling them in as thickly as possible to hide the fact that there is no reality behind them. Mr. Delius has turned his tale so drastically that there is hardly anything left of the story beyond a series of love duets. A reference to the libretto, and still more a careful comparison of the libretto with the original story, will help to explain a few situations, but in performance it is scarcely possible to get any coherent impression at all of the motives which direct the actions of the characters. Although the work was performed in Germany long before it was given in England, the English words appear to be the original ones. But they are seldom set with any dramatic significance. The music fits the German almost equally well, or equally badly. It is only too evident that the composer's main interest lies in the orchestra. Only one of the characters stands out with any distinctness of personality, and that is the Black Fiddler. In the present version of the opera the part of the Black Fiddler has been cut down. It would have been much better to elaborate his part and make him dominate the opera still more. But his first appearance required a good deal of complicated explanation, and complicated explanation is not Mr. Delius' strong point. The Black Fiddler was the rightful heir to a certain piece of waste land; but as he was unable to prove his right the land was gradually filched by Manz and Marti, the parents of the two lovers. In the course of some ten years they had acquired the whole of it and were quarrelling over their unauthorized gains. All this Mr. Delius attempts to compress into a prologue which takes little more than ten minutes. When the real opera begins and Miss Amy Sissors has grown up into Mr. Walter Hyde, the parents disappear altogether, except for a momentary entrance of Vrenchen's father who is knocked on the head by her ignignant lover. The Black Fiddler, who might have held the whole opera together, is forgotten until the last scene of all. We are shown the lovers making love in a cornfield, dreaming of their future marriage, amusing themselves at a village fair, avoiding bad company and finally committing suicide. They sit or walk about on the stage and sing, while a few other people pass across and do nothing very intelligible. By the end of the opera it seems as if the scenery had been the principal thing. The strongest impression was the impression at Berlin in 1907. Mr. Allinson's very ingenious and charming designs certainly contributed to create the same impression at Covent Garden.

"A Village Romeo and Juliet" ought to be a thoroughly bad opera. It is badly constructed, its characters ill-defined, its treatment of the voices often uninteresting and inexpressive. Yet it undoubtedly succeeds in being a work of extraordinary beauty. Nothing happens on the stage, but that does not matter. The composer is concerned only with the inner feelings of his characters and of himself as the spectator of them. They do not express themselves; they are too vaporous and unreal for that. Indeed the whole opera seems to take place in a sort of dream. That being so, the treatment of the prologue is perhaps justified, though it is difficult to justify the ludicrous appearance of the two children. But Mr. Delius is always apt to be embarrassed when he deals with concrete realities. He does not really set the opera going until the scene inside the cottage. If only he could have kept the vocal writing up to the expressive level of Salvi's first monologue!

The opera was in many respects well performed, but no intelligence had been applied to helping out its weak places. The singers waved their arms in the conventional operatic fashion. There was no attempt to realize that an opera of this type is a thing quite apart from the ordinary rut and demands an individual style of production. Mr. Percy Heming had a vivid conception of the Black Fiddler's part; the rest just sang their stuff in the usual way. Mr. Allinson's scenery was planned with an idea behind it; but what is the good of intelligent scenery when neither costumes, attitudes nor movements are designed to form a conscious and deliberate foreground to it? It may be practicable to chuck the "Bohemian Girl" on to the stage anyhow; but "A Village Romeo and Juliet" requires more than that. It is far from being a perfect opera, and it is perhaps hardly likely ever to become a popular favourite; but it is certainly one of the most beautiful and moving works that have been put upon the stage in recent times.

EDWARD J. DENT.

CONCERTS

There have been many singers who have attained distinction in spite of voices that were lacking in strength or even in agreeable quality, by virtue of their individuality and temperament or intelligence. Miss Doris Godson, who gave a recital on March 18, has a small voice, but sings with quite a pleasant quality of tone. At present she does not show either intelligence or even temperament in any marked degree. Her pronunciation of Italian is far from perfect, her English lacking in distinction. Her choice of songs was hardly fortunate; few of them were interesting, and a singer with a small voice would do well to avoid songs with showy accompaniments. In her English group the best poetry seemed to produce the worst music; her highest standard was represented by Landon Ronald.

Miss Gwen Francgan-Davies showed at her recital on March 19 what temperament and intelligence in a high degree can do for a voice of little power. If she could acquire a more even and steady style of singing, and more precision and clearness both in phrasing and diction, she might become a notable singer. Shewas at her best in some Irish folk-songs arranged by Herbert Hughes, and in Hampshire folk-songs arranged by Gustav Holst. One of the Irish songs, "She moved through the air," a melody of singular beauty, exquisitely set, was sung with admirable grace of expression. A German group concluded the programme, and if anyone required persuasion to listen to German songs, none could be more persuasive than those of that most loveable of German composers, Robert Franz. Except for the fact that Parcell was presented in a startlingly over-edited form, the programme was carefully and attractively arranged. Mr. George Reeve was, as always, the most delicate and sympathetic of accompanists.

DEBUSSY'S "Bercuse Héroïque," played for the first time at the Queen's Hall concert on Saturday afternoon, is a little piece composed for "King Albert's Book" in 1915, introducing matches of the "Brabançon" and "Marseillaise." It was appropriate enough in its original surroundings, but was not worth reviving at the present time. Its interest is purely occasional and its artistic value negligible. A symphony by Sibelius was curiously awkward and unmusical in style, but might perhaps improve on further acquaintance. Madame Calvé sang "Voi che sapete" in a somewhat sophisticated style. Her performance of the "Habanera" from "Carmen" was a characteristic piece of acting: her companion of Sir Henry Wood's as a substitut for Den José seemed to afford considerable amusement to the orchestra.

The revival of interest in Spain and Spanish things is shown by the announcement of two long-vacation courses, one in Cambridge and the other in Madrid. The former will be held from July 29 to August 18, in the form of University extension lectures. The latter will consist of two vacation courses organized by the Centro de Estudios historicos under the direction of the celebrated philologist D. Rizón Menénzéz Pidal. The courses will be identical: the first will be held from July 10 till August 21, the second from July 24 till September 4. The lectures are intended primarily for teachers of Spanish, but will be a most valuable and interesting experience for anyone who has a working knowledge of the language. Further information may be obtained from the "Junta para Ampliación de Estudios," Moreto 1, Madrid, or through The Athenæum.

THEATRE

Drama

THE CURTAIN GROUP

LYRIC THEATRE, HAMMERSMITH.—Three One-Act Plays.

The production of three one-act plays under the auspices of the Curtain Group at the Lyric Theatre, Hammersmith, on Sunday, March 14, raised the whole question as to the value of such a movement. It was fortunate, therefore, that during one of the intervals an outline was given of the immediate intentions of the People's Theatre Society, into which the Curtain Group is to be merged forthwith. Among the plays announced for early production were Mr. Shaw's "Heartbreak House" and Mr. D. H. Lawrence's "The Widowing of Mrs. Holroyd." Had it been otherwise there would be little inducement, on the afternoon's showing, for those to step forward who are anxious to support any organization which has come into existence on behalf of the non-commercial or anti-commercial theatre.

Certainly none of the items in a rather drawn-out programme gave specific justification for the setting-up of the elaborate machinery which the organizations require. "Kind Heart and Coronet," by James Sterndale, was a delightfully neat and good-humoured domestic sketch, centring in a voluntarily poor young marquis who falls in love with his landlady's daughter; and we imagine that any music-hall manager with a passable knowledge of his business would be glad to get hold of it. "The Return to Nature," by Kenneth Hare, possessed the one merit that it was an attempt at imaginative writing. Its concern was with a society lady and a satyr: the psychology was false, the idiom too obviously artificial, and the wit dim in comparison with that of certain predecessors in its genre. And Mr. Galsworthy's contribution, with which the afternoon concluded, hardly possessed the aesthetic warranty which is surely to be the single test even for the drama of "ideas." So long as they remain ideas such drama is bound to fail at the test, and not even the high quality of Miss Cathleen Nesbitt's tragic acting in the part of a stranded German girl could convince us that "Defeat" was anything more than Mr. Galsworthy's pathetic acknowledgment that blood will out and breed will tell in the crucial moment, despite all previous avowals of emancipation from the common prejudices, particularly, as in the present instance, the prejudice of patriotism.

Apart from Miss Nesbitt's achievement in what was practically an emotional monologue, or might as easily have been, the afternoon's acting was undistinguished. In Mr. Sterndale's play Miss Athene Seyler and Mr. Nicholas Hannen were very much at ease in some homely repartee. It is through the necessity of keeping in mind that in all such activities we expect and look forward to something different from the productions and the acting of the commercial stage, that these severities of criticism are provoked. And if the People's Theatre Society keeps it in mind also, its development will be entitled to every encouragement.

T. M.

THE CULINARY VEIN

STRAND THEATRE.—"Come out of the Kitchen." By A. E. Thomas.

It is something to find a play which deals with the Southern section of the United States of America, and which does not mention the Mint Julep; apart from this striking omission "Come out of the Kitchen" contains little or nothing remarkable. The ethics are those wherewith Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch and the works of Mrs. Kate Douglas Wiggin have long since familiarized vast tracts of the public mind; the devotees of "Peg o’ my Heart" will find another appeal to their affections. The aesthetic appeal is that of blanc-mange, and makes an almost equal demand on the intelligence.

Careful to avoid offending and to extirpate faction, the author has steered midway between Bourbon and Bevo. Sherry is, I cannot say drunk, but sipped during the dinner scene, and is not "in that quantity" an intoxicant. Lord Richard was perhaps more discreet; our transpontine cousins are proverbially "whole-hoggers," and the millionaire in this case does not stop at the "Pantry," he, boldly, yet diffidently, approaches the very center of the domestic comforts; his attorney has his cheek smudged, the "Agent" loses a handkerchief in his zeal for ice-cream-freezing, and so forth.

The Middle Ages gave us Cophetua, strong meat for a barbarous era; the modern world, as mirrored in current theatricals, would never endure a real beggar-maid; the cake must be both had and eaten, the cloud must be lined with silver, gold, or an aristocratic pedigree.

The spectator would be, perhaps, comforted, or at least some spectators would be comforted, if the whole company would decide before curtain-raising whether they are going to play farce or realism. M. Hamley-Clifford is, I think, the most praiseworthy actress in the cast; in the first act she makes the comic sister at least plausible. Mr. Denton, on the other hand, when the rest of the actors have for some time been trying to behave like real people, sails rather close to excess.

We presume it is harder to write straight comedy like Wilde or like Maltby than to write these meringues à la crème, these stories of jokes and horror, neither of the first water, with the "poetic passage" (love of nature) thrown in. Mr. Worlock scores his best point with "In the kitchen! Huck." (Act III.) The whole affair is mild, it is not too great a bore; in fact, it is hardly a bore at all, it is just after-dinner amusement of the "normal" variety. It is quite as good as "Peg o’ my Heart." It is not so funny as "Potash and Perlmutter." It is not so idiotic as "Daddies." But in the looseness and vagueness of critical language we have as yet no precise terms for these nuances and gradations.

THE INDEPENDENT THEATRE

LYRIC, HAMMERSMITH.—Three One-Act Pieces.

The Lyric Opera-house has provided itself with a decorative curtain, and, on occasion, provides a good orchestra. On the 21st inst. the Independent Theatre, following the precedent of the Curtain Group on the 14th, reversed the order of its performance "as announced," apparently on the theory that even the selected and experimental audience cannot possibly know its own mind and must have its entertainment administered to it. Miss Ginner’s mime play exposed a small but heavy corps de ballet, wherein Miss Fancheux danced with considerable technique and no temperament. Hard upon this came two of Lord Dunsany’s lyric burglars. Purple patches were then declared in hoarse voice, leading, I think, to a slightly less satisfactory enunciation of Ben King’s bottomless lines:

Nowhere to stand, but on,
Nowhere to jump but off.

Which is what one expects from Lord Dunsany.

Mr. Shaw’s "Dark Lady" was wily acted; it contains all Mr. Shaw’s faults with an added horror when he tries to be poetic. The difference between Wilde’s wit and Mr. Shaw’s is that one can read a Wilde play the day before seeing it, and performance does not suffer thereby; but having read the "Dark Lady" years ago, one cannot now enjoy it, or at least one could not enjoy this defective exploitation of it, with its flourishes, ranting and preaching, with one or two jokes towards the latter end, chiefly in The Cloaked Man’s battery of Elizabeth. Analysis yields one joke of Mr. Shaw’s own, repeated continually throughout the skit, and one joke borrowed from The Sentimental Journey, applied three or four times. This is hard monotonous stuff for forty-five minutes’ audition; it should at least be reinforced by some activity of the players, not necessarily the waving of arms.

Again, we are troubled with the indecision of author and player, and wish either Mr. Shaw or the performers could make up their mind whether or not the murder of Mary, Queen of Scots, is or was a joke or not, and which manner of treating and acting it is to be used for a given performance. Perhaps the unities do arise from the grave and demand that Elizabeth should be, in the impersonation, either a tragic and comic Elizabeth or simply a stuff-shirt of Elizabeth for the duration of the act, rather than a confusion and alternation of both.

T. J. V.

Correspondence

NOVELISTS AND A NATIONAL PRESS

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sir,—The article on "The Economics of It" in The Athenæum for March 12 raises some very important questions. The position of the purely literary man is undoubtedly desperate. To put any trust at all in the Civil List is obviously hopeless: we have seen too much of the way in which the compilers of that List fling pecuniary insults—and light ones, at that—to men of ability who, refusing to prostitute their talents, have fallen into "necessary circumstances," and award to widows of world-renowned writers or scientists sums barely sufficient to pay their laundry bills. Some other remedy must be found, and that remedy must strike at the root of the evil by encouraging the public to see, read and appreciate good work.

The problem, as stated, falls into two parts—critical and original work. Taking the latter first: how is the conscientious novelist to be given a fair chance? The majority of publishers are willing and anxious to produce work of really good quality, but they are not in the position to practise pure philanthropy for the benefit of the conscientious novelist and his limited public. Most of them do take risks—which from a strictly business point of view are undue, and are occasionally rewarded by making a smaller loss than might be expected, or even a profit. But would it not be possible to establish something in the nature of a National Press? The analogy that I have in mind is the constant demand for a National Theatre—the condition of the drama being in many ways similar, as there is the same rooted belief that there is no sufficient demand for really good work in the theatrical as in the literary world, though the success of such plays as "Abraham Lincoln" tends to show that there is a growing public for such work. This National Press, which might possibly be controlled by the Royal Society of Literature or the Authors’ Society, should be founded with the object of publishing only works of real merit apart from all considerations of profit. As to the endowment of such a Press: let some of those devotees of Literature who are willing to pay sums running into four figures for the sake of locking up in their safes a unique specimen of a bad printed edition of some Elizabethan poet forgo the pleasure of exciting the envy of their neighbours, and devote the money thus saved to giving to the world literature of far greater value. Subscriptions of smaller sums might be encouraged by entitling one giver or two to the proportion of all the works published during the year. A very substantial sum would certainly be required for the start of such a Press, as, if it is to fulfil one of its avowed purposes—the provision of a living wage for the conscientious novelist—royalties must be on a lavish scale as the payments to composers. But all the books produced will not make a loss; there is no essential reason why conscientious work should necessarily be dull; there have been instances of really good work being
THE VENGEANCE OF THE PARODIST

LA VENGANZA DE DON MENDO. By Pedro Muñoz Seca. (Madrid, Ed. Hispania. 3.50 ptas.)

THE Madrileños, like the Viennese, are not so overawed by their native language that they are unable to parody it. Vienna has produced at least one extremely clever skit on "Tannhäuser," the most Teutonic of all operas; Madrid has lately been regaled by a kind of grotesque synthesis of conventional tragedy in "La Venganza de Don Mendo."

Parodies in foreign literature are always worth studying; and often they help one to understand points which would otherwise be difficult to grasp. Parody is by no means a new art in Spain, and Mr. Muñoz Seca is perhaps not yet a master parodist. But he can be very entertaining; and he is, of course, an accomplished playwright.

It is impossible to listen to "Don Mendo" for many minutes or to read many pages of it without realizing in between one's chuckles that it is a parody of the romantic manner rather than one of a tragedy of the "Golden Age" of Lope de Vega or Calderón. It recalls Echegaray's "Esposa del Vengador," Grau's "Conde Alarcon," Gutiérrez "Trovador" (on which the libretto of the opera was founded), or the conventional, romantic way of doing Calderón's "Alcalde de Zalamea"; but most of all it reminds one of the Don Juan play which nearly every theatre in Madrid performs on All Saints' Day and the following week: the "Don Juan Tenorio" of Zorrilla.

Perhaps it was the effect of seeing "Tenorio" and "Don Mendo" within a few days of each other; but it seemed that in many ways "Don Mendo" was more directly a parody of Zorrilla's drama than of anything else. In any case, Sr. Muñoz Seca has got the Zorrilla manner so thoroughly into his head that he writes naturally in that style; and he chooses unerringly those forms of expression and those forms of verse which the romantic poets would have used in the circumstances. His play is perfectly organic and perfectly logical; but it makes most perfect nonsense. His characters rant and rave just as they do in Spanish romantic plays; they complain, and strike attitudes which are only a little more absurd than they often are in serious drama; they pour out floods of rhetoric about honor and Castilla. It takes sharp eyes and sharper ears to unravel some of the tenses of irregular verbs which for metrical reasons are made more irregular than they ever were before; and one has to keep one's wits about for words used in a sense which they are hardly ever made to bear and which confuse a Spanish audience with laughter. I feel that I shall never in future see a tragic king or men in armour, a prison scene or stage corpses, without thinking of "Don Mendo."

The only thing in which the play might have been improved is its form. Four acts of uniloquial parody are rather a large order; it might have been more interesting if it had been a play within a play, like the "Critic" or the "Rehearsal." And an estreno, the first night of a new play, is such an event in Madrid—some people never go to the theatre at all unless it is an estreno—that it might have been possible to bring a few types of a first-night audience on to the stage at the beginning and the end, to round off "Don Mendo" and give it a setting. It would be such a success that one wonders that it has not been tried already. Perhaps it has.

J. B. T.
THE SEX OBSESSION.

Les Cœurs Malades. Par Eugène Montfort. (Paris, E. Flammarion. 5fr. 75.)

It is not easy to diagnose the psychological effects of the war upon the survivors of the generation that fought it. The traces of the ordeal are not continuously apparent. They lie beneath the surface, and we can but glimpse them at intervals, when a chance phrase or gesture reveals a deep bitterness, or a senseless crime betrays the disorder of a maddened brain. The glimpses are so rare that we are often tempted to suppose the men of to-day, who were boys in 1914, to be curiously unaffected by the intervening years. But a book like "Les Cœurs Malades" helps us to understand what has really happened.

It is clearly the work of a young man obsessed by sex; and there is something in the completeness of the author's abandon to the obsession which proclaims the date of the book. Even without the positive knowledge that "Les Cœurs Malades" is, in fact, a reprint, we should be convinced from the first hundred pages that it was written before the war. For we feel at once that M. Montfort's attitude to sex in this novel is different from the attitude of the men who have returned from the war.

The war-scarred young men of to-day are as susceptible, of course, to sentimental torture as they were six years ago. They are as liable to be attacked by the specific neurosis set up by the sex obsession as the characters in "Les Cœurs Malades". But they are not, we believe, so liable to be destroyed by it. For they have lost the habit of prolonged introspection: they can no longer concentrate their interest on their personal suffering. The memory of the vast group-agony is still upon them; the horror of accumulated material and physical distress still colours their vision. Their experience has taught them the power of the larger life which surrounds their personal lives, and they are conscious of the chains which bind them to surrounding organizations. Before the war a young man in love could think away the world. His life—he imagined—was his own to surrender to Love or Fame or Gold as he chose. Now he knows that a world jealous of youth and love and leisure holds a mortgage on his life and will not hesitate to foreclose. And the knowledge manifests itself in his attitudes towards sex.

There is hardness in this attitude, and suspicion; not the timorous hardness and calculating suspicion of the man of the world, but something which is nevertheless defensive—a cloak, as it were, enveloping limbs which have suffered from pitiless cold. The young men who have come back remember that there were some women who failed to stand beside them in the war. They think of the women who envisaged the war as a prize-fight in which they had but to applaud their champion and bathe his wounds in the intervals, of those who saw nothing in their champion's despairing heroism but a thrilling theatrical gesture and those who were not ashamed to exploit the slavery of boys as an opportunity for increasing their own freedom.

As a result of this attitude the survivors of the war have lost many things that matter—faith, naïveté, and a certain careless gaiety. They have also lost the faculty of writing such a book as "Les Cœurs Malades." But this is of smaller moment. For the pre-war roman passionné fell between art and pathology. It was not sufficiently filtered to rank as art or sufficiently undisturbed to serve as pathological evidence. We had always before our eyes the distressing picture of an author in the throes of the sex obsession. To-day we are pleased to fancy that the boys who became men in the war will not succumb to this obsession. Let us hope that our fancy has at least a foundation in fact.

CONTEMPORARY DANISH FICTION

Modern Danish literature displays two main tendencies. There is the literature of aesthetic refinement and moral decay, whose model is art for art's sake, and whose chief exponent is the group of teachers at Copenhagen. And there is the newer and healthier influence, hailing mainly from Jutland, which believes with Aristotle that art is the cleansing of the soul, and which teaches the value of the will and the necessity of energy combined with self-control; for example, Jacob Knudsen, John W. Jensen and Jeppe Aakjær are beginning to feel themselves so contradiicted to the Copenhagen circle. The first of these tendencies denies, the second affirms the importance of life, and it is the second tendency that is now gaining the upper hand. Both schools know their business as writers, for our literature has by now obtained complete control of art and is already able to call in the quota of musicians who are perfect masters of their various instruments, though they have, it is true, no conductor.

The following brief article will deal only with novelists; the other main branch of activity, lyric poetry, will not be touched.

Henrik Pontoppidan (born 1857; Nobel prize 1917) is the classic exponent of Danish neo-realism. He aims at a picture of Denmark as it actually is, and has achieved the exposure of the realism that professed itself realistic. In his three long novels ("Det forjettede Land," "Lykke Per" and "De dødes Rige"—the titles are to be taken ironically) he gives a cross-section of the Danish life in the twenty years of the nineteenth century, and a criticism of it that interprets rather than destroys. "Det forjettede Land" (translated into English as "The Promised Land") contrasts country and town, "Lykke Per" contrasts Jutlanders and Jews (the latter exemplified by Georg Brandes and his radicalism), and "De dødes Rige" describes the various literary circles of the nineties. Pontoppidan is a powerful narrator, cool and clear, and his profound love of truth sharpens his eye against all the forgeries and falsifications of life that may be introduced by the veil of an empty phrase or the vagueness of enthusiasm. Thus his works constantly unveil the Danish national character and criticize its weak points. His two early novels ("Landsbybilleder" and "Fra Hytherne") bring us to the department of social literature.

Social literature may be grouped under the different classes of society of which it treats. Peasants are vividly depicted by Johan Skjoldborg (born 1861) and Jeppe Aakjær (born 1886), both writers of peasant stock. Their literary impulses come from this sympathy with the social classes and their indignation against the upper, and also from their strong sense of justice. Martin Andersen Nexø (born 1869), who began as a shoemaker and a mason's apprentice, has given us in "Pelle Erobreren" (1906-10), translated as "Pelle the Conqueror," a many-sided picture of the lower classes. With the birth of a new age, and the decline of the old order, a new city, Copenhagen, with its degenerate and half-baked inhabitants, or introduces us into the early trade unions and shows us strikes and lock-outs in their beginnings. His unfinished "Dittes Menneskebarn" gives us the female counterpart of "Pelle." From the purely artistic standpoint he is the greatest of the social writers. Their practical influence has been important, but they often fail artistically because the propagandist in them overpowers the poet, and the descriptive element in them is generally more valuable than psychological. Mrs. Marie Bregendahl (born 1897) and Thorkild Gravlund (born 1879) may also be mentioned as prominent novelists of this class; they write about peasants with much psychological power, and their keen minds and tender hearts turn the searchlight of truth upon their subject-matter.

Jacob Knudsen (born 1858, died 1919) also writes about peasants, but rather about their mentality than about their social conditions, nor is his sympathy untempered by criticism. He is in every way our greatest author, for every word he writes is an expression of his manly and powerful individuality. To quote Hamlet, "He was a man, take him for all in all"; moreover he stood in a heartfelt and sincere relation to Christianity. Like Shakespeare, he asserts that the will is the central force of human life, and he exerts constant self-training and self-control. When he writes: "The disease of the will should be called wickedness, and those who suffer from it ought to be punished rather than physicked; one does not pity but despises and hates them”—it sounds like an echo of Shakespeare’s “When we are sick in fortune—often the surfeit of our own behaviour—we make guilty of our disasters the sun, the moon and the stars....” He is hard, he does not shrink from an operation when more demands it. Like Shakespeare’s York he lives his life “This tested’ d, jocund, cut off, the rest rest sound,” and the beautiful words of Hamlet strike the deepest chord in his strong and well-tempered soul: “Give me that man That is not passionate, and I will weep him In my heart’s core—ay, in my heart of hearts.” His subject-matter is always a spiritual conflict; man is his main race; and his characters are and scorns all shams, and his two books on Luther lead us through Luther’s religious crises and are full of power and interest. His works are solid fuel; they make people think, and their vital and compelling force may restore the impaired will to live.

Another serious and purposeful writer is Harold Kiddie (born 1878, died 1918), whose early death was a great loss to Danish literature. His books are not easy reading, but their solidify is due to much thought and feeling, and the effort to express spiritual qualities. Through his races of every type. His characters cannot forget. This is their strength and their weakness. Kiddie indicates a new positive ideal far beyond the reach of any fin de siecle literature. In his memorable “Aage og Else” a fine and over-sensitive man is unable to live his life because he is bound to the ideal whom he can never understand; his life is to ride to the last day. Life on the Helhest (the horse that presages death in our fairy tales). In Kiddie’s most beautiful novel, “Helten” (“The Hero”), we meet an old lonely teacher on a small island, whose long life has been one unbroken act of piety and one long sermon to the glory of God. Every human life is spun out of two threads a black and a white. Through life and life shines the love of his youth. Six hundred years after the great Florentine, another poet glorifies a new Beatrice and sings of her power to open the door of happiness to the outcast. It is the maldy of our century to see a goal in transitory things and to pursue them in the vain hope of happiness. Kiddie’s cure for this malady is to create a home out of the island on whose shores God has placed us, and to fulfill the duty of loving our neighbour according to God’s eternal law. Views such as these are not popular; but though some thoughts are to the Jews a stumbling-block and to the Greeks foolishness, they are nevertheless necessary if men want to live and to be saved. To evolve the best volume of his last book, “Jernet” (there will never be a second volume), Kiddie buried himself for six years in the depths of the lonely forests of Värmland, in Sweden, where he collected his vast material; he then spent a year in a wood in Denmark, forming the new material to shape. The very day his book appeared he fell ill and died in a week, at the age of forty and at the height of his power.

Johannes V. Jensen (born 1879) is certainly the most able of living Danish authors. He is indolent, undisciplined; there is something tumultuous about him; when he passes he whirled up the dust and attracts the public’s attention; like Hilde in “The Master-Guild” he seems to say, “I am youthful, I want to see the life of man, to tell the true tale of the age raged violently in his mind. In “Einar Elgu” (1878) the self-dissection of the eights culminates and leads through self-adoration of the Nietzsche type to insanity as its final consequence. “Den gotiske Renaissance” (1901) finds a man only for sickness by rejecting isolated impressions, and the worship of the past. Its lesson is that we live not by turning backwards and inwards, but by evolving forwards and outwards; in other words we must act and not dream. Jensen’s books after 1900 celebrate the culture of the actual, the victories of technical science and the beauty of fitness to an end, all of which are symbolized in the modern machine. He is intoxicated by the restlessness and the vibration of modern civilization and by the life of the metropolis; he respects, in the man, the heart of prey: for example, his American novels “Hjulet” and “Mad d’Ora.” In a long series of novels that is still unfinished he follows the history of the Gothic race from the glacial period onwards. The experiment is interesting, partly as evidence of the writer’s imagination, and particularly for the magnificent images of typical spaces. He points out the race of that are introduced; there is, however, a tendency to repetition. His style may be in bad taste and grotesque; but it is usually ingenious and stimulating. It is founded upon his intense perception and his luxuriant association of ideas. Whereas the realists usually stop at the caste and the class, he strives to penetrate into the deeper more primitive ones. His insight embraces the consciousness of the civilized man and the primitive simplicity of a Singapore coolie. He loves situations where primitive impulses spring forth spontaneously. He is our greatest colourist and narrator, though when he yields to the temptation to philosophize on the doctrine of evolution he becomes childish, for his specific equipment is of the slightest. As a rule he scorns “literature,” though he accepts with reservations Kipling, Walt Whitman and Jack London as his forerunners. His tempestuousness, his fire and his colour carry his readers away and should spread his influence widely. He has already a small flock of admiring imitators in Denmark, among our young lyricists, whose poetry takes the form of hymns to the machine.

But with lyric poetry we reach the other branch of our modern literary activity, and there is not here space to deal with it.

Ingeborg Simesen.

LITERATURE WITHOUT A SUBJECT

Les Animaux et leurs Hommes. Par Paul Eluard. Avec cinq dessins d’André Lhote. (Paris, Au Sans Pareil. 3fr. net.)—M. Eluard throws down the gauntlet of a new literary theory:

Connaissons ce dont nous sommes capables. La beauté et la laideur sont nos parisis, pas autres. Nous sommes toujours autrement soucits de la puissance ou de la grâce, de la douceur ou de la brutalité, de la simplicité ou du nombre. La vanité qui pousse l’homme à déclarercelui beau ou laid, à prendre parti, est à la base de l’erreur naïfée, de plusieurs époques littéraires, de leur exaltation sentimentale et du désordre qui en résulte. Essayons, c’est difficile, de rester absolument purs.

This is all a little mysterious, and it is not very easy to see where the conscientious practice of this theory would logically lead one. All we know is that it leads M. Eluard to write a poem about a hen which runs:

Hëlas, ma seur, bête bête, Ce n’est pas à cause de ton chant, De ton chant pour l’œuf Que l’homme te croit bonne.

If this is the result of remaining “absolutely pur,” we prefer our native impurity: it is more amusing. However, M. Eluard has done better than this: here and there he finds a delightful image such as “Le poisson avance comme un doug dans un gant”; or “La tête grosse et immobile Comme un can, Le poire travaille.” But it is all imponderably slight. M. Eluard seems to feel that distrust of the subject in literature so common among the younger Frenchmen. Philosophy, nature, love, psychology—these things are too stale, or too heavy, or too uncertain to be written about. And so nothing remains but to spin a tedious literature out of passing sensations and images, out of little jokes and casual queer ideas. The literature made out of these things grows so thin that finally it disappears altogether. M. Lhote’s pen-and-ink drawings are pleasant, though, like a good nice of his work, a little heavy and dubious. We welcome the enterprise of French authors and publishers in securing good artists to illustrate their books. A volume like Salmon’s “Manuscrit trouvé dans un Chapeau,” illustrated by Picasso, is something very well worth having. We should like to see in this country any signs of a similar ardour for good book-illustration.

Owing to the Easter Holidays THE ATHENÆUM will be published next week a day earlier.
List of New Books
Prepared in cooperation with the Library Association.

The method of classification adopted is a series of groups roughly corresponding with the Dewey Decimal System, the sub-classes being indicated, for the benefit of librarians and others familiar with the system, by the class-numbers given at the end of each entry. The first numeral in these represents the main class, the second the subdivision, and so on.

Those works in the List which appear most suitable for purchase by Public Library Authorities are marked with an asterisk.

200 RELIGION.

Cave (Sydney). REDemption, HINDU and CHRISTIAN ("The Religious Quest of India"), Milford, 1919. 9 in. 275 pp. bibliog. index, 10/6 n. 294. See review, p. 412.

Gillies (J. R.), THE MINISTRY OF RECONCILIATION. Black, 1919. 8 in. 276 pp. index, 5/ n. 202. The substance of this volume was delivered by Dr. Gillies in 1915, in the form of addresses at the invitation of the authorities of the College of the Presbyterian Assembly in Belfast. The book is an able presentment of the scope and opportunities of the Christian ministry: and it is hoped that it may afford an opportune contribution to the study of some of the problems with which the Churches are now confronted.

Principal Greasted's book, which is the outcome of a series of lectures to theological students, is amply provided with illustrative quotations and with footnotes giving the Greek or Latin text. There are numerous references to authorities, one of the chief being Dr. R. C. Moberly. "Few recent writings," declares the author, "are at once so sane and so constructive [as Dr. Moberly's], and, despite much misunderstanding, it is in such attempts that the hope of the future lies." *

See review, p. 412.

Rihbany (Abraham Mitrie), THE SYRIAN CHRIST. Melrose, 1919. 8 in. 309 pp. index, 7/6 n. 232

The author of this pleasing and informative book, which is planned on something of the lines of a Syrian member of the Greek Orthodox Church, whose intimate knowledge of his countrymen's life and mentality enables him to throw fresh light upon some "hard sayings" in the Bible. The command "Love your enemies" is explained as meaning no more than "like," or "be well-disposed toward," those who are foes. The chapters grouped under the heading "Sisters of Martha and Mary" form a luminous exposition of the difference between the Oriental and Occidental views of woman; and St. Paul's attitude towards women is discussed at length. Oriental carelessness about truth is stated to be due to intellectual inaccuracy rather than to moral delinquency.

300 SOCIOLOGY.

Attlee (C. R.), THE SOCIAL WORKER. Bell, 1920. 7 in. 294 pp., 6/ n. 307

This is the first of a series of works to be issued by the University of London Ratan Tata Department of Social Service and Administration, the later ones to deal in detail with the various sections of social work. Mr. Attlee gives a general sketch of the work, the opportunities for social service, and the personal qualifications necessary, and points out that the social conscience is much more sensitive to-day, and that the demand is rather for a new attitude towards social problems than for specific reforms.

The Dream City. By Unitas. Simpkin & Marshall [1920]. 7 in. 121 pp. ill. 2/ n. 320.1

In the form of a story, "Unitas" depicts a Utopian State which the record was found in an old book picked up in the trenches. The stately architecture, the wide, open planning of the chief city, the ideal organization of the society, and the moneyless economics are effectively contrasted with the dingy, sordid, and unhealthy conditions to which our soldiers have returned from the war.

Gardner (Lucy), ed. SOME CHRISTIAN ESSENTIALS OF RECONSTRUCTION: essays by various writers. Edited by Lucy Gardner for the Interdenominational Conference of the Social Service Union. Bell, 1920. 7 in. 244 pp., 5/ n. 304

These essays were originally intended for a small audience, but the editor is right in thinking them sufficiently valuable to bear publication. Each essay deals with some aspect of the present social problems and is worth reading, not so much as a guide to practical matters as for its temperate and Christian spirit.

500 NATURAL SCIENCE.

*Keane (A. H.), MAN, PAST AND PRESENT. Revised, and largely re-written, by A. Hindston Quiggin and A. C. Haddon. Cambridge, Univ. Press, 1920. 10 in. 593 pp. 16 pl. appl. index, 36/ n. 572

See review, p. 410.

Rees (Alfred W.), THE HERON OF CASTLE CREEK; and other sketches of bird life. With a memoir by J. K. Hudson. Murray, 1920. 8 in. 232 pp. por. index, 7/6 n. 598.2

Most of these delightful studies of bird life, bird-watching, and the American life are included in the Standard or other periodicals, and are now published in book-form without the late author's revision. His descriptions of the habits, plumage, nests, etc., prove that Mr. Rees spent many hours (often in awkward situations) patiently observing.

690 USEFUL ARTS.

*Cambridge (P. J.), DIABETIC DIETING AND COOKERY. University of London Press and Hodder & Stoughton, 1920. 9 in. 230 pp. appl. index, 10/6 n. 616.63

An able summary of recent knowledge and modern views concerning this important subject. Appended to the main text are food tables "in ounces and average servings," and a very useful series of 189 practical cookery recipes.

*Halliburton (W. D.), PHYSIOLOGY AND NATIONAL NEEDS. Constable, 1919. 9 in. 176 pp. index, 8/6 n. 613.2

See review, p. 418.

Rew (Sir Robert Henry), FOOD SUPPLIES IN PEACE AND WAR. Longmans, 1920. 7 in. 191 pp. index, boards, 6/6 n. 613.2

This book is not very big, but it is full of information and of sagacious comments on the facts set out for the reader's benefit. A notable point, as Mr. Rew describes the war as "the watershed of the world's economic history," is that "there are many possible breadstuff, but no substitute for fat." "It has hitherto been assumed," says Sir R. H. Rew, "that if supplies of wheat could be assured, all would be well, but the experience of Germany has shown that a deficiency of milk and fat will lower the vitality and weaken the morale of a nation scarcely less effectively than a shortage of bread." Sir Henry is of opinion that Germany in the later years of the war endured privation, "but to a greater extent than some of the nations who were the victims of her crimes." The author considers that British farmers during the war acted patriotically as a general rule.

*Shanahan (E. W.), ANIMAL FOODSTUFFS; their PRODUCTION AND CONSUMPTION, with a special reference to the British Empire: a study in economic geography and agricultural economics. Routledge, 1920. 8 in. 333 pp. bibliog. index, 10/6 n. 613.28

Dr. Shanahan's investigations, conducted between September, 1915, and September, 1918, at the London School of Economics and elsewhere, have led him to the somewhat grave conclusion that, apart from the influence of the war, the world's supplies of meat, and of dairy and poultry produce, at present tend to be deficient, and are still more likely to be so in the near future. Various aspects of the problem of the consumption of these foodstuffs, and the economic relations between production and consumption, are discussed by the author, who shows how the existing deficiency within the British Empire may partly be overcome.

Clear reproductions of photographs of the castle of Loches; of the town of Avignon and the palace of the Popes; of several other great churches; and of the house of Jacques Cœur at Bourges, are among the illustrations in this useful guide. The French descriptive text is supplemented by an English translation on the lower half of each page. Parts 2-4 will deal with France of the Renaissance, and with "classic" and "modern" France.

Victoria and Albert Museum. Review of the Principal Acquisitions during the Year 1916. Stationery Office, 1919. 10 in. 107 pp. il. paper, 3/6 n. 708.2

See notice, p. 421.

800 LITERATURE.

Davis (Allan) and Stratton (Anna R.). The Inward Light: a drama in four acts. New York, Knopf, 1919. 8 in. 135 pp., $1.35. 812.5

The American Civil War brought upon the Friends profound searching of conscience, and in numerous cases a serious clash between ideals and worldly prosperity. Such a conflict is the theme of this play, the scene of which is laid in Pennsylvania. The authors' hero is a Quaker manufacturer, David Worthington, who sacrifices happiness and fortune rather than swerve from his convictions. There are some powerful situations, and the drama ends upon an exalted note.

Eliard (Paul). Les Animaux et leurs Hommes; avec cinq dessins d'André Lhote. Paris, Au Sans Pareil, 1920. 7½ in. 46 pp. paper, 3fr. n. 844.9

See notice, p. 427.

Nathan (George Jean) and Mencken (H. L.). The American Credo: a contribution toward the interpretation of the national mind. New York, Knopf, 1920. 7½ in. 191 pp., $1.60. 818.5

In a preface extending to two-thirds of the whole book the editors explain that their compilation is not "a somewhat laboured attempt at jocosity," and that it aims at clarifying the subject of American ideals and the American character, "so copious, so cosmic, and withal so ill-informed and incomprehensible." They show the thoughts that lie at the back of those ideals and that character. It is a delightful collection of popular fallacies, of such sorts as these—"That a person who follows up a cucumber-salad with a dish of ice-cream will inevitably be the victim of cholera morbus;" "That a Sunday School superintendent is always carrying on an intrigue with one of the girls in the choir;" "That if one doesn't scratch a mosquito-bite it will stop itching;" "That Bob Ingersoll is in hell.

The "'Ion,' "'Lysis,' "'Protagoras,' "'Phèdre,'"" and "'Symposium,' rendered into limp and elegant French. Analytical descriptions and footnotes assist the reader.

Seca (Pedro Muñoz). La Venganza de Don Mendo. Madrid, Ed. Hispam, 1919. paper, 3.50 pts. 862.6

See review, p. 425.

Soulages (Gabriel), tr. Les Plus Jolies Roses de l'Anthologie Grecque: cueillies par Gabriel Soulages. Paris, Crès, 1919. 7½ in. 221 pp. paper, 5fr. 884

Melville (Herman). Aschajleeves, Erastosthenis ("Scholasticus"). Possidius are among the numerous writers from whose works M. Soulages has culled the amorous, subtle, and often delicately beautiful "roses of Athens" assembled in this book. He has contented himself with literal versions in French prose.

Williamson (Claude C. H.). Writers of Three Centuries, 1789-1914. Grant Richards, 1920. 8 in. 515 pp., 7/6 n. 804 Formal criticism—or even original criticism—is disclaimed as the object of these essays, which are intended to help readers "to set right certain reputations" which are in danger of losing their proper proportions. Blake, Shelley, Balzac, Heine, Newman, Tennyson, Ruskin, Flaubert, Samuel Butler, Zola, H. van Even (Oscar Wilde), Bernard Shaw, Conrad, D'Annunzio, H. W. Wells, Belloc, Chesterton, Masefield, and Rupert Brooke are apparently those who stand most in such jeopardy. Mr. Williamson's summaries are on the whole safe, but they are not very deep or very clearly put. It is strange that a critic of literature is so hazy about the modern theatre, though he has written in it, and that he calls it "a florid" art. Our vocabulary is not enriched by such words as "furtherest" and "undergoings"; and a "weapon" he uses for specific purposes to make his message palatable to mankind" is an odd metaphor for technique, described in the same sentence as a cloak which an artist puts "(sic). And what is meant by "the ingenious sockets" "made by Mr. Shaw" in which to launch his ideas"?

POETRY.

Acharya (Sri Ananda). Snow Birds. Macmillan, 1919. 8 in. 260 pp., 7/6 n. 821.9

Frose-poems or rhapsodies in free verse—whichever you like to call them—on Nature, Indian mythology, sentimental or ideal themes, in a style analogous to that of Sir Rabindranath Tagore.

Bowman (Archibald Allan). Sonnets from a Prison Camp. Lane, 1919. 7½ in. 152 pp., 5/n. 821.9

The brave of squeezing a description of the turbulent happenings of war into the narrow mould of the sonnet is almost impossible. It is not, therefore, surprising that Mr. Bowman's opening sonnets, describing the retreat of March, 1918, should be unsatisfactory. Later in the book, when he begins to write of those reflective themes to which the sonnet form is suited, Mr. Bowman reveals himself as an interesting and talented writer. From his remote Westphalian camp he writes:

Then as the white and sheeted vapour steals
Over the flats lagoon-like, comes a breath
Of anguish from the void, where still is hurled Nation on nation; and the spirit feels
A tidal presence of overwhelming death.
Stir through this weird backwater of the world.

These are beautiful lines, and it would be possible to quote many more as remarkable. Mr. Bowman's chief defect is a certain stiffness and over-nobility of language, which sometimes leads him by prosaic or trivial things with a pomp which does not become them.

Euripides. Choruses from the "Iphigenia in Aulis" and the "Hippolytus" of Euripides. Translated by H. D. ("Poets' Translation Series" : second set, 3).

The "Egoist," 1919. 7½ in. 37 pp. boards, 2/6 n. 882.3

H. D.'s translations, embellished by no unnecessary arabesques of rhyme or diction, are often of great beauty. There is something very satisfying in the bareness of such lines as these:

If a god should stand here
He could not speak.

At the sight of ships
Circled with ships.

This beauty is too much
For any woman. It is burnt across my eyes.

Fairfax (Griffith). Menopotamia: sonnets and lyrics at home and abroad, 1914-1919. Murray, 1919. 7½ in. 80 pp., 3/6 n. 821.9

Captain Fairfax is an accomplished writer of sonnets. He possesses taste, literary tact and discrimination, and a command of poetic language. A sonneteer with these qualities can always produce work that shall be readable and distinguished. There exists, unhappily, an enormous number of readable and distinguished English sonnets; but the sonnets which are genuine poetry are few. The more elaborate and difficult the form, the more it will attract the skilled and uninspired artisan of verse; for his mastery of the technical difficulties will do much to cover his lack of inspiration. Captain Fairfax often comes near to good poetry, but he never quite attains to it. That mysterious power which can turn an exercise in ingenious rhyming into such thing of beauty as Wordsworth's "Westminster Bridge" is missing.

Inspired partly by "Sir" Gilbert Murray, this methodical inquiry into the influence of Vergil on English poetry from the earliest days has been carried out with indefatigable Colmanian thoroughness. The editor even discusses somewhat timidly whether such influence can be traced in "Boeowulf," as Professor Fr. Klaeber, of the University of Minnesota, contends. It is a pity she does not use the time-honoured English spelling of the name, though she quotes Chaucer's "Vergil," Aucun's "Virgilius," and Kings Alfred's "Virgilius." The form "Vergil" is neither Latin nor English, but a nondescript pedantry.

The sixth number of this annual gives examples of thirty-three poets—carefully worded and highly polished occasional verses most of them, few showing power or originality, those few, if any, including A. G. Strong's "Euna-Mena-Mina-Mo" and J. B. S. Haldane's "Complaint of the Blasphemous Bombers at Beilt Aëssa." The setest of "The Diver," by R. M. S. Pasley, is magnificent; but the sonnet as a whole is not great.

Savill (George), Idyls of the Homeland; and other poems. Cambridge, Heffer, 1920. 71/4 in. 37 pp. paper, 3/8 n. 821/8

Mr. Savill is a little too "naïve" for our taste. The time is past when such nursery gems as:

"The rose is red, the violet's blue,
Sugar is sweet, and so are you, had power to thrill us. And when Mr. Savill writes a poem beginning:
[etc.]

Here in the hedge 'neath the willow-tree hole
Robin hath made him a wee pretty nest,
Cunningly hid in a little round hole—
Love ever finds a sweet haven of rest . . .
See you the five spotted eggs lying there?

They are the joy of his dear little heart, somehow we find ourselves unable to feel what the American professors call "the authentic spiritual chill" about it.
[etc.]

822/33 SHAKESPEARE.

FICTION.

*Almqvist (Karl Jonas Ludvig). Sara Videbeck; and the Chapel. Translated from the Swedish by Adolph Burnett Benson. Milford, 1919. 71/4 in. 252 pp., 8/6 n. 839/7

The Swedish polymath, novelist, Socialist, and "Eugene Aram," as he was called on the strength of his later career, wrote the former of these as a feminist novel to show what were his ideas of a free marriage. It appeared in 1838, and its technical merits warrant the statement in the introduction that it is "a masterpiece of realistic description, and in this respect holds a unique place in contemporaneous prose fiction." Sergeant Albert and Sara meet on a journey, and with easy naturalness continue their life's wayfaring together—as simply as two chums of the same sex. "The Chapel" is an equally simple and delightful study of an ideal Christian minister and his affectionate congregation of poor fishermen.

Recounts the adventures of a French boy in Spain during the war. He joins a commercial traveller, who, after various ye rious incidents, turns out to be a German spy. The hero falls in with a friendly old man and his daughter, who are connected with the French Intelligence Department. The old man is murdered, and after other exciting events the German meets his end. A well-written story.

Brough (Harold). The Marbeck Inn. Odhams [1920]. 71/2 in. 320 pp., 7/1 n.

Chambers (Robert W.). The Moonlit Way. Appleton, 1920. 7 in. 424 pp. il. 7/6 n. 813/5

The action of Mr. Chambers's story has a sinister background of "Bolosma," and recalls a recent celebrated trial in Paris. The most attractive portions of a readable and stirring book are, perhaps, those concerned with the loves of the very agreeable Thesalus Dunois and Dulicie Soane. The presentations of Murtagh Skeel, the Irish poet, and of the sculptor James Westmore, with his artist friend Garret Barres, are skilful and lifelike.

The padre of Talbot House, the soldiers' hut and place of worship on the Flanders front, tells the story of the great work carried on there, and gives glimpses of our soldiers' lives which reveal humour, pathos, and a greatness too often unappreciated. This is the third edition of a book that attained a very wide private circulation, and is addressed to the public as a most deserving appeal for sympathy and funds.

A rendering into Spanish of M. Frapé's story, which has for its theme the struggle of the poorer middle classes to keep up appearances and to seem better off than they are.

Strange coincidences and adventures often beset the lives of twins, especially in fiction; and here we find a plucky girl and her twin brother in an ingenious series of incidents, and winning the V.C. on the same day, though at opposite ends of the earth. A misgoverning girl, a siege, a battle, and a love-affair combine to thrill the uncritical reader.

Mr. Lloyd vividly depicts a journalistic factory, of a not unfamiliar type, in which commonplace matter is profitably supplied for the depletion of the great British public; and he ingeniously contrasts the shabby treatment of three geniuses (who in a pecuniary sense were three "failures") with the appreciative fostering of other members of the staff who could turn out "topical" articles and short serial stories by the yard. The characterization is somewhat unequal. Sandra is rather a lay-figure, but poor Marcelle—one of the "failures"—who "used the word 'dined' with inverted commas in her voice," and Mrs. Bish, whose "upper lip peeled off the large, gold-filled teeth in a deprecatory smile," are well drawn. Golding, the sometime head of the press forcing house, is an ordinary sort of man, truthfully and unflatteringly portrayed. His wife is more difficult to understand, but the silhouette is not unsatisfactory.

See review, p. 415.
MONTFORT (Eugène). Les Cœurs Malades. Paris, Flammarion [1920]. 7\(\mathrm{j}\) in. 278 pp., paper, 5fr. 75 n. 843.9
See review, p. 426.

Newman (F. J.). ROMANCE AND LAW IN THE DIVORCE COURT. Month. 1920. 7\(\mathrm{j}\) in. 330 pp. A series of stories, mostly dealing with the "sleazy side" of marriage. Frankly, they are somewhat dreary reading; but they serviceably reveal many a "rift within the lute" of matrimony, as well as various nice legal points. The stories are concerned with facts, but names are (very properly) disguised. The happy and beneficial influence of the late Rev. A. H. Stanton, of St. Albans, Hackney, is well shown in the first narrative, which relates to the marriage of a ward in Chancery. A useful glossary of legal terms concludes the volume.

The delicate limning and restrained feeling which are distinctive of this completely rewritten edition of a story published in 1903 will be appreciated by numerous readers unacquainted with the dour and lonely Laird of Hepburn and his faithful Danny; and many other persons will like to furnish their memories of the book.

910 GEOGRAPHY, TOPOGRAPHY, ANTIQUITIES.

Klein (Félix). En AMÉRIQUE À LA FIN DE LA GUERRE. Paris, Beauchesne, 1919. 7\(\mathrm{j}\) in. 368 pp. paper, 7fr. n. vi\(\frac{1}{2}\). 917.3

The mission upon which the author and others visited America in October, 1918, had for its chief purpose the conveyance of French congratulations to Cardinal Gibbons on the occasion of his episcopal jubilee. The time was auspicious; victory was in the air and the Armistice was about to be signed. It is not surprising that the Abbé's book is cheerful in tone as well as readable. There is a good pen-picture of the Cardinal; and the author describes visits to New York, Boston, and other cities. Several universities were included in the itinerary, and the members of the party were received by President Wilson.

Martonne (Em. de). CHOSES VUES EN BESSARABIE (Extrait de la "Revue de Paris"). Paris, 1919. 7\(\mathrm{j}\) in. 47 pp., paper, 7fr. 12.$

Professor E. de Martonne's sketch of a journey from Bukarest across Roumania and Bessarabia in 1919 gives an account of the towns, roads, rural districts, the general state of the people, and their post-war situation and its problems. He touches on the menace of the Bolshevists (then on the far bank of the Dniester), the rupture with Russia, the independence of the Moldavian Republic, and the effects of the Roumanian régime in saving that country from the fate of Russia.

The programme announced in the compendious but illogical sub-title is satisfactorily carried out by Mr. Maugham, who was sometime British consul-general at Monrovia, and is already known favourably as a writer on African subjects. He knows the country well, has utilized the best official authorities, and shows a sympathetic understanding and appreciation of the negro inhabitants. The work is illustrated with good photographs, statistical statements, and the words and music of the Liberian national anthem.

Major Pearce, the British Resident at Zanzibar, has produced a thoroughly interesting and detailed account of the history, appearance, associations and inhabitants of the island. In particular, the unsolved problems connected with various ruins are treated in an intriguing manner. The whole book serves, in fact, to awaken interest in a very little known outpost of the British Empire.

920 BIOGRAPHY.

Hargrove (Charles).

See review, p. 414.

Paracelsus (Philippus Aureolus Theophrastus Bombastus von Hohenheim).

Swainson (W. P.). Theophrastus Paracelsus, Mediæval Alchemist. Rider, 1919. 6\(\mathrm{j}\) in. 52 pp. limp cl., 1/3 n. 920

Astrologer, alchemist, naturalist, physician and wanderer, the son of Wilhelm Bombastus von Hohenheim, of Einsiedeln, Switzerland, is an interesting subject of study; and this brief account of his life, followed by a sketch of his doctrines, is likely to be welcomed by those for whom the "occult sciences" have attraction.

940.9 THE GREAT EUROPEAN WAR.

*Corbett (Sir Julian S.). NAVAL OPERATIONS: vol. I, To the Battle of the Falklands, December, 1914 (History of the Great War, compiled by direction of the Historical Section of the Committee of Imperial Defence). Longmans, 1920. 9 in. 484 pp. maps, plans, diagis. apps. index, maps and charts in separate case, 17/6 n. 940.9
See review, p. 412.

Eight vivid pen-pictures, the best of which are "Jerusalem Delivered," "Gaza—Before and After," and "The Common Task." Captain Lockhart has a sense of humour, which flashes out in "The Peace Patrol" and other sketches.

*Pollard (Albert Frederick). A Short History of the Great War. Methuen [1920]. 8 in. 419 pp. maps, index, 10/6 n. 940.9

An excellent feature of Professor Pollard's evenly balanced and temperamentally written narrative is that it corrects several popular misapprehensions. Recognising the splendid achievements of our naval and military forces, the steadfastness of the bulk of the civilian population, and the brilliant work of our Allies, the author avoids the indiscriminate and uninformed censure of German war methods with which the general reader has been amply supplied during the past five years. Professor Pollard ably discusses the real meaning of the expression "crime of the century," which is so often misunderstood. Generous tributes to the bravery and endurance of the French at Verdun and elsewhere, to Serbian heroism, and to the nobility of the motives which inspired the people of the United States, are associated with an appreciation of German discipline and determination, and with praise for the skill of such men as Admiral von Schier, Captain Müller, and General von Lettow-Vorbeck. The crime of the torpedoing of the "Lusitania," the immorality of sinking hospital ships, the heinousness of sowing loose mines, and the executions of Edith Cavell and Captain Fryatt are denounced in the terms they deserve: but it is pointed out that the German air-raids and bombardments of the English coast, could be justified on the . . . provisions of the Hague Convention, which exposed to the risk of bombardment any locality containing soldiers, munitions, or material for war, or means for military transport." The cruelty with which the war was waged by the Germans created horror mainly, says Professor Pollard, because "they smudged against the higher standards of modern times, and because their cruelty now proceeds more scientific and effective means of expression."

Unwin (Stanley), ed. The WORK OF V.A.D. LONDON. DURING THE WAR. Allen & Unwin, 1920. 7\(\mathrm{j}\) in. 96 pp. il. por. boards, 5/.

940.9

Founded in 1918 by Sir James Cantlie, No. 1 Voluntary Aid Detachment, London, Unwin was in some respects an exceptional position. It was the first detachment to be formed, and it was called in to attend upon the King after his accident at the Front. "No. 1" also carried out other important duties at the Royal Palace.
THE SEA FISHERIES
By J. T. JENKIN, B.Sc. 24s. net.
A complete review, with many illustrations of the administration of British Fisheries, with criticism of official statements, and suggestions for reform.

YPRES. 1914.
Being a German official account, issued by the General Staff. Authorised translation with introduction and notes by the Historical Section of the Committee of Imperial Defence. 5s. net.

NOTE S OF A CAMP FOLLOWER
ON THE WESTERN FRONT. By E. W. HORNUNG. "An admirable picture of the work done in the Y.M.C.A. batts and of the men by whom they were so much appreciated."—Westminster Gazette. "A book such as one loves—gives a peep into the very heart of the soldier."—Church Times.

PASTEUR.
By RENE VALLERY RADOT. With an introduction by the late Sir William Oaker, Bart. "A classic of scientific biography."—Saturday Review. "The translation of M. Vallery Radot's admirable biography is a book every English-speaking admirer of Pasteur will desire to possess."—Athenaeum. 10s. 6d. net.

SIR VICTOR HORSLEY.
By STEPHEN PAGET. "It could not have been better written."—Westminster Gazette. "So readable, so convincing, so vividly defined. ... Mr. Paget has never had an eq. 2 as a medical biographer, and here he had exceeded himself."—Observer. 21s. net.

FLOWERS IN THE GRASS
By MAURICE HEWLETT. 5s. net.

THE CALL OF THE OFFSHORE WIND
By RALPH D. PAINE. 7s. 6d. net. "For those who love the breath of the sea wind in their faces,"—Observer. "Has that keen sea tang that the public has learnt to relish in 'Conrad and Masfield.'"—Sunday Times.

HEARTS HAVEN.
By CLARA LOUISE BURNHAM. 7s. 6d. net. "This novel of the little mother is very sweet and very pretty."—Pall Mall Gazette. "Quaint dry humour."—Glasgow News.

FROM PERSIAN UPLANDS
By F. HALE. Maps. 10s. 6d. net.
A record by one who really knows the country and the people of every localities and politics, in Persia from 1913 to 1919.

ARTHUR HUGH CLOUGH.
By JAMES I. OSBORNE. "An excellent monograph. ... A most admirable exposition of a character of singular and beautiful integrity. ... Mr. Osborne respects Clough too much to over-praise him —and I, Mr. Osborne."—Affable Jack in The New Statesman. "A very careful and interesting piece of work."—W. L. Courtayne in The Daily Telegraph.

LETTERS TO X.
By H. J. MANGHAM. 1s. net. "Delicat and discursive."—Manchester Guardian. "His judgments of modern literature coincided so closely with our own that it might appear immode to tell how strikingly sound they appear to us to be."—Athenaeum.

THE NEW GERMANY
By GEORGE YOUNG. 8s. net.

THE PUBLIC SERVICE.
IN WAR AND PEACE. By Sir WILLIAM BEVERIDGE, K.C.B., formerly Secretary, Ministry of Food, now Director of the London School of Economics. This book summarises THE CASE OF THE CIVIL SERVICE. 2s. net.

COMMERCe & INDUSTRy

A TREASURE OF ENGLISH PROSE
Selected from Chaucer to Bernard Shaw, by LOGAN PEArsALL SIMON, Author of "Trivia." 6s. net.

THE OUTLAW
By MAURICE HEWLETT. 6s. net.

THE LAIRD OF GLENFERNIE
By MARY JOHNSTON. 6s. net.

KEITH'S DARK TOWER
By ELEANOR H. PORTER. 6s. net.

THE BRANDING IRON
By KATHERINE BURT. 7s. 6d. net.

STAFF TALES
By W. P. LIPSCOMB. Illustrated by H. M. BATEMAN. 7s. 6d. net.

DAILY NEWS:
"A well-written and exciting story of wild life."—SHEFFIELD DAILY TELEGRAPH. "A tale of raw elemental love, written with much force. ... Should have a wide sale."—WORLD.
"This most remarkable book would make a thrilling film play."—Freeman's Journal

WRITE FOR PARTICULARS AND CATALOGUES TO 10-12 ORANGE STREET, LONDON, W.C.2.
Appointments Vacant

COUNTY HIGH SCHOOL, ILFORD.

Applications are invited for the following appointments—the
(a) Master to teach Economics (Advanced Course) and English (Boys' School). Commencing salary £200 to £275 per annum, according to qualifications and experience. Increments and maximum according to County Council Scale.
(b) Spanish Master for three days per week—Monday,
Wednesday and Friday. Salary £180 per annum.
Applications to be made on forms to be obtained by sending stamped addressed foolscap envelope to the Clerk to the Governors.

CITY OF LONDON COLLEGE.

The Governors invite applications for the position of DIRECTING HEAD of the City of London College.
The commencing salary is £1,000 per annum. Candidates must possess first-class educational qualifications and a capacity for general administration and organisation and a wide experience of trade and commercial life at home and abroad.
Forms of application can be obtained from the Secretary of the College either personally or on receipt of a stamped directed foolscap envelope.

DAVID SAVAGE, Secretary.

White Street, Moorfields, E.C.2.

NATIONAL MUSEUM OF WALES, AND
THE UNIVERSITY COLLEGE OF SOUTH WALES AND MONMOUTHSHIRE.

Applications are invited for a joint appointment of Keeper of the Department of Archaeology in the Museum, and Lecturer in Archaeology in the College.
Total salary £600 per annum. Forms of application and conditions of appointment may be obtained from the Director, National Museum of Wales, Cardiff, by whom applications should be received by May 1, 1920.

COUNTY BOROUGH OF SUNDERLAND.
PUBLIC LIBRARIES, MUSEUM AND ART GALLERY.

The Committee invite applications for the position of Male Assistant in the Central Library. Salary £212 10s., advancing by increments of £2 10s. to £230 per annum.
Public Library experience essential, including Dewey Classification, and open access methods.
Applications, stating present position and particulars of Library Association Certificates held, etc., together with copies of not more than three recent testimonials to be delivered addressed me at my office, Town Hall, Sunderland, not later than first Friday in April, 1920, endorsed "Library Assistant.

H. CRAVEN,
Town Clerk.

Town Hall, Sunderland,
March 26, 1920.

DERBY SCHOOL OF ART.

A HEAD MASTER is required for the Derby School of Art to commence duties as soon as possible.
Commencing salary, £100.
Further particulars may be obtained from the undersigned, to whom applications should be forwarded not later than April 14.

F. C. SMITHARD,
Secretary to the Education Committee.

Education Office, Becker Street, Derby.
March 26, 1920.

Appointments Vacant

HANTS COUNTY COUNCIL.—EDUCATION COMMITTEE.

Basingstoke High School for Girls.

Required next term, Senior Mathematical Mistress, graduate; salary according to scale, commencing at £180, with allowance for approved experience up to six years. Application form on receipt of stamped addressed foolscap envelope, from the Head Mistress, Basingstoke High School for Girls, Hants.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL.

Applications are invited from persons desirous of having their names placed on the panels of teachers of (a) Citizenship (21s.); (b) History—Ancient and Modern (21s.),
Social (21s.), Commercial (15s.), Economic (15s.), Industrial (15s.);
(c) Languages (Modern)—(i) advanced and causerie (21s.), (ii) Intermediate and Elementary (15s. senior institutes, 10s. junior institutes), (a) French, (b) German, (c) Italian, (d) Portuguese,
(e) Russian, (f) Spanish; (d) Languages (Ancient Latin) (15s.);
(e) Literature (15s.). Salary is for an evening of two hours' teaching.
Apply to the Education Officer (T.6), Education Offices, Victoria Embankment, W.C.2 (stamped addressed foolscap envelope necessary). Form T.17 (p) will then be sent, and must be returned by April 8, 1920. In the case of male candidates, preference will be given to persons who have served or attempted to serve with the Forces of the Crown.

JAMES BIRD,
Clerk of the London County Council.

COUNTY BOROUGH OF HUDSDENFIELD.
PUBLIC LIBRARY AND ART GALLERY.

The Committee invite applications for the appointment of Senior Assistant (Male). Salary £175 per annum. Public Library experience essential, with knowledge of Cataloguing, Dewey Classification, open access, Shorthand and typewriting a recommendation. Candidates should hold at least two certificates of the Library Association.
Applications, accompanied by copies of three recent testimonials, to be sent to the Librarian, Public Library, Huddersfield, not later than Friday, April 9th.

By Order,

J. HENRY FIELD,
Town Clerk.

COUNTY BOROUGH OF EAST HAM EDUCATION COMMITTEE.

East Ham Technical College.

The Committee invite applications for the post of Assistant Mistress in the Secondary School. Candidates must possess a University degree, or equivalent qualification, good qualifications in English and French, and be prepared to take an interest in school games. Preference will be given to candidates who have had some experience in secondary school work.
Commencing salary £255 per annum, rising by annual increments of £15 to a maximum salary of £420 per annum.
Forms of application, which may be obtained from the undersigned,
should be returned at once.

F. R. THOMPSON,
Secretary.

Education Office, Town Hall, East Ham, E.6.
March 29, 1920.
Ex-Service Men are being specially cared for by the

CHURCH ARMY

by means of

HOSTELS FOR THOSE ATTENDING THE HOSPITAL FOR fitting of artificial limbs, and those seeking work and learning trades;
EMPLOYMENT BUREAU FOR MEN OUT OF WORK;
TRAINING FARM in Essex (700 acres) and MARKET GARDEN at Stonebridge Park, Willesden, for training men to work on the land.

Friends of the DISABLED AND SHELLSHOCKED for helping men who have lost their health in the Country's cause.

THE MOTHERLESS CHILDREN of Ex-Service Men are taken in full charge.

THE EVANGELISTIC AND SOCIAL WORK is again in active operation. The WORK and its COST are both increasing

CONTRIBUTIONS will be gratefully received by the Hon. Chief Secretary, Prebendary Carliole, D.D., Church Army Headquarters, Bryanston Street, Marble Arch, London, W.1. Cheques, &c., should be crossed "Barclays, % Church Army."

Appointments Vacant

RESIDENT LECTURER in ENGLISH (Degree) wanted in September for Teachers' Training College in London, to lecture on General and Children's literature.

Applicants should state age, qualifications, experience, and salary required. Box 11, ATHENÆUM Advertisement Office, 170, Fleet Street, E.C.4.

LADY, educated, capable, expert shorthand typist, six years good office and secretarial experience, desires post as daily secretary or in office. S.W. district preferred. Accustomed responsibility. Salary £3.—Box 33, ATHENÆUM Advertisement Office, 170, Fleet Street, E.C.4.

TYPEWRITING OF EVERY DESCRIPTION carefully and promptly executed at home, ls. per 1,000 words; carbon copy, 3d. per 1,000 words. Duplicating, Cambridge Local.—Miss Nancy McFarlane, 11, Palmers Avenue, Westcliffe Essex.

TYPEWRITING. — Authors' MSS., Examination Papers, Letters, Circulars, Testimonials, General Copying, Duplicating, etc. — J. Trimnell, S. Moira Terrace, Cardiff.

Exhibition Notice

R.W.S. ROYAL SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER-COLOURS.
SUMMER EXHIBITION NOW OPEN. 10 till 6.
5a, PALL MALL, EAST (near National Gallery)

GRAFTON GALLERIES.
FRENCH EXHIBITION of GALERIE DES BEAUX ARTS of PARIS. 10 till 6. Admission 1/3 inc. tax.

ETCHINGS BY IAN STRANG
THE CHENIL GALLERY
by the Town Hall, Chelsea.

DAILY and SUNDAYS, 10 till 6.
AUGUSTUS E. JOHN'S War, Peace Conference, and Other Portraits.

THE GALLERY OF THE ALPINE CLUB, Mill Street, Conduit Street, W.

"There is one thing Mr. Augustus John has above his contemporaries; that is, an instinct for painting."—Morning Post.

"It needs no prophetic insight to foretell that the exhibition will be one of the sensations of the season."—Daily News.

AUTHORS'

MSS. placed at highest prices; free monthly prizes; terms for stamp.—Cambridge Literary Agency, 8, Henrietta-St., W.C.2

THE AUTHOR'S ALLIANCE are prepared to consider and place MSS. for early publication. Literary work of all kinds dealt with by experts who place Authors' interests first. Twenty years' experience. Please note new address: 99 and 94, Chancery Lane, London, W.C.2.

Special Offer

THE BAN OF THE BORI.
Demons and Demon-Dancing in West and North Africa,
by Major A. J. N. TREMEMERNE, M.A., LL.M., Author of "Haus Superstitions and Customs," etc., Coloured frontispiece, 69 photographic illustrations and 47 figures in the text;
A most interesting and exhaustive study on African customs.
L. CHAUNDY OF OXFORD LTD.
2, ALBEMARLE STREET, LONDON, W.

ATTRACTIVE BOOKS
AT LESS THAN HALF THE PUBLISHED PRICES.
Books on a great variety of subjects:—Sport, Travel, Fiction, Biography, Theology, etc., etc.
All in New Condition as published. Catalogue on application.

WILLIAM GLAISHER, LTD.,
265, HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.1.
The best
Labour Saving
Appliance is the Human Brain

If you apply your brain to every item of household management, however trivial, you will in the course of a year save many pounds.

Do you, for instance, when cooking on a gas stove invariably turn out the gas when you no longer require the heat, or do you draw aside the pot from mere force of habit?

May we send you a small pamphlet on "Thrift" in the use of gas which will help you to save odd pence daily in these days when every penny counts?

We do not sell gas or gas appliances; we exist to advise the public how to get the best service from the gas and the gas appliances which they use, and we are supported by the chief gas undertakings in the British Empire.

If you will write to us about any difficulty we will put our expert service at your disposal free of charge or obligation.

THE BRITISH COMMERCIAL GAS ASSOCIATION
47 Victoria Street, Westminster, S.W. 1
OLD CLOTHES

Since the war we who were in khaki—the men more easily than the women—have been living in the old clothes which, in 1914 or thereabouts, were enthusiastically or regretfully embalmed and laid to mature in wardrobes or old trunks. It is melancholy, indeed, to reflect how many of these suits, carefully folded and redolent of camphor, waited in vain to drape once more the limbs whose shapes they knew so well, now wrapped in the ultimate garment of all mortality. As for the clothing of the hereafter, I find it hard to accept the revelation of "Raymond" that the forms of the departed are clothed in the emanations of defunct earthly suitings; I prefer to imagine the disembodied freed from fleshly fetters, and not bound in their higher state to the daily adjustment of spiritual braces and celestial suspenders. The physical bliss, to be found in this existence, of nude revelling on a strand lapped by summer waves, fanned by a zephyr and warmed by a bland sun, is surely a premonition of a more perfect state in a less constricted life. Be that as it may, it is with the survivors that we are here concerned. If there was any joy among those old clothes at their disentombment by a familiar hand, the joy of their owners at this resurrection, as they consigned their khaki without unction to the grave, was at least as great. Not only was there affectionate recognition of familiar things all but forgotten, not only was there promise of ease after stiffness, and variety after monotony, but there was assurance of wealth—varying, it is true, with the richness of the half-remembered hoard, but wealth real and tangible, a definite and ridiculously enhanced value dwelling in every single article.

Happy indeed was the man who had been extravagant before the war, who counted his shirts by the dozen, who had full measure of socks pressed down and running over, and numbered to every coat two pairs of trousers. If he had been exposed to reproach in earlier days for self-indulgence and vanity, he now proved to have been a wise investor whose investments had appreciated at least one hundred per cent. His many suits, his cupboard full of boots and shoes, his store of ties, were now so much fine gold, promising him for years immunity from the extortionations of after-war clothiers and bootmakers, who, for all their triple charges, could not give him the quality of the days when garments, as it appears to our saddened minds, cost but a song. Yet he who had been more modest in his expenditures was not unhappy, for who can regard with discontent even half a talent which has brought forth two- or threefold, though buried? The one preoccupation of us all, well or sparsely provided, has been to reckon how long our old clothes would last, whether they would carry us on till a restored world-trade and, perhaps, an increased earning capacity in ourselves would make the replacement of them a less inconceivable undertaking. Our firm determination has been that we will wear these old suits to their last thread, let the boots crumble to dust upon our feet and the shirts fall in shreds from our backs before we would face the prospect of equipping ourselves anew.

There is nothing to be ashamed of in such a determination; no moral issue is involved in the clothing of the body, save in deciding how much may legitimately be spent on it. But on clothing the mind there is no limit to legitimate expenditure, and a moral question indubitably arises in the consideration of mental old clothes. A parallel may, in some sort, be justly drawn between the effects of the war on our bodily and our mental wardrobes. The putting on of khaki had certainly its counterpart in the return bishing of the intellectual and emotional self in a war-outfit. In this respect there was no distinction between men and women, or between those who fought and those who remained at home. It was an inevitable process for every man and woman, bewildering by its novelty, disconcerting in its effects. Mr. Bernard Shaw in his preface to "Heartbreak House" submits the material of the mental khaki in this country to a ruthless dissection from which, in his judgment, it appears a hideous blend of madness and false sentiment. To Mr. Shaw himself it was a shirt of Nessus. "I can answer," he says, "for at least one person who found the change from the wisdom of Jesus and St. Francis to the morals of Richard III. and the madness of Don Quixote extremely irksome. But that change had to be made; and we are all the worse for it, except those for whom it was not really a change at all, but only a relief from hypocrisy." As might have been expected, he fails to notice in this abhorrent material certain strands which were brighter to look upon, and might well earn their place in any future textile of the mind—the strands of self-sacrifice, of fortitude and of enthusiasm for a common end: nevertheless, the war-covering of the mind, though there were times when it seemed too familiar ever to be changed, became as intolerable as khaki to the temporary soldier. True, we have shown a greater reluctance to consign it to the lumber room than he his uniform, but with greater reason, since the spiritual conflict has exceeded in length the physical; even now, with the peace ratified, it is hardly over.

It is high time, however, to deck our minds once more in the ordinary garb of peace. The question is whether our old clothes that, in 1914, were metaphorically snatched off our backs by terrific circumstance will do as well for some years longer as the serges and worsteds which the returned warrior is now happily unearthing. No doubt these familiar suits of ideas will fit us just as easily as they did. We can slip into them as smoothly as into an old Norfolk jacket, stretching our mental limbs luxuriously, like tom cats by the fire, in ecstasy at so much comfort after so much stress. We shall not, most of us, have grown out of them, a melancholy commentary on the inches which we supposed the physical and bayonet training of war had added to our mental girth. Even if we find certain of them slightly threadbare, our affection for them will make light of such deficiencies. Our old political fancy waistcoat, party-coloured, how neat it looks! Those stout boots of social prejudice, why, they will last for years. Surely it would be madness to throw them away. Besides, it would be extremely expensive to lay in a complete new outfit. The outlay of time and energy would be almost prohibitive, and our personal command of these resources seems to have diminished as surely as our personal incomes, for we can hardly meet the demands made on either. The temptation certainly is strong to pop on one or two of the most becoming vanities, as we linger before the admirable figure which we cut in our own reflections, and to put the rest of the dear old things away in their accustomed drawers, thus saving our time for pleasanter, or, as we think, more necessary objects, and serving simultaneously the interests of economy and comfort.

Those who succumb most easily to the temptation will generally be the ones who would be particularly improved by a new outfit. No two individual cases will be entirely alike. Some—the author of "Heartbreak House," for instance—have only to take their sage's robe out of camphor and ensue wisdom as before; others have been stripped so naked that, whether they will or no, they must acquire a new covering, be it only one of sackcloth; others, again, whose war-garments were as offensive as those they wore in peace, will swagger imperturbably in them to the tomb. But the average man, if he devote some graver moments to the survey of his mental wardrobe, is bound to be assailed by some misgivings regarding the durability of the things he put away in 1914; or, if they are still in good condition, they may appear too far behind the best fashion of to-day to warrant their retention unaltered. He will not even put his khaki away without reflection, lest he should bury some component of more than transitory value. And he will almost certainly come to the conclusion that modifications are necessary, if he is to cut a decent figure in the world, unless he is content to wrap himself in the old cloak of self-satisfaction and have done with it. The worst of it is that, whatever is necessary to be done, he will have to be his own tailor: the stitching and darning, the taking in and the letting out will have to be performed with the intellectual needle of each Sartor Resartus, for there are no wholesale or retail purveyors of new costumes for the spirit. Let us wish him the sartorial eye of a Poole or a Paquin, so that he may combine simplicity with exquisite taste and perfect workmanship, and fit himself without too many trying-ons.

Orlo Williams.

SOME EARLY FRIENDS AND CONTEMPORARIES OF RUSKIN
(With many unpublished Letters)

II.

We get glimpses of Lord Egremont, the friend of Turner and the liberal patron of art. He was often in correspondence with Jones and took his advice on artistic matters. Both men shared a common devotion to Turner.

Turner is here and he tells me you are well enough in health to make an excursion into the country, and I shall be very happy to see you here, and I do not think that you have yet seen your battles in their proper places on each side of the Duke of Wellington.

Ever truly yours,

EGREMON.

There are many letters to Jones in which he is made a sort of court of appeal on all questions relating to Turner. A. E. Chalon, the Academician, writes to him on July 2, 1856:

Dear Jones,

A friend of mine has betted that W. M. Turner never married. Have you any objection to settle the question in a few words addressed to me? £5 pending.

Ever truly yours,

A. E. CHALON.

Thornbury's Life of Turner gave little satisfaction to those who knew and cared for Turner. Ruskin's views are on record. Many wrote to Jones in a similar sense. The painter David Roberts on January 10, 1862, thus expressed himself:

MY DEAR JONES.

If you have time to cast your eyes over the accompanying reviews of Thornbury’s Life of Turner, I think it will amuse you. There seems to be but one opinion of this miserable book.

Some of the letters give us delightful social pictures of the time. Brighton, in those days as in these, was famous for its residents. A. E. Chalon, writing from this town in October, 1858, sends Jones a delightful pen-and-ink drawing of Brighton fashions, with the following words in explanation:

My sitting-room window overlooking the pier, I have a long way to get at the gaiety, but on the esplanade you find promenaders with bands of music, singers, tumbler, &c., with a sprinkling of beauty and a few of the most frightful old men I ever saw. There I met Dandy Arthur Westmacott, dressed in a suit of almost white grey, his thumbs, covered with presque white kid, stuck in his waistcoat pockets, pretty creature!

But Chalcor’s drawing of Mr. Westmacott must be seen to be appreciated.

Sir Francis Chantrey died in 1840. Jones wrote his recollections of him in a dignified little memoir issued in 1841. This book contains many of the delightful letters which Chantrey wrote to Jones and others. It does not, however, contain the letters which were addressed to Chantrey by his contemporaries. Many of these are of great interest and passed into the ownership of Jones at Chantrey’s death. Both men were intimate friends of Thomas Moore, the poet, and there are many delightful letters from him to each of them. Here is a characteristic note:

Middleton,

November 23, 1828.

MY DEAR CHANTREY,

Though I passed through town on my way hither, I had not time to return your visit, but shall certainly do so in my transit back. How mortified I was to miss you, no tongue can tell, and my wife’s mortification was even still greater than my own, for I have often and often told her not only of your red-vafer face, but your warm, melting sealing-wax heart, and she has prepared to meet you and yours as old friends. Who told you of young Tom? He is, to be sure, the most popular little gentleman going, and will join soon I fear, but old Tom’s nose out of joint, particularly with you, from his nose being so much more sculpturesque than his Papa’s, whose bust you so wisely took care not to do. I mean to stay but two days in town—Thursday and Friday. For the latter I have engaged myself to Murray, but if you should happen to be free on the former (Thursday) send a line to say so, directed 19, Bury St. Street, St. James’s, and I shall be at your disposal with most hearty good will. Let your line he at Bury Street on Tuesday evening, or at the latest Wednesday morning.

With best remembrances to Mrs. Chantrey,

Yours most truly,

T. MOORE.

Jones illustrated Moore’s poems, and the following letters relate to his drawings:

DEIZE,

August 2, 1839.

MY DEAR MR. JONES,

I recollect your saying me, when you so kindly gave me your spirited sketch from my Legend of the Dismal Swamp, that you had, like Ariel, “done” some other “spiritions” of the same kind, from my works; and I meant, when last in town to have called upon you on the subject. I am about, in conjunction with the Longmans, to publish a collected edition of all my perpetrations in rhyme, and as I know hardly anyone so likely to bring out whatever of the picturesque there may be in them as yourself, I have suggested to young Longman (now the acting coryphée of the Co.) that he could not do better than wait personally upon you, and learn how far you would be inclined to help us. Should you have neither leisure or willingness to engage in such a task yourself, the next kindness (but “longo intervallo”) would be to suggest someone else, who has not been hacked in the craft of illustration, and who would at least not be likely to “monstr my nothings.” Pray forgive all this trouble (if it is only trouble).

Believe me,

Most truly yours,

THOMAS MOORE.

DEAR WILLIAM,

September.

I have only time to put up hastily the enclosed. I like the drawings exceedingly, but Mrs. Moore thinks there is something too everyday and ordinary in the sketch from Anacreon—such as one sees so often in sketches of a lady with a child upon a sofa, etc., etc.—and perhaps she is right. I rather think too that it is of himself Anacreon tells the story—so that to put him in petticoats would be rather a breach of costume (instead of a pair of breeches of another kind). Even when in a hurry, you see, I can’t help stopping to joke—but I shall write again more fully and seriously to-morrow.

Yours ever truly,

T. MOORE.

We get a pathetic picture of the unfortunate painter Haydon in a letter to Chantrey:

King’s Bench Prison,

July 17, 1827.

DEAR SIR,

It has been suggested by Mr. Lockhart that a sum might be raised by 10 guineas subscriptions to extricate me, for which I must paint one or more pictures according to the sum raised, my present one of Eueses to be one—the possession to be determined by lot afterwards amongst the subscribers. A meeting will be called, would you have any objection to attend? I know I have your best wishes.

Yours, dear Sir,

B. R. HAYDON.

Chantrey sent a sympathetic reply, and two days later Haydon writes to him again from the prison:

The meeting will meet on Monday. I have five children; a sixth coming. Lord de Tabley’s death is the cause of this misery. Eueses was for him.

The scheme was apparently successful, for Haydon was liberated a little later and “The Death of Eueses” was duly raffled for. But no help could permanently set Haydon on his legs. He ended his life by suicide in 1846.

After Haydon’s suicide, and the publication of some account of his life, Sir William Napier, the historian of the Peninsular War, writes to Jones:

Haydon appears to me to have been a greater writer than a painter: yet he was a good painter up to a certain point, and that point high, though not the highest. He could not reach the highest because there was evidently some organ wanting in his brain, and the want of it made him a fool or a madman whenever that organ was required for completing his thought. Metaphysical this, but no matter, you will understand me.

A letter from Lord Egremont to Chantrey shows other distress in the world of art, and is in itself a tribute to both men:

9, Grosvenor Place,

October 12, 1830.

DEAR SIR,

Since I have been in London, I have seen a very worthy man, of considerable talent in sculpture, in the greatest distress, everything seized even to his very bed!—Mr. Kendrick, whom you certainly must know and against whom there is nothing to be said, except that the market for sculpture in England is very much overstocked, and all the inferior work for the coarser monuments and ornaments is occupied by stonemasons not only in London, but in every country town. I really see no prospect or hope for him in his own line, unless he could also get some employment in some other line, and every line is so overstocked that there is hardly a hole large enough for a half-starved weasel to creep into. Can you discover any hole for him? for I am sure that your benevolent good-nature would help if you could. I shall hope to have the pleasure of seeing you and Mrs. Chantrey at Petwirth as soon as convenient to you.

I am, truly yours,

Egremont.

I am now setting off for Petworth.

One of Jones’s intimate friends, as we have seen, was Sir William Napier. The following letter gives an interesting picture of Nelson:

My dear Jones,

I suppose you are returned like the Pelican of the wilderness to your thirsty offspring, for I reckon all who have drunk at your fountain of imagination your offspring. You have taught us to live in a new manner, to see with new eyes, to judge with new judgments and to listen with incredulous ears, and you have given us at the same time new and better aspirations to cheat our senses in this world of phantoms.
The light of genius is a strong one, when it can as in your case overcome the dusky atmosphere of London and shame the sunshine of Italy. I paid a visit to your studio, as Mr. Hayter calls it, while you were away, and saw the Esther and the Navel battle. The first I think exquisite, but I sent you a message by my brother Henry about the second, which, he having missed you, I will now repeat. Lord Nelson was peculiarly a man of vigorous mind, not a man of bodily power.
Should you treat him in the way you have done? especially when the uniform will prevent you from showing any power of drawing. The Spanish commander went down on his knees to Nelson when he surrendered; this is a fact which might be made use of 1 think, although there is difficulty in recording the humiliation of an enemy without an appearance of arrogance that I know you will not admit either in real life or in your pictures. Sons, you see, will be rebellious, but I do think that the mind never dwells long with pleasure upon violence, whether it be in expression or in action. The sublime is found more certainly in tranquility than in turbulence. Jupiter was always described with an open brow, and and the grandeur of the ocean is felt in a calm perhaps more than in a storm, because the mind is fixed in the latter upon the minor parts of foam and rising waves and sound, and is also troubled with fear, which contracts the power of thought by fixing it too much upon the subject: in short, we must be tranquil to look at anything as a whole, and hence the moon is a more sublime spectacle than the sun. The latter is never so much admired as when seen “in Valdarno’s vale shorn of his beams,” and what is it that makes a cloudless sky’s grandeur in nature but the tranquility of it, and as that cannot be transferred to canvas, it does not belong to painters unless they should be as tame as Claude, and after all his skies are not the best part of his pictures. All this you will probably call fustian, so to change the topic I send you my first book and preface, which I hope you will read carefully and then give to Mr. Murray, the bookseller, keeping back the preface from him. He wants a specimen to give to some of his hacks to decide upon an offer. I shall be in town with the remittance of the volume in a short time, but I wish to have a witness to the fact of Murray’s having received my first book in case he should mislay or lose it, and as I wish to have your opinion on it and to save time, I send it to you by Lord Lansdowne, who undertakes to send it to town for me. I shall, unless you are very busy, put you in mind of your promise to aid me in correcting the proof when I get to town, and in the meantime remain

Yours most sincerely and faithfully,

W. Napier.

This letter contains some art criticism which has survived the ninety-one years or so since it was written.
It has a further interest, for the book to which he refers was the first volume of Napier’s “History of the Peninsular War.” It was published in 1828, and succeeding volumes appeared up to 1840, when the work was completed.

Finally we may print one of Southey’s letters to Jones’s lifelong friend Chantrey:

Keswick,
January 14, 1829.

My dear Sir,

When Bedford wrote to inform me I had been made a member of Parliament, he exhorted me to remember that I was still but a man. I will bear his advice in mind now that the has given this proof of his high consideration for me, and remember that I am still but an author.
A compliment there is in the affair, and it belongs to you.
The Southey would otherwise prefer a wooden bust as more appropriate because he has found the original a blockhead in all matters of business. It is, however, a hopeful sign that he wishes to have it in marble, and there can be no possible objection on my part to his having it, or anybody else. Do I not sell the brains? And would it become me when I make that use of the kernel to be chary of the shell?
Farewell, my dear Sir, and believe me

Yours very truly

Robert Southey.

Lord Mac has sent me this journal, and he will be greatly to blame if he does not publish it, just as it is. It will do him great credit, and must, I think, be serviceable to him by making him known as he deserves to be. Twenty pages have satisfied me of this, and I am now about to lie down on the sofa and go on with its perusal till it be time to dress dinner.

J. H. Whitehouse.

After the sun is gone,

And the air grows chill

And quiet, pure and wan

From hill to hill,

And the wide space of the lane

From side to side

Is full of the pale green water of eventide,

And a blurring, mist of blue

Gathers and floods

Under the dim close-woven thatch of the woods,

So dim, so closely-twigs,

So screened from view

That the sunset’s burnished flame

Can scarce show through:

Then in some grey barn

From cobwebbed beam

A bat will drop, to flit

In the fading gleam—

A flickering silhouette

Like a headless bird,

Flapping softly, diving

On wings unstirred,

Or like a torn black rag

Poised Butterlying,

Or whirled in frantic loops

Too quick to see.

But when from dusk-blue woods,

From misty park,

Out of dim-watered ditches,

Wells the dark,

Then all seen things dissolve

To ghosts—like naught...

Emptiness haunted by a thing distraught—

A blind, distracted flight,

Bewildered, lost,

And the thin, pale cry in the night

Of a bloodless ghost.

Martin Armstrong.
REVIEWS

DANTE AS A "SPIRITUAL LEADER"

DANTE. By Henry Dwight Sidgwick. (New Haven, Conn., Yale University Press; London, Milford. 6s. 6d. net.)

The primary virtues of Introductions to Great Authors are comprehensiveness and brevity. They should be little books that say something about the authors' lives and something about all of their work. It is not their function to express any very profound or searching literary criticism. Mr. Sidgwick has succeeded so well that there is not very much to say about his handbook: it is brief, complete, and bibliographical. He makes, however, one or two suggestions which, on so important a subject, are worth a challenge.

Inasmuch as Dante is a "spiritual leader," Mr. Sidgwick attaches great importance to the allegory of the "Comedy.

To Dante this literal Hell was a secondary matter; so it is to us. He and we are concerned with the allegory. That allegory is simple. Hell is the absence of God. If the reader begins with the consciousness that he is reading about sin, spiritually understood, he never loses the thread; he is never at a loss, never slips back into the literal signification.

Without stopping to question Mr. Sidgwick on the difference between literal and spiritual sin, we may affirm that his remarks are misleading. Undoubtedly, the allegory is to be taken seriously, and certainly the "Comedy" is in some way a "moral education." The question is to find a formula for the correspondence between the former and the latter, to decide whether the moral value corresponds directly to the allegory. We can easily ascertain what importance Dante assigned to allegorical method. In the "Convivio" we are seriously informed that the principal design of the odes is to lead men to knowledge and virtue, as will be seen in the progress of the truth of them; and we are also given the familiar four interpretations of an ode: literal, allegorical, moral and analogical. And so distinguished a scholar as M. Hauvette repeats again and again the phrase "didactique d'intention." We accept the allegory. Accepted, there are two usual ways of dealing with it. One may, with Mr. Sidgwick, dwell upon its significance for the seeker of "spiritual light," or one may, with Landor, deplot the spiritual mechanics and find the poet only in passages where he frees himself from his divine purposes. With neither of these points of view can we concur. Mr. Sidgwick magnifies the "preacher and prophet," and presents Dante as a superior Isaiah or Carlyle; Landor reserves the poet, comprehends the scheme, and denounces the politics. Some of Landor's errors are more palpable than Mr. Sidgwick's. He errs, in the first place, in judging Dante by the standards of classical epic. Whatever the "Comedy" is, an epic it is not. M. Hauvette well says:

"Rechercher dans quelle mesure le poème se rapproche du genre classique de l'époque, et dans quelle mesure il en écoute, est un exercice de rhétorique entièrement inutile, puisque Dante, à n'en pas douter, n'a jamais eu l'intention de composer une action épique dans les règles.

But we must define the framework of Dante's poem from the result as well as from the intention. The poem has not only a framework, but a form; and even if the framework be allegorical, the form may be something else. The examination of any episode in the "Comedy" ought to show that not merely the allegorical interpretation or the didactic intention, but the emotional significance itself, cannot be isolated from the rest of the poem. Landor appears, for instance, to have misunderstood such a passage as the Paolo and Francesca, by failing to perceive its relations:

In the midst of her punishment, Francesca, when she comes to the tenderest part of her story, tells it with complacency and delight. This is surely a false simplification. To have lost all recollected delight would have been, for Francesca, either loss of humanity or relief from damnation. The ecstasy, with the present thrill at the remembrance of it, is a part of the torture. Francesca is neither stupefied nor reformed; she is merely damned; and it is a part of damnation to experience desires that we can no longer gratify. For in Dante's Hell souls are not deadened, as they mostly are in life; they are actually in the greatest torment of which each is capable.

Ancor il modo m'offende.

It is curious that Mr. Sidgwick, whose approbation is at the opposite pole from Landor's, should have fallen into a similar error. He says:

"If in meeting [Ulysses], as in meeting Pier della Vigna and Brunetto Latini, the preacher and the prophet are lost in the poet.

Here, again, is a false simplification. These passages have no digressive beauty. The case of Brunetto is parallel to that of Francesca. The emotion of the passage resides in Brunetto's excellence in damnation—so admirable a soul, and so perverse.

And I think that if Mr. Sidgwick had pondered the strange words of Ulysses, com' altrui piacque,

he would not have said that the preacher and prophet are lost in the poet. "Preacher" and "prophet" are odious terms; but what Mr. Sidgwick designates by them is something which is certainly not "lost in the poet," but is part of the poet.

A variety of passages might illustrate the assertion that no emotion is contemplated by Dante purely in and for itself. The emotion of the person, or the emotion with which our attitude appropriately invests the person, is never lost or diminished, is always preserved entire, but is modified by the position assigned to the person in the eternal scheme, is coloured by the atmosphere of that person's residence in one of the three worlds. About none of Dante's characters is there that ambiguity which affects Milton's Lucifer. The damned preserve any degree of beauty or grandeur that ever rightly pertained to them, and this intensifies and also justifies their damnation.

As Jason

Guarda quel grande che viene!

E per dolor non par lagrima spanda,

Quanto aspetto reale ancor rifiute!

The crime of Bertrand becomes more lurid; the vindictive Adamo acquires greater ferocity, and the errors of Arnaut are corrected—

Poi s'asceso nel foco che gli affina.

If the artistic emotion presented by any episode of the "Comedy" is dependent upon the whole, we may proceed to inquire what the whole scheme is. The usefulness of allegory and astronomy is obvious. A mechanical framework, in a poem of so vast an ambit, was a necessity. As the centre of gravity of emotions is more remote from a single human action, or a system of purely human actions, than in drama or epic, so the framework has to be more artificial and apparently more mechanical. It is not essential that the allegory or the almost unintelligible astronomy should be understood—only that its presence should be justified. The emotional structure within this scaffold is what must be understood—the structure made possible by the scaffold. This structure is an ordered scale of human emotions. Not, necessarily, all human emotions; and in any case all the emotions are limited, and also extended in significance by that place in the scheme.
But Dante's is the most comprehensive and the most ordered presentation of emotions that has ever been made. Dante's method of dealing with any emotion may be contrasted, not so appositely with that of other "epic" poets, as with that of Shakespeare. Shakespeare takes a character apparently controlled by a simple emotion, and analyses the character and the emotion itself. The emotion is split up into constituents — and perhaps destroyed in the process. The mind of Shakespeare was one of the most critical that have ever existed. Dante, on the other hand, does not analyse the emotion, so much as he exhibits its relation to other emotions. You cannot, that is, understand the "Inferno" without the "Purgatorio" and the "Paradiso." "Dante," says Landor's Petrarch, "is the great master of the disgusting." That is true, though Sophocles at least once approaches him. But a disgust like Dante's is no hypertext of a single reaction: it is completed and explained only by the last canto of the "Paradiso":

La forma universal di questo nodo credò ch'io vidi, perché più di largo dicendo questo, sentii ch'io godo.

The contemplation of the horrid or sordid or disgusting, by an artist, is the necessary and negative aspect of the impulse toward the pursuit of beauty. But not all succeed as did Dante in expressing the complete scale from negative to positive. The negative is the more important.

The talent of Dante was not for discovery, but for organization. His knowledge was encyclopedic, but unacquainted with the curiosity, the empiricism, of such a mind as Leonardo's. It was not a scientific mind. He was more attracted by the emotional aspect of extraneous knowledge than he was impelled to explore the unknown. His politics were emotional. Several passages of the "Purgatorio" are the emotional extract of the "Nicocamæan Ethics" filtered through the Schools:

Lo natural e sempre senza errore,
Ma l'altro può errar per malo obbettio,
O per poco o per troppo di vigore.

Therefore Dante is also the severest, the most erudite of technicians, the best subject for attentive study by sibylline poets. The "Convivio," the "De Vulgari Elloquentia," are of great importance for poets, and still more is the study of the success, the perfection of the writing, which carries off triumphantly the last inspired of passages. And the technical probity of Dante as a writer is another reason why, as the wrapper of Mr. Sidgwick's book declares, we may "turn to Dante for guidance and support."

T. S. E.

The Life and Letters of St. Paul, by the Rev. Professor David Smith (Hodder & Stoughton, 21s. net), is both a biography of the Apostle and a commentary on the most significant passages in his epistles. It is an elaborate and detailed work, but not so technical in its treatment as to be difficult reading for those who are not trained students of the subject. In fact, the warmth of its style is likely to make it more acceptable as an aid to devotion than as a contribution to historical research. It is not possible to treat a topic like the life and teaching of St. Paul in such a way as to read back the ideas of sixteenth-century Protestantism satisfy all schools of opinion, but Professor Smith tends rather into the mind of a writer whose general outlook was so remote from the Reaction controversy that it is impossible to bring him quite so naively into court on the one side or the other.

The Worker in War-time

British Labour Conditions and Legislation during the War,

During the war British industry was inundated with emergency legislation and emergency regulations.

The flood is now in process of subsiding, and students are beginning to investigate the body of law which it has left behind. How much has been the improvisation of those desperate years added to our store of useful knowledge and experience that has value for the future? What permanent marks have they made upon the industrial structure of the country?

It is with questions like these in their minds that most readers will approach Professor Hammond's monograph. They will not find an answer. A direct answer, indeed, they will hardly expect to find. The title itself suggests that his study is a record, rather than an analysis, of the facts; and the first paragraph of the preface plainly states that this was the author's intention; his account, he tells us, is "a narration rather than an interpretation."

His choice was wise. On a subject of this kind a serious student seeks not so much ready-made help as he finds in evidence on which to form his own judgment. In arranging and presenting his evidence, however, Professor Hammond was under a disadvantage. He wrote before the armistice. As he says himself, the attempt to describe the happenings of a great war while the war is still in progress "means, inevitably, that the writer will mistake the significance of certain events and either magnify or minimize their importance."

Except for purposes of propaganda, for example, no writer who is well acquainted with the problems of British industry would now give to the Whitley Council movement the prominence which it receives in these pages. But it was perhaps natural to over-emphasize the importance of such schemes for reconstruction at a time when men were seeking to buoy themselves up with the hope of a new world.

There is less excuse for certain other mistakes, as they seem to us, of the same kind. Thus the trade agreements and administrative arrangements for the regulation of wages in the engineering and other industries were, in our opinion, of greater and more permanent significance than the legislative provisions on the same subject which Professor Hammond describes at some length. Yet they are barely mentioned. So too, in dealing with the measures for relieving unemployment, Professor Hammond gives a page to the extension of the National Insurance Act, but says nothing of the interesting and instructive experiment conducted by the Cotton Control Board. Again, in describing the movement of wages, Professor Hammond confines himself almost entirely to figures indicating the general increase in the wage-level, and does not refer to the changes in the relative remuneration of different classes of labour and different districts — though these changes raise questions of at least equal importance and no less difficulty. Here, as elsewhere, his handling of the statistical material is much less critical than one would have expected.

We cannot help feeling that Professor Hammond could have added a great deal to the value of his book without unduly enlarging its bulk if he had relied less complacently on the material which he found ready to his hand. His work gives no indication of far-reaching research or first-hand acquaintance with British conditions. Yet it has considerable merit. It is clear and easy in style and remarkably unbiased. Though it contains nothing that will be new to Englishmen who have followed the recent social legislation of their country at all closely, it should prove a useful introduction to the subject.

G. S.
THE SECOND EARL GREY

Lord Grey of the Reform Bill. By G. M. Trevelyan. (Long-mans. 218. net.)

The aristocratic Whigs, as Mr. G. M. Trevelyan recognizes in this truly admirable book, were an essentially British product. They stood in politics for what the English Brahmins, and in literature—peculiar people. The late Mr. George Russell used to declare, indeed, that Macaulay was about the only man who became a Whig, even of the rank and file, having been born outside the pale. That statement is, however, an exaggeration, since James Hare, the apothecary's son, Bob Adair, the son of a surgeon, "le plus grand saigneur de l'Europe," and Conversation Sharp, who was in the hat trade (his complexion, said Luttrell, was darkness that might be felt), were all accepted members of the confraternity. The fact seems to be that the Whig grandees, who, though proud, were no snobs, hailed as recruits any brilliant young man who could catch the tone of Devonshire House and Lansdowne House. There were those who missed doing so, and Palmerston, in spite of the influence of the Lady Cowper who afterwards became his wife, failed, probably through his "ha-ha" manner, to matriculate. He "acted with" the Whigs, but was never of them, and Cambridge House was a centre, not of Whiggism, but of post-Reform Liberalism.

Fato Metelli Roma funt consules. The Whigs, such as the Russells, Cavendishs and Elliots, were honest; they exercised their patronage with a much greater degree of discrimination than they are commonly credited with, and they had that administrative ability that came from being brought up in the atmosphere of government. Though they stood, in Lord Grey's famous phrase, by their order, they were never by the other classes had a right to exist, and even to prosper, provided they did so deferentially and according to that state of life to which God had been pleased to call them. But theirs was essentially a narrow outlook on life; and though they cannot have been quite so languid as Lawrence, for one, made them out to be, a graceful intellectual ineffectiveness stamped itself on most of them. The few spent laborious days, notably the Duke of Newcastle, whose eighty and odd manuscript volumes in the British Museum testify to tremendous energies, mostly misdirected, and George Grey's. The majority of the Whigs, however, regarded politics merely as one of the pursuits becoming to great gentlemen, much as they kept packs of hounds, or collected libraries, or employed the Adams to decorate their mansions, or Bridgeman or Capability Brown to plan out their gardens. They cheerfully encumbered their estates through fighting election contests against other great gentlemen of the Tory persuasion in the same spirit as they lost thousands in a night over the card-table at Brook's. Chesterfield, Pulteney and Cartelet are typical specimens of the Whig statesmen of the generation before Earl Grey, the last of them especially with his abrupt transitions from hot party wranglings to calm retirement upon port and the classics. And Grey himself, the greatest of the Whigs, inherited in no small degree their failings as well as their virtues.

The Whigs, on the whole, served their country well, since by knowing when to yield they saved it from revolution. They were steeped in faction before the call came from France, and discredit attaches to their conduct both over the Regency Bill and the prosecution of Warren Hastings. Mr. Trevelyan, as many will rejoice to note, makes an implicit apology for his great-uncle's famous essay on that sorely-tried man, an essay now looked upon as written with prejudice and based on defective evidence. But when the call sounded, though the greater number, including Burke and Windham, who were meant for better things, gravitated to conservatism, the more generous minds embraced the cause of reform. On none of the Whigs had the French Revolution a more heartening effect than on young Charles Grey, the dissipated danger at Carlton and Devonshire Houses. Dealing masterfully with obscurely allusive records, Mr. Trevelyan proves that it was Grey who brought over Fox to the side of political sacrifice, not the other way round. They ruined the party for many a long year, but Grey's motion for reform of 1797 at least gave the nation something more substantial to think about than the rights of man. And then, outmanoeuvred by Pitt, they allowed the dilettante Whig spirit to get the upper hand, and there came the deplorable secession from the House. "Secession," said Lord Lansdowne, "means rebellion or it is nonsense." It was nonsense, or rather it was laziest. Fox liked basking in the sun at St. Anne's, Grey enjoyed playing with his babies at Howick. Poor devils like Sheridan and Tierney might hang about St. Stephen's if they chose; Fox and Grey were not to be bothered.

Fortune was unkind both to the Whigs and Grey when his father's death removed him to the deadening surroundings of the Upper House, leaving perplexed mediocrities like George Ponsonby and Tierney to deal, as best they could, with the impishness of Brougham and the exuberance of Sam Whitbread. Fortune, too, yoked Grey with an uncongenial partner in Lord Grenville, the "Bogy," who, though he surveyed foreign affairs with a more steadfast eye, was rigidly obscurantist as to domestic concerns. Grey, however, was not in any case the man to turn a minority into a majority. His doctrine that an opposition should promise less than it hopes to perform when in power, though high-minded enough, was hardly practical politics, even in the days of rotten boroughs. And, though Parliamentary reform was a sincere creed with him, like the Athenian he seldom recited it; even in 1816 he did not consider it a sine qua non of accepting office, and it was only in 1820 that he began to incline to the opposite view. Secluded for the most part at Howick, partly through his own ill-health and that of his wife, but partly, too, through inclination, he held over his followers a chronic threat to resign, or dispensed advice through the gout-stricken man at Holland House. That was not Palmerston's, nor Disraeli's, nor Gladstone's notion of leadership, and they were pro tanto more effective. One cannot help feeling, too, that Grey harboured an icy dislike for bourgeois individuals like Sheridan, Huskisson, and Canning that was above measure. Against the last he entertained a "rooted distrust" which was also ungenerous. He had no call to join Canning's Government, as Lansdowne and other Whigs did, but he should not have attacked it with such bitterness that the dying man actually contemplated taking a peerage to meet his assailant face to face.

And yet, when the example of France once more, combined with the blunders of the Duke of Wellington, brought office within his grasp, Grey rose nobly to the occasion. It was just one of those crises when character and integrity tell, and though there have been better endowed statesmen than Grey and Althorp, there have been none more upright. Mr. Trevelyan becomes almost lyrical over the Reform Bill, but not without adequate cause. Grey's long experience and knowledge of men are exemplified in the building up of his administration. Palmerston's appointment to the Foreign Office dismayed many, but when there he was kept in order. Grey's handling of Brougham, his wayward Chancellor, too, was perfect, and he endured much from his son-in-law Durham distraught by sickness and domestic loss. Mr. Trevelyan is best left to explain how he angled the unwilling King into a consent to the creation of peers and how he left, the Lords a way of escape, without surrendering principle, by producing a new Bill, differing from the old one in detail, but not, as they hoped, "less efficient." Attention must be drawn, however, to the skill with which Grey's biographer has used the Home Office papers to bring out, as no writer on this well-worn period has before him, the imminence of revolution over the country, and the tale of Attwood and Field. Greece's genuine stand among the rare demagogues capable not only of raising panic but of controlling the storm. The Bill once passed, Grey's work was done; his "resigning favors" increased, and finally, instead of ejecting the muddle-headed Littleton, he himself quietly evacuated office. He was seventy years old. His last years were not, however, so completely divorced from politics and immersed in the north as Mr. Trevelyan would seem to imply, since "The Melbourne Papers" show that he was consulted by his successor during the crisis of 1834, and that the "Bedchamber Plot" caught him, not at his beloved Howick, but in Berkeley Square.

April 2, 1920 THE ATHENÆUM 443

LL. S.

HEGEL'S AESTHETIC

THE PHILOSOPHY OF FINE ART. By G. W. F. Hegel. Translated by F. P. B. Osmaston. 4 vols. (Bell. 23s. net.)

Most of Hegel's important works have been translated into English, and it has long been a reason for regret that the one which, after his "Philosophy of History," comes nearest to being in any sense a popular work, has been hitherto inaccessible to those who have no German. The reason is not obscure. The book is very long; like all Hegel's work, it is very difficult, and, as it was never prepared for the press, the text is not always satisfactory. Yet the topic, unlike most of those dealt with by Hegel, is one which with him much larger than is attracted by technical philosophy—metaphysics, logic or even ethics. At the present moment, aesthetics—perhaps because one of the greatest living philosophers, one of the most lucid of all writers upon philosophy, has devoted to it his most original work—has become, for good or evil, almost a fashionable topic and is canvassed at length in the daily press. It is impossible to appreciate the full force of Croce's "Estetica" without a knowledge of what had been already done by Kant and Hegel, to whom alone, or almost alone, he pays the tribute of serious and respectful criticism. Kant's far less attractive and less comprehensible "Critique of Judgment" has long been accessible in English. Hegel's "Estetica" is permanently valuable as an attempt, carried out with all his genius and all his historical resources—an attempt, therefore, not likely to be surpassed—to justify, or rather to glorify, art from what may be called (briefly, and therefore exaggeratedly) the inartistic point of view. It is the apotheosis of the simple notions that art is a teacher or an edifier. But these views are so sublimated and refined by philosophical criticism of their cruder forms that they seem constantly on the very point of shedding the old husk entirely, and revealing a very different kernel—the doctrine of art as expression, as teaching us not what is useful or right or true, but only the true quality of what men have desired and felt. Hegel's genuine sensibility to certain forms of art, especially those of Greece, seems always struggling against the constriction of his system. His efforts after freedom are aided by his critical acumen in detecting the fallacies of facile moralization or intellectualism. What in the end prevents him from breaking quite free, or at least from discarding ambiguities which justify us in thinking that he is still half imprisoned, is his unshaky blindness to one kind or element of beauty—that in which pure lyrical music, the pure responsiveness of nature to the thrill of the human heart, predominates.

But whether we can completely accept Hegel's "Aesthetic" as a philosophy of art or not, it is the best history of art that has ever been written. For it is the only kind of history which helps us to understand the art of past times and alien peoples. It is not busy with the irrelevant incidents of schools and origins, or with the trifling circumstances of publication, which at most explain the limits of the imperfections of the artist's output. Hegel tracks out no plagiarisms, and he gossips neither about Harriet nor the Elizabethan stage. He helps us to put ourselves into the frame of mind of those nations and periods which have created and enjoyed great works of art. If we could only sit down to read the "Agamemnon" as Sophocles or Pericles might have sat down to hear it, we might have some chance of feeling what Aeschylus meant us to feel. And that is the end of all art scholarship—a complete pedagogic to appreciation. Psychological description can, of course, never exhaust the nature of the individual. But Hegel, with no more prolixity on the one hand or abstraction on the other than is necessary, gives us an analytic summary—found on wide learning and aesthetic imagination—the Classical, the Medieval mind. We learn what thoughts, what beliefs, what passions were stirring in these times. At least we learn these things in the abstract. And that is the only possible preparation for feeling them also in the concrete work of art—for understanding the artist's language.

For all these reasons Mr. Osmaston has earned gratitude by his arduous undertaking. He has had little help from predecessors. The summaries are almost valueless. Mr. Bryant's translation of Part II., which he has not seen, for the first half merely renders Bénard's loose French paraphrase. Unfortunately, the more and the longer a work has been wanted, the more apt we are to complain of its translation. From a philosophical translation is inevitably harder to understand, for those with any knowledge of the foreign language, than the original. But Mr. Osmaston seems often unnecessarily obscure, and not always with the excuse of accuracy. A few examples will suffice. Thus on p. 9 of vol. iv., "Die geistigen Formen sind es, die sich an die Stelle des Sinnlichen setzen, und das zu gestaltende Material, wie früher Marmor, u.s.w., abgeben," is rendered: "We have here spiritual forms substituted for sensuous, and supply a configurative material, such as we met before in marble, etc." This is indeed obscurum per obscurius. On p. 17, vol. iv., "poetische Vorstellung" is translated in two consecutive lines "the conception of poetry" and "the ideal work of the imagination," of which the latter is at best ambiguous. That it is something worse is suggested by the rendering, two pages earlier, of "religiösen Vorstellung" as "the notion of religion."

The translator does not always seem aware how much may turn upon rendering a particular passage without either excessive or defective emphasis. He appears to agree with Professor Bosanquet's appreciation of Hegel's doctrine; yet, though Professor Bosanquet devoted a considerable part of a recent paper before the British Academy to controverting Croce's view that in Hegel's opinion the day of art was over, Mr. Osmaston on p. 296 of vol. ii. translates "Die Kunst selbst sich aufhebt" by "Art commits an infraction—of the Oriental, the Classical, the Medieval mind. We learn what thoughts, what beliefs, what passions were stirring in these times. At least we learn these things in the abstract. And that is the only possible preparation for feeling them also in the concrete work of art—for understanding the artist's language."

E. F. C.
"PROBARI RATIO"

ECONOMIC DEMOCRACY. By Major C. H. Douglas. (Cecil Palmer. 5s. net.)

THE orthodox church of Economics finds itself increasingly prey to suspicions, some worthy no doubt, and others doubtless unworthy; the Roscelins and Abelards are few, the chief heresiarces, in the main, unattractive; the permitted fads are presumably "warranted harmless." Mr. J. M. Keynes may deplore the poverty of our late enemies from a more humanitarian angle than those who merely regret an unlikelyhood of ultimate payment; Nationalization and Communism are no more likely to become world systems than were the various panaceas of Anabaptists and Mammillaires to become worldwide spiritual nostrums. And yet scepticism grows under the post-war pressure, sometimes half-conscious, sometimes as polished as that in which the Medici pontiff may have indulged himself between high masses and banquets.

Fabianism and Prussianism alike give grounds for what Major Douglas has ably synthesized as "a claim for the complete subjection of the individual to an objective which is externally imposed on him; which it is not necessary or even desirable that he should understand in full." Even if one cannot accept the detail of Major Douglas' thesis one is compelled to sympathize with the humanism of his approach to the problems of disguised Prussianism and of the high cost of living; if one sees no such Utopias as he vaguely adumbrates, one can but admire his very sincere protest against the wastage of human material under the present system of wage-tyranny and his instinctive revolt against any system of rationization which treats a man as a "unit."

The "button-moulder" of Ibsenian drama has long since passed from the supernatural to the mundane; uniforming Death has donned the robe of the social theorist, and, not content to wait extreme uctions, has encroached upon the purlieus of the living. Major Douglas' realism begins with a fundamental denial that man with his moods and hypostases is or can decently ever become a "unit"; in this underlying, implicit and hardly elaborated contention lies the philosophic value of his treatise. He is for a free exercise of the will, and his paragraphs arouse and reassure one to a sense of how far we have given up our individual wills in all matters of economics.

The second strand of this author's realism is his perception, very clear and hard-headed, that the ultimate control of industry is financial control. There are the makers of credit, and into their hands do we commit our trust, rather against Major Douglas' judgment; for he would have us retain, we think, some sort of string-end or chain-end. "Real credit" is, in his definition, "a measure of the reserve of energy belonging to a community, and in consequence drafts on this reserve should be accounted for by a financial system which reflects that fact." The State should lend, not borrow in this respect, as in others, the Capitalist usurps the function of the State." This latter proposition is perhaps the most "revolutionary" in the book, that is to say it is almost the only complete reversal of present custom which the author advocates; in the rest he offers modifications and makes rather startling promises.

His remedy, for those who no longer regard the present system as the best possible modus in the best of Candian worlds, is neither a sharing of goods, nor a nationalization of coal-mines, nor a complete preliminary metamorphosis of human nature, nor the capital levy recommended by Mr. Keynes, but simply the administration of credit by a decentralized local authority; the placing of the control of process entirely in the hands of the organized producer (and this in the broadest sense of the evolution of goods and services) and the fixing of prices on the broad principles of use value, by the community as a whole operating by the most flexible representation possible.

Various further mechanisms are by this entailed, but we are insured against an increase of bureaucracy. Given the feasibility of such placing and fixing, we are, by the author, assured, if not of millennial happiness, at any rate of a much chastened Mammon, whose bonds are not to incommode his utility.

The formula is certainly not framed to stir street-corner enthusiasms, it is proposed in very moderate if not very comprehensible terms; and by reason of their moderation one is left with the question, "If it will not do any good, this decentralization of the credit-administration, will it, could it, on the contrary do very much harm, and to whom?" It would be carping to point out that the author is not very definite about the composition of his "decentralized local authority"; in so brief a book something must be left, we presume, to the reader's constructive imagination.

The author tries with undeniable honesty to solve the vicious-circle riddle; he writes with sufficient precision of phrase to command a certain respect for the mental capacity. Surrounded by weaknesses, and convinced of the better nature of abstract competitive bodies, one cannot abruptly reject the calculations of any man who has succeeded in convincing himself of the existence of a remedy; moreover the book, sound or unsound, is a mental stimulant. Present conditions cannot be laid wholly to the war; one remembers the spring of 1914. The Trade Unions are naive seekers of plunder offering no solution, but presenting rather an extended demonstration of Adam Smith's basis of "Economics" to the effect that "Men of the same trade never meet together without a conspiracy against the public"; but in the other camp even The Times lifts up a protest against Messrs. Coats, and the dudgeon of increasing a company's capital is too transparent for any but the most obtuse among laymen.

Economic treatises, in the main, neglect human values; they content themselves with tables of statistics, which from the general-readers' point of view might often be interchanged or turned upside down without much affecting the argument. Major Douglas is at least philosophically wholesome, and if his forebodings are exaggerated they at any rate show what kind of perils he would teach his audience to avoid:

The danger which at the moment threatens individual liberty far more than any extension of individual enterprise is the Servile State: the erection of an irresistible and impersonal organization through which the ambition of able men, animated consciously or unconsciously by the lust of domination, may operate to the enslavement of their fellows.

The State exists for mankind, ideas exist for mankind, and lastly—and here is the rub of his treatise—credit exists for mankind; or, in Major Douglas' words, "The administration of real capital, i.e., the power to draw on the collective potential capacity to do work, is clearly subject to the control of its real owners through the agency of credit."

It is extremely difficult to find a flaw in this doctrine on the basis of ethics or equity, as for the practical workings of any system which attempts to put this poetic justice into action we must await the event. Major Douglas does not, apparently, contemplate Soviets or red shirts or polygamy or free beer or free divorce or guillotines, or any of the more decorative paraphernalia of ancient and modern revolution; we are to be saved by a few hundred charactarized, but honest accountants working in a plate-glass room under communal supervision, which, if we are, alas! destined for salvation despite our natural inclinations, may be as good a method as any.

J. J.
THE ATHENÆUM

THE CLINTONS, AND OTHER Happenings. By Archibald Marshall. (Collins. 7s. net.)

THE SURRENDER, and other Happenings. By Mary Gaunt. (Werner Laurie. 7s. net.)

A BIT AT A TIME. By Dion Clayton Calthrop. (Mills & Boon. 7s. net.)

In our infant days we never thought to charge the teller of the story with being in league with the Dustman. They were two separate visitors, and the former was our friend, and the latter, who never failed in coming, was our enemy, but a gentle enemy. True, the teller of the tale always saw him coming long before we did, and informed us that it was no use “going on” ages—it seemed—before the soft poppy-dust descended. Still, we imagined that he hated to be overtaken as much as we did, and was trying his utmost, as we were, to ward off the fatal blow.

But with “The Clintons” Mr. Archibald Marshall is Dustman to his own stories. They flow along so gently and so smoothly that the reader’s mind is put to sleep, and asleep it stays while one episode merges into another. There is not a single jar or jolt in the whole book; there is not even an angle or a sharp outline. All is gently blurred as though we floated at twilight on a placid river through venerable English meadows, with many an ancient home of England half-glimpsed through the trees.

For Mr. Marshall takes an especial delight in lingering over the mildly exquisite problems of family pride and family tradition, in tracing the fine inevitable line that divides your aristocrat from your common man, and in noting with almost a sympathetic shiver of apprehension what must happen when that line is invaded. “Kencote,” “In that State of Life,” “The Squire and the War,” all belong to this kind; and every “Audacious Ann” depends for its full success upon the fact that the little lady is high-born. The other two stories—one about a builder and the other about a disappointed bookkeeper—are so subdued in tone, we gain the impression that the author is determined to keep them in their place. He is lenient with them because they are poor plain folk; the builder is not to blame because he puts up “abominations of desolation” where the old houses used to stand—he knows no better; and the meek bookkeeper, sorrowing over one blot on the fair page of the great ledger, is a pitiful example of the “small man” “Thus the stream glideth.”

Far different is the climate of “The Surrender, and other Happenings.” In these exciting stories it is not only we who are kept awake; the characters sleep at their peril. If they are not fighting snow, there is a pack of timber-wolves, or an African swamp, or a mob of furious Chimamen or a horde of savages to be overcome. Mrs. Gaunt’s method is—more or less—to think of an extraordinary background, double it, add one man, multiply by one terrible danger, keep on multiplying, subtract all possible means of escape, draw a line, add one absolutely unexpected means of escape and one sweet gentle girl. The result: “Extremely readable, for the author is far more interested in the surroundings of her stories than in the characters themselves—and so are we.

... Forty-five degrees below, perhaps it was more than forty-five degrees below, and he sat apart because he had read somewhere that sushi would crack as it hit the ground at fifty degrees below. But there was a sharp little sound almost under his nose, and he stood still for a second. It had cracked in the air! What did that mean? Nanook looked up at him gravely...

If such trimmings as these be provided the plainest of plain stories will content us. But does it really matter so little whether one loses one’s toes or whether one doesn’t? Mrs. Gaunt’s heroes seem to shed them as light-heartedly as the Pobbles.

Mr. Dion Clayton Calthrop has chosen a happy title for the finest, best assorted tales contained in “A Bit at a Time.” One cannot see the play for the chocolate box, but he must be a sweet-toothed reader who does not quarrel with the quality of the sweets, or who does not find the row of war-time specialities positively nauseating. Here is a small “humorous” sample from the diary of an American airman:

“If I’d found a Hun then I’d have boilled him alive in bread sauce and trussed him with red-hot skewers, tied him down to a white ants’ nest and put a jug of water out of his reach.

Another shake of the box produces the war-time bride:

If you had put a pink rosebud to bed in silk handkerchiefs and put golden foam for hair, and a crumpled leaf for a hand, you could get nothing fairer.

It is the confectioner’s mystery that, though the one should be so hard and the other so soft, the flavour of both these samples is identical.

K. M.

THE ART OF VENERY

SPORT IN ART, FROM THE FIFTEENTH TO THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY. By William A. Baillie-Grohman. (Simpkin & Marshall. 15s. net.)

TRULY, I grow no good hunter would take his game falsely,” says Gaston de Foix. A modern friend very dear to us, whom we confess to consulting more than hares in any corner intimate of the world of books, has something of the same spirit.

“Okay” [says Mr. John Jorrock] “how that beautiful word, Fox, gladdens my ‘eart, and warms the declin’ embers of my age. (Cheers.) The ‘oss and the ‘ound were made for each other, and natur thaw in the Fox as a connectin’ link between the two. (Loud cheers.) He’s perfect symmetry, and my affection for him is a perfect paradox. In the summer I loves him with all the hardness of affection; not an ‘air of his beautiful ‘ead would I ‘urt; the sight of him is more glorious nor the Lord Mayor’s show; but when the heart becomes—the when the Grown’cops crackin’ stubble proclaim the farmer’s fears are past, then, dash my vig, ‘ow I glories in pursuing of him to destruction, and holdin’ him above the bayin’ pack! (Loud cheers.)

As far as hunting and big-game shooting are concerned, it has taken us some hundred years to get back to the ideals of Gaston de Foix. Between Gaston and Jorrock come the sickening barbarities of the eighteenth century—holocausts of beasts driven into enclosures, butcheted from cars, shot from the seats surrounding sofas.

The worst of these horrors, described in the book now before us as “slaughter of the grossest kind, achieved with the least possible trouble, fatigue or danger to the sportsman,” were the invention and peculiar pleasure of the German princes. But we need not congratulate ourselves. Good Queen Bess liked her little bit of butchery as well as most folk of her time. And to-day the giant battles of tame, hand-fed pheasants appeal very little to some of us, even if we can love and admire men who love them. To say that they call forth extraordinary skill, far greater skill than the killing of pheasants in rough shooting over dogs, is no matter to the reader. There is surely something repugnant in the idea of bringing up, feeding, taming any wild creatures with the deliberate idea of killing them by the thousand. No, we turn with relief to “the higone of war without its guilt.”

But how far is even hunting, the most idyllic of all field-sports, behind the art that was practised by Gaston de Foix! The best huntsman of to-day is a child in his knowledge of his quarry, the most erudite a beginner in his science, the keenest a very easy-loving voluptuary, compared with him. A day’s hunting meant in those times perhaps thirty-six hours in the saddle. The cub-hunter of to-day who grumbles at getting up in the dark can perhaps scarcely realize that Gaston rose at midnight for his hunts; and the death might be less pleasant to him.
THE STORY-WRITING GENIUS

JE NE PARLE PAS FRANÇAIS. By Katherine Mansfield. (Published for the Heron Press by R. Golden-Sanderson. 10s. 6d. net.)

THE critic who is given to "analysis" is the last person in the world who is likely to take his occupation with undue seriousness. He speedily becomes aware of the fact that there are two kinds of literature: there is the kind of which, with considerable plausibility, he can account for on his own theories; and there is another kind whose essence seems to be quite unanalyseable. It is, of course, this latter kind for which the critic has most respect: he refers it to "genius," a word indicating the complete breakdown of his critical apparatus. The essence of a good Tchekov story has this kind of clusiveness, and so has this story by Miss Katherine Mansfield. It is true that Miss Mansfield's story lends itself to description more than does a typical Tchekov story, it has more of a definite "subject," but any such description would not touch on that quality which makes us use the word "genius." In fact, it is at the very opening of the story, before the wheels begin to turn at all, that we are most conscious of this quality. The dirty little Parisian café becomes on four pages, a character in itself. It is a different universe, a different reality, a different set of values, to which we are introduced. The illusion of reality is so complete that it is, in truth, a new experience that we are being called upon to live through. We see everything through the eyes of the young French "literary" man and procureur Raoul Duquette who tells the story, and the fact that we can do so shows that he is completely realized, that the universe through which he guides us is, in its way, a complete universe. The story may be regarded as an exposition of this man's world. The exposition is made clearer by the introduction of two English lovers and the Frenchman's reaction towards their tragedy. This second "theme," however, is made almost too interesting; one's attention runs some risk of being diverted from the proper centre of the story. One nearly succumbs to the weakness of wondering what happened afterwards. . . . We think this is due to a slight weakening of Miss Mansfield's concentration; the effect is as if the proper working-table became a vivid, suffering, appealing human being, with, conceivably, a life quite outside the hospital walls.

We are recalled to the "case" point of view, however, with a clean brutality. The episode assumes the perspective which belongs to it in this new world. It takes its place—a not unimportant place—amongst the other things that have occurred in this Frenchman's life. That is why another incident exists, that is why every incident in the story exists, to take its place in the world of Raoul Duquette. This way of presenting a character—by presenting the world in which the character fits, instead of by contrast with the reader's own world—will remind the reader of Dostoevsky's "Letters from the Underworld." Indeed, the pedigree of Miss Mansfield's story is pretty clear. Both Dostoevsky and Tchekov can be found amongst her ancestors, although she takes after the former more than the latter. But in her liking for a definite point, for "solid" material, she remains English or, perhaps, French. Is she bold enough to investigate her relations to these and other writers? More fully it would, indeed, be a grateful side-path for the critic to wander down. But this would be for the critic to shirk his real task. As we have admitted, this is what we propose to do. We do it by saying that "Je ne parle pas Français" is a story which possesses genius.

J. W. N. S.
ITALY AND HER FRIENDS

WITH THE M.A.D. 17TH TO ITALY. By Major E. H. Hody. (Allen & Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.)

DIARIES OF AN ALLIANCE OFFICER IN ITALY, 1918. By Cyril H. Goldsmid. (Williams & Norgate. 7s. 6d. net.)

ITALY REVISITED. By Joseph Collins. (Fisher Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.)

THE Caporetto disaster had one good result: it brought Italy into closer touch with her allies, and did something to establish a better understanding of each other's characters among the chief Entente nations, as well as of the difficulties of the task that fell to the lot of each in the common cause. Most of the troops who were hurried South went by rail, but it was Major Hody's duty to pick a batch of fifty-six British lorries across France, and his admirably written account of the journey of the Mad 17th to Italy is by far the best of these three books. "The A.S.C. do some work at times," he assures us, though he readily admits that most of the men appreciate their comparative security, and no one who reads this book is likely to dispute his statement. So profound is Major Hody's interest in his work that it is impossible not to catch his enthusiasm as one reads, and one is soon absorbed in the sporting side of his attempt to keep within the time-limit. Ten days from the Salient to Ventimiglia may seem a small achievement to the leisurely motorist, but he started at a few hours' notice, with no maps or spare parts or tyres, with great three-ton lorries that had already done much service. By cleverly capturing the tyre-press in Paris, he effectually distanced his only rivals for first place, thus sipping the cream of the welcome all along the route. But the first-aid car which brought up the rear was often unable to get through all its repairs and rejoin with the worst casualties in tow before morning. However, the drive along the wonderful Riviera road a week after leaving the mud of Ypres was more than a sufficient reward for all misfortunes. Though there was no rest in Italy, Major Hody at last managed to find time and room to reflect, and his chapter on C.O.'s shows that he can do so to some purpose; also, it is pretty obvious that he was one of those who understood how to get on with their men.

Major Hody saw little of the Italians. He had his work cut out for him in supplying his division with rations. But Mr. Goldsmid was a liaison officer, first with the army on the Piave and then on the Grappa. Though he knew no Italian at first, he obviously approached our allies in the right spirit of camaraderie, being ready to see the best in them at once. Naturally, he found it amusing "trying to arrange matters between these young Italian officers and the shy, reticent fellows in the G. 2's office." His unpretentious little book is a straightforward account of the campaign as he saw it. He pays a high tribute to the wonderful work done by the rank and file during the first month after the retreat to the Piave.

The Italian staffs needed the steady influence of the Allies to keep them from the tendency to make their dispositions with their heads over their shoulders. . . . But the proof of their [the men's] resolution was that within four days of their crossing they had a system of trenches and three strong strands of wire put up. They used material faster than it could be provided for them. This was the difficulty: the lack of means, not the lack of will to work: the absence of proper control, not the want of determination to fight.

He found the Italian soldier very intelligent and quick, and he even praises the kindness and care they showed their mules—no small tribute from a British cavalry officer. As Mr. Goldsmid seems to doubt whether the importance of our work in Italy has been appreciated, we may quote the opinion of the American, Mr. Collins, who cannot be accused of a tendency to neglect the motives in other people's eyes:

Whatever one may think about the self-sufficiency and bumptiousness of the Anglican, he cannot help but be impressed with the businesslike way in which he goes at any task that he may have in hand. Wherever you see them at work, they are at work in real earnest. . . . Their horses are better groomed, their paraphernalia more shipshape, their general conduct more snappier and businesslike than that of their allies. They have given a good account of themselves in Italy.

Mr. Goldsmid was with the Italians to the end, his last duty being to pilot an Austrian General across the frontier to Innsbruck. He is not always too careful in writing Italian; he even gives the name of his friend the Duca Camasta as Lanza di Trebia instead of Trabia.

Mr. Collins approaches his task in a very different spirit. He was a high official engaged in the management of one of those societies that did such excellent work in relieving distress in all parts of Italy. He had known the country for years as a tourist, and obviously he has a genuine appreciation of the art, architecture and literature of the great period. He is continually assuring us that he loves the Italians, especially the children and the peasants, but we cannot help suspecting that he has given his heart to Italy and her pulchritude rather than to the Italians. Indeed (and perhaps this is only a proof of the greatness of his love), we feel all the time that he will not be satisfied till he has converted them into good Americans. He warns Italy that after the war it is her duty to make a new alliance with Hygieia and Vulcan, and then this wonderful land will for the first time in centuries get a square deal. Undoubtedly there is plenty of work for Hygieia, especially in the South, but we have our doubts as to the unmixed blessings that are to flow from Vulcan. Mr. Collins' god of Progress has a way of playing havoc with civilization in so many directions, and we are not sure that the Lombard, or even the Chicago, factory hand is so much more to be envied than the fairly-well-to-do Italian peasant, who is as a rule only too glad to leave Mr. Collins' land of promise and return to his poor, misguided country and his own people, in spite of their sad lack of education.

Mr. Collins has a good deal to tell us about the Italians—the result of a year's acquaintance. The peasant is, he admits, more attractive than in any other country. He is courteous, peace-loving, hard-working, and he will put up with conditions that would be intolerable anywhere else. But in the middle classes he is distressed to find a certain satisfaction with themselves and with their accomplishments, which Mr. Collins, inestimable charge, we do not remember to have seen brought against the Italians before. Surely the Italian may be allowed to behave as master in his own house, and even resent the suggestion that he should rush to carry out the long list of reforms Mr. Collins would thrust upon him so incontinently. More astounding still, the peasant is contented with his lot, "and seems to get pleasure from the simple social intercourse consisting of conversation that the Anglo-Saxon does not sense," the young people being quite happy with "courtship and its ancillie to amuse them. Mr. Collins strikes us as a little naive in his account of the aristocracy, "whose pleasures are largely in parade and personal contact." He is distressed at their reputed immoralities, but in all ages the idle "have been more or less devotees of this strange deviation from the physiological norm." Again, all Italians will discuss without reserve "physiological functions of all sorts and pathological states to which the human being is subject," a habit which their American friend would have them give up at once. He admits they are progressing, but clearly, much as he loves them, they have a lot of leeway to make up before they can approach his ideal. There is, of course, a foundation of truth in what he says, but is America, or, indeed, any other country, so entirely free from some of the worst blemishes he finds in the Italians?

L. C.-M.
MARGINALIA

SINCE to immortalize heroic actions has always been one of the prime duties and privileges of literature, my conscience tells me that I ought to devote my this week’s space to commemorating the Boat Race and the University Spirits. In imagination I see an article larded on unfamiliar quotations in which I enumerate every reference to boat-racing and sport in the pages of Homer, Virgil, the Bible, Dante, Tasso, Spenser, Milton, Blackmore, Somerville, Akenside and Wordsworth, the whole concluding with a panegyric on Mr. Alec Waugh for his description of a football match, which was so realistic and, consequently, so boring that I have never been able to read to the end of it. That was the article I ought to have written; that was the article I tried to write. But it couldn’t be done; there is no rubbing nature against the hair. Sport leaves me sadly cold; my feelings towards it are much the same as those of that Chinese nobleman who, when he was invited to go to the Derby, declined on the ground that the fact had been known for some time in China that if a number of horses started simultaneously, one of them was certain to arrive before the others.

Sport, then, being impossible, another subject had to be found. Mr. Dent’s recent article on “The Problem of Don Juan” suggested a delightful one. I am grateful to him for having given me an excuse for writing about that most amiable and engaging of characters, Lorenzo da Ponte, poet, theatrical manager, bookseller, professor, whisky distiller and author of the libretti of Don Juan and The Marriage of Figaro.

Published in 1829, when he was eighty years of age, Da Ponte’s memoirs rank, for entertainment and interest, with those great autobiographical documents of the Italian eighteenth century, the memoirs of Goldoni, of Carlo Gozzi, of Casanova and of Alfieri. In the circumstances of his life Da Ponte most closely resembles Casanova. He was an adventurer, a wanderer in many lands. He had picked up a living in Italy, in Austria, in Holland, in England, in America. Like Casanova, he lived for the most part from day to day, from hand to mouth. But in character the two men were profoundly different. Casanova was an unscrupulous blackguard, whose blackguardism was tempered only by a weakness for the fair sex. Da Ponte was the kindest, gentlest, most uncalculating creature alive. Casanova was always the shark, the coney-catcher, the swindler, the thimble-rigger. Da Ponte was the eternal dupe. The two men had known one another in Vienna. We learn without surprise that Da Ponte had lent Casanova several hundred sequins, which were never repaid. Once, in Holland, reduced to sheer starvation, Da Ponte wrote to Casanova to ask for the repayment of a small sum on account. Casanova’s reply was brief and characteristic: “When Cicero wrote to his friends, he abstained from talking business.”

Like Casanova, Da Ponte had had his share of improbable adventures. Masked ladies beckon to him from gondolas, and, paying on closer acquaintance, to be run away Neapolitan princesses. Mysterious old gentlemen accost him at the Ridotto, offer him their daughters in marriage with a treasure of fifty thousand ducats amassed by begging. These things happened in Venice in his youth, in the free city where it was carnival half the year round. Haunted by these joyous memories, he came back to it when he was old. Venice enlaved and Germanized was as lifeless as a tomb. The great days had passed for ever. Out of Venice, that city where life seems always to have been a melodrama or a farce, his adventures were, naturally, of a more commonplace order. He made money and was swindled out of it again. Everywhere—Italy, in England, in America—it is the same story with varying details. If you are an adventurer and at the same time kind, trustful and thoughtless, you can hardly expect to have adventures of any other sort.

It was in Vienna, where for eleven years he acted as poet and director of the Italian theatre, that he met Mozart. In what is perhaps the most engaging passage of the whole book Da Ponte describes the conditions in which “Don Juan” was written:

I sat down at my writing table at about midnight, on my right stood a bottle of excellent Tokay, my inkystand was still left, and before me a snuff-box full of the best Seville snuff. At that period a certain lovely young creature of sixteen, towards whom I should have liked to feel only a father’s love, lived with her mother in my house. She used to come into my room to read me a little corridos whenever I raised the least little alarm. I abused my bell-tringing privilege, especially when I felt my inspiration begin to flag or grow cold. This charming young person used to bring me, now a biscuit, now a cup of coffee and now only her pretty face, always gay and smiling. In this way I broke myself into working twelve hours a day for two long months. During the whole of this time my lovely young creature sat in the next room with her mother, reading or stitching, so as to be always ready to come at the first note of the bell. Fearful of disturbing me in my work, she used sometimes to sit motionless, not opening her mouth or blinking her eyelids, fixedly gazing at me as I wrote, breathing quietly, graciosly smiling; and seeming, at moments, on the point of bursting into tears at the excess of words in which I was absorbed. I ended by ringing less frequently so as to escape being distracted and losing time in looking at her. So it came about that, between my Tokay, my snuff, the bell on the table and the pretty little German, youngest of my muses, I wrote in the first night the two first scenes of Don Juan for Mozart, two acts of Diana’s Tree (for Martini) and more than half the first act of Assur (for Salieri). In the morning I took my work to the three composers, who could not believe their eyes.

Vienna was Da Ponte’s paradise. He was driven from it by the intrigues of envious rivals, and at the age of forty-two, accompanied by his newly-married English wife, he set out in a one-horse calessino to make his fortune in France. Armed with great hopes and a letter from the late Emperor of Austria to his sister in France, Da Ponte reached the French borders, only to discover that Marie Antoinette was on the point of having her head cut off. The stars in their courses seemed to be fighting against poor Da Ponte. He crossed over to England, where he worked in the theatre, sold Italian books, made a few good friends and was the victim of a great many false ones, and whence he had finally to flee to escape imprisonment, for debt. His destination was America. Here he arrived with a parcel of violin strings and a few copies of a magnificent edition of Virgil, on the strength of which he set up a retail drug store. The drug store was not a success: “Installed behind my counter, I found it impossible to take myself seriously.” So, one would imagine, did everyone else. After that he took to teaching Italian in New York, and was on the high road to prosperity when his evil genius prompted him to take up whisky distilling. Successful at first, he was soon swindled once more into complete poverty. He was now an old man and had learned, at the age of seventy-seven, just enough prudence to restrain him from embarking on any fresh adventures. He settled down once more to teaching, and began, in comparative peace of mind and body, to compose his memoirs.

AUTOLYCUS.

A useful book of reference is provided by the publication of The Five Lambeth Conferences” (S.P.C.K., 12s. 6d. net), compiled by Miss Honor Thomas, under the direction of the Archbishops of Canterbury. It contains a brief history of the five decennial Conferences that have already been held, together with the text of their resolutions and Committee Reports. A quantity of important information, which has not hitherto been particularly easy to unearth, is thus put in a convenient form at the disposal of Anglican Churchmen, and, as the Archbishop remarks, the book is a seasonable help for those who, when attending the approaching sixth Conference, desire to be abreast of what has been said and done on the previous occasions.
THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY

ANOTHER SHAKESPEARE

“Shakespeare” Identified. By J. Thomas Looney. (Cecil Palmer, 21st, net.)

ONE cannot read this book without feeling, in spite of all impatience, a real sympathy with the author. He is so transparently honest and serious, so evidently oppressed by the magnitude of his discovery that Shakespeare was really Edward de Vere, 17th Earl of Oxford, so manifestly aware of the conditions of Elizabethan literature as a whole, so obviously uncommitted to pass an opinion upon any one of the more intimate problems of literary psychology. Refashioned by the expert hand of Mr. Shaw, the case of Mr. Looney himself would make a fascinating play. All the elements of psychological tragi-comedy are given; an initial insensitiveness leads inevitably to a disastrous and absurd conclusion.

Mr. Looney fervently desires that his case for Edward de Vere as the real Shakespeare should be met, and, since his conviction has by now hardened into an idee fixe, he will probably impede to us all manner of motives for believing the issue. But everything in such a theory depends upon the nature of the negative case. It is simply lost labour to look for a “real Shakespeare” unless you can prove that William Shakespeare, of Stratford, did not write the plays. There is not a shred of evidence that he did not. At bottom the argument of the anti-Stradfordians, however much they may obscure it by a parade of learning which can impose only on those ignorant in the special study of Elizabethan literature, is psychological. William Shakespeare was a half-educated country boy who had to leave the grammar school at thirteen. Therefore he could not have written in manhood Shakespeare’s plays. Refuse that argument, and every single one of the anti-Stradfordian theories tumblers like a house of cards.

Every person with a rudimentary critical faculty is bound to refuse the argument out of hand. He may admit that we know little about Shakespeare; but he remembers that we know far less about Marlowe and Webster. And there is no difficulty whatever in believing that the Stratford boy grew up into the greatest of all poets. Strangely enough, there is a parallel to Shakespeare in the later poet whose immature genius gave promise of equal greatness—John Keats. Keats was the son of parents lower in the social scale than Shakespeare’s; he, too, left school with little Latin and less Greek; yet at the age of twenty-three he had written poetry that for amplitude of rhythm and exquisite beauty of diction not Shakespeare himself surpassed. If anyone with Mr. Mooney’s understanding of literature were to compare Keats poems at twenty-three with those written by his contemporary Shelley at the same age, he would be forced to conclude that Keats was the aristocrat with the Oxford education, and Shelley the parvenu aspirant to poetry. Confronted with a parallel, the case against Shakespeare melts away; but we would recommend Mr. Looney, before he commits himself to print on this question again, to examine the not uninteresting internal evidence in the plays, which, quite apart from the unassailed tradition of nearly three centuries, indicates that they could have been written only by a Warwickshire man. We should, in truth, have had to invent the man of Stratford if we had not got him.

M.

Among the books announced for spring publication by the Princeton University Press is “Charlemagne,” a Chapman play also known as “The Distracted Emperor.” Frances L. Schoell, an Alsatian, at one time a prisoner of war in Germany, and now at the University of Chicago, edits the play and contributes a preface. She unearthed the manuscript in the British Museum, and it was originally in hand for publication by the University of Louvain.

LETTERS FROM AMERICA

“Once or twice, when there was a pause, Martin asked such questions as naturally occurred to him, being a stranger, about the national poems, the theatre, literature, and the arts. ‘“We are a busy people, sir,’ said one of the captains, who was from the West, ‘and have no time for reading mere notions.’”

The impression of America and the Americans thus accurately presented in Mr. Chusszlewitz was of course, in later passages somewhat modified. Whether this was due altogether to a love of truthfulness, or whether Dickens had an eye to the sales of his book in America, we do not know. We suspect him. And at all events this English view of America was thoroughly characteristic then, and is thoroughly characteristic now. We remain, for the English, a nation of barbarians—anchec, restless, sharp at a bargain; enormously conceited and naked of culture. A large part of this opinion is, no doubt, inherited. It was very easy for an English visitor, in 1840, to see only crudity and vulgarity in America—there was plenty of it; he expected to find it and he found it; and in no time at all the American national character became, for the Englishman, fixed and indelible. The Theatre: “We have no time for reading mere notions.” And Poe this Englishman somehow did not hear of, and Hawthorne was better known to him as the American consul at Liverpool than as a novelist; and Emerson and Whitman and James were none of these seemed, exactly, to be representative, except Whitman. And even of Whitman mention occurred seldom, eulogies were few, fewer even than in America.

And so it went, and so it has gone ever since. The “Dickens” America is still the reality, a reality which the English visitor of to-day is as sure of finding as he would be of finding in the “City of Spotted Horses.” The English man of letters, when he steps ashore in New York, is certain that he is about to enter a scene of fantastic material wealth through which, alas! culture creeps in rags. At the pier he encounters the newsboy selling the New York Rowdy, a newspaper devoted entirely to the scandalous and the sordid, and to hieroglyphic cartoons by Goldbeck. He is banded about from one tinkling dinner-party to another, moves amazed among gushing pseudo-intellectuals and tuff-hunters. The American scene of which he has heard rises beautifully before him!—a spiritual prairie, bare and bleak, its dust kept forever in motion by a dry wind. He is immensely gratified at finding his ideal true. And he returns to England, his lecture notes a triumphing success, to add his joy to the American myth.

Who is to blame for this extraordinary libel? Let us apporion it with equanimity. Let us not overlook our own share of it: our few decent intellectuals (if I may be permitted the term) are not sufficiently aggressive, are far too refining. Mr. Edwin Arlington Robinson ought, I presume, to rush to the gangplank to greet our distinguished visitor with outstretched hands, thus anticipating the New York Rowdy’s star poetry reviewer, aged eighteen. Professor John Livingston Lowes ought certainly to be on hand; and Mr. Hergesheimer; and Mr. Cabell; and Mr. Dreiser; and behind them in committee Messrs. Robert Frost, Alfred Kreymborg, Maxwell Bodenheim, Wallace Stevens, Paul Manship, Bela Pratt, and Marsden Hartley, Miss Amy Lowell, and others. Unfortunately, these excellent poets, critics, sculptors, and painters have an impression that their distinguished visitor will not know who they are, will not, in fact, have heard of them. So they do not go. And instead such an idea never occurs to them. Why should it?

This modesty is reproachable, then—but perhaps equally reproachable is the Englishman’s ignorance, which automatically limits his acquaintance in America to what is not worth knowing. The Englishman inherits the idea that all Americans are vulgar and stupid, and it does not occur to him to make personal inquiry. It is true that he encounters in England a few émigrés Americans who are quite charming and intelligent, and he recalls Henry James; but these Americans candidly admit—they do not—that they have abandoned the patriotic daughter of the West because of her loud voice and shocking lack of refinement: they even urge upon the remaining half-dozen intelligent Americans the same course, if they wish salvation. And that these émigrés speak the truth is self-evident, for if America had culture she would have art, and where is American art?

At this point our inquiry becomes more serious. America has her art, of course; and it becomes interesting to know why the Englishman remains so aggressively ignorant of it. Well, in so far as he is merely insular and stupid, he clings stubbornly to his "Dickens" legend, and lets it go at that. But it is not the case of the Englishman that most concerns us. Much sadder for us is the case of the intelligent Englishman, the Englishman who is indeed, with a faintly patronizing air, well disposed toward America, but who nevertheless finds us so little worth his curiosity. This Englishman believes he knows everything worth knowing of American literature. What, in fact, does he know? What is, for him, the American literary scene? How curious is he concerning contemporary literary affairs in America?

He knows, let us assume, Hawthorne, Poe, Whitman, Henry James, perhaps Bret Harte, and Mark Twain's "The Innocents Abroad," "The Gilded Age," "Huckleberry Finn." Possibly he knows Thoreau, Stephen Crane, H. L. Mencken, Theodore Dreiser, Lafcadio Hearn. Of these Poe, Hawthorne, James and Hearn do not seem to him quite "American"—they are not really "in character"—they are "sports." Whitman, Harte, Mark Twain, O. Henry—ah, yes! Here we have the real thing: here we have America as it should be in its art—virile, coarse, devoid of beauty. This is the American "scene.

And this Englishman, who is often, unfortunately, a critic of American letters, in the blindness of his heart, on discovering our best, but determined, consciously or unconsciously, to discover as our best only that part of our literature which gives him back his theory. If Poe and Whitman were living to-day, he would reject Poe instantly; but for Whitman he would have typhoons of praise. James he would revere as another Zola. Give us the broad, the elemental, the raw! His eye lights for a moment on finding the "Spoon River Anthology"—if we suppose him to have poured a little ballad, and London's "Congo," with its lavish rhythms, its flashy colour, its crashing echoes, captivates him. This is what America is for. Here we have the finest flower of its singular culture.

And so another shrewd stroke is added to the "Dickens" legend. An American rising to that rank that London is no longer taken very seriously in America, and has now for several years been writing nothing but the most heart-breaking doggerel, would be received with incredulity.

"Obviously precluded: lacking in perspective!" And if he asked the English critic why he did not read instead John Gould Fletcher, or Maxwell Bodenheim, or Edwin Arlington Robinson, or Amy Lowell, the critic would reply that these poets "did not strike him as American." This everlasting idle fire! Do we in New York or Boston or Chicago read J. C. Squire, or Edward Shank, or John Masefield, or W. H. Davies, or Richard Aldington, or D. H. Lawrence because they are British? Does not our book-behest demand we or "Georgian Poetry" for that reason? Not at all. We read these things because we are interested in poetry and are humble enough to look for it anywhere. And, preposterously naive souls that we are, we see no reason why the English reader should be less curious about Robinson, or Bodenheim, or Fletcher, or Kreymer, or the successive "Others" Anthologies, purveyors of poetry just as interesting...

Is there any short narrative poem by a contemporary English poet which is finer than Robinson's "Ben Jonson entertain a Man from Stratford," any sequence of poems more remarkable than "The Harp's Lamentations" and "Symphonies"? I do not think so. Nor do I know if any English criticism of poetry written in this century which is as brilliant in style or as sound in theory as John Livingston Lowes' "Convention and Revolt in Poetry." Yet for any of these books—aside from Mr. Fletcher's—one would probably search London in vain. Whether of criticism or poetry, the young English critic continues imperturbably to select for praise our worst, on the ground that it is more "autochthonous." Lindsay is preferred to Twain or Robinson. An American critic is read for the inclusion of Holmes. It is as if we were to maintain that Patrick MacGill is the most representative of contemporary English poets; W. W. Jacobs, the most "British" of contemporary writers of fiction!

Perhaps in this English attitude there is a particle of fear—a possibility which flatters us, but which we need not discount on that account. Perhaps the English critic need not, unconsciously, that on Helicon the choicest vineyards are by a just Providence reserved for him; perhaps he is worried by any ever so casual oblique approach of his neighbour. But in the main it is simply a matter of blindness. The American at a great distance he can see clearly enough, and admirable, at that distance, he looks. But let him get closer, and somehow or other he becomes invisible. Whitman? A noble mountain, a droll monstrosity, obviously not to be judged by the English standard. But let an artist appear who deviates from the English form less sharply, but more delicately, more intelligently, and his deviation becomes at once a defect. A difference in language is not central; but a difference in spirit is intolerable, for this is merely the English form gone wrong. The barbaric yawp is one thing—subtlety and delicacy are another. And the worst of this dogma is that it gives aid and comfort to a large and industrious sect in America already too prone to believe that coarseness is power, that size is proportion, that coarseness and size is beauty; who think that a "great" poem will inevitably result if one chooses a large subject—the Mississippi River, or Great Salt Lake, or the latest Mogul locomotive; and who nightly crowd the house tops watching for the perenni ally-predicted great star of American fiction to rise in that quarter of the sky just above the stockyards. Stockyards! Is America all stockyards and skyscrapers? Was this the environment on which Poe drew, or Irving, or Hawthorne, or Thoreau, or James, or Emerson, or Holmes, or Lowell, or Howells, or Cable? Was this the "scene" of "Typee," or "Omoo," or "Walden"? is it, to-day, the "scene" of "Java Head," "Jurgan," "Goblins and Pagodas," "Can Grande's Castle," "Merlin," "The Man against the Sky," "North of Boston," "Sea Garden,"...? How safe is I am in drawing up this overwhelming case! Few Englishmen have read all these books... And how futile is the effort! For the Englishman will go on saying that in a land of blue brilliant sky one cannot expect an art in which tonal subtlety, or "atmospheric" is at all prevalent. Englishmen should be the first to recognize American art—muscularity the chief characteristic of its poetry. The climate, the atmospheric tone, of New England, or of Chicago, is like that of Tuscany, save that it is colder; and therefore the New England poets should manifest, should they not, something of the coarse animalism, the dumb brutality, of Dante and Petrarch. The climate of California is like that of Greece—it should nourish artists of the rank simplicity of Euripides, the unrefined naive violence of Praxiteles... And so forth, ad absurdum.

The situation is comical. It has come to such a pass that one seriously hesitates to recommend to the insular Englishman any book which is at all likely to feed his curious temperament, even if we should despise that which we profess not to like better be silent for example, concerning Dreiser's new book of narrative portraits—"Twelve Men"? Dreiser is too good a text for the determined English critic! "Twelve Men" deals deliberately and precisely with this thick, vulgar, bawling American "scene; Dreiser has too naively shared himself, the faults of difference in his indifferent book, he comes closer than ever before to disengaging himself, mastering the scene, will be overlooked—for the English critic will not have read "Jennie Gerhardt," or " Sister Carrie" or "The Titan," and will have no basis for comparison... And consequently one decides to remain silent, almost. And one refrainsh ales, in this Ciceronian fashion, from mentioning Sherwood Anderson's "Winesburg, Ohio" (a volume of short stories, which, along with Dreiser's, foreshadows the adaptation of a Tchelovian method to the American scene)—for that is even cruder.

Conrad Aiken.
BIBLIOGRAPHICAL NOTES

The catalogue of the first part of Mr. Buxton Forman's library, sold in New York on March 15-17, reveals the richness of his collection in works relating to certain nineteenth-century poets, and his indefatigable energy in getting hold of specially rare copies of books as they were issued. Matthew Arnold is represented by eleven first editions, including the Rugby Residence Poems. Blake is by a fine group of original drawings, manuscripts, letters and first editions, including the "Poetical Sketches" of 1783, the "Book of Job," with the original copper plates from which it was pulled, and the manuscript of an unfinished poem, "Genesis." The Brontë family are represented by manuscripts of Branwell, Anne, Charlotte, Emily and Patrick; Mrs. Brownings by a number of inscribed first editions and an Autobiography written at the age of fifteen; Browning himself by first editions from "Pauline" onward. A fine set of Byron first editions, and some Coleridge with a manuscript poem, follow. The Dryden collection is a very important one, and includes the earliest form of his elegy of Oliver Cromwell. Naturally everything relating to Keats that Mr. Forman could get appears here, from original poems and first editions presented to Fanny Bravne to his letters to his sister and friends. In the catalogue an illustration appears of a special book-plate printed at the Kelmscott Press which will be found in many of the Kelmscott published books. It must be said, to avoid future mistakes, that this book-plate was not printed at the Kelmscott Press: it is obviously a reproduction of handwriting, not type, and it only appears, of course, in Mr. Forman's own copies. There is a fine collection of Kelmscott books, not including the "Chaucer." The Morris collection is also interesting, including the rare "Sir Galahad," of 1888, which Mr. Forman got from the author in 1890; the first draft of "The Roots of the Mountains," and part of "Jason." Mr. Forman had the Manet and Mallarmé editions of Poe's "Raven," and the original MS. of his "Spectacles." The Rossetti collection is not so interesting, but the Shelley books, letters, and manuscripts are of first-rate importance; they include the last letter of "Harriet" and Shelley's own copy of "Queen Mab" with his corrections. There are about 140 separate lots catalogued.

The Stevenson collection consists of first editions, while Swinburne is represented by a number of autograph poems as well, and a set of "Undergraduate Papers" of 1858, Tennyson is fully represented, and Mr. Forman appears to have specialized in EDMUND WALTER. WALT WHITMAN is represented very fully; and there are proof-sheets, letters, and first editions of Wordsworth. Altogether the collection reveals to us an inquisitive, acquisitive and appreciative habit mind, the true collector's mind, and we are sure, would appreciate the careful catalogue of the results of his labours issued by the Anderson Galleries.

Messrs. Sotheby have issued an illustrated catalogue of the Mostyn sale, to be held on April 16 (price 2s. 6d.), consisting mainly of valuable English books of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries.

THE YATES THOMPSON SALE

Messrs. Sotheby send us the following prices realized at the Yates Thompson sale, supplementing those recorded in last week's Athenæum:

English Manuscripts.—Hegesippus de Excidio Judeorum, 12th cent., Winchester binding, £70; Cassiodorus and Seneca (c. 1200), from the Waltham Abbey copy, £450; Biblia Nicolai de Belle, 12th cent. (£400); The Lusher Psalter, 11th cent. (£600).

Books printed on Vellum.—Cicero, De Officiis; Paradoxon, Malat, F. Fust & P. Schöffer, February 4, 1466, £470; Aquinas (Thomas), Prima Pars, Second Pars Sume Theologia, Venice, Franz Renner & Petrus de Partibus, 1478, (£450); Luttrell Psalter, 14th cent. (£1,100); Sarum Psalter, 13th cent. (£800); Gospel Book of Pope Pius II., £350; German, £250.

The total of the sale was £17,965.

The Contemporary Art Society has purchased Mr. Walter Sickert's picture "Roquefort," now on exhibition at the Goupil Gallery, 5, Regent Street.

Science

THE ONE BEST WAY

Motion Study for the Handicapped. By Frank B. Gilbreth and Lillian Gilbreth, Ph.D. (Routledge. 8s. 6d. net.)

A WAR PROFITEER wishing to make what these authors would call "the greatest contribution towards happiness minutes" would do well to present a few self-centred friends with a micromotion study machine. It must be confessed that they may extract a new and subtle charm from shaving and other intimate actions. This ingenious instrument was devised that manufacturers might observe their own manipulation of secret processes, and that superintendents might test whether work is economically accomplished; its nature may be gathered by dissection of its name. It is, however, doubtful whether he would be equally well advised in disseminating standard micromotion studies to an armed, one-eyed, legless dentist. In spite of the satisfying picture of Dr. Jane G. Bunker, who remained two-legged, but became one-armed, one-eyed, and totally deaf for the purpose of the experiment, operating on a patient, it may be doubted whether there will be a stable public demand for advantages in this industry. The authors, by the way, embark upon the One Best Way of treating teeth in joyous unconsciousness of recent research into the effect on teeth formation of a deficient supply of the accessory food factor or vitamin. Some of the devices for enabling "the handicapped" to set to the work in the One Best Way suggest horrible unformable flaws, like the famous bath which dashed in when the owner pressed a button by his bedside in order to exhibit it to a friend, without allowing time for the millionaire's abashed wife to escape from its depths. Mr. Gilbreth is also engaged in taking moving pictures of champions in various spheres in order to detect fundamental motions common to the champion breed, but, apparently, surgeons are shy of comparison, and the champion oyster-opener has not yet been captured.

But the enthusiasm of Mr. and Mrs. Gilbreth must not be allowed to obscure the importance of psychological methods in fitting the disabled for their return to industry. Careful and sympathetic vocational selection, calculated to dispel ergophobia in the case of neurasthenics, and to reawaken hope and interest, is essential. Labour-saving devices and motion study, in which it may sometimes be desirable to substitute the cinematograph for the coarser method of the stop-watch, are also useful; but, especially where the disabled man is returning to his former occupation, the method arrived at by motion study should be advised rather than injudiciously pressed, as some modification, necessitated by his disability, of his own old method, may turn out to be possible in individual cases in which the One Best Way would lead to despair. Moreover, the co-operation and goodwill of their fellow-workers are significant factors in re-establishing the disabled as wage-earners, and these will be secured by some measure of joint control of industry.

SOCIETIES

ARISTOTELIAN.—March 8.—Professor Wildon Carr in the chair. Mr. Morris Ginsberg read a paper on "Is there a General Will?" The term "general Will" has been used in various meanings, of which the following are the more important. The general will comes into being: (1) When every member of a group has a sentiment of regard for the group as a whole and identifies his good with the good of the whole group. (2) When a decision is arrived at by a real integration of differences and not by a mere blending of individual wishes. (3) It is recognized that society as a whole and the sciences can do good only in the highest stages of civilization, but it is claimed that there are in society other common contents of a certain permanence and continuity, with the result that when confronted with the same situation, members of a society experience the same inner reaction.
There is a view of Wundt based on an analysis of the mutual implications of presentation and will, and leading to a theory of a series of will-unities of varied complexity. (5) There is the doctrine of "a real" will worked out by Professor Bosanquet and other idealists.

All these views, in varying degrees, involve a confusion between the act of willing, which must always be individual, and the object of will, which may be common. Professor Bosanquet’s view is based on a hypostatization of a kind resembling the doctrine of the reality of acts of experience. Generally, in so far as the psychological forces operative in society are general, they are not will, and in so far as there is self-conscious will, it is not general. The St. John and other associations exhibit a kind of unity, but this unity is a relation based on community of ideas and purposes, and must not be spoken of as a personal will. For the purpose of social theory, what is required is not a common will but a common good. The latter is an ideal and not an existent, and must not be identified with a general will.

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL.—March 22.—The President, Mr. Falconer Madan, in the chair.

Mr. Seymour de Ricci delivered a lecture on Colard Mansion, the associate of Caxton, who printed at Bruges from about 1475 to 1484. The lecturer said his task was rather to raise questions than to impart information about Mansion, whose work had more than a century ago been most accurately studied by Joseph van Praet. Van Praet’s collection of Mansion’s editions went partly to the Bibliothéque Nationale, which possesses specimens of nearly all the books known, about 25 in number. Only about 75 copies altogether were known to exist, of the Mansion’s books were perfect, but this unity is a relation based on community of ideas and purposes, and must not be spoken of as a personal will. For the purpose of social theory, what is required is not a common will but a common good. The latter is an ideal and not an existent, and must not be identified with a general will.

Mr. Seymour de Ricci delivered a lecture on Colard Mansion, who printed at Bruges from about 1475 to 1484. The lecturer said his task was rather to raise questions than to impart information about Mansion, whose work had more than a century ago been most accurately studied by Joseph van Praet. Van Praet’s collection of Mansion’s editions went partly to the Bibliothéque Nationale, which possesses specimens of nearly all the books known, about 25 in number. Only about 75 copies altogether were known to exist, of the Mansion’s books were perfect, but this unity is a relation based on community of ideas and purposes, and must not be spoken of as a personal will. For the purpose of social theory, what is required is not a common will but a common good. The latter is an ideal and not an existent, and must not be identified with a general will.

Mr. Seymour de Ricci delivered a lecture on Colard Mansion, who printed at Bruges from about 1475 to 1484. The lecturer said his task was rather to raise questions than to impart information about Mansion, whose work had more than a century ago been most accurately studied by Joseph van Praet. Van Praet’s collection of Mansion’s editions went partly to the Bibliothéque Nationale, which possesses specimens of nearly all the books known, about 25 in number. Only about 75 copies altogether were known to exist, of the Mansion’s books were perfect, but this unity is a relation based on community of ideas and purposes, and must not be spoken of as a personal will. For the purpose of social theory, what is required is not a common will but a common good. The latter is an ideal and not an existent, and must not be identified with a general will.

Mr. Seymour de Ricci delivered a lecture on Colard Mansion, who printed at Bruges from about 1475 to 1484. The lecturer said his task was rather to raise questions than to impart information about Mansion, whose work had more than a century ago been most accurately studied by Joseph van Praet. Van Praet’s collection of Mansion’s editions went partly to the Bibliothéque Nationale, which possesses specimens of nearly all the books known, about 25 in number. Only about 75 copies altogether were known to exist, of the Mansion’s books were perfect, but this unity is a relation based on community of ideas and purposes, and must not be spoken of as a personal will. For the purpose of social theory, what is required is not a common will but a common good. The latter is an ideal and not an existent, and must not be identified with a general will.

Mr. Seymour de Ricci delivered a lecture on Colard Mansion, who printed at Bruges from about 1475 to 1484. The lecturer said his task was rather to raise questions than to impart information about Mansion, whose work had more than a century ago been most accurately studied by Joseph van Praet. Van Praet’s collection of Mansion’s editions went partly to the Bibliothéque Nationale, which possesses specimens of nearly all the books known, about 25 in number. Only about 75 copies altogether were known to exist, of the Mansion’s books were perfect, but this unity is a relation based on community of ideas and purposes, and must not be spoken of as a personal will. For the purpose of social theory, what is required is not a common will but a common good. The latter is an ideal and not an existent, and must not be identified with a general will.

Mr. Seymour de Ricci delivered a lecture on Colard Mansion, who printed at Bruges from about 1475 to 1484. The lecturer said his task was rather to raise questions than to impart information about Mansion, whose work had more than a century ago been most accurately studied by Joseph van Praet. Van Praet’s collection of Mansion’s editions went partly to the Bibliothéque Nationale, which possesses specimens of nearly all the books known, about 25 in number. Only about 75 copies altogether were known to exist, of the Mansion’s books were perfect, but this unity is a relation based on community of ideas and purposes, and must not be spoken of as a personal will. For the purpose of social theory, what is required is not a common will but a common good. The latter is an ideal and not an existent, and must not be identified with a general will.
EXHIBITIONS OF THE WEEK

MANSARD GALLERY.—Group X.

ADELPHI GALLERY.—War Landscapes and Army Types by Karl Hagedorn.

HAMPTON GALLERY.—Artists in Art.

MACRAE GALLERY.—Children in Art.

TWENTY-ONE GALLERY.—Paintings by Michel Economou.

The inaugural exhibition of Group X represents the post-bellum rally of English Cubism. Leaving the Neo-pre-Raphaelites in the New English Art Club, the Expressionists in the London Group, and (as we read in the catalogue) a "stagnant mass of indescribable beauteousness" of the British Academy, this little band of stalwarts have forgedh towards the MANSARD Gallery to reaffirm their belief in the necessity for continuing in England the Continental experiments in abstract pictorial construction. The leading figures are Wyndham Lewis, Edward Wadsworth, Frank Dobson and William Roberts. In his recent exhibition of Black Country drawings at the Leicester Galleries, Mr. Wadsworth revealed himself a sincere, personal and most promising draughtsman and established his position in the front rank of the younger artists.

Mr. Lewis's claim on our attention is (pace Mr. Bell) equally assured and incontrovertible. Both artists maintain their established form and there is no evidence that Mr. Lewis's subtly plastic and effectively arranged "Self-portrait." Mr. Roberts, it will be remembered, won his spurs by his large war pictures in which he made ingenious use of a pseudo-Cubist formula. His drawing "Cockneys: a Street Scene," he relapses into the trivialis formula and concentrates on the humorous aspects of the subject, producing a result which is little better than a drawing by a Simplicissimus caricaturist. Mr. Dobson is a sculptor who cuts in stone. We hope he will continue to do so and not desert the stern path to a gallery in the green fields of modelling. If he sticks to the chisel we see no reason why he should not soon become that most rare of birds in this land—a sculptor of importance; for he has structural imagination and a sense of concrete form. Incidentally, in a series of sanguine studies, he shows himself an accomplished and facile, though somewhat meretricious, academic draughtsman. Other members of the group are John Turnbull, who knows all there is to know about aeroplanes, and makes intriguing use of his knowledge in some of his charcoal studies. With his small oil sketches, exhibited elsewhere, we have had recent occasion to appreciate; and Cuthbert Hamilton, the director of the Yeoman Pottery.

Mr. Karl Hagedorn would presumably subscribe to paper on Expressionist ideals, but his drawings at the Adelphi Gallery do not convince us that he has much foundation in realized experience. They create an impression of journalistic superficiality which is due to too hasty approach, a mixture of Impressionist and Expressionist formulae, an arbitrary use of obvious colour and an irritating falsification of tone values. He would, we believe, achieve better results by a more humble and studious attitude.

Mr. Louis Sargent is a clever painter who has always shown a laudable ambition to keep pace with the times. Unfortunately some ballast of caution appears to prevent his ever quite succeeding. Time was when he felt the call to paint in Whistlerian greys; later he decided that the day had arrived for bright and broken colour; now he shows signs of conversion to a more modern decorative method, apparently inspired by the works of Mr. Walter Bayes and Mr. Alfred Wolmark. On the whole we like best his latest manner. The large still-life "Dahlias with Green Background" is a handsome arrangement of juxtaposed colour-shapes which succeeds by reason of a certain crude opulence and decision of handling.

The new exhibition at the MACRAE Gallery contains sketches and studies of children by T. Austen Brown, Philip Hagreen and a number of lady artists; and the TWENTY-ONE Gallery has replaced the Tytgat exhibition by a collection of Grecian landscapes by Michel Economou.

THE CAVELL MONUMENT

We had hoped that the simplicity and dignity of the Cenotaph might have set a standard for our London monuments and secured for us in future, if not the quality of structural integration, at least the rules of structural unity. But we reckoned without Sir George Frampton, who has lost no time in demonstrating that our optimism was unfounded. His pretentious Cavell Monument is abominably designed. It is put together in sections on the principle of a serial story, and each instalment finishes in some quite unrelated twist. The first section, set high, stands up as an inoffensive rectangular structure, but the verticals soon degenerate into weak concave lines which swirl into rosettes and enclose oblong tablets. Seen from Trafalgar Square, the form thus constituted suggests the face of a great toad, of which the rosettes make the eyes and the base of the front tablet the mouth. From the toad's head he arches the upright of a cross which proceeds for a yard or two without interruption. Before the cross bar is reached, however, it is already partially obscured by a table-cloth decorated with the Red Cross. Above the cross bar we look in vain for the continuation of the upright; in its place we find a baby held in position at this perilous altitude by a woman who appears by some trick of perspective to be standing behind the incomplete cross and to be looking over the bar. Suspecting, doubtless, that this conglomerate stone monstrosity would convey no meaning in itself, Sir George Frampton has helped the passer-by to discover what it is all about by inscriptions such as "For King and Country," "Attrition," "Sacrifice," and so on, and by a marble effigy of Edith Cavell placed in front on a pedestal. The figure itself, though quite uninspired, is the best part of the monument, and must be accounted an adequate piece of hack portraiture in the English Academic tradition. It is unfortunately useless to try to read the inscriptions which support it. This huge and hideous structure is there, and is, we presume, not likely to be disliked. We must reconcile ourselves to its presence as best we can, and take comfort in the reflection that its ragged outline harmonizes rather well with the tower of the adjacent Coliseum.

SPIRITS AS ART-MASTERS

The Chester Gallery is at present hung with drawings by Miss C. H. Martin, who maintains that her hand is governed by a Spirit Guide. From an examination of the drawings it appears that the Guide most frequently dictates a badly constructed youth's head resembling the type popularized some years ago by the American illustrator Charles Dana Gibson; at other times he involves the medium in a dart to place her paper on a rough board and rub an impressiveness of the grain to obtain "vital lines." Occasionally the Guide feels destructive and compels the obedient hand to tear the paper into ribbons. At Miss Martin's invitation, we attended her first Demonstration Lecture at the Gallery, and listened to a rambling discourses on the psychic significance of the drawings. We learned that the Guide is versed in the mysteries of Isis and Osiris and that his mission is to banish materialism from the world and make the peoples of the earth one. His special message on this occasion was to the effect that the alleged British miracle in India, Ireland and Egypt was the work of the same force responsible for the existence of conscientious objectors, strikes and the shortage of munitions in the war. A small audience, mainly composed of women, behaved with remarkable decorum during the lecture, to which the public were admitted on payment of three shillings.

R. H. W.

Three new pictures are on view at the National Gallery. The largest is a full-length portrait of the third Marquis of Hamilton by Daniel Mytens, presented by Mr. Colin Agnew and Mr. C. Romer Williams, and hung in Room XXV. In Room XIX, among the primitive works of the Netherlands, will be found a small panel, lately acquired, representing "Lot and his Daughters," a Dutch work dating from about 1510; while in the Vestibule hangs the "Virgin and Child" by Fra Filippo Lippi which was recently on view at the Burlington Fine Arts Club, and has since been presented to the nation by the Earl Dowallow.
Music

"THE HYMN OF JESUS"

HROSWITHA of Gandersheim, when she wrote her play "Callimachus," produced by Madame Donnet at the Art Theatre this last winter, was indebted for the story of it to the Apocryphal Acts of St. John. The oriund of the play might have been a little mitigated in the minds of those acquainted with its original source. For the author of these Apocryphal Acts, Leucius Charinus, was a Gnostic of the second century, and one of the principal doctrines which his book was intended to inculcate was the duty of celibacy or of complete abstinence in the estate of matrimony. Drusiana, the heroine, refused to live with her lawful husband Andronicus, and, being pursued by the evil passions of Callimachus, fell ill and died. Callimachus then bribed Fortunatus, the steward of Andronicus, to open the tomb of Drusiana; but before he had had time to take the grave-clothes from the corpse "there appeared something wonderful, which people that do such things desire to experience, yet are not able to come forth, bit the steward, and killed him. It then encircled the young man's feet, "and when he had sunk down, sat on him." John and Andronicus, coming to the tomb, found there a beautiful youth, who directed John to raise up Drusiana and then ascended into heaven. John raised Callimachus first, in order that he should confess. Callimachus confessed and repented, having himself also seen a beautiful youth protecting Drusiana. John raised up Drusiana, who at once prayed for the resurrection of Fortunatus: Fortunatus rose up, but so far from repenting, ran away in a great state of perturbation, to die a few hours later from blood-poisoning.

But the duty of abstinence was not the only Gnostic doctrine which the story was intended to illustrate. The rest of the company were much perplexed that Drusiana had seen the Lord in the form of John and in the form of a youth. John accordingly proceeded to explain that he himself had seen the Lord at different times in very various forms, sometimes, too, with a material and solid body, at other times bodiless and immaterial. Finally he recited the words of a hymn which was sung by Jesus and the Apostles before they went up on to the Mount of Olives.

He commanded us to make as it were a ring, holding one another's hands, and Himself standing in the middle. He said, Respond Amen to me. Then I began then to sing a hymn, and to say: — Glory to Thee, Father! And we going about in a ring said Amen.

So then, my beloved, after this dance with us, the Lord went out: and we as men gone astray or awakened out of sleep fled all ways.

This hymn has formed the basis of Mr. Gustav Holst's new choral work performed at the last Philharmonic concert. To understand its general character it is desirable to read it in its original context as a definitely Gnostic document. But the Apocryphal Acts of the various Apostles were too popular among the early Christians to be altogether exterminated in the official condemnation of the Gnostic heresy. The Catholic Church adopted them, and revised them, Hrotswitha read them in the tenth century, and we may well suppose this hymn to have been known to some of the Italian mystics of the thirteenth.

Mr. Holst's setting of these words makes use of various archaic effects, but as a whole it gives the impression of being a work of startling originality and boldness. The voices are made to sing groups of dissonances which on paper look utterly impossible of execution and unhear-able to the ear. In actual fact they can be sung accurately, because they are quite simply and logically arrived at, and for that same reason they come to sound singularly beautiful and expressive. It is curious to note the devices which the composer has utilized, and utilized to the full, as well as those which he has almost entirely passed by. What remain in the hearer's mind as the most outstanding characteristics of the work are its original effects of dissonance and its original effects of rhythm. Those dissonances are prepared and resolved, not according to old-fashioned rules but according to essentially new and original principles. They are approached and executed almost contrapuntally. Yet the fundamental principle of contrapuntal writing is not there. Mr. Holst's discords do not really grow out of the clash of melodies; for him it is always the clash, not the melody, that is the chief means of expression. He values melody, for he uses it in certain places; but he uses it as a complete and non-dissonant contrast to his main scheme of effects. His principal sources of melody are two plain-song hymns, Vexilla Regis and Pange Lingua. They are the main themes of the introduction which precedes the actual hymn; they reappear once or twice with a most arresting beauty of effect in the course of the hymn itself. But they seem to stand outside the clash of counterpoint. They were, never even harmonized, either with the the faintest outlines of chords or with certain alternating groups of notes that suggest bells ringing quite independently of the rest of the music. The other purely melodic effect is that of the semi-chorus of women's voices responding "Amen" to the two main choirs in a short rising and falling phrase which is generally harmonized in consecutive fifths. This is a definite link with the Italian mystics of the thirteenth century, for these smooth phrases in fifths are a common feature of the Landi Spirituali. They occurred in the Landi simply because they were popular; but Mr. Holst makes them convey a very curious sense of remoteness. The double chorus with its poignantness of discord is almost savagely human; the plain-song melodies and the "Amen's" of the semi-chorus float in with a feeling of serenity that has passed beyond the region of struggle.

Certain quasi-theatrical effects rather detract from the beauty of the composition. Mr. Holst has a curious weakness for letting his forces go their way independently of each other. In one of his "Planets" there was a chorus which started singing and walked off singing into the distance. Here we have voices singing behind the scenes, and others chanting with no reference to the orchestra. The words "Glory to Thee, Holy Spirit," are directed to be said, not sung, and said by the eight voices in a carefully non-simultaneous arrangement. Such effects as these might have their reason on the stage, but in the Queen's Hall they are perilously near being ridiculous. No doubt Mr. Holst designed his work for performance at some cathedral festival where the distinction between the ridiculous and the sublime is not always so clearly perceptible.

The "Hymn of Jesus" is so skilfully designed and carried out with such masterly accomplishment that any repugnance which we may feel towards its emotional atmosphere is inevitably overwhelmed in admiration for its beauty of construction and execution. Yet the most genuinely beautiful and touching moment of the work was a humble phrase of transition—the short instrumental passage following the "Amen" of the Pange Lingua and developing its theme before the beginning of the hymn itself. For that one moment the composer seemed to have forgotten symbolism and the crude emotion of mystical religion, and to have gone back to music and the musical expression of his own meditative mind.

EDWARD J. DENT.
THE "MAGIC FLUTE" AT THE "OLD VIC"

If the difficulty in "Don Giovanni" (as has recently been observed more than once) is to persuade the audience that it is not serious, that in the "Magic Flute" is to persuade them that it is. The former is a comedy, in which Mozart's power of dramatic composition runs away with him to such an extent that almost everyone who listens to it feels a confusion of purpose. The latter is to all intents and purposes a morality play carrying with it such an infusion of spectacular irreality and fanciful absurdity that the listener has to be continually discarding false impressions if he is to read the work aright.

The chief task of the producer is to make it as easy as possible for him to do this; no production (short of tampering wholesale with the libretto) can relieve him altogether of the necessity. At the "Old Vic" this has been thoroughly understood, and the conception of the work is in all essentials a true and good one. There is no attempt at scenic display—a virtue that is, perhaps, the outcome of necessity, but none the less a virtue—and the only animal that appears is the introductory serpent. Mr. Clive Carey wisely took the part of Papageno into his own hands: he keeps him in the background, and ends by persuading us that he is after all not such an impossible fate for the alluring young lady who eventually makes him her own. This abnegation on the part of Mr. Carey makes the task of the other protagonists a good deal easier. Tamino and Pamina are both well played; Mr. Steuart Wilson and Miss Evelyn Konnard preserve throughout the gravity of demeanour that their respective rôles demand, and their voices suit the requirements of the music admirably. If one may offer a criticism that may seem hypercritical, it is that the conception of both of them is too static; in neither case is the gradual transition of the uninitiated to a state of probation and final enlightenment fully realized—or, perhaps one should say fully brought out; to understand such a process of spiritual growth is one thing, to portray it another, for which subtle and finished acting is required. Miss Muriel Gough as the Queen of Night showed that coloratura singing of an exacting nature has no terrors for her; in fact the singing all round was of that unobtrusively good type that is becoming associated with the "Old Vic" performances, the three Genii being perhaps the best. The performance as a whole had not the perfect cohesion that was attained in the later performances of "Figaro," and some of the cast did not seem to know their way about the stage any too well. That is probably due to insufficient opportunity for stage rehearsals, and one or two more evenings should put matters right. The orchestra do well enough; one is conscious, of course, that the score has had to be arranged, but it is an intelligent arrangement, in which the balance of orchestral tone is maintained, even when the tone is not of the particular quality that Mozart wanted. And the gentleman at the piano (whose name did not appear) has a curious hypnotic power of suggesting that the upper octaves of that instrument are anything but what they seem to be.

R. O. M.

CONCERTS

Singers who specialize in folk-songs, especially those of the Celtic nationalities, are often tempted to win an easy popularity by an exaggeration of national temperament. The present fashion of singing elaborately dressed-up folk-songs at serious recitals has increased the temptation. To sing folk-songs well requires peculiar natural gifts; but these gifts are not in themselves sufficient to make an artistic singer. Miss Jean Nolan, described on her programme of March 24 as "the Irish mezzo-soprano," relies too much on being merely Irish. Indeed, so aggressively Irish was her programme that one wondered why she should have trouble to put in two very hackneyed songs of Scarlatti and a small group of French and Russian songs, which only exposed her technical shortcomings. Her voice is strong, but harsh and uneven in quality. With more careful training she might, perhaps, become an effective singer in the emotional style. At present she seems to aim at being not so much a singer as a "disease.

At the "Modern Trio's" concert on March 24 a new sonata for violincello and piano-dorfa by Dr. Ernest Walker was introduced. It is a numbers self-conscious, "classical" piece of work. Neither the passionate outbursts of the first movement nor the careful gaiety of the third seemed very spontaneous or convincing; but the slow movement showed that for a certain contemplative thoughtfulness the idiom of Brahms can still be made sincerely expressive.

MUSICAL NOTES FROM PARIS

M. Gémier's latest production at the Cirque d'Hiver is entitled "La Grande Pastorale," and its form and subject is that of an old French "mystery play" staged and mounted à la Reinhardt. First of all he gave us "Edipus Rex" with the text, not of Sophocles, but of M. Saint-Georges de Boulérier, in which professional athletes and the now familiar "staircase" played an important part, while a concealed orchestra played Bach arrangements in the balcony: and now he introduces us to a mystery play, such as is still performed in certain villages in Provence, centring in the story of the Nativity, while the authentic local musical colour is provided by a troupe of genuine Marseilles' "Cigaloun Tambourinaires" specially recruited from the South of France for the production. This instrument, which should call the pipe and tabor, but the "drums" are long-shaped and of narrow circumference, and bigger than the English tabor. The music, for the most part consisting of arrangements, of old Provencal folk-tunes and dance-music, was attractive, and the Farandole, as danced in Provence, resembles in many ways the delightful Catalonian "Sardanas" both as regards the steps and the music which accompanies them. The whole production was picturesque, and certain scenes, such as the tableau representing the Adoration of the Magi, were particularly well realized. There were even moments of great beauty, which were marred, however, by the banality of the words put into the mouths of the actors representing Mary and Joseph, whereas their silence would have been far more impressive and would have enhanced the pictorial effect of such scenes as the Journey to Bethlehem, and the Nativity in the stable. The white donkey which carries Mary to Bethlehem charmed everyone by his grace and docility; but when not the donkey as an athlete, the shepherd dog both had parts to play, and acquitted themselves well. The crowd, as usual in such productions, had an important rôle, and, true to the Reinhardt theory of stage-management, did not confine itself to the stage (or rather "staircase"), but passed a good deal of its time wandering about the stalls. M. Gémier had not cast himself for any part, confining himself to the duties of metteur-en-scène, and this enabled him to give full play to his special gifts.

Efforts are being made at the present moment to blend together the Cubist movements in painting, literature and music. In pursuance of this aim a concert was given on the 11th at the Galerie de La Boétie, where the group of artists known as the "Section d'Or" are now holding an exhibition. The group includes such painters and sculptors as Malevitch, Goncharova, Marcoussis, Braque, Archipenko and Brancusi, and in a room hung with their more or less Cubist canvases, we listened to the latest compositions of Auric, Poulenc, Durey, Darius Milhaud, and a young girl composer, who is evidently very gifted, Mlle. Germaine Tailleferre. Poulenc's settings, for voice and small orchestra, of Guillaume de Machaut's "Le Bestiaire" (The Dromedary, The Thibetan Goat, The Grasshopper, The Tarp and The Carp) are altogether delightful. Milhaud's "Machines Agricoles" is much more "Cubist," and consists of short tonal descriptions, more or less realistic, of Reaping, Binding, Mowing-machines, etc., with a part for female voice.

M. Vincent d'Indy's opera "La Légende de St. Christophe" is in active rehearsal, and will shortly be produced at the Opéra.
Drama

MUSICAL COMEDY

Scala Theatre.—“Society, Ltd.” By A. Bramcombe and A. Carrington

MUSICAL Comedy is a convention, and therefore permissible; it is a convention which has never quite decided on itself, and is therefore without standards. To an uninitiated but analytical Tibetan this form of theatricals would, perhaps, appear to be the eternal balcony scene from melodrama, enhanced by a corps de ballet which does not, and is presumably unable to, dance. The joke is interpolated, that is to say a musical comedy contains about enough jokes to fill one issue of the London Mail. The tones are about the same.

Musical comedy obviously does not aim at pleasing the dramatic sense of the audience; nor yet the musical sense. Thus, in the specimen presented for our dissection we find the same old tunes out of “Florodora,” the familiar rhythms of the “Rajah of Bong,” and other heteroclite reminders of songs which are but a confused familiarity, dating back twenty years. There seems, however, to be no reason why musical invention should, or even would, be excluded if it were discoverable. It might be against the commercial economies to employ better musicians, but there is, so far as we can see, no reason preventing their entry into this field. The serious song about the brave T.B.D.s was, for one hearing at least, quite as good as the art-settings of Kipling which one hears in the “serious concerts.”

The versification of musical comedy is presumably the only active stage versification in England, unless we, with considerable tolerance, include the occasional translation of a movie “serious” opera libretto. Ta du se yee. I do not pretend to say whether or no this is what may be called a “hopeful sign.”

The remaining convention of musical comedy is the journey: this, I believe, exists as a convention in the classic plays of Japan, whence it can hardly be derivative, but it has no regular prototype in European drama. The curious mind may assign its contradiction of the unities to some obscure influence of the picareque novel; we take it as we find it: musical comedy and much melodrama insist on transportation en masse of the characters.

In fine, the musical play appeals neither to ear nor to dramatic sense, it is moreover conservative in décor. It inclines to garden scenes, beach or birch-abbreviation scenes and mannequin parades, but without appeal to the critical eye of the connoisseur or the artist; its scenic novelties must be “lovely” in the majorities’ acceptance of that term, the bold experimentalist is not wanted. Neither, apparently, are the strict sculptural or decorative senses, for if repetition is the essence of pattern, these senses would demand a certain strictness of application. The limbs, for instance, of the non-dancing chorus should, if the whole effect is to bear comparison with Greek vases, repeat, not contradict the given curves of the accepted type. The value of multiplicity on the stage is the same for these group scenes as for ballet; it follows the simple aesthetic principle that when the single object is not interesting enough to retain the eye, the entertainer must provide so many objects that no eye in the audience can quite exhaust its analytical process, the search for perfection must not receive a convincing negation. This profusion of variety should alternate with exactness of pattern, i.e., the silhouettes for this latter should be uniform or at least similar or graduated; if the chorus is made up of a job lot of varied types, the costume should have a unifying effect, when pattern is intended. Also the given costume should be applied to suitable types; it is not every group of eight young women who can wear poke-bonnets becomingly. Carelessness of these details has led many people to suggest that there is in musical comedy some other motive than strict appeal to the optic sense.

I am convinced that in England many discrepancies are tolerated and even unnoticed which would merely stir guffaws at La Gigue. With these restrictions “Society, Ltd.” is a “high-class musical comedy.” Miss MacVane has a rich contralto voice, which she should use ever for song, never for speech. The national caricatures by Bromley Challoner, T. Ryke, A. Roberts and H. A. Meynott are not unentertaining.

Marie Dainton is the cleverest member of the cast, or at any rate the part of Lady Whyte-Chappelle gives her greater opportunity for entertaining one. Miss Waring supplies the Vernon-Castle touch. The shadow of democracy or the resurgent ghost of Figaro casts in an occasional allusion to current events, and the serious five minutes devoted to the young sea rover are a more dignified allusion to the war than is to be found in several of the “more serious” current plays. The audience gave repeated signs of approval.

T. J. V.

VAUDEVILLE

The Coliseum.—“The Truth about the Russian Dancers.” By Sir J. M. Barrie.

One can learn more about le mot juste, more about prose style by studying George Mozart than by watching fifty Times leaders avoid the point on every possible issue. He is followed, at the Coliseum, by Miss Renée Kelly in a pretty frock and fifteen minutes’ worthless froth parody. Six Heralds do French country-fair acrobatics at great apparent risk to their necks. The Humskip Jazz has merits of a Malebolge variety.

Quale nell’arrazzana de’ Vinziani...
Chi ribatte da proda, e chi da poppa e...
Poi l’addentard con più di cento rafi...

All of these lines apply, yet the lingua Toscana, even at the bidding of so great a master, lacked certain staidness, certain clangings and clashings, now easily dispensed under the bushes of Pan and of Orpheus. After which arrived Sir James Matthew Barrie.

If, as one of our greatest critics has written, the test of genius is a general under-floor everywhere present in the work, but nowhere especially indicable, the converse must also be true. There are certain modes of imbecility which are, and of a right ought to be, called nauseating—certain aromas of mind which rise through a man’s writing as the smell of boiling cabbage ascends from the basement of a cheap lodging-house, filling all the interstices. You cannot pick it from the mantelpiece in the dining-room, you cannot detach it from the curtains in the third-floor back, and yet it is “everywhere present.”

In “The Truth about the Russian Dancers” Madame Karsavina reveals herself as an excellent choreographer. Paul Nash has designed costumes with true flair; they fit their purpose, they are not two-dimensional costumes which look well in a sketch, they have the three-dimensional quality which costumes should have. The inventions of Derain and Picasso are excellently applied. There is minor invention in the décor, which is what is needed: seeing that a mode has been established, there is no need of another revolution in decoration; there are now ample freedoms, and the welfare of the theatre merely demands that the mode be applied and exploited. Mr. Nash is definitely the right man for this sort of thing.

The footwork of the ballet is light and excellent, the grouping good; Karsavina dances pleasingly, mostly with her feet; she also has made some pretty innovations. She is not a great dancer; there is no great emotional force in her, nor do the dances of maternity and of resurrection differ very greatly in feeling; but her slight art has become very graceful and delicate.
Arnold Bax's music is also in keeping, and, if one may hazard an opinion from a single hearing, it is the best he has yet given us, despite certain banal passages. The whole performance would be delightful but for the intervention of Sir J. M. Barrie, whose fundamental silliness makes one look back even to the pathology of the Boutique Fantasque as towards something relatively clean and healthy if acrid.

T. J. V.

"OTHELLO" AT THE OLD VIC

THE production of "Othello" generally resolves itself nowadays into a choice between two methods. Either the play is turned frankly into a not altogether un-Shakespearian melodrama of the good, honest, go-ahead kind, or there are combined in its interpretation all the subtleties, all the more or less keenly imaginative conventionalities which are perhaps even less satisfying in the outcome. "Othello" is a work demanding fusion of these methods, yet at the Old Vic we have the spectacle of Mr. Russell Thorndike, as Iago, following the first of them exclusively, and Mr. Charles Warburton, as the Moor, following the second of them exclusively—with, of course, an incomplete success in either instance. Every one of the moments which are frankly melodramatic for the individual—for example, the penultimate scene of the fracas between Cassio and Roderigo—ought to have its corollary in a dozen which are not, and Mr. Thorndike not only conveyed little of the extreme subtlety of Iago, but he gave us a robust sort of rage with no deeper inspiration for his treachery than an innate blackguardism and the admiration of the gallery. Mr. Warburton's physique was a considerable handicap in his presentment of Othello; which partially explains why the gentleness of the Moor was never once relieved by the blind rage of a towering savage. Miss Florence Saunders and Miss Catherine Willard managed to bring conviction into their work as Desdemona and Emilia; and early in the evening we had, in the acting of Mr. Paterson as Brabantio, a perfect little cameo that relieved the scene in the council chamber of the air of tedium by which it is usually and unaccountably characterized.

T. M.

Correspondence

CHARLES BRADLAUGH AND GENERAL BOOTH

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sir,—I very much regret that the story of Mr. Bradlaugh's last words, quoted by me in a review of Mr. Begbie's book, should have caused pain to his daughter. I quoted it from Mr. Begbie's book, and, although I have not the review before me, my recollection is that I made it clear that I took no responsibility for the truth of the story. As for Mrs. Bonner's suggestion that I found lying rumours against a dead atheist "permissible," but "irrescuable when they concern a living Salvationist," surely it is disapproved by the fact that all my beliefs and sympathies are with the dead atheist and against the Salvationist, living or dead.

Yours, etc.,

L.W.

March 28, 1920.

THE PEOPLE'S THEATRE SOCIETY

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sir,—While thanking you for your notice of the performance given by the Curtain Group on March 14, will you allow us to point out that your contributor is mistaken in supposing that Mr. Bernard Shaw's "Heartbreak House" was announced for production by the "People's Theatre Society" (in which the Curtain Group is now merged)? Mr. Desmond certainly said in his speech that Mr. Shaw had been asked to sanction a production of his play by the Society, but he added that no reply had been received from him, and expressed a hope (shared by all the members of the Society) that the desired permission might ultimately be forthcoming.

The production of Mr. D. H. Lawrence's play "The Widowing of Mrs. Holroyd" is, on the other hand, in active preparation, and the date of the performance will be announced in due course. In conclusion, may we say that the People's Theatre Society intends to confine its productions as far as possible to plays of full length and to give the one-act play a rest?

Yours truly,

DOUGLAS GOLDRING,

HAROLD SCOTT

(Joint Hon. Secretaries, People's Theatre Society).

5, York Buildings, Adelphi, W.C.2,

March 27, 1920.

JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sir,—The task of writing my father's biography has been undertaken by Mr. J. L. Garvin. May I ask you to call the attention of your readers to this fact, and to say that I shall be greatly obliged if anyone with original material will place it at Mr. Garvin's disposition?

All letters and papers will be carefully treated, copied and returned. It is expected that the biography will be completed within two years, and anyone with material should kindly communicate with Mr. Garvin as soon as possible at 9, Greville Place, N.W.8.

Yours faithfully,

AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN.

March 25, 1920.

THE ONE THING CHEAPER

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sir,—By a recent decision of the Council of this Society the statutory entrance fee of two guineas is waived for the first 500 members elected in the year 1920. The annual subscription, which entitles members to the Journal of Hellenic Studies and the use of the library and slide collections, remains at a guinea.

If it is true that this is the only thing cheaper than before the war, I think we may be glad that it is so good a thing as easy access to the inexhaustible treasures of ancient Greece that has become so. Will those interested write for particulars and application form for membership?

Yours faithfully,

JOHN PENOYRE, Secretary,

The Society for the Promotion of Hellenic Studies, 19, Bloomsbury Square, W.C.

TCHEHOV AS A SAINT

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sir,—Compare these three quotations:

"Measured by the standards of Christian morality, Tchekhow was wholly a saint."—J. M. M. (The Athenæum, March 5, 1920).

If I can trust the case of my conscience, I have never by word or deed, in thought, or in my stories, or in my career, coveted my neighbour's wife, nor his man, nor his ox, nor any of his cattle, I have not stolen, nor been an hypocrite, I have not flattered the great nor sough their favour, I have not blackmailed, nor lived at other people's expense. It is true I have waxed wanton and slothful, have laughed heedlessly, have eaten too much and drank too much and been profane. But all that is a personal matter, and all that does not deprive me of the right to think that, as far as morals are concerned, I am nothing out of the ordinary, one way or the other. Nothing heroic and nothing scoundrelly—i am just like everyone else; I have many sins, but I am quits with morality, as I pay for these sins with interest in the discomfort they bring with them.—ANTON TCHEHOU (March 22, 1890).

A Disappointed Reader.

Edinburgh, March 6, 1920.
Foreign Literature

SOFFICI AT THE FRONT

KOBLEK. By Soffici. (Florence, Vallecchi. 3.50 lire.)

WHEN the Duchessa D’Aosta came to visit Soffici in hospital, and he accused her of being also among the authors, she admitted the charge, but with the difference that "vous en vous lit, moi on ne me lit pas." And undoubtedly Soffici is one of the young men who are read, and widely read, in Italy to-day, and no less undeniably does the renown of his experiences during the attack on the mountain of Koblek in the advance on to the Bainsizza plateau deserve the success it has scored. The egg which with he begins is the entertaining of the General at the regimental mess, where he unbent in a way that would astonish his British brethren, on the night before the battalion went up the line, while for dessert he gives us his talk with the witty Orléans princess. The actual fighting resolves itself largely into a duel between the brigade and a single machine-gun, securely hidden in its rock-shelter, where it held up the advance for two days—days which fill nearly a third of this book. So appalling was the August heat that an Austrian prisoner actually fell on his knees and began to drink deeply. By way of explaining his action, Soffici sets himself to relate all he saw and felt in the utmost detail, and, in spite of the occasional intervention of the Censor, he is extraordinarily successful in bringing it all vividly before us. "I felt no pity for the man," he says of a soldier killed as if in the act of standing to attention, heels together, hands to crease of trousers, "for as long as the battle lasts we are dead in spirit, but in his presence I realized more fully than ever before the greatness of the sacrifice the safety of the world is now demanding."

Soffici has little sympathy with Socialism, but he records that he was not the only officer moved to tears by the speech of Signor Bissolati at the front, though he noted without surprise that his eloquent appeal to the men was received in frigid silence. One thing the war has taught him, and that is the narrowness of his old life, when his friends were all—at least in their own opinion—either artists, poets, or philosophers. After two years of soldiering he has come to have very different feelings towards that great body of mankind "which we mass together and christen contemptuously 'Borghesia.'"

Not that our author is any the less an intellectual, though war was by no means altogether a horrible nightmare to him. When he reached the summit of Koblek, now held by his own brigade, almost fainting with heat and pain, his wounded eye done up in a dirty coloured handkerchief ornamented with the map of Italy, and first looked down on the great calcareous amphitheatre, unrelieved by a particle of shade, that stretched away from the peak Jelenik, amid the mob of troops shouting hoarsely "Water, water!" his commanding officer, Cassatì, once his fellow-student in Milan, did not forget his Stendhal even in the flush of victory, but actually began to compare him to Fabrizio Del Dongo until he realized the seriousness of his wound. On another occasion, noticing a book lying by three dead Austrian officers, whose faces were blackened beyond all human semblance, he picked it up and found it was Schopenhauer's "Die Welt als Wille und Vorstellung." He could almost have laughed, he tells us, at the fate of this pessimist, and "death in battle is so near to us all that we are driven to respect it even in the enemy."

L. C.-M.
had been used for ballet by Stesichorus. In "The Funeral Games of Pelias" he contrived to introduce, by song and dancing, all the picturesque adventures of the Argonauts, besides the witchcraft and the cruelty of Medea. In a poem on the Trojan expedition he contrived, by a device which modern ballet-masters in the search for a sensation might well imitate, to start his ballet with the orthodox presentation of a Helen who ran off with Paris and so caused the war, and to end it with the startling, pious, satisfactory discovery that the fair goddess Helen had been slandered: she had never been to Troy; mischief had sent a phantom image of her lovely person to the doomed city, and it was about a phantom, not a woman, that the wretched Greeks and Trojans waged their war. In this apology the poet cried "he had been blind"—and so arose the legend that the golden Helen smote him with blindness for his slander, and restored his sight in consideration of his palinode. Dr. Vurtheim thinks, and we agree, that both the "slander" and the recantation occurred in one great poem. There are few treasures we would rather have from Egypt than a papyrus roll containing this delightful composition. And yet there are some others which we covet even more. If only Egypt would restore its "Galcyx," the tales of a Sicilian madman who loved the "brilliant youth Euthales, and who, when Aphrodite did not grant her prayer, leaped from the Leucadian cliff to death; or, best of all, the story of that other tragic lover, Daphnis! For it was Stesichorus of Himera, not Theocritus, who first gave to European literature the famous theme of the sad shepherd for whose death "the oaks on the banks of Himera's river lamented."

J. T. SHEPARD.

THE DIARY OF ANTON TCHEHOV

Translated by S. KOTELIANSKY and KATHERINE MANSFIELD

[There are few entries in Tchehov's Diary, which is here given completely.]

1886.

MY neighbour V. N. S. told me that his uncle, Fet-Sheshlin, the famous poet, when driving through the Mokhovaia, would invariably each time let down the window of his carriage and spit at the University. His coachman got so used to it that every time he drove past the University he would stop and wait for Fet to spit.

In January I was in Petersburg and stayed with the Souvorins. I often saw Potapenko, frequently met Korolenko and once went to the Maly Theatre. As Alexander and I came downstairs, we came across a man maliciously out of the editorial office of the Novoe Vremya and said to me indignantly: "Why do you set old Souvorin against Barenin?" I have never spoken badly of the contributors of the Novoe Vremya in Souvorin's presence, although I deeply despise the majority of them.

In February, passing through Moscow, I went to see Leo Tolstoy. He was irritated, passed bitter remarks on the literary decadents, and for an hour and a half argued with B. Tchitcherin, who, I thought, talked nonsense all the time. Tatyana and Marya [Tolstoy's daughters] laid out a patience; they both wished, and asked me to pick out a card, and I picked out for each of them separately the ace of spades; that grieved them. It turned out that accidentally two aces of spades were in the pack. Both of them are extraordinarily sympathetic, and their attitude towards their father is touching. The countess criticized the painter Gé all the evening. She too was irritated.

May 5. The sexton Ivan Nicolayevitch brought my portrait, which he has painted from a photograph. In the evening V. N. S. brought his friend N. [who is [...] director of the literary department of the editor of the magazine [...] and doctor of medicine. [...] He produces the impression of an unusually stupid person and a reptile. He said that "there's nothing more pernicious on earth than a rascally liberal newspaper," and told us that the peasants whom he doctors, having got his advice and medicine free of charge, ask him for a tip. He and S. speak of peasants with exaggeration and loathing.

July 1. I was at the Vagankov Cemetery and saw there the graves of the victims of the Khodinka [during the coronation of Nicholas II, in which hundreds of people were crushed to death on the Khodinka Square]. I. Pavlovsky, the Paris correspondent of the Novoe Vremya, came with me to Melihovo.

August 4. Opening of the school in Talij. The peasants of Talij, Bershov, Dubtechnia and Sholkoovo presented me with four loaves, and two silver salt-cellars. The Sholkoovo peasant Postnov delivered a speech.

August 15-18. I stayed with me. He has been forbidden to publish anything; he speaks contemptuously now of G.'s son, who said to the new Chief of the Press that he was not going to sacrifice his weekly Nedelya for N.'s sake. "We are always ready to meet the wishes of the Censorship." In fine weather N. walks in galoshes, and carries an umbrella so as not to die of sunstroke; he is afraid to wash in cold water, complains of heart-palpitations. From me he went on to Leo Tolstoy.

I left Taganrog on August 24. In Rostov I had supper with a school-friend, I. Volkenstein, barrister, who has already a house in town and a bungalow in Kislovodsk in the Caucasus. I was in Nakhichevan—what a change! The streets are lit by electric light. In Kislovodsk, at the funeral of General Safonov, I met Tchouproff [a famous professor of political economy]. Afterwards I met Vesselyov. On the 29th, I went on a hunting party with Baron Steinig; the evening was speckled with a cold, with a violent wind.

September 2. In Novorossisk. Steamer "Alexander II." On the 3rd I arrived in Feodosia and stopped with Souvorin. I saw I. K. Aivasovsky [famous painter], who said to me: "You no longer want to see me, an old man."" I ought to have paid him a visit first. On the 16th in Kharkov at the theatre, "The Dangers of Intelligence." 17th, at home: wonderful weather.

Vladimir Solovtov told me that he always carried an oak-gall in his trouser pocket. In his opinion, it is a radical cure for piles.

October 17. Performance of my "Seagull" at the Alexandrovsky Theatre. It was not a success.

29th. I was at a meeting of the Zemstvo Council in Serpuhovo.

November 26. A fire broke out in our house. Count S. I. Shakhostkovsk took part in putting it out. When it was over, Sh. related that once at night, when a fire broke out in his house, he lifted a tank of water weighing 4½ cwt. and poured the water on the fire.

Dec. 4. For the performance of "The Seagull" on October 17, see Theatre, no. 9, p. 75. It is true that I fled from the theatre; but only when the play was near the end. During two or three acts I sat in L.'s dressing-room. During the intervals she was visited by uniformed officials of the State theatres with orders, P. with a Star, a young and handsome official of the Police Section of the Home Office. If a man takes up work which is alien to him, art for instance, and finds it impossible to become an artist, he infallibly becomes an official. What a lot of people, having put on a uniform, play the parasitic round science, the theatre, and painting! Just the same happens to those who find life alien, and are incapable of living it fully. Nothing remains for them but to become officials. The fat actresses in the dressing-room made themselves pleasant to the officials, were respectful and flattering, L. said how pleased she was that P. had got the Star at such an early age. They were like respectable old housekeepers, self-women whom the masters honoured with their presence.

Dec. 21. Levitan suffers from dilatation of the aorta. He keeps his chest clear with the help of his superb studies for pictures, and a passionate thirst for life.

Dec. 31. P. T. Seryogin, the landscape painter, came.

1897.

From January 10 to February 3 busy with the census. I am the numerator of the sixteenth district and have to instruct the other fifteen numerators of our section, Barykin. They all work superbly, except the priest of the Starospassky
The Shadow of a Child

Gilbert Tiennot. Par Marguerite Henry-Rosier. (Paris Grasset. 5fr.)

Every now and again we come upon a work which confounds criticism. It may be that it defies existing standards and still compels one’s admiration, making us mutter in our beards about genius and inspiration and so on, or it may be, as in the case of the novel before us, that it conforms in all appearance to the demands of a high standard and yet fails to “come off.”

There is no obvious reason why “Gilbert Tiennot” should not interest and convince; but as a matter of fact it does neither. We take no delight in the little boy whose childhood forms the subject of the book; we cannot visualize him as a real child, although Miss Henry-Rosier has attempted him in a technical method which is not assailable on principle. Perhaps the little boy does not live because he has been sacrificed to literary refinement and reticence. Perhaps the roses have faded from his cheeks because they could not be retained in the scheme of colour selected. Perhaps the picture would have been better if Miss Henry-Rosier had taken less trouble about the painting. Whatever the cause, the carefully mixed half-tones create not a harmony but a uniform neutral tint, and poor little Gilbert Tiennot appears but a colourless shadow of a child.

W.
List of New Books
Prepared in co-operation with the Library Association.

The method of classification adopted is a series of groups roughly corresponding with the Dewey Decimal System, the sub-classes being indicated, for the benefit of librarians and others familiar with the system, by the class-numbers given at the end of each entry. The first numeral in these represents the main class, the second one of the subdivisions, and so on.

Those works in the List which appear most suitable for purchase by Public Library Authorities are marked with an asterisk.

200 RELIGION.

The date and authorship of this remarkable work are doubtful. Dr. Crafer inclines to the idea that the date may be about 410 A.D., but it is just possible that it is of a century earlier. The author, it is suggested, was "a man bearing the very common name of Macarius, who was not a bishop, but came from Magnesia, and ... had settled in Syria at the time that he wrote his book." The answers to the objections to Christianity, according to the editor, were perhaps worked up by Macarius Magnes, the Bishop of Magnesia, "who is heard of in A.D. 403.

*Lea (Thomas Simcox) and Bond (Frederick Bligh). Materials for the Study of the Apostolic Gnosis, Part I. Oxford, Blackwell, 1919. 9 in. 127 pp., 15/ n. 225

In the introduction to this work, which is stated to be the first instalment of an accumulation of facts supplementary to a volume published in 1917, the authors aver that "Number and geographical were ... the natural vehicles for the inculation of spiritual Knowledge, and hence a symbolism of Numbers, such as indubitably does occur in our sacred books, and in the sacred literature of old days, may, and indeed must, embody a spiritual thought, and a spiritual significance, in spite of the denials of modern biblical critics, who now frankly reject the idea of 'verbal inspiration,' not understanding the fuller sense of this phrase."

The authors give numerous instances of what are described in their "Apologia" as "quite indisputable facts illustrative in the first instance of a parallelism of meaning and of numerical values in the equivalent of the letters constituting words and phrases employed in the Greek text of Scripture and other writings of the apostolic or sub-apostolic period."

Paul (St.)

The profound and far-reaching influence of Pauline thought upon Christianity has led innumerable scholars and writers to study the life and works of the Apostle; and the author has endeavoured to bring together in a small compass "the best that has been written on the subject in recent years."

He has tried, in addition, to map out in the latter part of the book, as a result of independent study, the great field covered by St. Paul’s teaching.

Thomas (Honor), ed. The Five Lambeth Conferences. S.P.C.K., 1920. 9 in. 471 pp. index, 12/6 n. 283

See notice, p. 449.

This popularly written history by the Principal of Culham College is based upon a course of lectures formerly delivered at Cuddeson. Canon Whitham gives a very clear picture of the progress and vicissitudes of the Church during the centuries between the Apostolic age and the Great Schism in 1054. Questions are appended to each chapter, and the accompanying short lists of books will be of much assistance to the student.

The author, writing as "a layman who owes much to clergy and ministers," lays stress on the primitive simplicity of the early Church and aims, not at controversy, but at showing the devotion of the disciples to their Lord. The need of to-day, says Mr. Wilson, is "a missionary ardour and effort, a passion for the conquest of men's hearts and affections, an impulse towards comfort and rescue and healing and conciliation.

300 SOCIOLOGY.

The present volume contains a further portion of this comprehensive and erudite history by the late Emeritus Professor of Civil Law at Cambridge. Nearly the whole of the text was in type at the time of his death, and little editing has been necessary. A considerable quantity of matter for the volume on the Republic is in existence, but it is uncertain whether it is in such a state as to admit of its being published as a book under the author's name.

*Dowdall (Harold Chaloner). Local Development Law: a survey of the powers of Local Authorities in regard to housing, roads, lands, buildings, and town-planning. Fisher Unwin (1920), 9 in. 231 pp. biblog. app. index, 10/6 n. 352.04

The aspect of the law relating to the important problems which are associated with the improvement of the country, "upon the most convenient, healthy, economic, and agreeable lines," should be particularly useful to local councillors and to officials engaged in administrative and executive work under the Acts of Parliament concerned. The main sections of Mr. Dowdall's book deal with Town Improvement and Planning apart from schemes under the Town-Planning Acts; with schemes under the Acts; with "Private (Local) Act of Parliament"; and with the acquisition of land.

See review, p. 445.

Pollock (Sir Frederick). The League of Nations. Stevens, 1920. 9½ in. 267 pp. biblogs. app., index, 10/.

The author's purpose is to give a practical exposition of the Covenant of the League of Nations, "with so much introduction as appears proper for enabling the reader to understand the conditions under which the League was formed and has to commence its work."

He deals with authentic documents and to other publications, which are given at the heads of some of the chapters, are of material assistance to the reader. The impatient and the pessimistic concerning the future of the Covenant will do well to bear in mind the wise saying of Colbert, quoted by Sir Frederick: "Il ne faut jamais se mettre dans l'esprit que ce que l'on fait est parfait. Mais il faut toujours chercher à avancer pour approcher de la perfection, qu'on ne trouve jamais."

Returning to civil life after serving as a captain of artillery, M. Souchon writes as he thinks the majority of combatants would write. The long and terrible war was only a crisis—a bloody one—in all the crises which the world must traverse before finding her balance. There is no reason to despair or to rejoice, but it is certain that we must take precautions. Unfortunately, there is too feverish an enthusiasm for idealistic objects, such as the Société des Nations. Instead of taking precautions, a section of the nation seems to be returning to pre-war indolence. But let us not forget that the first society of nations ended in the Tower of Babel.

600 USEFUL ARTS.

Gilbreth (Frank B. and Lilian Moller). Motion Study for the Handicapped. Routledge, 1920. 9 in. 181 pp. ill., 8/6 n. 613.72

See review, p. 452.

By the cold-pack method, which requires no complicated equipment, and simply means that the fruit, vegetables, greens, soups, meats, or fish are packed cold in their fresh and natural state, the writer claims that busy housewives may "can" everything that grows, the full flavour being retained. Much of the terminology is American, and such ingredients as okra, sweet corn, and certain plans are not to be had in England; nevertheless, the book gives very many practical hints that will be useful.

Millinery. By Laurette ("Handy Books for Shoppers"). Grafton [1920]. 7½ in. 48 pp. ill. appps. boards, 2 n. 646 "Every woman, we are told in this book, "should set out to choose a new hat in a spirit of great adventure." The useful information is accompanied by the flavor with reference to foundations, linings, trimmings, feathers, ribbons and ornaments should be helpful to many.

Walsh (James J.). Medieval Medicine ("Medical History Manuals"). Black, 1920. 8 in. 233 pp. ill. appps. index, 76 n. 610.9

A work of considerable interest, the author of which stresses the extent of the knowledge of medicine and surgery in the Middle Ages, and its intimate relation to Greek influences. Medieval surgeons appear to have experimented with surgical operations that might produce amputations; and there were attempts at plastic surgery. Some of the hospitals were in many respects admirable. It is noteworthy that the medical school of Salerno was open to women students, and that numbers of women in the Middle Ages studied and taught medicine, were consulted on medical-legal questions, and in general were looked upon by their medical brethren as colleagues in practically every sense of the word.

700 Fine Arts.

Maxwell (Donald). The Last Crusade; with 100 sketches in colour, monochrome, and line, made by the author in the autumn and winter of 1918, when sent on duty to Palestine by the Admiralty for the Imperial War Museum Lane, 1920. 10 in. 163 pp. ill., 25 n. 759.2

One of the surprises of the War Exhibition was the beautiful series of nocturnes and other pictures illustrating the operations in the Holy Land, contributed by Mr. Donald Maxwell. They reminded one now of Whistler, and then of Turner; like many other modern artists, he made beauty of the most forbidden material. These and many other pictures and sketches are reproduced here—some of which are the most artfully and accompanied by a readable account of his doings, which is not mere perfunctory padding, but bears much the same relation to the sketches as the concert programme does to the music.

Thomson (Ella Franklin). Lace ("Handy Books for Shoppers"). Grafton [1920]. 7½ in. 47 pp. gloss appps. boards, 2 n. 746

The would-be buyer of lace, whether hand-made or machine-made, will find a good deal of practical information in this little book. The list of varieties of lace, and the glossary of terms, are likely to be useful.

The considerable development of village clubs as a focus for social, recreational, and cultural activities has made very opportune this handbook to their organization, planning, and architecture. No better form of war memorial can well be devised than a beautiful and commodious village hall, and the recent extension of the Public Libraries Acts to rural districts is bound to stimulate the growth of many such halls as an appendage, or the converse, of the village library. Mr. Weaver wrote before the recent Act was passed, and is already a little out of date in some other information; but his plans, elevations, interiors and miscellaneous advice are of extreme value at the present time, and such a foundation as the Kensington Village Club, with ample provision for all sorts of needs and its comely architecture, sets an ideal standard that will, we hope, prove an inspiration.

790 Amusements, Games, Sports.

Elson (J. C.) and Trilling (Blanche M.). Social Games and Group Dances; a collection of games and dances suitable for community and social use. Lippincott, 1919. 8 in. 258 pp. il. bibliog., 76 n. 793

To devise games and dances which remove or diminish stiffness and self-consciousness in either youthful or mature persons thrown into each other's society is to render no small service, and it is claimed that many of the games and group dances described in this readable and practical book achieve the end in view. They are said to keep the members of a group wholesomely occupied, and to make them feel at home with each other.

800 Literature.

Burnet (John). The Greek Strain in English Literature. English Association (pamphlet 45), Feb., 1920. 10 in. 8 pp. paper, 1 n. 820.4

In this lecture Professor Burnet makes some interesting comments on Lorenzo's panegyric of music in the "Merchant of Venice." He shows that Lorenzo is retelling the doctrines of Plato's "Timeus," and makes several suggestions about the channels through which Platonism found its way into Shakespeare's mind.

Macleod (Ronsby). The Professor's Love-Life: letters of Ronsby Macleod. New York, Macmillan Co., 1919. 8 in. 188 pp., 9 n. 816.5

Published at the wish of a woman, now dead, that they might help to the betterment of life, these beautiful letters were written by a man in extreme ill-health to the girl he loved, and from whom he was for ever separated by his disease. The final letter was written when he was dying, and almost too weak to hold the pen. The writer was evidently a man of high standards and ideals.

Mason (H. C.). The Inner Court. Heath Cranton [1919]. 8 in. 96 pp. il. boards, 5 n. 824.9

Short essays, dealing with such themes as peace, love, sympathy, altruism, beauty, and knowledge. The illustrations are pleasing.

Tolstoy (Count Leo Nicolaevitch). Reformation (performed at the St. James's Theatre, London). A translation by Mr. and Mrs. Aylmer Maude of Tolstoy's "The Living Corpse," Constable [1919]. 7½ in. 78 pp. paper, 2 n. 891.72

The play, which was left by the author in a somewhat unfinished condition, was discussed in The Athenæum for October 10, 1919, p. 1011.

Trine (Ralph Waldo). Through the Sunlit Year; a book of helpful thoughts for each day through the year from the writings of Ralph Waldo Trine. Jell, 1920. 7½ in. 253 pp. boards, 5 n. 814.5

A collection of 'thoughts,' one for every day in the year. On February 18, for instance, the reader is asked to ponder on the following: "Be true to the highest within your own soul, and then allow yourself to be governed by no customs or conventionalities or arbitrary man-made rules that are not founded upon principle." This dreadful incitement to Bolshevism, conscientious objection, Sinn Feir and so on is, however, mitigated by succeeding thoughts. We fear, however, that this is merely to camouflage Mr. Trine's deep designs, for on April 19 exactly the same sinister thought is presented for our meditation. What is the significance of these two dates? Perhaps some Baconian cipher experts may solve the problem.

Poetry.

Love is the theme of most of Mr. Cohen's sketches—love treated with gravity or with a rather painful sprightliness.
We quote an example which may be taken as grave or gay according to taste:

*Listen to the cooling dove (O how sweet! O how sweet!)
Speeding to my daily trust
With my love upon the phone,
Me the mellow voice enticed
By resemblance to her own.*

The language in which these poems of religious experience are written is the traditional language of mysticism. Fire and flame, the Mystic Rose, the Rose of Beauty, wings, light, the Great Pulse—these words and phrases, with others of a similar character, recur again and again in Miss Martin's verse. But the use of mystical phraseology is not in itself enough to make a good poem. The traditional language of mysticism, like traditional poetic diction, must be touched by a master hand if it is to become the substance of poetry. Anyone who has read Samuel Pordage's rhymed version of Boehme's philosophy will appreciate this fact. We do not mean to compare Miss Martin with Samuel Pordage; we believe her to be, on the whole, a better poet than "Iame Mephibosheth, the wizard's son." All that we would do is to suggest that she relies a little too much on the forceful symbolism of the mystics, and too little on her own powers to make a poet interesting.

Fluencia—one of the most dangerous infirmities of poetical minds—is Mr. More's chief enemy. The beads in his chaplet of sonnets go slipping through his fingers with a fatal facility.

O amber ships aloft on beryl seat—
With all your silken sails a-spread for gales
That bear you swiftly from our sullen vales
To happy island.

He can write lines as good as these by the hundred. The trouble is that he does not write better ones.

Rundall (Joan). Peat Smoke; and other verse. Deane & Sons, 1919. 71 in. 60 pp. boards, 2/6 n. 821.9

In their quiet and unobtrusive way these verses have a certain charm and beauty of their own. One cannot quote anything of outstanding merit, but there is throughout a reflective melancholy which one cannot but find sympathetic.

822.33 SHAKESPEARE.

FICTION.

Stated to be by a new author, this detective story displays forcefulness and "go." The violent death of a fascinating adventurer leads to a prolonged inquiry, which is conducted by Paul Harvey, a special investigator, "with ardour and acumen. A business girl materially helps him; and the stirring drama ends in an unexpected conclusion.

See notice, p. 461.

The "Percy Reprints," of which this is the first, deserve to be successful. Mr. Brett-Smith is an editor who combines accurate scholarship with good critical judgment, an editor from whom one can be certain of getting a good text and an introduction worth reading. With him the soul of the series will be safe; its body well-being, if we may judge from the excellent printing and binding of the present volume, is the object of Mr. Blackwell's tenderest care. "Jacke Wilton" has been reprinted three times within the last half-century, but always in expensive or limited editions. In the "Percy Reprint" it is within the reach of all lovers of literature.

Poets and poetry take a very prominent place in this story. Julian Tarrant, having gained fame as one of the greatest poets of the day, decides at the age of forty to adopt a child, and persuades a friend to choose one from among the children who are being cared for at a convent. As the girl grows up she develops a remarkable gift for poetry, and Julian is insensibly attracted by her. Whence comes her talent? Is it due to environment or heredity? The author draws her characters skillfully. The war enters into the later part of the book.

This book is a trenchant indictment of obsolete systems of estate-management. The village of Upworthy consists of aesthetically beautiful, but insanitary cottages, with leaking roofs and open drains. The Lady of the Manor, charitable according to her lights, and gracious, leaves the management of her property to a rascally bailiff, and the local authorities are afraid to interfere. A young doctor with modern ideas comes upon the scene. In his attempts to improve matters for the villagers he is at first regarded by their "betters" as if he were Ibsen's "Enemy of Society." How he ultimately triumphs is splendidly shown in Mr. Vachell's excellent story.

Ward (Mary Augusta, Mrs. Humphry). Harvest. Collins [1920]. 8 in. 284 pp., 7/6 n.

910 GEOGRAPHY, TOPOGRAPHY, ANTIQUITIES, &c.

Collins (Joseph). Italy Revisited: My Italian Year, 1917-1918. Fisher Unwin [1920]. 8 in. 315 pp., 10/6 n. 914.3

See review, p. 448.

These documents, the English of which is on the pages opposite to the Latin, relate to a variety of topics. Among them are the Statute of Labourers, 1498; fairs, and the amusements of the people; the value of money in the fifteenth century; and Royal Pardons. The introduction and the footnotes are scholarly and illuminative.

920 BIOGRAPHY.

See notice, p. 442.

940 THE GREAT EUROPEAN WAR.

Hody (E. H.). With "The Mad 17th" to Italy. Allen & Unwin [1920]. 8 in. 100 pp. ill. map, 10/6 n. 940.9

See review, p. 448.

Goldsmid (Cyril H.). Diary of a Liaison Officer in Italy, 1918. Williams & Norgate, 1920. 71 in. 186 pp. por. ill. map, index, 7/6 n. 940.9

See review, p. 448.

Sobel (L.), K. Romance. Florence, Valllecchi, 1919. 8 in. 206 pp. paper, 3.50 lire. 940.9

See review, p. 459.
A. & C. BLACK'S SPRING LIST.

WAR POSTERS
ISSUED BY ALL THE Belligerent Powers.
Selected and Edited by Captain Martin Hardie, A.R.E., and Arthur K. Sabin.
Large crown quarto, cloth.
Price 25s. net.

OUR ITALIAN FRONT.
Painted by Captain Martin Hardie, A.R.E.
Described by H. Warner Allen.
With 50 full-page illustrations in colour and a sketch map.
Price 25s. net.

THE SALONICA FRONT.
Painted by William T. Wood, R.W.S.
Described by Captain A. J. Mann, R.A.E.
With 32 full-page illustrations in colour and 8 in black and white; also a sketch map. Square demy 8vo, cloth.
Price 25s. net.

BUCKS AND BERKS.
Painted by Sutton Palmer.
Described by G. E. Mitchell.
With 50 full-page illustrations and a sketch map.
Square demy 8vo, cloth.
Price 25s. net.

OUTLINES OF THE HISTORY OF BOTANY.
By R. J. Harvey-Gibbon, M.A., F.R.S.E., Professor of Botany in the University of Liverpool.
Demy 8vo, cloth.
Price 12s. 6d. net.

A ST. ANDREW'S TREASURY OF SCOTTISH VERSE.
Selected, arranged and Edited by Mrs. Alexander Lawson and Alexander Lawson, M.A., Hon. D.D., Berry Professor of English Literature in the University of St. Andrews.
Post 8vo, cloth.
Price 7s. 6d. net.

X-RAYS IN GENERAL PRACTICE.
A HANDBOOK FOR THE GENERAL PRACTITIONER AND STUDENT.
By Alice Vance Knox, M.B., B.Ch.
With Chapters on Instrumentation by Robert Knox, M.D., C.M., M.R.C.S., L.R.C.P.
Crown 8vo, cloth, with many illustrations.
Price 12s. 6d. net.

FUNDAMENTALS IN SEXUAL ETHICS.
AN INQUIRY INTO MODERN TENDENCIES.
By S. Herbert, M.D., M.R.C.S., L.R.C.P., author of "The Physiology and Psychology of Sex," etc.
Large crown 8vo, cloth.
Price 10s. 6d. net.

MERCHANT ADVENTURES, 1914-1919.
By P. A. Hook, with a foreword by the Rt. Hon. Lord Inchcape of Strathnaver, G.C.M.G., G.C.I.E.
Large crown 8vo, cloth, containing 27 full-page illustrations from photographs and engravings.
Price 21s. net.

WHO WAS WHO?
1897-1916.
THE BIOGRAPHIES OF THOSE IN "WHO'S WHO" WHO HAVE DIED DURING THE ABOVE 20 YEARS.
By C. A. Millard.
Demy 8vo, cloth.
Price 25s. net.

ATHENA.
P. 1.
Edited by C. A. Millard.
Demy 8vo, cloth.
Price 25s. net.

BLACK'S GARDENING DICTIONARY.
Edited by E. T. Ellis, F.R.H.S.
Demy 8vo, cloth, uniform in style with Black's Medical Dictionary and other Books of Reference.
Price 10s. 6d. net.

BLACK'S DOMESTIC DICTIONARY.
Edited by Edith A. Brown, F.R.G.S., Lecturer at Harrod's Stores, 1917-1918, on Ways and Means in War Time, Ex-demonstrator for Fruit and Vegetable Preserving Branch of Food Production Department, etc.; and Myriam Rothschild, Organizer and Director of various War Hostels and Food Supply Centres, etc.
Demy 8vo, cloth.
Price 10s. 6d. net.

The "Artist's Sketchbook" Series.

NEW VOLUMES.

NORWICH. By E. V. Cole.
DURHAM. By R. J. Bertram.
Price 2s. 6d. net each.

NEW EDITIONS.

ADVICE TO CONSUMPTIVES.
HOME TREATMENT AND AFTER CARE.
By Nori. B. Bardswell, M.R.C.P., Medical Superintendent of King Edward VII. Sanatorium, Midhurst.
Price 3s. 6d. net.

THE SWING IN GOLF, AND HOW TO LEARN IT.
By A. Q. Large crown 8vo, cloth.
Price 2s. 6d. net.

STUDIES IN FOSSIL BOTANY.
By D. H. Scott, M.A., Ph.D., F.R.S.
Price 25s. net.

EARLY GREEK PHILOSOPHY.
By J. Burnet, M.A., LL.D., Professor of Greek in the United Colleges of St. Salvator and St. Andrew, St. Andrews.
Price 10s. 6d. net.

A PRIMER OF SOCIALISM.
By Thomas Kirkup.
Third Edition, revised and partly rewritten, by Edward R. Pease, Secretary to the Fabian Society.
Crown 8vo.
Price 2s. 6d. net.

JOTTINGS OF AN ALLOTMENT GARDENER.
A BOOK FOR ALL FOOD GROWERS.
By E. T. Ellis.
Price 1s. 6d. net.

NEW EDITIONS.

EDINBURGH AND ENVIRONS. By G. E. Mitton.
GLASGOW AND THE CYLDE. By G. E. Mitton.
SCOTLAND. By G. E. Mitton.

SUSSEX. By J. E. Morris.
PARIS. By C. Mathon.
TROSSACKS. By G. E. Mitton.

For complete List write to the Publishers.
Appointments Vacant

UNIVERSITY OF LONDON.—University READERSHIP in ITALIAN tenable at University College, VACANT owing to the appointment of Dr. Edmund Gardner to the Chair of Italian in the University of Manchester. Salary £400 a year. Applications (12 copies) must be received not later than first post on May 29, 1920, by the ACADEMIC REGISTRAR, University of London, South Kensington, S.W.7, from whom further particulars may be obtained.

CITY OF LONDON COLLEGE.

THE GOVERNORS invite APPLICATIONS for the position of DIRECTING HEAD of the City of London College. The commencing salary is £1,000 per annum. Candidates must possess first-class educational qualifications and a capacity for general administration and organisation and a wide experience of trade and commerce both at home and abroad.

Forms of application can be obtained from the SECRETARY of the College either personally or on receipt of a stamped directed foolscap envelope.

DAVID SAVAGE, Secretary.
White Street, Moorfields, E.C.2.

COUNTY HIGH SCHOOL, ILFORD.

APPLIcATIONS are invited for the following appointments:—
(a) MASTER to teach ECONOMICS (Advanced Course) and ENGLISH (Boys’ School). Commencing salary £200 to £275 per annum, according to qualifications and experience. Increments and maximum according to County Council Scale.
(b) SPANISH MASTER for three days per week—Monday, Wednesday and Friday. Salary £180 per annum.

Applications to be made on forms to be obtained by sending stamped addressed foolscap envelope to the Clerk to the Governors.

COUNTY BOROUGH OF STOKE-ON-TRENT EDUCATION COMMITTEE.

HANLEY SECONDARY SCHOOL.

WANTED for April 19, an ASSISTANT MASTER with some experience in Secondary School Work for General Subjects in the lower forms.

Salary according to qualifications and Scale, plus a War Bonus of £65 per annum.

Forms of application (which should be duly filled up and returned to the Director of Education not later than April 12, 1920) may be obtained on receipt of a stamped addressed envelope from Dr. W. LUDFORD FREEMAN, Director of Education.

Education Offices, Town Hall, Hanley, Stoke-on-Trent.
April 1, 1920.

OLDHAM EDUCATION COMMITTEE.

MUNICIPAL SECONDARY SCHOOL.

REQUIRED, as soon as possible, a FORM MASTER, with good qualifications in History. Salary minimum £180, maximum £450.

Application form and scale of salaries from the undersigned.

W. KERSHAW,
Secretary for Education.
Education Offices, Oldham, March, 1920.

DERBY SCHOOL OF ART.

HEAD MASTER is required for the Derby School of Art to commence duties as soon as possible.

Commencing salary, £500.

Further particulars may be obtained from the undersigned, to whom applications should be forwarded not later than April 14, 1920.

F. C. SMITHARD,
Secretary to the Education Committee.
Education Office, Becket Street, Derby.
March 28, 1920.

BOROUGH OF SWINDON.

SECONDARY SCHOOL AND TECHNICAL INSTITUTION.

Principal: G. H. BURKHARDT, M.Sc.

APPLICATIONS are invited for the POST of HEAD MASTER OF THE ART DEPARTMENT. Applicants must have had experience of teaching and organisation in a School of Art and in a Secondary School. Salary according to new scale, a copy of which, together with further particulars and form of application, may be obtained from the Principal, Technical Institution, Swindon.

W. SEATON,
Secretary.

Appointments Vacant

WANTED for Country House SECRETARY GOVERNESS to teach English subjects to girl of seven who has French resident governess. Experience in teaching summarising data for literary work, also shorthand and typing essential. Salary £100 per year resident. Apply Box H, Advertisement Department, THE ATHENÆUM 170, Fleet Street, E.C.4.

Scholarships, etc.

THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC, SOUTH KENSINGTON, LONDON, S.W.7.

Incorporated by Royal Charter, 1883.

Patron: His Majesty The King.

President: H.R.H. THE PRINCE OF WALES, K.G.
Director: HUGH P. ALLEN, Esq., M.A., Mus. Doc.

Application: GEORGE A. MACMILLAN, Esq., D.Litt.

COMPETITION FOR SIXTEEN FREE OPEN SCHOLARSHIPS in May and June, 1920, as follows:

PIANOForte … … … … … … … … … … 2
SINGING … … … … … … … … … … 2
VIOLONCELLO … … … … … … … 1
VIOLIN … … … … … … … … … … 2
ORGAN … … … … … … … … … … 2
COMPOSITION … … … … … … 2
BASSOON … … … … … … … … … 1
HORN … … … … … … … … … … 2
CLARINET … … … … … … … … … 1
FLUTE … … … … … … … … … … 1

The Scholarships are open to all classes of His Majesty’s subjects, within the prescribed limits of age stated in the particulars issued to applicants. They entitle the holders to a thorough and systematic free education at the College only, in theoretical and practical music, and as a rule, tenable for a period of three years. In some cases grants towards maintenance are added, but these cannot be decided until after the election of the scholars has taken place.

Preliminary examinations will be held on Wednesday, May 26, 1920, in various local centres throughout the United Kingdom, and the final competition will take place at the College about June 9, 1920.

All persons desirous of competing must apply on the official entry forms, which may be obtained with all particulars from the College, Prince Consort Road, South Kensington, London, S.W.7.

The last day for receiving these forms, which must be accompanied by an official stamped registrar’s certificate of birth, is April 21, 1920.

CLAUDE AVELING, Registrar.

Literary

ESSAY PRIZE OF 300 GUINEAS.

The CARNEGIE TRUST for the Universities of Scotland offers a Prize of 300 Guineas for the best “SURVEY OF ANGLO-AMERICAN HISTORY,” the author to be a graduate of any of the Scottish Universities who were under 21 January 1, 1921, is not of over ten years’ standing from the date of his first graduation. Award will be made only where the essay is judged worthy of publication.

Essays, with mottoes and sealed notes containing a declaration by the writers that the essays are bona fide their own production, must be lodged, on or before April 15, 1921, with the Secretary of the Trust, The Merchants’ Hall, Edinburgh.

Financial

FRUIT GROWING in SOUTH AFRICA offers an unequalled opportunity for men with a capital of not less than £2,000. The African Realty Trust, Ltd. (capital £401,000 fully subscribed) of 36, New Broad Street, E.C.2, is developing large areas in the Transvaal and Cape Colony for growing oranges, pineapples, peaches, etc., under conditions which provide for all the comforts of civilization, combined with the advantages of an open-air life in healthy fever-free areas. Ample native labour for farm work and domestic purposes. Taxation negligible. Write for particulars.
Art Exhibitions

R.W.S. ROYAL SOCIETY OF PAINTERS
IN WATER-COLOURS.
174th EXHIBITION NOW OPEN, 10 till 6.
5a, PALL MALL, EAST (near National Gallery)

DAILY and SUNDAYS, 10 till 6 UNTIL 29 APRIL.

AUGUSTUS E. JOHN'S War, Peace Conference, and Other
Portraits.
THE GALLERY OF THE ALPINE CLUB, Mill Street, Conduit
Street, W.
"There is one thing Mr. Augustus John has above his contemporaries; that is, an instinct for painting." —Morning Post.
"It needs no prophetic insight to foretell that the exhibition .
will be one of the sensations of the season." —Daily News.

ETCHINGS BY IAN STRANG
THE CENILG GALLERY
by the Town Hall, Chelsea.

NEW ART SALON,
160, Shaftesbury Avenue, W.C.2.
Now on Exhibition. Blaker, Cezanne, Derain, Friez, Nina Hamnet, Gros, Laurencin, Modigliani, Meninsky, Nevinson, John Nash.

Sales by Auction

PRINTED BOOKS, THE PROPERTY OF LORD MOSTYN
Messes. SOTHEBY, WILKINSON & HODGE
WILL BE SOLD BY AUCTION, at their Large Galleries, 34 and 35, New Bond Street, W.I., on Friday, April 16, at 1 o'clock precisely.
Valuable PRINTED BOOKS, the Property of the Lord Mostyn, Mostyn Hall, Mostyn, Cheshire, comprising EARLY ENGLISH and SCOTTISH LITERATURE, including S. Brandon Vertueus
Octavia, 1598; James Shirley Poems, 1646; Roger Ascham Toxophilus, 1511; Lord Bacon Essays, 1625; T. F. Newes from the North, 1579; Sir David Lyndsay Warkis, 1568; Chaucer Works, 1561; Hakluyt Voyages, 1598-1600, &c.; RARE
AMERICAN, including Henry Hudson Descriptio Detections
Preti, 1615; John Lederer Discoveries, 1672; Increase Mather
Brief History of the War with the Indians, 1676; New England's Emigions, 1659; and a very fine uncut set of the five rare folio tracts on the Indian Wars, 1675-7; HISTORICAL TRACS of GREAT INTEREST, on Henry VIII's Ecclesiastical Policy; Mary Queen of Scots; Spanish Armada; The Great Civil War, &c.; A FEW EARLY PRINTED BOOKS, including Petrarch
Canzoniere, 1473; St. Augustine de Civitate Dei., 1488; Columna Hypaneromachia Polipili, 1489; Gregorius Turenensis Opera, printed on vellum, 1522, &c.; EARLY WORKS ON Farming and Horticulture—Interesting Bindings, including one from Caxton's workshop, &c.
May be viewed Two days prior. Catalogues may be had,
Illustrated copies, price 2s. 6d. each.

Charities

BOOKSELLERS' PROVIDENT INSTITUTION
A Registered Friendly Society founded in the year 1837 for the assistance of members and their widows and children when
in necessitous circumstances.
Patron: Her Majesty Queen Alexandra.
President: Charles James Longman, Esq.
An Annual Subscription of One Guinea, or a Donation of Ten Guineas, entitles the donor to Honorary Membership with the privilege of voting at General Meetings; whilst a bequest of Twenty Guineas constitutes the executor an Honorary Member for life, with power to vote.
Subscriptions or Donations will be thankfully received by the Secretary, Mr. William Poulten, Stationers' Hall Court, London,
E.C.4, who will gladly furnish any further particulars that may be desired.

Booksellers & Catalogues

CATALOGUE No. 4 (1920)
of INTERESTING BOOKS, including: ENGLISH and FOREIGN LITERA-TURE, MODERN ILLUSTRATED BOOKS, WORKS ON THE FINE ARTS, BIBLIOGRAPHY, etc.
Also a Collection of LAMBETH DELFT and STAFFORDSHIRE FIGURES, and several good examples of OLD FURNITURE.
Will be sent, post free, on application to
L. CHANDY & CO., LTD. ALBEMARLE STREET, LONDON, W.1.

ATTRACTIVE BOOKS
AT LESS THAN HALF THE PUBLISHED PRICES.
Books on a great variety of subjects: Sport, Travel, Fiction,
Biography, Theology, etc. etc.
All in New Condition as published. Catalogue on application.
WILLIAM GLAISHER, LTD.,
265, HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.1.

BOOKS AND AUTOGRAPHS.
CATALOGUES FREE.

Authors' Agents, etc.

PROOF READING, INDEXING, RESEARCHES, REVISION
Linguist, good experience.—Mr. F. A. HARDLAN, 15, Bellevue Mansions, Forest Hill, S.E.23.

AUTHORS
MSS. placed at highest prices; free monthly prices: terms for stamp.—Cambridge Literary Agency, 8, Henrietta-St., W.C.2

THE AUTHORS' ALLIANCE are prepared to consider and place MSS. for early publication. Literary work of all kinds dealt with by experts who place Authors' interests first.
Twenty years' experience. Please note new address: 83 and 94,
CRANCERY LANE, LONDON, W.C.2.

LITERARY RESEARCH or TRANSLATION WORK, wanted by Cambridge University woman, Honours, Tripos in Classics and Russian. Knowledge of type-writing.—Write Box 44, ATHENAEUM Advertisement Office, 170, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

AUTHORS MS. TYPED. 1/- PER 1000 WORDS.
Neat, Intelligent work. Circulars, Testimonials, etc., duplicated from 3/- for 25 copies. Literary Manager, Oxford Bureau, 3, Crosshall Street, Liverpool

Typewriting &c.

TYPEWRITING OF EVERY DESCRIPTION carefully and promptly executed at home, 1s. per 1,000 words; carbon copy, 3d. per 1,000 words. Duplicating, Cambridge Local.—
Miss Nancy McFarlane, 11, Falmeira Avenue, Westcliff Essex.

TYPEWRITING. — Authors' MSS., Examination Papers,
Letters, Circulars, Testimonials, General Copying, Duplicating, etc. — J. TRIMNELL, S. Moira Terrace, Cardiff.

IMPORTANT.
The Publisher will be glad to hear from readers of "The Atheneum" who experience any difficulty in obtaining copies. All communications sent to 10 Adelphi Terrace,
W.C.2, will receive immediate attention.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES.
INLAND, FOREIGN,
£1 8s. 2d. per annum £1 10s. per annum
post free. post free.
Shorter periods in proportion.
Subscriptions should be sent to The Publisher,

"The Christianity of-to-day," says the author, "is, broadly speaking, the Christianity of St Paul. The influence which he has exercised on the hearts and lives of men is unequalled by any other writer in the world's history." The book is intended to form an introduction to larger works on the subject by gathering together in a small compass the best that has been written concerning the apostle in recent years.

A Study of Shakespeare's Versification with an Inquiry into the Trustworthiness of the Early Texts, an Examination of the 1616 Folio of Ben Jonson's works, and Appendices, including a revised text of Antony and Cleopatra. By M. A. BAYFIELD, M.A. Demy 8vo. 10s net.

"His main contention, which is of great importance to the text of Shakespeare, is that the text is still infected with elisions from the first folio, and to a less degree from the different quartos, which modern editors have retained, although they often destroy the verse. This contention we believe Mr Bayfield has established; and, if so, his labours are of great importance to the text, which must in future be printed very differently."—The Times.

Coleridge and Wordsworth.

"A scholarly and searching elucidation of Douglas's translator's labours.... Douglas, of course, appeals primarily to students of literature, to whom Mr Watt's volume will be little short of a godsend, but its racy style, its interesting matter, and its variety of topics should secure for it a somewhat wider public with benefit to that public."—The Aberdeen Journal.

Inter Lilja. By A. B. RAMSAY, Lower Master of Eton College. Crown 8vo. 6s 6d net.

This book contains a number of verses, mostly in Latin, dealing with a variety of subjects. Some have matters of general interest for their theme (for example, Geoffrey Chaucer, M. Beriot, Chess, Dan Leno, Queen Victoria's Birthday); but the greater part are more specifically Etonian. In addition to the Latin verses, which form the bulk of the book, there are a few in Greek and a few in English.

"The very thing that many English people have long needed; namely, a guide to the best Italian authors of the nineteenth century. Mr Bullough's plan is to give typical extracts of two or three pages, with a brief biographical note of the author. Under Mr Bullough's guidance the English student of Italian need never be in doubt as to what to read."—The Spectator.

Small Talk at Wreyland. By CECIL TORR. With 8 plates. Second impression. Demy 8vo. 8s net.

"Mr Cecil Torr.... talks of everything and anything; of old diaries, of old journeys, of old wine, of old sermons, of old books, of Rheims and Rochester, of Granada and Damascus, of reviewing Egyptian chronology. He gossips: he is a babbling brook, a shining river. He has charm; and the charm of his extraordinary book we despair of converting by any quotation or any description; we can only say it is there."—The Field.

Cambridge Bulletin. No. XXXV, February, 1920, giving particulars of recent publications of the University Press, will be sent on application.

Cambridge University Press

The revised Second organising we

The Italian 14s Demy

The Cecil £20 4s Antony 1920 and, of Be £10 scholarly Essays the plates.

8s be the In Selections Inter Cambridge Fetter "C

"A scholarly and searching elucidation of Douglas's translator's labours.... Douglas, of course, appeals primarily to students of literature, to whom Mr Watt's volume will be little short of a godsend, but its racy style, its interesting matter, and its variety of topics should secure for it a somewhat wider public with benefit to that public."—The Aberdeen Journal.

Inter Lilja. By A. B. RAMSAY, Lower Master of Eton College. Crown 8vo. 6s 6d net.

This book contains a number of verses, mostly in Latin, dealing with a variety of subjects. Some have matters of general interest for their theme (for example, Geoffrey Chaucer, M. Beriot, Chess, Dan Leno, Queen Victoria's Birthday); but the greater part are more specifically Etonian. In addition to the Latin verses, which form the bulk of the book, there are a few in Greek and a few in English.

"The very thing that many English people have long needed; namely, a guide to the best Italian authors of the nineteenth century. Mr Bullough's plan is to give typical extracts of two or three pages, with a brief biographical note of the author. Under Mr Bullough's guidance the English student of Italian need never be in doubt as to what to read."—The Spectator.

Small Talk at Wreyland. By CECIL TORR. With 8 plates. Second impression. Demy 8vo. 8s net.

"Mr Cecil Torr.... talks of everything and anything; of old diaries, of old journeys, of old wine, of old sermons, of old books, of Rheims and Rochester, of Granada and Damascus, of reviewing Egyptian chronology. He gossips: he is a babbling brook, a shining river. He has charm; and the charm of his extraordinary book we despair of converting by any quotation or any description; we can only say it is there."—The Field.

Cambridge Bulletin. No. XXXV, February, 1920, giving particulars of recent publications of the University Press, will be sent on application.

"Broadly speaking the advance of adult education can proceed only as quickly as voluntary agencies can stimulate, focus and organise the demand for it. In the last resort the volume of educational activity is determined not by the capacity of the universities and education authorities to provide facilities, but by the ability of organising bodies to give shape and substance to the demand. The organising work of voluntary bodies should, therefore, be maintained and developed."—From the recommendations of the Ministry of Reconstruction Adult Education Committee's Final Report.

(F. M. Stationary Office, Cond. 321. 1s. 9d. net.)

Essay Competition.

ESSAYS ARE INVITED ON THE SUBJECT OF

The Future of The Adult School Movement in the Light of

The Adult Education Report

First Prize - £20
Second Prize - £10
Three Prizes of £5 each.

CONDITIONS.

1. The Competition is open to men and women, irrespective of membership of Adult Schools.

2. Essays must not exceed 15,000 words.

3. Essays must
   (a) Be signed with a nom de plume.
   (b) Be accompanied by a sealed envelope containing the writer's full name and address.

4. The competition will close on May 31st, and essays must be posted to reach the Editor of "One and All," 30, Bloomsbury Street, London, W.C.1, not later than that date.

5. The judges will be Wm. Chas. Braithwaite, B.A., LL.B., Miss A. L. Littleboy, and Albert Mansbridge, M.A.

6. The decision of the judges will be final.

7. Essays may be hand or type written, and must be on one side of the paper only.

8. The National Adult School Council will have the right to publish any or all of the essays in whatever form it may deem desirable.
THE HOMELESS ARTIST

ENGLAND finds considerable difficulty in realizing that artists are necessary to it. It is, indeed, less inclined to admit that they are necessary now than it has been for many years. Under the stress of war conditions a delightfully simple classification of trades into essential and non-essential came into being, and the artist, rightly enough, was relegated among the non-essentials; and there, we fear, he has remained in the general mind, because the general mind is, alas! still organized for war.

We gladly admit that the artist is not necessarily to a community organized for war. It is his greatest title to honour that he is not. He is necessary to civilization, and civilization abhors the condition of war as Nature does a vacuum. Now that the interregnum of civilization, the moratorium of the ideal, is at an end, the artist has become essential again; but to be essential and to be recognized as essential are very different things. The ordinary mind takes satisfaction in the congenial conditions imposed by war; the simplification of the moral issue brings with it a welcome economy of effort; the opportunity to indulge the baser passions under the cloak of patriotism is congenial even to persons who consider themselves above them. People are loth to leave such an Elysium long after the excuse for it has departed. Therefore we have peace without the morality of peace, civilization without the values of civilization. The artist who has become once more essential is still regarded as a parasite, and treated as one.

A few weeks ago we discussed the concrete case of the literary journalist; to-day we wish to present to our readers' consideration a hardship peculiar to artists. The wages of the artist, like the wages of the literary journalist, have not risen during the war.

As far as ordinary economic hardship goes, they are in the same case. But there is this important difference. Whereas the literary man needs food and clothes and shelter, the artist needs food and clothes and shelter and—a place to work in, a place where, if he so desires, he can stretch a canvas twenty feet broad or chip at half a ton of stone. That is no less a necessity to the artist than is to the workman his bag of tools on which the broker's man may not distrust.

London never was particularly rich in such places. Very often the artist had to go abroad to Paris to find one; more often he abated his demands under stress of necessity, and did his best with a big room in one of those great houses with which the West of London is covered. But in his pursuit even of one of these he had to be very circumspect. Agents looked askance at him, and confronted him with clauses of leases which provided that the respectability of the western squares should never be contaminated with anything so disreputable as an artist who was not even a member of the Royal Academy. Eventually, however, the proprietors of some of the more hopeless unfashionable houses saw a chance of making a good thing out of the artists; they labelled their houses studios, added fifty per cent. to the economic rent, and permitted the artist to live in them.

But at the present time these apologies for studios have, in common with every other place of shelter, a rarity value. The artist is in no position to outbid his more prosperous rivals; the larger rooms go to the larger purses. Artists' studios are let at twice the rent to people who make use of them for jazz parties; and now in expectation of the promised influx of American visitors, who love such delightfully Bohemian things as studio-flats, two of the most important blocks of studios in Chelsea have been sold, and the occupants given notice to quit. Furthermore, it is announced that a huge block of property, which includes very many of the little studios of which we have spoken, has been sold to make room for two convalescent hospitals.

Whether there is any hope of having these peculiar difficulties of artists mitigated by legislation we do not know. There is at any rate no reason to suppose that the present House of Commons does not share the general view that artists are unnecessary people. Once more, it is for those who think otherwise to come together in support of them. That admirable organization, the Arts League of Service, is elaborating a scheme by which one or two large houses should be bought for the sole purpose of providing artists with accommodation and thus establishing the nucleus of an artists' quarter in London, whence they cannot be evicted by persons with a larger bank balance, but infinitely less claim on the consideration of a civilized community. But such a scheme will inevitably need a measure of financial backing. We sincerely hope that when the time comes our readers will give it all the support and advertisement in their power.

M.

UNPUBLISHED WRITINGS OF JOHN CLARE

It is recorded that, in his cottage at Helpstone, Clare scarcely let a day pass without writing verses, which he would often give away; in the words of "Hudibras" Butler, the habit was for him no more difficult than for a blackbird 'tis to whistle.

It is traditional also that, during his long confinement in the madhouse, while the cloud of insanity hung black and desperate upon him, the poetic impulse came to him by flashes; and, as lightning makes blackness intenser, so deeper oblivion followed these wildfire moments—and Clare within ten minutes of composing the new poem had utterly forgotten it. Such facts certainly suggest the mass of material produced by Clare, and the difficulty of collating it after so long an interval; and actually, to-day, a great quantity of manuscript is distributed among private owners—in America as well as in England—and in local museums.

A rough-and-ready survey of some of these unpublished writings confirms the belief that much of Clare's best is contained in them. In fact, even his first volume, "Poems descriptive of Rural Life and Scenery," might have been of finer quality had the selection been made with more sympathy; at the time Clare appears to have been playing the poetic ploughman, but he was playing the part amazingly well. Presently the ploughman fades out and Clare emerges as pure poet; not that Mr. Alaric Watts, Messrs. Taylor & Hessey, or the critics at large approved of the advance. An examination of Clare's method about 1827 reveals him as an indubitable poet—one with very definite aim, comprehension and technique. The very handwriting distinguished him, with its strength and clearness, rapidity and certainty. From this time onwards he was engaged on a new volume of poems, which never went into print, despite Clare's moving appeal and prospectus. The manuscript bears the title "The Midsummer Cushion, or Cottage Poems"; it is a thick oblong volume containing, in close serried writing of much beauty, three hundred and sixty poems. Many were evidently far too long to tempt even enthusiastic publishers, if any existed; many were included later in "The Rural Muse" of 1835. But there is a rich harvest remaining—and he who binds the sheaf can only take delight in the labour. Here is what may be called a "blankverse sonnet," a study in cumulative effect, odd turmoil and fury:

SIGNS OF WINTER.
The cat runs races with her tail—the dog Leaps o'er the orchard hedge and knells the grass; The swine run round and grunt and play with straw. Snatching out hasty mouthfuls from the stack; Sudden upon the elm-trees tops the crow Unceremonious visit pays and croaks. Then swoops away—from mossy barn the owl Bobs hasty out—wheels round and scared as soon As hastily retires—the ducks grow wild And from the muddy pond fly up and wheel A circle round the village, and soon, tired, Plunge in the pond again—the maidens in haste Snatch from the orchard hedge the mizzled cloths And laughing hurry in to keep them dry.

This is the intensity and rural shrewdness of a hundred poems beside, from which it is indeed tantalizing to make a selection. Wherever Clare goes, he looks and sees "large territory spread"; it is his contentment, it is his delight to subdue the author and exalt the subject. In an age of self-righteousness he avoided both the fashionable introspection and the temptation to draw morals. Beauty crowded upon him; at this time he seldom did more than take what he found without any tinge of mood or egotism. This might sound a light task; and so might making a bird's nest. Incidentally, his bird-knowledge is that of an observer never wearied nor preoccupied.

THE BLACKCAP.

Under the twigs the blackcap hangs in vain With snow-white patch streaked over either eye; This way and that he turns and peeps again As wont, where silk-cased insects used to lie. But summer leaves are gone, the day is bye For happy holidays; and now he fares But cloudy, like the weather—yet to view He flirts a happy wing and inly wears Content, in cleaning what the orchard spares: And like his little cousin capp'd in blue Domesticates the lonely winter through In homestead plots and gardens where he wears Familiar pertness—yet but seldom comes With the tame robin to the door for crumbs.

But it is time to mention the two volumes of "Asylum Poems," which were copied out for publication during Clare's old age, but were hardly ever used except by J. L. Cherry in 1873. By no means a complete collection of Clare's work after 1835—a third volume is said to exist in private hands—this large budget is, nevertheless, immensely enlightening and valuable. And here the unfortunate editor, already tormented by Clare's contempt of punctuation and capitals, is further incensed by the dim quillmanship and tenacious malapropism of the抄ist. The poems are mainly love lyrics, addressed to Scotch Girls, Irish Girls, Bonny Oundle Girls, and hundreds of others—all bonny, young and flower-like. These songs are often written in most melodious and unfamiliar rhythms. Like perch in a shoal of roach, there are occasional scraps of nature verse; more rarely, sea ballads and mystical lyrics occur; and there are poems about the man himself. Clare anticipates most of our contemporaries; whose war-poem is this?

In the Bastiles of Hell,
Bloody and dreary,
Bloody tales capturing tell
Lonely and weary;
I have been where they fell
Wounded and weary...

Whose violence this?
A frown from thy face, love,
Is like a sledge hammer
Mashing bones into powder
And knocking out brains...

Again, it would not be hard to place the following lines among the modern schools:
The blackbird sings loud as a lady's piano
With a yellow gold ring round his violet eye...
Vetches both yellow and blue
Grew thick in the meadow lane;
Isabella's shawl left off the dew...

Young Peggy's face was common sense and I was rather shy...

Inevitably, many of these "mad poems" are broken, jangled, unintelligible; there is a trick of catching up a striking word or phrase and so destroying its effect; one love song to Eleanor or Mary Boyfield is much the same as the next to Mary Hobbs or My Beautiful Ruth. There are, however, many wonderful songs and "tailpieces"; the following are three of them, not necessarily the best:

I HID MY LOVE.
I hid my love when young, while I Couldn't bear the buzzing of a fly;
I hid my love to my despit
Till I could not bear to look at light;
I dare not gaze upon her face
But left her memory in each place;
Where e'er I saw a wild flower lie
I kissed and bade my love goodbye.

I met her in the greenest dells
Where dewdrops pearled the wood blue bells,
The lost breeze kissed her bright blue eye,
The Bee kissed and went singing by;
A sunbeam marked a passage there,
A gold chain round her neck so fair;
As secret as the wild bee's song
She lay there all the summer long.

I hid my love in field and town
Till e'en the breeze would knock me down,
The Bees seemed singing ballads o'er,
The fly's bass turned a Lion's roar;
And even silence found a tongue
To haunt me all the summer long.
The riddle Nature could not prove
Was nothing else but secret love.

FRAGMENT.
The dewy evening with its orange sky
Looks mellow, like ripe fruit before it fall
Those thunder-strokes of ink, black clouds that lie
O'er the gold seas of light, to thought recall
Niagara's rocks and their tremendous fall
The waves of light pour o'er its sunniest dye
Fancy bears the torrents' thundering bawl;
While peace upon the velvet sword sits by
And Heaven seems melting from so soft a sky.

SUMMER.
'Tis now the height of Summer,
And whereas' er I turn my eyes
The woods do moulding but murmur
And the hedgerows swarm with flies.
On dry banks the wasps are busy
With yellow jackets and sharp sting;
Summer's a secret dirty hussey
And nothing like primrose spring.

Then leaf-strewn woods are greenest,
And full of wild primroses,
The calm green
On moss nest the bird repos.
Then by the spiny rails
The violet smells so sweet
Loading with perfume all the gales
And wild bee's yellow feet.

Hot summer is a dirty hussey
Swarming over with wasps and flies
That by wood side are ever busy
With their burning melodies.
Give me the spring with foot-paths clean,
The finches' nest and budding tree,
The primrose in its leaves so green—
And 'neath white thorn I'll happy be.

Other manuscripts exist which reveal Clare in a new light. His prose has not yet been mentioned, in spite of the excellence of his style and the warmth and truth of his colour-work. Here, again, he is brilliantly modern, even to-day, and can hold his own with the finest of our descriptive giants. His subject is of course Nature for the most part: he wrote, however, many essays, autobiographical sketches, and even a satiric novel. The following occurs among his Asylum poems:

DEWDROPS.
The dewdrops on every blade of grass are so much like silver drops that I am obliged to stoop down as I walk to see if they are pearls, and those sprinkled on the joy-woven beds of primroses underneath the hazels, white-thorns and maples are so like gold beads that I stooped down to feel if they were hard, but they melted from my finger. And where the dew lies on the primrose, the violet and white-thorn leaves, they are emerald and beryl, yet nothing more than the dew of the morning on the budding leaves; nay, the road grasses are covered with gold and silver beads, and the further we go, the brighter they seem to shine, like solid gold and silver. It is nothing more than the sun's light and shade upon them in the dewy morning; every thorn-point and every bramble-spear has its trembling ornament, till the wind gets a little brisker and then all is shaken off, and all the shining jewelry passes away into a common spring morning full of budding leaves, primroses, violets, vernal speedwell, blue-bell and orchis, and common-place objects.

An age which reprinted Introductions to the Scriptures in Four Volumes almost annually and "Proverbial Philosophy" almost weekly could scarcely be expected to thirst for this rich wild wine.

EDMUND BLUNDELL

UMBRACULUM
"Felix heu niam et beta tellus."
In a fair orchard let me lie,
When globed apples yet are green;
And let there be a bed thereby
Of osiers, where white willows lean
And pause upon the wind's slow chant.
A hidden freshet you may guess
By its deep marge of verdourousness
And many a broad-leaved water-plant.
And I would have a pretty pair
Of bullfinches for playmates there;
Freely they shall hop and feed
On the ripe sorrel's rust-red seed;
Or pluck the thistle, poor old king,
When he has lost his purple crown,
By the long beard of yellow down,
And sometimes shall the ringdove's wing,
Aloft, with rushing shadow, sweep
The sun-filled hollow, sound asleep;
And horned wasps, a-freebooting,
Come tumbling in their contraband,
Where caves are hung with grassy thatch
In little cliffs of golden sand;
And hazel-nuts, with cheek untanned,
Forth from their scalloped hoods shall peep;
And, though the honey-heavy bees
Some looser petals may un latch,
Let bramble briar bear berries crude,
Nor yet the loitering year have brewed
Its purple wine with pulpy lees.
And all along the lush hedgerow
Shall alder dark and thorny sloe
With fork-leaved agrimony grow;
Angelica with pipy stem
And the wild basil; and from them
And thousand happy things beside
Some feeble ebb from their full tide
Of pleasure through my being flow.
Oh, leaves! oh, flowers! oh, birds that flit
Through verdurous aisles with silent floor,
A' airy joy, too exquisite
For sense with its own bliss at war,
Leads on, where music seems t' melt
In odour; odour, half unfelt.
Its purer essence to reserve
For scent more keen; and our dull nerve Blind as a wingless grub must be
To such quick-darting ecstasies.
There is an altar, more withdrawn,
More secret from the cult of man,
Than e'er was hymned by fluting Faun
Or echoed to the pipe of Pan;
And, could I follow where they lead,
These visions glimpsed by lawn and glade,
Still would that mystic altar fade,
The fount to its hid source recede.
For phantasy, though it be fair,
Hath never found a footing there.
Then, soul, to joys of sense resign,
Nor for a higher rapture pine;
Have here thine hour of heartfel ease,
Though, veiled by the still, listening trees,
That mask the cornfield's tawny side,
I guess the falling swaths of gold,
The stalwart arms with sleeves uprolled,
The reapers' devastating stride;
The charm still works: not yet, not yet
For me the crooked scythe they whet,
Nor shall its long, devouring hiss
Have power to rob me of my bliss,
Telling a tale none crediteth—
Some bugaboo of Time and Death.

G. M. Cookson.

Mr. Aymer Vallance's work on "Old Crosses and Lychgates," which will be published very shortly by Messrs. Batsford, is the first to classify, according to their design, the various types erected in England. The numerous illustrations from photographs and drawings include many fine crosses which have disappeared, or survive only in a mutilated form.

REVIEWS

THE DIGNITY OF POETRY

_The Athenæum, April 9, 1920_

October; and Other Poems. By Robert Bridges. (Heinemann. 5s. net.)

Flowers of the Grass. By Maurice Hewlett. (Constable. 5s. net.)

Country Sentiment. By Robert Graves. (Secker. 5s. net.)

The mere accident of publication has brought these three books together; but there is more substance in this accident than in most. The books are roughly of equal size, exactly of equal price, and they are the work of poets of three generations. We suggest, not that each or any of these poets is characteristic of his generation, but only that their ages give a (perhaps adventitious) point to a comparison between them.

Each of these poets has, and expresses, a conception, or a philosophy, of poetry. Conceptions of poetry are always interesting; they are a dangerous and necessary part of the equipment of a modern poet, as tell-tale and fascinating as the eyes to a student of character. Therefore we will set them out in order. In his Tercentenary Ode to Shakespeare Dr. Bridges has a vision of the Angel of Earth:

_It was not terror in his eyes nor wonder,
That glance of the intimate exaltation_
_Which lieth as Power under all Being._

_And broodeth in Thought above._

_I hear his voice in the music of lamentation,_
_In echoing chant and cadenced litany,_
_In country song and pastoral piping,_
_And silvery dances of mirth:_
_And oft, as the eyes of a lion in the brake,_
_His presence hath startled me,_
_In austere shapes of beauty lurking,_
_Beautiful for Beauty's sake;_
_As a lonely blade of life,_
_Ariseth to flower whosoever the unseen Will_— _Stirreth with kindling aim the dark fecundity of Being._

Mr. Hewlett's is a simpler creed; he addresses his poet in these words:

_You had the uxorious eye_
_Which woes the universe,_
_To make a marriage-tie_—
_For better or for worse,
_Whose progeny_
_Your heart receiv'd to nurse._

_And thought him worse than dark_—
_Who with dull ears and eyes_—
_Could heed the soaring larv_—
_Spray with clear song the skies,_
_Or watch to his arc_—
_The golden sun arise._

And the faith of Mr. Graves is simpler still:

_May sudden justice overtake_—
_And snap the froward pen,_
_That old and palsied poets shake_—
_Against the minds of men._

_Blasphemers trusting to hold caught_—
_In far-flung webs of ink,_
_The utmost ends of human thought_—
_Till nothing's left to think._

_But may the gift of heavenly peace_—
_And glory for all time_—
_Keep the boy Tom who tending geeze_—
_First made the nursery rhyme._

From the conjunction it would appear that Mr. Graves is calling down fire and brimstone upon the head of the Poet Laureate in person; but Mr. Graves, we are sure, is not so rash or sacrilegious as all that. He merely means that he does not like serious poetry; but he does like nursery rhymes.

If we compare these professions in content and in form, we have no doubt which is the work of the considerable poet. If we set, for a moment, the thought aside, Dr. Bridges' mastery of language and rhythm is evident. Beside him Mr. Hewlett and Mr. Graves are alike rhymesters. But there is a difference between them; there are more differences than one. The first is that Mr. Graves would obviously not object in the least to be called a rhymester; he invites the appellation. Mr. Hewlett, we feel, does not. A second is that Mr. Hewlett is vulgar; Mr. Graves is not. At the worst Mr. Graves is schoolboyish and impertinent. Mr. Hewlett's vice is radical. We can safely say that the man who defines the poet as one "who woos the universe with an uxorious eye" is himself no poet, whatever else he may be. Therefore we are not much surprised to find at the end of what is intended to be a poem in honour of the peasant of the Wiltshire downs this indescribable verse:

In task-work plain beyond a doubt;
Needling no bolster-speech or sermon:
He, God, was there to clean them out—
He'd kill a pig: why not a German?

Mr. Hewlett would, we believe, retort with surprise and indignation that he is merely speaking truth. We leave the Wiltshire peasants to settle that account. But, if it were true, the condemnation falls only the more heavily on the rhymester who spends three or four pages of doggerel in celebrating men whom he can thus epimorise. It is not in the narrow sense any moral deficiency that puts Mr. Hewlett outside the pale of poetry; it is a fundamental vice of taste, that is as evident in his commonplace rhythms, and his misuse of language (of which the two verses of his poetic creed supply copious instances), as in the temper which can end a poem which precedes the one from which we last quoted with these words:

How should I falter and refuse
What blood my heart has yet in store,
To write in it the holy dues
Of you who fought the Holy War?

Such things are impossible not only to Dr. Bridges, but to Mr. Graves also; impossible, because there is a fineness of the moral fibre, not peculiar to poets, which is indispensable to poetry. That Mr. Graves could not be guilty of such a thing, though far from proving him a poet, or even a poet in the making, means at least that there is nothing essentially alien to poetry in him. His fortune will be decided by the outcome of the narrower but intense battle with his art.

Mr. Graves, we think, suffers at present from not having realized that the province he has deliberately chosen for himself, though small, is very hard to subdue. It is not enough to be simple yourself in order to achieve simplicity. Mr. Graves is genuinely boyish, as we can tell by the ring of conviction that sounds in some of his successful and very charming verses. We do not imagine that success in a little genre could be more completely attained than, for instance, in "Advice to Lovers":

I knew an old man at a Fair
Who made it his twice-yearly task
To clamber on a cider-cask
And cry to all the yokels there—

Lovers to-day and for all time
Preserve the meaning of my rhyme:
Love is not kindly nor yet grim
But does to you as you to him,
Whistle, and Love will come to you,
Hiss, and he fades without a word,
Do wrong, and he great wrong will do,
Speak, he retells what he has heard.
Then all you lovers have good heed,
Ves not young love in word or deed:
Love never leaves an unpaid debt,
He will not pardon nor forget.
The old man's voice was sweet yet loud
And this shows what a man was he,
He'd scatter apples to the crowd
And give great draughts of cider, free.

That, we say, is charming; and charming things will always be worth making. Mr. Graves, then, by the recommendation of this piece, and "Pot and Kettle" and a few other similar verses, shall have the congenial post of making our rhyme-books. It is an important office in the republic, but we are confident that he will not abuse it.

Poetry is another matter. Hard by the meadow of nursery rhymes lies, it is true, the windswept common of ballad. It is a blasted heath where the incautious traveller risks lightning and sudden death. The most genuine boyishness is of no avail to disarm and make its own the pity and terror that live there, but only gaunt experience. Behind a true ballad lies the grim wisdom of generations of hunted men who have snatched at life. They have mapped their universe, simply; but their knowledge is become an instinct: they carry in their minds, as on their bodies, nothing that can be spared; and their forgotten art is an art of essentials. Bigger men than Mr. Graves have failed in the effort to recapture it, and perhaps his failure is no worse than theirs; but it is irrevocable and absolute.

Soft and thick the snow lay,
Stars danced in the sky.
Not all the lambs of May-day
Skip so bold and high.
Your feet were dancing, Alice,
Seemed to dance on air.
You looked a ghost or angel
In the starlight there.
Your eyes were frosted starlight,
Your heart fire and snow.
Who was it said, "I love you"?
Alice.
Mother, let me go!

Mr. Graves is, though he may not be aware of it, playing at ballads; the result is falsity. We have only to consider "Your heart was fire and snow," first in itself, then in its context, to discover how infinitely remote is this delightful rhythm from the true ballad substance. In this exacting kind he becomes merely rhetorical; and if we had nothing better than his achievements in it to go upon we should have to give the most peremptory denial to his claim.

Now I begin to know at last,
These nights when I sit down to rhyme,
The form and measure of that vast
God we call Poetry, he who stoops
And leaps me through his paper hoops
A little higher than his own
That, we say, is charming; and charming things will always be worth making. Mr. Graves, then, by the recommendation of this piece, and "Pot and Kettle" and a few other similar verses, shall have the congenial post of making our rhyme-books. It is an important office in the republic, but we are confident that he will not abuse it.

Poetry is another matter. Hard by the meadow of nursery rhymes lies, it is true, the windswept common of ballad. It is a blasted heath where the incautious traveller risks lightning and sudden death. The most genuine boyishness is of no avail to disarm and make its own the pity and terror that live there, but only gaunt experience. Behind a true ballad lies the grim wisdom of generations of hunted men who have snatched at life. They have mapped their universe, simply; but their knowledge is become an instinct: they carry in their minds, as on their bodies, nothing that can be spared; and their forgotten art is an art of essentials. Bigger men than Mr. Graves have failed in the effort to recapture it, and perhaps his failure is no worse than theirs; but it is irrevocable and absolute.

Soft and thick the snow lay,
Stars danced in the sky.
Not all the lambs of May-day
Skip so bold and high.
Your feet were dancing, Alice,
Seemed to dance on air.
You looked a ghost or angel
In the starlight there.
Your eyes were frosted starlight,
Your heart fire and snow.
Who was it said, "I love you"?
Alice.
Mother, let me go!

But Mr. Graves has leaped at least half through something sterner than a paper hoop in "Sospian Fach." Whether he will achieve more permanent success in a higher kind than childish rhyme, the evidence is too slight to permit conjecture. He obviously needs to be much more critical of himself when he passes outside what seems to be his natural bent: for his failures in dealing with other emotions than the pleasant thrill of rhyming are, with the exception we have noticed, failures not in the superficies but in the essence of poetry.

Even though it was possible to associate Mr. Graves with Dr. Bridges for a moment in order to differentiate them both from Mr. Hewlett, it is a very real shock to pass from a high-spirited and robust rhymester to the most accomplished English metrist living. The first verse of the first poem of Bridges' book takes us into the world of art:

April adores in play met with his lover May where she came garlanded
The blossoming boughs overhead were thrill'd to bursting by the daze from the sky and the wild music there that shook the odorous air...
We have a poet here with an instrument adaptable to the highest or the most exquisite intuition; and the disappointment, if we may call it disappointment, of this small book is that so much of its room is taken up by poems of a more or less official inspiration. Not that Dr. Bridges finds the writing of a formal ode ungenial: his mastery of the high Miltonic style must make such composition pleasurable to him even when the theme is not peculiarly his own. But the difference between the ode to Shakespeare in this book or the earlier ode to Purcell and the poems celebrating the various events of the war is very sensible. No incident of war calls forth so secure a note as the opening of this response to Shakespeare:

Kind dove-wing'd Peace, for whose green olive-crown
The noblest kings would give their diadems,
Mother who hast ruled our home so long,
How sweet are words so just.
Leaving our cities stirr with war, . . .

And if we set the book aside with a faint regret that it contains no sonnet equal to the finest in "The Growth of Love," and no short poem which will live in the memory as certain of his earlier lyrics have done, the regret is more than outweighed by the deep satisfaction we feel that our Poet Laureate is a poet. Nothing he writes, be the occasion never so official or the inspiration tenuous, is marred by a touch of shoddyness: the dignity of poetry is safe in his hands. This dignity has no pomposity. It is only a name for the austerity and candour that mark the true artist; for the manifest determination not to deceive himself or his audience, to be certain that the emotion to be expressed belongs to the finest of which he is capable, and the expression as exact, precise and perfect as lavish pains can make it. To acquire dignity of this kind not only Mr. Graves, but many another would-be poet of to-day has an arduous road to tread.

J. M. M.

THE FALL OF KUT

MY CAMPAIGN IN MESOPOTAMIA. By Major-General Sir Charles V. F. Townshend. (Thorton Butterworth. 28s. net.)

If the first campaign in Mesopotamia is not the best-known episode of the war it is not for lack of gallantry, and Sir Charles Townshend's contribution is one that will appeal to the student of military affairs not only for the light it casts on the motives that moved him, but also and even more as a careful and frank study of a campaign which must ever be memorable in our history. In some respects it was characteristic; in some unique. It is our way to throw troops into hostile country without providing the means of movement. But there are few, if any, of these adventures which lived in so piecemeal a fashion, and were pushed on to disaster in defiance of military theory.

Sir Charles Townshend took the field as commander of the Sixth Division in succession to General Barrett, who retired through ill-health, in April, 1915; and in the last month of the year his maxie operations had ceased and he was shut up in Kut. He had fought three battles, and his Sixth Division had proved itself a splendid fighting unit. But the influence of the commander was a factor which one inferred. He enjoyed an extraordinary prestige with his troops and his success had been considerable.

The only doubt anyone could have had was the necessity of these battles, for Townshend's own idea was to occupy "the towns of Kurna, on the Tigris, in the bifurcation of the Tigris and Euphrates, Nasiriyeh, and Alhwaz, on the Carun river, all of which were avenues of approach for the enemy, with minimum forces strongly entrenched and with ammunition and provisions for six months. The principal mass of my forces would have been installed in the vicinity of Basra in an entrenched camp whose guns menaced that city and port." Taking Mesopotamia as a secondary theatre, this was sound military theory; and General Townshend reveals himself throughout as that rarest of British products, a thoughtful, well-instructed student of scientific warfare.

But he was not in command of the Expeditionary Force and had to take orders from Sir John Nixon. Indeed, he had to obey orders that were at times against his own judgment, to fight with insufficient forces, to take the field with a unit that lacked, even at the outset, essential elements of force. The critic may suggest that he could have refused or have urged his objections more forcibly. But Townshend was a student of Napoleon, and having made his objections and been overruled, he held it his duty to obey. At Kurna, where he had no misgivings, despite the difficulty of attacking an enemy protected by floods and the turns of a winding river, his plans were well thought out and his success deserved. The manner in which he improved the occasion by the capture of Amara shows that, having thought out his battle plans, he could on occasion take the risk which held the potentialities of a greater success. He followed the retreating Turks up the river, first in the Espiegle, until the water became too shallow, and then in the Comet, in which, with some 25 British sailors and soldiers, he received the surrender of Halim Bey, the Turkish commander, the Governor of Amara, some 30 on 40 officers, and a whole battalion of Turkish pompiers. Before the first of his troops arrived, the next day, the Arabs in Amara had got thoroughly out of hand. He was then ordered to take Kut, and did so after the first engagement at Es Sinn.

It was a more formidable undertaking; but once more his success was well deserved. He then informed Sir John Nixon of his view of the situation, which was substantially that already outlined except that now he proposed to hold Kut as an advanced post. He was against an attempt to take Bagdad with his small force; but Sir John Nixon and the Government thought otherwise, and hence the Pyrrhic victory at Ctesiphon, at which Sir John was present. This marked the turn of the tide, and he was compelled to fall back by the Turkish reinforcements. His decision to stand at Kut was justified by the extreme exhaustion of his troops, and there is little necessity to introduce strategic reasons for it, though it served to hold up the Turks and cover the concentration of the expected reinforcements. It is inevitable that the tendency should be to judge it by theoretical standards; but it was a practical problem and General Townshend cannot be held responsible for the disastrous end of the siege. Never in the war did British officers show to such disadvantage as in the miserable attempts at relief. They were marked by unparalleled horror; and the tragedy is merely accentuated by the unfair suggestions that Townshend's starving troops should have cut their way out to Aylmer on March 9, braving the floods and sacrificing the wounded.

It was not his fault that the prisoners were so maltreated in captivity. Before surrender he was careful to insist that they should be well treated, and when called upon to act as an intermediary between the Turks and the British, at the end of the war, his first condition was that his troops should be set at liberty. No one can read General Townshend's own account of the campaign and still think him either haphazard or pusillanimous. His plans were ever carefully thought out, his decisions rapid and bold, his resolution unflagging. His unhappy fate it was to be only a pawn in the hands of irresponsible and bungling players, and his book is welcome for its dispassionate, candid and competent account of his stewardship in a subordinate executive command.
FOR readers unacquainted with contemporary French literature—readers who "may be disappointed at not meeting [in Madame Ducaux's pages] with those illustrious spirits with whom for five-and-twenty years they have been familiar: Pierre Loti, Paul Bourget and Anatole France"—this volume should be a useful literary guide-book. Mme. Ducaux tells us what are the main objects of interest in the world of letters, she gives a certain number of facts and dates, she passes judgments. Anyone who followed her round and read all the books she mentions would have at least a passable idea of what was happening on the other side of the Channel. But those who already know something about twentieth-century French literature will find not a few things to complain of in Mme. Ducaux's Baedeker.

Their first and most legitimate criticism—that the book is marred by important omissions—has been to some extent, it is true, disarmed by Mme. Ducaux herself: "Given the limits of my little volume, I was compelled to make choices. Why should some be taken and others left? Why accept Rostand and reject Bataille? Why give Madame de Noailles and say nothing of Fernand Gregh?" And why, we complain, why say not a word of Jules Romains, whose two pre-war novels were among the finest and most original pieces of twentieth-century French literature, and whose "Europe" has proved him a poet of real eminence? Why omit Rémy de Gourmont and Jules Renard and, for all his absurdities, Guillaume Apollinaire? One could go on lengthening this list of "Why's" until their repetition should make this review look like Wordsworth's "Anecdote for Fathers."

The next criticism is that Mme. Ducaux, like Baedeker, has doubtless and even trebly stared at certain things to which she should have given only a single asterisk or perhaps none at all. Thus we find the later Nationalistic Barrès distinguished by as many stars as Herr Baedeker allotted to the Lion Brewery at Munich, the Taj Mahal and the Great Pyramid. The self-absorbed Stendhalian Barrès of the earlier novels gets barely a single star. And yet the Barrès of "Le Jardin de Bérénice" and "L'Ennemi des Lois" is surely a better writer than the author of the Aisatian novels. Then there is Rostand. He is spoken of as though he were a literary monument worthy of attention, a Sainte-Chapelle at the least instead of a Trollopian or plaster-built palace in the White City. To Georges Duhamel she gives what is a brief, an insufficient number of stars. One may not altogether admire his pre-war Unanimitist poetry or the pulpit manner of his recent utterances; but to "Vie des Martyrs" and "Civilisation" nothing short of the highest praise is due. There are, too, a good many names in Mme. Ducaux's book which it was not really necessary to include. A hurried sightseer wants to hear only of the best works of art, the most striking objects of interest, and Mme. Ducaux has included a number of very definitely second-rate authors in her list. In a comprehensive history the second-rate author has his rightful and important place; but in a guide-book for foreign literary tourists he is a superfluity.

One closes a volume like this of Mme. Ducaux with a pleasant glow of patriotic pride. For, inevitably, it conjures up a comparison. One places this score or so of contemporary French names side by side with the corresponding twenty English names. After duly comparing, measuring and weighing them, one sees no reason to be unduly ashamed or depressed about twentieth-century English literature. On the contrary.

A PACIFIST WAR-BOOK

OLD members of the F.A.U. may be tempted to complain that this record of their activities reads too much like a Government Blue Book; that the Unit's history was really an astonishing romance, and that it has been told in cold, hard terms and even with a touch of levity. They received no publicity during the war; are they not now entitled to a warmer measure of praise and congratulation than this book affords? But the editors have chosen wisely and executed well. Attitudinizing is the very last failure to which the Society of Friends should be liable; gestures and postures are often the sole reward which unpopular minorities allow themselves, but they are none the less pernicious. During the war the policy of the Unit, transmitted from its splendid chairman, Sir George Newman, and loyally accepted by the members, was to get on quietly with the work in hand just so long as that work was compatible with the first principles of the association; when incompatibility became demonstrable, they would protest, maintain the right and the truth, and do so sincerely, without any rant or pretentiousness. In this spirit the editors have compiled their record of achievement: their work is admirably clear, brief, and well divided, and shows a healthy distrust of epithets. It touches every phase of work from the hospital ship and the motor-ambulance abroad to the varieties of general service at home; and it never allows the reader to forget that the main portion of the Unit's life was drudgery.

But there is more in the Unit's record than mere detail of movements. The editors have drawn upon the private notes and letters of individual members, and these sketches of life in Flanders, France, and on the seas bring just the right touch, for they are lively, but not egotistic, and show a cheerful confidence in the form of service undertaken without ever lapsing into priggishness. The notes and extracts thus reflect the spirit of the editors' story and are quite free of the taint of war-time journalism. But most old members of the Unit will feel that modesty might have been spared in the case of the chairman. To maintain an unennobled, civilian Unit in the war zones and—still more hazardous—under the angry eyes of the carnivorous old folks at home was a formidable task indeed. Sir George Newman is one of the busiest men in England, but he always found time to solve intricate problems of administration, to face the military authorities on the question of control, and to save the situation when the prospects were blackest. Without him the Unit could scarcely have continued to be: the members knew this and would surely have liked a fuller recognition of the fact in their official history.

The Unit had capable and imaginative artists serving with it, and some of their work is included in the record. Mr. C. R. W. Nevinson was with them in Flanders for a time, and his haunting picture of the wounded in the Dunkirk evacuation sheds is reproduced by the courtesy of Mr. Arnold Bennett. There are several pieces of Mr. Ernest Proctor's work, both in colour and black-and-white. Mr. Proctor has a sure sense of simple design, and can hit off the atmosphere of a wrecked village or a road in Flanders with economy and precision. Thus the pictures harmonize very happily with the terse, straightforward method in which the strange, eventful history of a thousand men over four and a half portentous years has been narrated for remembrance's sake. The record is both worthy and typical of the cause.

I. B.

A. L. H.
ROUSSEAU UP TO DATE

A QUARTER of a century ago political theory, as taught in the books and the Universities, was simple, dogmatic and apparently final. There was the "Sovereign State," representative government, and an economic system working, on the whole harmoniously, outside the control of the State and (so far as economists cared to see) unaffected by political institutions. For the fact that its whole operation depends on the law of property and inheritance was not (and, indeed, commonly is not now) attended to by those who analyzed it. Professor Sidgwick's "Elements of Politics," first published in the eighties, is the last systematic effort to bring the complex and recalcitrant material within this scheme of notions. And now how curiously unreal, irrelevant, and out of date appears that admirable effort of an impartial intellect!

The shifting of the whole point of view has been mainly effected by the pressure of Socialism upon orthodox economics. But there has been also an independent movement in the purely political field. The two pillars of political theory, as it was taught from the time of Bentham onwards, were the Sovereignty of the State, and representative government based on local constitutions. Both have been severely shaken, if not uprooted, both in theory and in practice. The Sovereignty of the State had three aspects—legal, political and ethical. As a legal doctrine it asserted that in every political society there must be some person or persons invested with a power not to be disputed, save by rebellion, and unlimited, in the sense that whatever it ordained, the courts must accept and the executive enforce. This was regarded as a matter of definition. And the definition did apply to the British Parliament, which, as we know, could legally decree the destruction of all the first-born, or the reduction of any self-governing Dominion to the status of an African protectorate. Such a conception is clearly not very interesting to anyone except lawyers, and, further, it is hardly applicable to any State except the British. For it is precisely the object of all written constitutions to prevent the vesting of such uncontrolled legal powers in any person or persons. No one has ever been able to show where sovereignty, in this sense, resides in the United States, or even in France.

Politically, the doctrine (not indeed by strict logic, but by a natural psychology) easily glided into the view that the State has a valid claim to extend its control indefinitely, and to regulate, direct and suppress at its will the lives of individuals and the operations of any and every association formed by them. From this point of view, the doctrine went back to the "Leviathan" of Hobbes; and lovers of liberty like Lord Acton protested against it on that ground. The freest State in Europe, said that paradoxical, learned and sometimes profound historian, is Austria-Hungary; for these are the most complex balance of forces mutually checking one another. The State, in proportion as it is Sovereign, will be tyrannical.

Lastly, the doctrine of Rousseau, with his impeccable "General Will," passing through Hegel's dialectical mill and camouflaged by British idealism, invested the Sovereign State almost with the attributes of Deity, put it above morals as well as above law, and reduced the individual citizen to a mere imperfect and transient vehicle of its supreme, unchallengeable and perfect being. Professor Bosanquet is the principal exponent of this view in England.

The sovereignty thus attributed to the State should be ended, it was held, in a representative system; and, in general, the form of that system was thought to be finally determined. Power should be vested in an assembly elected on a wide franchise in local constituencies, and Government should be responsible to this assembly. This was fundamental. The points in dispute were minor ones, such as the exact extent of the executive's method of voting, and the constitution and powers of a Second Chamber. On the whole, and broadly, British experience and institutions were the last word of political wisdom, and, though they might develop in detail, their main lines were irrevocably and fortunately fixed.

How odd all this looks now! Right and left the Sovereign State is challenged, both in fact (by the menace of "Direct Action") and as an ideal. The Leviathans of the political world have revealed themselves as savage monsters preying on one another. And as they lie spouting their life-blood and bellowing their hate, the members who compose them, and are sacrificed by and for them, begin to ask: "What are we doing in these books?" Theoretically, indeed, the members not only compose but control the bodies. They are "represented" by the Governments. But in fact? At every turn, in every relation, they feel themselves misrepresented. They turn and writhes as in a Nessus shirt. Their organ of directing and co-ordinating life seems to have turned into a cancer and to be preying on the system it should sustain.

It is this sickness of political society that Mr. Cole undertakes both to diagnose and to cure. His political ideas he has expressed, hitherto, rather in parenthesis, in the course of discussions of the proper organization of industrial life. But in the very able and pregnant little book before us he gives the outline of a systematic political theory. At the outset stands (where he should stand) the individual. And thus, at a blow, that idol, the "Superman," or Leviathan, falls from his pedestal and crumbles into dust. The individual is the purpose and end, and much of his life (just that part which is the most important) he carries on in his own mind and heart and soul, independently of political association. He falls in love, he writes poetry, he worships his God; and it is in order that he may do these things freely that the whole organization of society exists. But he is also a social animal, both of necessity and by choice, and to express his social nature he forms associations. These are various and numerous; and among them there is no hierarchy of excellence. Some, however, and especially those which are more necessary, than others, as bread is more essential than prayer, for it is a condition of the power to pray.

These essential associations are either economic or political. Economic associations may be divided into those of producers and those of consumers (in Mr. Cole's language they are either 'Vocational' or 'Appetitive'). A political association is one "of which the main purpose is to deal with those personal relationships which arise directly out of the fact that men live together in communities, and which require and are susceptible to social organization." The definition is somewhat indefinite, nor is the scope of what it would include made clear; for the crucial word is unshaken, irreducible, the regulation of marriage, of crime, and of lunacy is mentioned as a function of the political association. Such an association, however, is conceived to be no more "Sovereign" than any other. It is not even to control the force of the whole society. That control is given to a special co-ordinating and coercive body, representative of the essential economic and political groups. Will that body then be "Sovereign"? Not in the old and full sense. It will exercise, coercion in the last resort. But it will not have the power or the right to create, to determine or, in all respects, to control other associations. Mr. Cole's conception of society is that of a number of associations, each existing by its own right and each acting freely within its own sphere, and all co-operating freely with one another, subject only in the last resort to the co-ordinating activity of a body representing themselves. Many questions, it is clear, arise in theory, and must arise in practice, as to the delimitation of powers between these bodies. But the general arrangement aimed at is sufficiently clear.

By this formal abolition of the Sovereignty of the State Mr. Cole hopes to secure the autonomy of all associations. But, further, he hopes by his system to secure a comparatively accurate representation of the wills of individuals. He recognizes, indeed, with Rousseau that all representation involves some distortion. But he urges that this distortion will be less in proportion as the functions of representatives are definite and single. The present system, whereby the whole of the individual is supposed to be represented by a member in a sovereign political assembly, is the worst possible for securing the desired result. The citizen is compelled to hand over all his powers and interests en bloc to a person he cannot effectively check or watch or guide in any particular matter. It is for that reason that the individual elector has become submerged in the party machine, and that he finds the acts and legislation of a supposedly democratic assembly to be as arbitrary and remote from his will as those of any despot. All democratic countries (most notably and obviously the United States) are feeling this difficulty, and trying desperately by every kind of device —referendum, initiative, recall, elaborate constitutional provisions—to recover control over their own representatives. Mr. Cole’s remedy is to multiply representative bodies, and assign to each some definite one of those many purposes which the individual can only fulfill in association.
The individual, in a word, is to divide himself into a number of aspects, each functioning in a single representative organization; and each of these bodies, it is thought, will be able effectively to control, since it will be doing something definite with his grasp, and obviously relevant to his interests. The contention will not give a more intelligent vote for a school board, a trade union executive, the committee of a co-operative society or a club, than he will for a member of Parliament. If it be objected that he will not, that most electors will, in fact, be too busy and indifferent to attend to the proceedings of all these bodies, even though it be clear that they affect his daily life and action, the reply is made that at least all will have been done that can be done to secure effective control over representatives. The indifferent will suffer. But at least they will suffer only because of their indifference, not because of a radical imperfection in the representative system.

Enough has been said to indicate the main lines of Mr.
Cole’s thinking. If he were only planning in the air, as Rousseau was when he wrote his “Social Contract,” it might be possible to dismiss his book as “mere theory,” however interesting. But in fact he is in close touch with the Labour movement, the Guild movement, and all the new forces that are struggling for expression. The disease he diagnoses is a real one, and the remedies he suggests are of the kind that real forces are feeling after. He is a Rousseau furnished with experience and interpreting creative forces. For that reason his book must be taken very seriously, not only by teachers, but by politicians and reformers. It will arouse keen discussion and hot dissent.
Mr. Cole will welcome both. For though his manner is dogmatic, his method is tentative and moulds itself on facts. His French logic has been graphed on an English mind.

G. LOWES DICKINSON.

The “Old Vic” is celebrating Shakespeare’s birthday.
Very few playgoers have seen Hamlet given in its entirety. It will be so played by the “Old Vic” company on April 19 at 1.15, and repeated on April 24 at the same hour. “Coriolanus” will be given (with Miss Genevieve Ward as Volumnia) on April 12, 14, 16, at 7.30, April 15 at 2, and May 8 at 2.30.
IT would be amusing to hear Martial's comment on Mr. Ker's translation. "Let no man rewrite my epigrams," he says. "Improve facti qui in aleno libro ingenuos est." And if there be any man "so pretentiously prudish that to his mind in no page it is permissible to speak plain Latin," Martial would have him content himself with the preface or the title-page. What would he say of a translator who has conscientiously run through seven books of his unseemliness, rendering in English all epigrams possible of translation by the use of dashes or paraphrases, but serving up for the wholly impossible ones the Italian squalorities of Giuspanio Graglia? He would have been amused, we imagine, but not greatly indignant. We at any rate, though we smile at Mr. Ker's embarrassment, cannot blame him for the result. When timid persons deplore the frank indecency of our own Elizabethans, we are angry. Elizabethan drama is indecent just because it is so much alive. If you translated Aristophanes with the aid of paraphrases and you would prove yourself unworthy to translate him, because life is really the grotesque and splendid paradox that Aristophanes has made it. The dung-beetle soars to heaven, but there's no question that dung-beetles live on dung. Only in Aristophanes they also soar to heaven, and there's the joke of it. Or, again, if you objected to the passionate sincerity of Catullus, or thought it proper to dilute his terrible and blasting rhetoric, when it became "impossible," with Esperanto, no amount of pretty sentiment about poor Lesbia's sparrow would excuse you. But for Martial's filth your dashes and your paraphrases, and even your Giuspanio Graglia, are excusable, at any rate. His filth is filth, and nothing more. It has no Shakespearean jollity, no Rabelaisian gusto. It has nothing of a Byron's self-contempt and irony and pity; nor of Webster's tortured indignation at the pushing, clutching, climbing, pulling up energies of a futile human menagerie. It is simply a frigid trick, tried and repeated and again repeated, with all the ingenuity variety which the author's unrivalled cleverness can suggest, because it is common form in Domitian's Rome that epigrams should be indecent. Martial himself, we feel, is not amused—simply he caters for the fashion. He gives the public what it wants. Epigrams should be spicy. Very well, Martial supplies an article more highly spiced, more elegantly served, more cunningly devised to tickle and surprise a jaded palate than any other vendor of such cheap commodities.

The fashion to which Martial thus conformed was not the result of a frank joy in life, an animal exuberance. It was the cynical admission of a dead-alive society that nothing seemed really worth while. These pleasure-hunters were haunted by two spectres: death, on the one hand, and the fear of what might happen after death, and, on the other, boredom. Drugs were employed to lay both evils: strange Oriental superstitions for the former, and for the latter, dinner-parties, spectacles and little books of verse. It was because society was both afraid of death and bored with life that such a monster as Domitian was so long tolerable. All Martial's lavish compliments to this strange "Lord and God" are, like his improprieties, simply in the fashion. Verrall's attempt to rescue Martial's reputation was quixotic, generous, but absurd. For provincials to describe the Emperor as "dems" was, he says, "the simplest way of saying that the Empire deserved from them as human beings gratitude and veneration. And so it did." It is as if Domitian were a sort of Great White Queen, and Martial a poor gaping savage out of Africa, thanking Heaven for Rome civilization and for all the majesty and beauty of the perfect monarch. As a matter of fact, Martial himself was a man of gentle habit, friendly and kind and simple. He knew quite well that the Lord and God of Roman society was vulgar, greedy, lecherous, and, above all, cruel. Martial's "Book of the Spectacula" is far more abominable than his most indecent epigrams, if cruelty be more intolerable than debauchery. This brilliant, pushing journalist would give the public what it wanted. Domitian was, perhaps, the most important member of the public. Domitian wanted flattery, and got it. It is useless to attempt to make this little Spaniard respectable. It is enough to say that by his very base-ness, his frank, contemptuous, contemptible acceptance of the work that Rome could offer, Martial not only sold his books, but made his picture of the sordid life of an Imperial city vivid, imperishable, true. He could not have drawn the picture had his conscience been more scrupulous. Nor could he have drawn it well had not the memory of Spain and some rusticity remained with him, to keep him witty and clear-sighted. It was Bibilis that enabled him to see through Rome, and to outlive her.

MARTIAL AND ROME

Mystica et Lyrica. By Cloucesley Brereton. (Elkin Mathews 6s. net)—In his "Epistle Dedicatorie" to the present Earl of Leicester the author very gracefully informs his "patron-in-chief" that, although Time alone can estimate the true value of his verses, the volume will at least remain "a most precious anthology of friends." Their "kindly readiness to go bail for my verses" is appropriately acknowledged by the publication of an imposing list in the good old style. The verses which some five hundred very responsible personages, including many who are noted in art and letters, have gone bail for, comprise some forty pieces, and one of the lyrics commences with the statement that Calm is the lake. Not a flake

Of foam, not a breath in the air.
Still in the sky
The clouds lie,
As if they had ever been there.

Which suggests that at least a dozen of the aforesaid guarantors will live to regret it, particularly as there is hardly an example in the whole volume which is completely free from such banality of thought and diction. Mr. Brereton's foreword reveals that he is engaged in education; can even that fact be justification for the "Ascent"?

Frar, Pessimist, why do you think us
For aye condemned to haunt the slime?
Just look at the ornithorhynchus!
The snake becomes a bird in time!

"To those who are indisposed by habit and temperament to worry over what is to them frankly insoluble," writes Mr. Brereton, "one would humbly suggest they begin at the end of the book and read the poems in inverse order. They will, if they do me the honour to read me aloud, possibly discover certain speech rhythms that are predominately Norfolk, and therefore interesting to those who have ears to hear." We confess that we have not persevered beyond the stage of frank insolubility.

A PREACHER of genius, if he were called upon, as the Primate of a national Church inevitably is, to find an inspiring thought for every State occasion, whether inherently great or trivial, might confess without shame that the task was beyond him, still less should he be held to that kind of blame which the present Archbishop of Canterbury, whose gifts have always lain in administration rather than eloquence. It is enough that in the war and peace sermons collected under the title "The Testing of a Nation" (Macmillan 6s.) he consistently expresses himself with dignity, good feeling, and in excellent English. At no stage of the war did Archbishop Davidson surrender to the Jingoism of panic, and he was not afraid, at moments of general distraction, to remind the nation of its duty towards the enemy.

T. M.
TWO MODERN NOVELS

AN IMPERFECT MOTHER. By J. D. Beresford. (Collins. 7s.)
TWO SISTERS. By R. H. Bretherton. (Allen & Unwin. 7s. 6d.)

Mr. Beresford and Mr. Bretherton, two of our more thoughtful writers, turning from the crowded noisy town where everybody knows everybody else, and there is not a house to be had or even a room that is bare of associations, turning equally from the vague outlines and spaces of the open country, have chosen to build their new novels in what might be called the Garden City of literature. It is only recently that the possibility and the attractions of this desirable site have been discovered by the novelists, and the houses are still scattered and few, but there is no doubt as to its dawning popularity with the novelists. They do not seem to mind the chill hygienic atmosphere of a Garden City; the gardens in which poor Adam and Eve never could find a hiding-place from the awful eye of God or man; the asphalt roads with meek trees on either side standing up, as it were, to an “artistic” dance; the wire receptacles ready to catch the orange or banana peel of some non-resident savage, and the brand-new exposed houses which seem to breathe white enamel and cork linoleum and the works of Freud and Jung, which seem to defy you to find in them a dark corner or a shadowy stair, which seem to promise you that there never shall be a book upside down on the shelves or an unclaimed toothbrush in the bathroom, or a big summer hat—belonging to whom?—on the top of the wardrobe, or a box under the bed. All is “carefully thought out,” “arranged for,” all is in admirable order, and we imagine Mr. Beresford and Mr. Bretherton throwing open the doors of their new houses and declaring them ready for inspection...

“An Imperfect Mother” is an account of the youth and early manhood of Stephen Kirkwood, a pleasant, diligent boy whose ambition is to be a successful builder. His father is a bookseller; he has two sisters, one with spectacles and one without, and his imperfect mother is an artist.
She plays the piano, she has a charming talent for telling little stories, and she is—well famed—gay, laughing, beautiful in a way that shocks the staid cathedral city of Medboro’. Up to the time the story opens she and Stephen have been, it is suggested, all in all to each other, but now she has fallen in love with the organist and her heart is divided.
Stephen, too, smiled upon by the fourteen-year-old Margaret Weatherby, feels the stirring of a new affection, and thus it happens that when his mother puts his loyalty to a final test he fails her and she runs away from home.
It is only later that we realize the significance of the scene when Stephen follows her, begs her to come back—and she laughs. Her cruel, hysterical laughter shocks him profundly, and she lets him go.

Seven years pass and Stephen, highly successful in the building trade, is sent up to London to supervise a £150,000 job on the Embankment. There, in his loneliness, he seeks out his mother, and relations of a kind are renewed. But at the very moment of their meeting Margaret Weatherby reappears and again smiles... There is a repetition of the old conflict under a new guise. His mother, again on the point of running away, turns to him; but this time he is in love, and this time when he shows his heart to Margaret, she it is who laughs hysterically, cruelly. This is not to be borne, and in Stephen’s despair he flings the problem at his mother. Why does he mind so much? Now we have the explanation. She remembers how when he was “a little bit of a toddling thing” he had got into one of his rages with her, and she had laughed, wildly, hysterically, cruelly, until he banged his head against the wall to stop her and had “a kind of fit.” This has left a dark place in his mind, and it is this that accounts for his extreme susceptibility to callous laughter... But, continuing the explanation, she tells him that the second time she laughed it was a sign of her despair. “I couldn’t keep you off. That laugh was the best effort to defend myself.” And—doesn’t he now see that Margaret’s laughter had the same meaning? He does, and his imperfect mother brings them together, even though she realizes that in so doing she loses Stephen for ever. But has she ever had him? Mr. Beresford does not allow us one single glimpse of their life together, in the early days, and in the “seven years after” meeting there is not a trace of real emotion. At his mother’s demand to know why he wanted to know her we are told Stephen “plunged after essentials.” This is a very cold plunge and, as far as we can see, a useless one. He brings nothing from the vasty deep. And does that explanation, which is intended, evidently, to warm and light up the whole pile book, do anything more than reveal its essential emptiness? The house is not furnished at all; nobody lives there. We should not be surprised if Mr. Beresford had written “To Let” on the last page...

In the opening chapters of “Two Sisters” the temperature is still depressingly low. There were two sisters; one was Ethel and one was Nell. Ethel was very, very good, but a prig; Nell was very, very bad and painted her face and waved at soldiers in passing trains, but she was not a prig. Ethel was married to Jim, a very architectural architect, and a modern house with all conveniences, but what did it matter what you did? “Don’t bother me, Ethel!”
“You must not talk to Ethel like that,” says Jim. This goes on for a long time. Then the father of the two sisters loses all his money, and Nell goes away to start a music school and help keep her parents in their old home, but Ethel refuses to aid them because they will not give up the old home. “Can Ethel be a little cold-hearted?” thinks Jim, and is ashamed of the thought. Nell, finding herself with a Bohemian and sister for partners, discovers that she is not really fond of wickedness. She turns over a new leaf and becomes, in no time, a pattern young woman. But when her female partner decamps and leaves her alone in the house with Leonard, Ethel interferes.

Up to this point we have been led so gently and by such easy stages, that it is surprising to find Mr. Bretherton means to make an example of that priggish Ethel. Virtuous matron that she is, she refuses to believe in Nell’s transformation, and after accusing her of living in sin, because the same roof shelters her and Leonard, Ethel ruins her sister’s character by making her accusations public. To the pure all things are impure, and poor Nell has only to return home, ill and shattered, as a result of Ethel’s campaign, for the virtuous sister to diagnose her illness as “going to have a baby.” Oh, how the reader hates Ethel when she makes her discovery known to her mother and forces her to be the family doctor, and how disappointed he is when the doctor lets Ethel off so lightly after all! Even Jim, the architect, when he appreciates the full extent of his wife’s guilt, is not really angry. He could not be angry. There is, as it were, no place for him to be angry in. The author himself is in the same dilemma.
Having placed Ethel in the Garden City and the modern house, he must, at all costs, keep her within bounds. And so we find ourselves positively ashamed of our little spirit of rage and only too ready to believe that Ethel will learn how to be—not more charitable, in future—but a great deal more careful!

K. M.

A BIOGRAPHY of the late Sir Swire Smith, M.P., whose pioneer work for technical instruction in this country made him widely known, is being written by Mr. Reginald Snowden.
A modest and humorous observer of men and things, Sir Swire Smith left intimate notes of a romantic career, which brought him in friendly touch with many well-known people.
MARGINALIA

THERE is a kind of literature—and a very agreeable kind it is—in which the raw material of the subject is so rich and sumptuous in itself that the author’s labour is lightened almost to nothingness. He has only to expose his material in a good strong light to be certain of success. The aim of this kind of literature is the discovery and criticism of human oddities and absurdities. It draws its matter from an inexhaustible mine which promises to be as rich ten thousand years hence as it is to-day, or as it was in the time of the Pharaohs.

I have before me two books which owe much of their charm and interest to the eternal and infinitely varied absurdities of our species. One is the Second Series of "Books in General," by Solomon Eagle,* and the other is Mr. E. V. Lucas’s little biography of David Williams, founder of the Royal Literary Fund.† "What a piece of work is a man! How noble in reason! how infinite in faculty! in form, in moving, how express and admirable! in action how like an angel! in apprehension how like a god! the beauty of the world! the paragon of animals! And yet . . ." and yet Solomon Eagle has discovered a gentleman called Mr. Finch Barnard, who has written a book about the soul, Shakespeare and similar topics in which there is a chapter headed: "Some Historical and Genealogical Evidences of the Descent of the Barnards and Finch from Charlemagne and from Adam." "Askenaz," Mr. Barnard goes on, "was the son of Gomer, who was the son of Japhet, eldest son of Noah, and elder branch to the Jews. Aventinus, however, makes Askenaz a fourth son of Noah. This great family was represented in England by the ancient Barnard and Finch family." Furthermore a "great and mystic significance attaches to the name of Barnard in regard to life and religion, and the mysterious relations between spiritual and animal life . . . There is not only a spiritual lien and a pedigreed between themselves, but probably also a blood, as well as a spiritual, tie with Jesus Christ." Solomon Eagle’s comment. "This is the sort of thing that happens to people who are too enthusiastic about their ancestors," is a superfluity. The extracts may safely be left to write their own criticism.

Solomon Eagle is happy in his choice of absurdities. He discovers the religious poetry of Joanna Southcott:

To warn their friend of every truth they know,
'Tis plain I did for them, the truth is so,
And so the bread is on the water cast,
And like thy uncle now the Jews will burst.

He might have added that Joanna still has followers; every Londoner must have noticed the posters which mysteriously made their appearance in our midst a few months ago: "The Bishops must open Joanna Southcott’s box and save the country in its hour of peril." He discovers the poetry of John Whitcomb Riley, the anniversary of whose birth is now a public holiday in his native State. He discovers other things more subtly and delicately absurd—metaphysical titbits from the seventeenth century, pidgin-English dictionaries for Germans, speeches by the Prime Minister cut up into free verse.

In David Williams, Mr. Lucas has found a congenial theme. Williams lived in that palmy age of English style which witnessed the uncontested efflorescence of Erasmus Darwin and Miss Anna Seward. The style of the period clings like a bright aura of absurdity round almost every figure of the closing years of the eighteenth century. A man may be the most serious of characters, the most intelligent and enlightened, but he cannot fail to become a little ridiculous when he is described as "gay, ardent and sprightly, with a bosom languishing for pleasure." Owing to "The Loves of the Plants" and "The Economy of Vegetation" we find it, to-day, almost impossible to take Erasmus Darwin seriously. He was very nearly a great man; his style compels us to treat him as a figure of fun. Mr. Lucas has very skilfully painted a portrait of Williams in which we see the central core of a serious character surrounded by the halo of absurdity with which our changed fashions of thought and speech have invested certain features of the period in which he lived.

What are the traits of style, what the intellectual preoccupations of our generation which will provide future Solomon Eagles and Lucases with material for their "Books in General" and their half-lurid biographies? It is a pleasing speculation, and one in which every writer on human absurdities should every now and then indulge. For there is a danger of believing absurdity to be absolute and self-evident to all, a danger, that is, of believing the opinions of one’s own age and society to be the best of all possible opinions. As well say at once, with that great anonymous writer of nonsense who called himself modestly "A. Nobody,"

My nose myself I painted white
Because, you know, I’m always right.

NOTES FROM IRELAND

When Mr. Bernard Shaw referred to a "quaint little pocketbook of English Pre-Raphaelite prose called the Gaelic Movement" most Irish readers of "John Bull’s Other Island" must have felt that our restless expatriate was relying once more upon his imagination for the facts of modern Ireland. Mr. Shaw is only too frequently guilty of such aberrations when confronted with evidence of an Ireland unknown to his youthful experience of this country. If there was any definite allusion in that inaccurate generalization it must have been to the existence of the Cuala Press, which began in 1903 to revive the art of fine printing in Dublin. During the first four years eleven volumes were published, bearing the imprint of the Dun Emer Press, which was then renamed the Cuala Press, but has remained from the beginning under the management of Miss Elizabeth Yeats. The selection of the books and the general editorship of the series have been in the hands of Mr. W. B. Yeats, and a set of these twenty-nine volumes, printed on a hand-press in an attractive eighteenth-century type, has become "a scarce and desirable item," to quote the vernacular of the dealers. There was never any intention to challenge comparison with the productions of the Kelmscott Press, which was apparently the basis of Mr. Shaw’s reference. At the same time, the Dun Emer and Cuala Press publications are singularly pleasing possessions to the bibliophile who is not merely a collector. Very few of the volumes are reprints, almost every one has an inscription of Miss Yeats’ own hand. Much of the beauty of the books lies in their independence of ornamentation for its own sake. They are easy to read, for Miss Yeats has always relied upon the craftsmanship of the printer for her effects.

The latest volume is "Further Letters of John Butler Yeats" (12s. 6d. net), which must be read in conjunction with "Passages from the Letters of John Butler Yeats," published three years ago in the same series. On this occasion the passages have been selected by Mr. Lennox Robinson, who differs from his predecessor in the earlier volume. Mr. Yeats Pound in so far as his selections are longer and deal more consecutively with one subject. That, of course, may be due rather to the character of the letters placed at his disposal than to any contempt of Planmaesigheid in Mr. Pound. The most obvious expectation aroused by the letters of an artist is that they will reveal his opinions on matters concerning his own art. Here that expectation.
The Bodleian during 1919.

We have received a copy of the report of the Bodleian Library for 1919. One item in it will arouse a free vote in the profound and not entirely sentimental regret in those who knew the charm of Bodley's library. The year was a typewriter (the first to be employed in the Library) was purchased.

The number of new readers admitted reached the surprising total of 1,424, as against 424 in 1918. The accessions showed a marked increase on 1918, but below those received in 1916. Among the MS. donations we may note classical lecture-notes and collations by Professor Bywater, and Mark Pattison's note-books on Scaliger, Salmasius, Casaubon, etc. (from the executors of Professor Cook Wilson); and the printer's copy of Samuel Butler's "Lack or Cunning," typed and written by the author (from Mr. Festing Jones); among the donations of printed books, various volumes of Erasmus (from Mr. P. S. Allen), Mr. T. J. Wise's privately printed bibliography of Swinburne and twelve of his privately printed pamphlets, and Mr. Festing Jones' privately printed "Diary of a Journey through North Italy to Sicily." A bronze bust of R. H. Robson, Ellis, was presented, and placed in the Picture Gallery. The most notable MS. acquisition was that of a seventeenth-century collection of prophecies collected by Elias Ashmole and annotated by him, and subsequently owned by Thomas Hearne; and among the printed books the only known copy of "Jaco's vow. A sermon preach'd before His Majesty and the Prince His Highness at St. Mary's in Oxford..." by Thomas Fuller, 1320.

There is a debit balance of over 1000 on the general fund; the expenditure on purchases, where a great increase is desirable, has had to be severely restricted, and a large reduction has had to be made in necessary binding.

Book Sale

The following are among the lecture arrangements at the Royal Institution after Easter: Professor Arthur Keith, four lectures on British Ethnology: the Invaders of England. Mr. R. Campbell Thompson, two lectures: (1) The Origins of the Mound Builders in Middle America; (2) Myths of the Babylonians. Mr. A. P. Graves' two lectures on Welsh and Irish Folk Songs (with musical illustrations). Mr. Frederick Chamberlin, two lectures on the Private Character of Queen Elizabeth. Professor Frederic Harrison, two lectures: (1) A Philosophical Synthesis as proposed by Auguste Comte; (2) The Evolution and the Evolution of Thought. Professor J. H. Jeans, two lectures on Recent Revolutions in Physical Science: (1) Theory of Relativity; (2) Theory of Quanta (Tyndall Lectures).
Science

THE ENTEENTE CORDIALE

THOSE who are interested in current "serious" literature, and more particularly that branch of it which deals in a speculatively way with those vague but impressive problems which have always haunted men, the existence of God, the "meaning" of the Universe and so on, cannot have failed to notice the unaccustomed prestige now enjoyed by science. The supposed contributions of science to these discussions are now listened to with a gravity and politeness, with a kind of serious hush, which was formerly reserved for quotations from Plato and Aristotle. Compared with the crude materialists of Huxley's day, it is evident that the modern man of science has greatly improved his social standing; he now frequently talks to the best people, on equal terms, on such subjects as the Good and the Beautiful. The underbred, pushing, clamorous self-assertion of the Victorian scientist is a rare note in these improving conversations between philosophers and men of science. A man like Haeckel is dismissed as a mere vulgarian; no one would trouble to refute him; his loud voice and hob-nailed boots are sufficient condemnation. Even Huxley is felt to be a rather noisy person; the modern expositor of the relations of Science and Religion or Science and Philosophy no longer borrows his technique from the Hyde Park orator; he has adopted rather the insinuating charm of the curate. There are, of course, survivals on both sides: sweetness and light are not yet universal; the general atmosphere of mutual forbearance and respect is still occasionally marred by the harsh note of some exceptionally fanatic or insensitive partisan. One or two grave lapses of this kind may be detected amongst the mass of recent books devoted to cosmical questions. There are still one or two literary men and philosophers who hint at those dreadful early days of science, before it went to Oxford, and there are still one or two provincial men of science, farouche, suspicious, who attend a modern cultured salon carrying their obsolete life-preserver in their pocket. But on the whole good manners prevail everywhere. It is realized that there is no reason why anybody should feel awkward at meeting anybody else in a world which is so indulgent of the difference between a man's private and public capacities.

To be on amiable terms with everybody is worth a sacrifice, and in our relief at escaping from the ferocious savagery of the Victorian controversialists we may well endure the minor discomforts of a reconciliation between science, philosophy and religion so effective as to render indistinguishable the separate persons of this trinity. The particular advantage of this amalgamation that concerns us here is the fact that it has brought a new branch of literature into existence. As is usual in an amalgamation, each member profits by the custom brought by the others, until finally a composite article is evolved which is, as it were, simultaneously buff and blue. That is how we get these very curious and interesting modern works on cosmical questions—works which seem to result from a close collaboration between, say, a professor of physics, an archdeacon and a Bond Street crystal-gazer.

A very comprehensive Weltanschauung is thereby afforded, and doubtless a truly "balanced" mind must result from the purer of such works, but we may doubt whether each component, as it were, is presented in its purity. The advantages of association are only obtained by a certain loss of individuality. We cannot speak for the philosophy and religion of these works, but we are impelled to these reflections by detecting a certain quality which pervades the scientific part of the expositions. It is, as we have admitted, a good thing for science that it has been taken up in this way. It moves in an atmosphere of culture; it finds itself being described in chapters headed with Greek quotations; it is complimented on its strong vein of poetry; its peculiarities are explained, inaccurately but sympathetically, in columns of literary causerie, and the unexpected but gratifying discovery is made that it by no means lacks the bump of reverence and proper respect for constituted authority.

Yet, kindly as are the surrounding faces, and pleasant as is the consciousness that one's clothes and accent excite no comment, there is, on the part of many scientific men, a persistent uneasy feeling that one has gained this position on false pretences. It is these remarkable modern books to which we pay tribute, which render the feeling acute. At the same time, it is very difficult to state precisely the elements of this feeling. We understand, however, that there are young poets and novelists who experience very much the same emotion when one of the great "official" men of letters talks about literature. It appears that such people often get everything subtly wrong, that their criticism never pierces to the real heart of the matter, that they make literature at once more pompous and more tame than it really is. These new cultured expositors of science affect one very much like that. Their indisputable intelligence and their wide knowledge do not save them; they lack something—it may be a mere familiar way of talking—which marks a profound scholar, whom feel they touch their subject with padded fingers. We attribute no occult influence to laboratories, but we think the expositor of science who is not also a creator is something like that curiously unconvincing creature—the theoretical sailor who has never been to sea. For that reason we are uneasy in the presence of these numerous modern expositions. Such work of the kind as was done in the old days was done by real men of science in their spare time. They had the competence, if also something of the crudity, of the workman in the factory who explains to you how his machine works. The modern writers are so much more like those frock-coated "attendants" at Exhibitions. One is oppressed with the same suavity, the same incredible readiness, the same secret doubt whether he has ever handled a tool in his life.

Such being our estimate of our modern teachers, we may be permitted to be sceptical concerning the complete satisfactoriness of their account of the present disposition and relations of science. When they vouch for the complete respectability and harmlessness of science we wonder if they are not a little too kind. We have an absurd nervousness, as in the presence of a reformed burglar. He looks well-dressed enough and his hands are not impossibly horny; moreover, we are told that the two very respectable gentlemen with him find him a most charming companion. We are prejudiced, we suppose; but to our thinking there is a coarseness about the jaw, an occasional hard glint in the eye, which would make us reluctant to accept him as, at any rate, a sleeping companion. We wonder if those two gentlemen, the one reverend and the other nearly so, ever feel a little apprehensive during the night?

S.

DR. A. L. BOWLEY, the author of the much discussed "Division of the Product of Industry: an Analysis of the National Income before the War," published 1919, and now in its fourth impression, has pursued his researches in the same field; and the Oxford University Press will publish immediately his "Change in the Distribution of the National Income, 1880—1913." It is still not possible to analyse the distribution for the years since the outbreak of war; but Dr. Bowley here carries the analysis back for a generation, and the results are of the first importance.
SOCIETIES

ARISTOTELIAN.—March 22.—Professor H. Wildon Carr in the chair.

Mr. Clement C. J. Webb read a paper on "Obligation, Autonomy and the Common Good." He contended that the notion of obligation, in which Kant rightly found the essential feature of our moral consciousness, cannot be directly derived (as Green seems to suppose) from the notion of a "common good," but that on the contrary it is an "essential of a "general will," as also the closely connected notion of a "common will," that derives its significance for ethics, and eventually for politics, from its connection with the notion of obligation. The latter of the two notions, however, as in itself merely the result of the general will, but not as the expression of an absolute factor therein, which perhaps may be best described as the sovereignty of the State. To the thought expressed in Kant's choice of the word "autonomy" to express the status of the good will may be traced along one line of descent the anti-authoritarian tendency in contemporary ethics and politics.

LINNEAN.—March 18.—Dr. A. Smith Woodward, President, in the chair.

Mr. E. Heron-Allen, Professor Vernon H. Blackman, and Dr. James Davidson were admitted Fellows. The following were elected Frewes: Jacques de Villermont, Arthur Lionel Goodday, Geoffrey D. H. Carpenter, and A. Stanley Hirst.

The proposed alterations in chap. xi, sections 2 and 6, of the rules relating to subscriptions were carried.

Professor James Small gave a lantern demonstration of "The Chemical Reversal of Geotropic Response in Roots and Stems." Professor Weiss, Cant, A. W. Hill, Professor V. H. Blackman, and Professor E. S. Goodrich took part in the discussion which followed.

ROYAL NUMISMATIC.—March 18.—Professor C. Oman, President, in the chair.

Mr. Ernest H. Wheeler was elected a Fellow.

The President exhibited seven tetradrachms of Antiochus the Great, illustrating his portrait at different periods in the reign and at different points. Mr. Watson showed an unpublished Persian brass of L. Verus (rev. S.C.) without S.C., and a small medalion of M. Aurelius (rev. Fortuna).

Mr. L. A. Lawrence read a further note on the Amphitry find of early 2nd H. P. pewter, in which readings of new points, not previously deciphered. Most of the mints were represented in the hoard, and among the rarer coins was one of a new Canterbury moneyer named RAGLE.

Mr. G. F. Hill gave an account of his investigation of a story that a specimen of the gold mancus of Offa had been found near Orwell, in Cambridgeshire, forty years ago. If the coin was really a specimen of the Arab dinar copied by Offa, he had been unable to trace through the British Museum, and at different points, Mr. Waterson showed an unpublished Persian bronze of L. Verus (rev. S.C.) without S.C., and a small medalion of M. Aurelius (rev. Fortuna).

Mr. L. A. Lawrence read a further note on the Amphitry find of early 2nd H. P. pewter, in which readings of new points, not previously deciphered. Most of the mints were represented in the hoard, and among the rarer coins was one of a new Canterbury moneyer named RAGLE.

SOCIETY OF ANTIQUARIES.—March 25.—Sir Hercules Read, President, in the chair.

Mr. C. L. Kingsford read a paper on "Paris Garden and the Bear-baiting." It has commonly been alleged that Paris Garden took name from Robert Paris, who in the reign of Richard II, had a garden, on which the butchers of London built a place where their offal might be cut up for the bears. But the wits on this story was based contains nobody of a garden or of bears, and is obvious that the site referred to was on the opposite side of the river, probably in Queenhithe Ward, of which Robert Paris was a common councillor. The site of Paris Garden anciently belonged to the Templars, and was in later times owned by a Knight under a lease from Bermondsey Abbey. In 1385 it was assurred to Henry VIII. by Act of Parliament, but neither then nor in subsequent grants is there anything to suggest that bear-baiting was practised there. Paris Garden Stairs formed the most convenient landing place for the bear-rings, and this probably led to the common reference to the bear-baiting at Paris Garden. We certainly get such a reference long after the time when it is known that bear-baiting was held further east. Amongst the Alley manuscripts at Dulwich College there is a list of his "writings of the Bear Garden. But none of the deeds are now preserved there. Recent discoveries have been discovered at the Record Office to which they probably came as an exhibit in Alley's lawsuit with William Henslow in 1629. From the deeds and from the interrogatories and depositions in this lawsuit it is possible to restore much of the early history of the Bear Garden before 1584. One William Payne was lessee of the Bear Garden before 1574 and erected standings or scaffolds for the spectators. Payne was succeeded by one Wiston, who was followed, perhaps with an interval, by Morgan Pope in 1585. Pope appears to have transferred his lease to one Hayes, from whom it was acquired by Thomas Burnaby, the person who sold it to Alley in 1584. Burnaby had sublet in 1585 to Sir Richard Everard, and another to his lease is a list of the bulls and bears together with the pony and ape. This list is, with the exception of one given by Taylor the Water-poet fifty years later, the only complete list which we possess. In the list appears a bear called "Harry of Term," which is also mentioned by Nash in 1593. The deeds and interrogatories make it clear that the bulls and bears were kept at the Bear Garden and not at Paris Garden as early as the time of William Payne. Payne used to bait the bears at the place subsequently known as the Old Bear Garden. John Taylor, one of the witnesses in 1589 (who has been wrongly identified with the Water-poet), remembered two earlier places at which they were baited, one near Mason Stairs and the other at the corner of S. Lane, which are referred to in 1578 as the Old Bear Garden. At the Record Office there are a number of deeds relating to the early history of the site of the original bear gardens. That this site was part of Alley's property is shown by his entry in 1620, on which the actual bear-garden was moved further east, the lessees probably found it convenient to retain the original site for purposes connected with their business.

ZOLOGICAL.—March 16.—Professor E. W. MacBride, Vice-President, in the chair.

Mr. R. I. Pocock read a report on the additions to the menagerie during February.—Mr. E. G. Boulenger exhibited and made remarks on a frog with a duplicate foot.—Professor J. P. Hill exhibited and made remarks on a specimen obtained from a kangaroo recently living in the menagerie.

Mr. Pocock read a paper, illustrated by lantern-slides, on the external characters of the South American monkeys, and showed the variations in the structure of the ears, nose, hands, and feet and external genitalia.

Dr. C. F. Soumac communicated his paper on "The Comparative Anatomy of the Tongues of the Primates of the Marsupialia and the different divisions of the tongue and the physical characters of each. He demonstrated by diagrams and lantern-slides the different forms which the papilae and openings of Wharton's ducts can assume among the mammals, and exhibited specimens illustrating the shapes and colours of the tongue, and arrangements for cleaning the teeth.

FORTHCOMING MEETINGS

Fri. 9. Philological, 5.30.—Dictionary Evening, Professor W. A. Craigie.

Malscological, 6.

Mon. 12. Royal Geographical, 5.—"A Brief Review of the Evidence upon which the Theory of Isotasy is Based."—Mr. O. Willott.

Royal Institution, 5.—General Meeting.

Aristotelian, 8.—Symposium on "The Concrete Universal"—The True Type of Universality."—Mr. S. E. Anwatin. Lecture 1. Dr. W. Rosenheim. (Cantor Lecture.)

Zoological, 5.30.—"An Apodous Ania sala."—Mr. A. Willey.

Royal Anthropological Institute, 8.15.—"The Western, Australian Aborigines: their Treatment and Care," by Mr. A. C. Scott.

Thurs. 15. Royal Institution, 3.—"Ebullition and Evaporation."—Mr. Sydney Skinner.

Society of Arts (Sidney Section), 4.30.—"The Port of India: their Administration and Development," by Sir George Buchanan.

Linnean, 5.—"Natural History Exploration on the North-East Frontier of India," Capt. F. Kingdon Ward.

Child-Study (90, Buckingham Palace Road, S.W.), 6.—Spelling Reform," Professor W. Ripman.

Fri. 16. Royal Institution, 9.—"Ions and Nuclei."—Dr. J. A. McClelland.
Fine Arts

HOW TO CATALOGUE GEMS

THE LEWES HOUSE COLLECTION OF ANCIENT GEMS. By J. D. Beazley. (Oxford, Clarendon Press. 38s. net.)

GEMS enjoy an unfair advantage over most other small works of art, the effect of which depends almost entirely on the skill of the artist in giving form to his raw material. The gem first attracts us by the beauty of its colour, an accident which has nothing to do with the art of the engraver. It is true that in the cameo he can take advantage of the distribution of colour, but for the present let us confine our remarks to intaglios. It is not too much to say that their colour is a hindrance to a proper appreciation of their artistic value. That can best be gauged in the impression, which has the advantage of showing the design in relief. Possibly the most skilful gem-engravers, like the finest engravers of coin-dies, are able to think in reverse; but even they are obliged to test their work, as it proceeds, by taking impressions to show the relief; and most of them, if we may judge by the practice of coin-engravers from the Renaissance onwards, must have made a point of working for the critic who is going to keep his head before a cabinet of gems needs to discount the element of colour, though he would be unduly pedantic who would condemn the art as bastard because the alliance of the two elements that make up the effect has no artistic sanction. "Art is a loving friend of chance, and chance of art." The cameo is in a different category from the intaglio. So far as it depends on the use of layers of differently coloured stone, it is not to be taken seriously as a work of art. It is the reductio ad absurdum of an excellent rule, that the artist should never forget the stuff he is working in. Here the material takes command, and compels him to arrange his colours in such a way as to make the design work as an effect of contrast or curtail elements in his design, in accordance with the distribution of the colours of the stone. No wonder that this kind of gem was especially popular with the Romans. The big cameos, whether Roman or Renaissance, are the most perfect examples of vulgarity and pretentiousness in art.

The Lewes House Collection, however, out of a total of 155 numbers, contains only half-a-dozen cameos. It has been formed with singular judgment and taste. The proportion of Etruscan—less than a score of pieces—is also small. The finest Etruscan work in gems, as in bronze, has its merits; but the mass of it is merely derivative and uninspired. Taken as a whole, there has probably never been another collection of gems containing, for its size, so few pieces of mediocre execution or doubtful authenticity. If Mr. Warren has been wise in his selection of specimens, he is no less to be congratulated on his choice of a cataloguer. Mr. Beazley's published works on vases have told us what to expect of him: an inquiring eye for minute detail; an archeological memory that nothing escapes; good taste, displayed not in laudatory epithets (we fancy the word "beautiful" is not to be found in his pages), but in discrimination of style; a wealth of happy illustration from other arts; and a proneness to Morellio-Furtwänglerian methods of attribution. The last characteristic appears in this book in a somewhat chastened form; or is it that, the subject being new, Mr. Beazley is feeling his way? As it is, his attribution of the scaraboid with an archer to Epimenes is difficult to accept; it seems not to show that engraver's finish or just subordination of anatomical details to the general surface. But perhaps we are rash in judging from the illustrations, excellent though they are.

Dexamenos, of course, has to have a list of attributions tacked on to the famous portrait which used to be called Demosthenes, and which Sir Arthur Evans thinks represents Cimon. But Mr. Beazley adds only one to Furtwängler's list, while subtracting others. He is careful, as usual, to say nothing of his opinion of this gem as a work of art. But it would be interesting to know how many impartial judges, admitting all its mastery of technique, and discounting the smugness which may be presumed to have been inherent in the subject, would find anything to admire in this portrait. A really great artist succeeds in creating dignity and interest (whether of attraction or of repulsion) to his subject; in this gem the precision of handling and the stress laid on detail (as in the staring stupid eye) serve only to bring out the paltriness of the sitter. Some early critics—in the days when it was held that the Greeks could do no wrong—were so grossly disconcerted by these characteristics that they condemned the gem as false. It is only an excellent example of the fatal facility of the virtuoso. That even in the fifth century—though not quite so early as some would date this gem—the Greeks could go astray like this is known to every student of coins.

A splendid work, on the other hand, is the Hellenistic portrait of an Oriental in a lez. It is that touch of melancholy in which the civilized, Greek artist seizes the expression of the semi-barbarian, a melancholy akin to that which is so often seen or fancied in the eyes of an intelligent animal. It recalls in this and other respects the amazing portraits of Pontic or Bithynian rulers round about 300 B.C., Mithradates II. or Pharnakes I. or Prusias I., as seen on their coins.

This last word reminds us of the fact that, although Mr. Beazley may not have gone through a long training in numismatics, his book is the first, not even excepting Furtwängler's, in which a student of gems has made a really critical use of coins. He might perhaps have remembered the early coins of Sidon in describing the fine Persian cylinder with the Great King going a-hunting; and perhaps he has exaggerated the connection between his griffin scaraboid and the coins of Abdera; Abdera's mother-city, Teos, might have something to say on the question, which we cannot argue here. But, on the whole, numismatists will have nothing but praise for Mr. Beazley's handling of the evidence of coins. It was time that this evidence was duly weighed, since coins, which can be accurately dated, afford the only positive criteria for the dating of gems, and, as the nearest analogue in technique, are the best guide in questions of authenticity. The final requisite—negative but necessary—for the ideal work on ancient gems would be attained if Mr. Beazley would publish a careful study of the work of Renaissance engravers. Not until the mass of Renaissance and eighteenth-century imitations has been separated will the foundations of criticism of the antique be secure.

Of course this is a catalogue, not a general treatise, and the author keeps severely to his lines. But it is less unreadable than most catalogues. Mr. Beazley is austere; but he can upon occasion show compassion:

A poor old donkey. His body is emaciated (with ribs, shoulder-blade, hips and vertebral protruding); except his belly, which is inflated, with swollen veins. The mane straggling and perhaps maney: a sore on the neck. A study of deception difficult to parallel among Greek representations of animals.

Or imagination:

The child Eros seated on the ground playing with a goose, which lifts its wings. Below, a pair of knucklebones, with which he was playing until the goose came to look.

But he does not often let himself go like this.

The book (barring a few Greek accents which have got lost) does great credit to the Oxford Press; the plates are admirable. We wish the portraits of the author trying on an Oriental headdress had been better likenesses.

G. F. H.
EXHIBITIONS OF THE WEEK
ROYAL SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER-COLOURS.
ROYAL INSTITUTE OF PAINTERS IN WATER-COLOURS.

As a general rule it is easier to appreciate an artist's powers in a one-man show than in a large mixed exhibition. But occasionally, and in an exceptional way, where the standard is low or perverted, a man's work gains by contrast with its surroundings. Mr. A. R. Smith's water-colour, for example, labelled "Noontide," which would have appeared relatively unimportant at the recent collection of his drawings arranged by the Fine Art Society, looks exceedingly distinguished at the Royal Society of Painters in Water-Colours, where the standard is not far to seek. At Bond Street we admired Mr. Smith's ability to suggest form bathed in light and air, and we took for granted his evident respect for the water-colour medium. In the Pall Mall gallery this fundamental quality appears in itself a merit, because the vast majority of the exhibitors flippantly neglect the medium. Nine-tenths of the artists here seem intent on emulating the effects of oil painting, and in many cases they accentuate the misdirection of their efforts by placing heavy gold frames close up to the drawings. The exhibitors who show the slightest signs of a genuine respect for water-colour can be counted on the fingers of one hand, and of these Mr. Roullet's work has an intuitively trite vision, and Mr. Moffat Lindsay suffers from a fatal reluctance to make a precise and positive statement.

Mr. W. B. E. Ranken is conspicuous at the exhibition of the Royal Institute for much the same reason that Mr. Smith is conspicuous in Pall Mall. For the Royal Institute is still the man's own, and as the old and justly proud gentleman grows older, and consequent to the malady which rages at the Royal Society. The difference in degree is seen in the lower types of oil painting selected by the Institute artists for emulation. Mr. Ranken scores because he exploits his medium in a legitimate manner. His drawings of the interior of Moor Park are flamboyant, it is true, but there they are flamboyant in a good sense—in the sense that Tiepolo was flamboyant, and a baroque church is flamboyant; much of their exuberance is inherent in the sumptuous nature of the subject, and in the case of these drawings the heavy gold frames appear (as a kind of exception which proves the rule) quite congruous and inevitable. Mr. Ranken's art has no relation to the art of Mr. Smith, but the two men have this in common: when they speak a given language they are ready to make an effort to master its pronunciation, and they are content to abide by its grammar and syntax. Water-colour drawing is after all no more an art in itself than the French language is an art. It is a language which can be learned well and can be made to express great things or little things, according to the quality of the brain, nerves, and spirit which direct it; and, like any other language, it must be mastered and its special character realized before it can be made capable of expressing anything at all.

We speak of water-colour drawing because it should be primeval drawing that is a statement of form, and artists of consequence who use the medium recognize this. They never use colour for the purpose of contributing to the realistic impression of the drawing. They get their effects entirely by line and tone, and they never impose colour over a line-and-tone foundation, or make it do the work of tone, unless they have previously reduced their palette to a conventional gamut, consisting at most of one or two warm tints and one or two cold ones. They tend to use colour in quite an arbitrary manner, reserving it to relieve monotony or severity, to secure added elegance or charm, or to induce by itself a special sensation. They never forget that their business is to make certain significant lines and washes on a sheet of paper, and not to disguise a sheet of paper, as a scene, or a face, or an Academy landscape in oils: they learn the language before they attempt to speak it, and then reserve it as part of their equipment until occasion calls for its use. The majority of the artists at the Royal Institute and the Royal Institute either do not realize that water-colour drawing is one of the most conventional and exacting of mediums, or else deliberately shrink the effort required to master it. They appear to imagine that its claims will be forgotten if they ignore its existence. But the medium will persist in the face of their efforts to destroy it, because it is always to be eminent artists who will delight in it just because it is difficult and austere.

Music

SUNRISE ON THE GANGES

Almost every young lady who gives a song recital seems to regard it as a duty to begin with an aria of Scarlatti. Sometimes it is "O cessate di piagarmi," sometimes "Già il sole dal Gange," occasionally both. It is very seldom that these ladies give evidence of having any particular understanding and appreciation of old Italian songs. If they had, they would not have the very selections cited above. And there is a repertory of about half-a-dozen by Scarlatti and others from which the choice is made. They would also take trouble to see that the accompaniments to their old Italian songs were properly written out. There may be a few editions in which the original figured basses have been treated in a scholarly and artistic style, but most singers appear to depend on editors who had no understanding whatever of the music of past centuries. The worst suffer of all has been "O cessate di piagarmi," which has only too often caused me to apply the words silently to the singer and the accompanist. It would be too much to expect that the singers should know where these arias came from, and their teachers are no doubt in a morally blissful ignorance. One that I had to listen recently sang "Già il sole" with a ferocious energy and a tone of righteous indignation in her voice which seemed to imply that the unfortunate dwellers on the Ganges, so far from having any right to regard that river as their own, had never even known a sunrise to see it by until that daily blessing had been vouchsafed to them by the establishment of British rule in India. And the gentleman at the pianoforte attacked the introduction with the manly vigour of one who hates a detachment of machine-guns off to a punitive expedition.

The charming lady had probably never given a thought to the significance or origin of the song. The accompanist probably thought that it looked rather like Handel, and that all Handel was meant to be played with the exuberant athleticism of the monster Polypheme. As a matter of fact, "Già il sole" comes from the third act of "L'Homestà negli Amori," one of Scarlatti's very earliest operas. It was composed in 1689, when he was twenty-four. The song is sung by Saldino, a lively little page, whose character somewhat anticipates the Cherubino of Mozart, and its general atmosphere is one of grace and charm.

Nearly all the favourite songs of Scarlatti which appear in recital programmes come from his quite early operas—"O cessate" ("Pompeo," 1683), "Le violette" ("Piro e Demetrio," 1694) and "Non dar più pene" ("La Rosina," 1685). Few singers seem to know the music of his mature period, either for the stage or for the chamber, and they take equally little interest in the more developed vocal music of those earlier Italians on whom Scarlatti formed his style. What really happens is that a certain amount of old Italian music is supposed to be part of every singer's necessary equipment, and the singing-teachers, knowing themselves not more than those one or two songs, teach them to all their pupils in turn. Pupils learn them in much the same way as they learn their elementary Latin anthems, or the conventional selections from them, at school; and they very seldom pay any further attention to them after they have got started on their own way. They sing their Scarlatti aria at the beginning of their recital as part of the convention of concert-giving. The first time that I ever met with that old favourite "Star vicino" (ascribed to Salvador Rosa) it was sung by a lady, an amateur, who, having been trained in "bel canto," had preserved her voice into middle age. It had been a very popular song in the drawing-rooms of her youth. It was considered a very good song to open with, she said; you tried the acoustics of the room with it, and made sure of your voice and your audience before going on to "Non piu mesta" or "The Lost Chord." But the ladies who try the acoustics of the Aolian Hall with "Già il sole dal Gange" put their own voice and their own intelligence to the test as well. Only rarely do they come through the trial with success.

For Scarlatti is a stiff examination in voice-production, in phrasing, in interpretation, in rhythm, in general musicianship, and also in the pronunciation of Italian. It is easy enough to cover up indifferent production in a good many modern songs by distracting the attention of the listener in the direction of literary expression. The same thing happens when singers attempt the English contemporaries of Scarlatti. The English music of that period requires just as much finish and elegance of style; but the hand of the English arranger is often a heavy one, and a modernized accompaniment invites an emotional method of singing. The English words are a still more dangerous pitfall, for they inevitably tempt the singer into a distressingly arch delivery of their curious phraseology.

If Purcell, Blow, Greene, and the rest were treated with the respect that is paid to the old Italians, even such very moderately intelligent respect as is paid to "Già il sole," they might form a classical foundation of pure English singing. It is at the same time highly desirable that singers should continue to make a careful study of the old Italian classics. It is obvious to anybody that they demand first and foremost a perfection of voice production and breath control. What is less obvious is that they demand clearness and precision in diction. Most singers nowadays make a point of singing French and Italian as well as English. In almost all cases their diction is much clearer in French than in either Italian or English, even when English is their native language. One reason for this is doubtless the fact that modern French songs are composed with a view to clear enunciation. It is only a really great French singer, such as Mme. Bathori, who can show her audience the vocal melody that underlies such songs as the "Chansons de Bilitis," which, to the ordinary English reader, appear to be little more than recitations. Hence the temptation of French songs for the singer who has not yet achieved complete vocal control. Old Italian songs treat their words in a different way. The words themselves are almost music. They are extremely formal, sometimes almost nonsensically formal, from a literary point of view, and designed deliberately to be repeated and inverted in the course of the song. The words are thus inseparable from the musical phrasing of the song. They must be spoken in such a way that their clear and distinct enunciation does not break and destroy the musical phrase, but actually helps to give it plasticity and suppleness. Herein Italian has a great advantage over English. It is only accomplished poets such as Dryden who could have treated English in this way, whereas in Italian the structure of the language places the technique within the grasp of any theatrical poetaster. For this reason songs of the old Italian school are valuable training to an English singer, because they teach him to regard a song as a piece of music to be understood and phrased with the same conscious beauty of line that is required of a violinist who plays an adagio of Corelli or Handel. When a singer has to deal with English words he is tempted by the nature of the English language to think too much of the single word and too little of the phrase as a whole. It is for this reason that the writer who conscientiously tries to speak his English clearly and expressively is invariably tempted to let his enunciation destroy the musical phrase. Only after he has carefully studied the old Italian can he learn to grasp the significance of a musical phrase as a thing beautiful in itself. It is in this sense that the old Italian songs represent the dawn on the Ganges, the original source of light which illuminates the whole of modern music.

Edward J. Dent.

BEECHAM OPERA: "THE MAGIC FLUTE"

If you cannot adapt your means to your ends, there is a good deal to be said for adapting your ends to your means, and under certain conditions the Covent Garden version of "Die Zauberflöte" might be justified. If Sir Thomas Beecham had to deal with any of the star performers who had never seen one another before, but who could be trusted as singers to make the most of their respective parts, he might be wise in deciding to abstain from allegorical research and to present the opera simply as a series of beautiful arias, quintets and so forth, with plenty of comic relief, and appropriately sumptuous mounting. Such a presentation would in any case seem very old-fashioned, but one could accept it as being good of its kind. The trouble at Covent Garden is that the performance there is on these out-of-date lines without being strong enough to carry conviction. Most of the singing is reasonably good, but hardly any of it first rate. One does not come across the outstanding feature of the Beecham company, generally speaking, is the absence of "stars" and the high general standard of intelligibility and cohesion. In spite of periodical aberrations it does aim at working on repertory lines and not on Grand Opera Syndicate lines; it is precisely on that account, indeed, that its claims on our gratitude are so substantial. Why then, in this instance, adopt the style that of all others is most calculated to emphasize the limitations of the company and place its virtues at a discount?

This fundamental incoherence of conception is the more regrettable as some of the rôles are in capable hands: Mr. Frederic Austin does excellently as the Speaker, and Mr. Randow's Papageno is well-studied—light in touch and free from extravagance. Mr. Foster Richardson starts well as Sarastro, but in his big E major aria he forgets all about Pamina after the first few lines, and sings at the audience in the approved Grand Syndicate manner. As for Mr. d'Oisy (Tamino) and Miss Licette (Pamina), neither of them seems to have the remotest idea of who they are or what they are supposed to be doing; Tamino struts about quite aimlessly when he is not singing, and Pamina evidently thinks that the threadbare "business" of the prima donna is quite good enough for her; she even forgets herself so far as to ogle Papageno, and give him a little push. This part will have to be drastically revised if any sense is to be made of the opera. And Mr. Pitt might try to obtain a little more lightness and elegance of phrasing from his orchestra. At the same time, the priests might rid themselves of those neat black imperials. Possibly they were worn during the high-priesthood of Sarastro (dignity uncertain), but as the effect of them seen in profile is that of a multitude of infinitely receding chins, it would be better not to insist upon this historic detail. The substitution of recitative for dialogue throughout the work is defensible, the "leit-motif" style of accompaniment a good deal less so. There is no need to bring Mozart up to date in this way.

R. O. M.

The sixth and last meeting of the present session of the Musical Association will be held at 160, Wardour Street, on Tuesday, April 13, when Dr. H. Thomas will read a paper on "Musical Settings of Horace's Lyric Poems," with illustrations by the lecturer.
Drama

THE OBVIOUS

Stage Society (Lyric Theatre, Hammersmith).—"From Morn to Midnight." By Georg Kaiser. Translated from the German by Ashley Dukes.

We are not wholly subjugated by the translator's fiat, in the version published by Messrs. Hendersons (2s. net), that we should admire " Von Morgens bis Mitternachts " because it " will appear to be a link between the three-dimensional stage and the screen," and is "a portent therefore not to be despised." The cinema is sufficiently with us, and magnificence regarding "dimensions" and expressiveness does not conceal the fact that this play is very like the old Viennese sculpture of the allegorical-over-intended variety. Specific lines in sculpture, specific masses and planes, specific situations and phrases, cannot be made to mean more than they do. You do not intensify a representation of rage by presenting the protagonist in the act of biting a tenpenny nail. A contemporary has said that the mental life of the contemporary German is so lofty wroght into metaphor that the man in the street never knows whether he is a torpedo or a colossus.

Georg Kaiser has, undeniably, written a play with almost as much action as a cinema piece of the same duration would require, but he has not escaped the over-rhetorical modality of his favored race. Ibsen was presumably as symbolic as a dramatist may well be, with this difference: Ibsen had an intellectual content; he was, and emphatically, in revolt against many things which had not caused revolt in his contemporaries. Kaiser's message would seem to be that "pleasure is vain—unless one has acquired a technique"; money is worthless, or in any case theft is a form of unwisdom. To convey this we are given a certain amount of brisk comedy plus a variant on the "Peer Gynt" tornado, plus an allegorical velodrome, plus continual flow of symbolic language, plus several sermons, finally ending in a dreary Salvation Army scene, much less interesting than any street-corner Salvation Army scene; even when it borrows an exotic motif from "The Man who Corrupted Hadleyburgh," plus one death, plus one threat of suicide by a despairing minor character, plus the chief protagonist's pistol shot.

The seven scenes almost demand an analysis seriatim. The first is good comedy, and in it Brember Willis is excellent. The second, as acted, was null; the third, nearly impossible; the fourth, a parody, in which Edith Evans, the wife, did a good three minutes' work. The fifth was allegorical, and thence the play declines to the seventh, which has no particular merits, yet in it, and, indeed, in all the scenes, there are chances for any amount of acting. Given actors sufficiently capable, and presupposing adequate preparation, the play through three scenes; but given this amount of talent and energy we should have energy enough and talent enough to produce a play with more important contents. Roughly, the play needs as much acting as, for example, "Peer Gynt," without having the importance of that Ibsen composition.

Its merit might lie, as its translator claims, in its economy of words, were it not for the multitude of rhetorical sermons, preached out like the printed directions between cinema-pictures. Really it entertains for six scenes because something is going on, and swiftly; for most of that period—with the notable exceptions of the rhapsody of the mother and son in the second scene, and that in the snow scene. The crudeness of the allegory and the generalizations of Kaiser's rhetoric place him, despite his cleverness and the modernity of the scenery, in very nearly the same intellectual gamut with the Salvation Army, to which he takes, and fittingly, as a last resort for his climax.

If, however, Kaiser shouts worn texts through a megaphone, it is undeniably a better megaphone than Mr. Douglas Murray's. The cashier's glorious day with 60,000 marks from which he can derive no satisfaction offers vivid intellectual enlightenments in comparison with the humanitarian fortnight in which "Uncle Ned" converts his brother from avarice. The Uncle Ned sort of thing passed out of "Pippa" into "The Third Floor Back," and we believe that Mr. Pim is still in beneficent transit.

And doubtless avarice is an evil, and doubtless, also, a very crude and persistent sermonizing is a desiderium; for if churches no longer function, the stage may be the remaining implement for the reform of multi-millionaires. We do not attend meetings of the Salvation Army. But "Uncle Ned" is hardly the thunderbolt for photocratic St. Paul's. One would, on the whole, prefer to live with the curmudgeon Sir Robert Graham rather than with his saccharescent younger brother, the ex-poet, and pseudonymous best-seller. The Christian virtues—and there are quite respectable virtues which can be called Christian—may be advocated without destroying a play. Flaubert has divided his great trilogy of Contes over a phrase in "St. Julien Hospitalier": "Et l'idée lui vient d'employer son existence au service des autres." One does not want, however, an image of Christ in violet-scented soap, which, is metaphorically, about what is offered us at the St. James's.

No human actor should be called upon to exercise such ineffable charm. I know . . . it is a custom of the time . . . it is almost a convention of the contemporary theatre. In every third play one attends there is some unfortunate actress or actor whose stage direction, entire and unqualified, is to "be charming," to "be absolutely and utterly charming," and, of course, it isn't done, it can't be done, it is not the mirror to nature. In real life no individual exercises this persistent and ubiquitous spell on all beholders, in all circumstances, for the uninterrupted course of a whole concatenation of circumstances. There are some people, not necessarily fiends, who do not fall into ecstasy before the head of Apollo; some against whom a pulpy and fatuous kindness or facile concomitants of the glibly hollow are the least promising unions. Besides, that younger brother turned up years ago. He was, then, a slightly acrimonious critic instead of a pulpy poetaster; he preached his little sermon against avarice and grinding efficiency with a deal more pith and vigour, in a play whose name has escaped me.

Mr. Ayrtton plays convincingly, and Mr. Anson makes an excellent old retainer, but neither part should be very difficult. The originality shown in "getting laughs" by the butler's mispronunciation of words and the flapper's falling through the doorway is not surprising, but who are we to quarrel with Harlequin's slip-stick? This play makes no demands on the intellect and many upon one's patience.

FRIVOLITY NOT UNPLEASING

Haymarket Theatre.—"The Young Person in Pink." By G. E. Jennings.

The first act of "The Young Person in Pink" is leisurely and gently amusing, and we can hardly demand from an untried dramatist such a tour de force as the opening thirty lines of Lope de Vega's picturesque "El Desprecio Agradecido." The play is not soothed in sentimental saccharine, even though this chemical appears from time to time. Lady Sarah commits a mild and tentative Pippa-ism in the second act, but it is tempered with reason. Some people like their plays with sugar, and some without; for the guidance of both groups plays
Correspondence

KEATS'S HOUSE AT HAMPSTEAD

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

SIR,—On the eve of the centenary of the death of Keats, the house near Hampstead Heath, in which he resided during the most active portion of his literary career, is about to be thrown into the property market as an 'eligible building site,' and a representative committee has been formed with the object of saving this great literary shrine from destruction, and of securing it for the benefit of the public in perpetuity. The house, now called Lawn Bank (but originally known as Wentworth Place), situate in Keats Grove, Hampstead, is that to which the poet came after he left Belcher's school, 1818, and which was his home during the remainder of his life in England. Within its walls, or under the shelter of the venerable trees which still grace its extensive old-world garden, much of his finest work was produced. At that period the premises formed two semi-detached cottages, the one built and occupied by Charles Wentworth Dilke, the other by Charles Brown. In December, 1818, after the death of his brother Tom, Keats went to live as a permanent inmate with Brown at Wentworth Place. Soon afterwards he became engaged to Fanny Brawne, whose mother had rented Brown's half of the double house while Brown and Keats were away on their Scotch tour, and her father took Dilke's half when Dilke and his wife had left Hampstead to live in Westminster. By subsequent occupants the party wall separating the two houses was broken through, and the two houses were thrown into one. Other considerable alterations have from time to time been effected; but on the strength of detailed information furnished in 1859 by a then surviving brother of Charles Dilke, it seems possible to recognize and perhaps to restore the original form and structure of the premises.

An exclusive right to purchase the property has been established for a short period to afford an opportunity of procuring the necessary funds. It is estimated that for the acquisition of the freehold for restoration and repairs, a adaptation as a Keats memorial house, and for permanent maintenance, a sum of not less than £10,000 will be required.

At the Hampstead Public Library is deposited the important Keats relics, comprising holographs of poems by Keats, books with copious annotations in his handwriting, his school books, his notebook as a medical student, letters written by or addressed to the poet, the lock of hair cut from his head after death by Severn, with casts, busts, and prints. The library also contains a large collection of Keats literature, and many etchings and other views of the Hampstead which the poet knew. It is confidently anticipated that these important relics will be removed from the public house, and that valuable additions will be made thereto from time to time.

Of the birthplace of Keats no vestige remains. His first Hampstead home, in Well Walk, has long since disappeared, through the walk being widened to a road, the charm which endeared it to Keats. The place of his death, in Rome, is piously preserved, but England has no corresponding memorial. If Lawn Bank is destroyed no similar memorial for him can be found in the land of his birth.

Such an irreparable loss would be deeply and permanently deplored, and believing that there will be a widespread desire to mark the forthcoming centenary in some suitable manner, we feel it our duty to draw attention to the risk in which the property is at present involved. We sincerely hope that the threatened fate may be averted, and that the premises, restored, endowed for maintenance, and equipped in honour of the poet, may be handed over to some public body in trust for the public for ever. The time allowed for decision is short, and we accordingly venture to urge the necessity for a prompt and generous response. Lists of the names of donors and subscribers will be preserved in the building in permanent form. Donations forwarded to the Hon. Treasurer of the Keats Memorial House Fund at the Town Hall, Haverstock Hill, N.W.3, will be gratefully received.

Signed on behalf of the Committee,
J. J. Fraser (Mayor of Hampstead), Chairman,
Sidney Colvin, Hon. Treasurer,
W. E. Doubleday, Hon. Secretary.
Central Library, Hampstead, N.W.3.
March 30.

BEDFORD COLLEGE FOR WOMEN

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

SIR,—Bedford College, the largest and oldest University College for Women in England, is in need of money.

At the moment when there is an overwhelming demand by women for higher education and training, it must either refuse admission to highly suitable students and starve or close down certain departments, or it must enlarge its buildings and increase its endowments.

Seven hundred students now crowd into buildings adapted for four hundred and fifty.

In the English, Latin and History departments, lectures and classes have to be repeated several times in the day. In Science departments the supply of instruments and apparatus is so insufficient that heavy appliances have to be carried from one laboratory to another. Chemistry, with 130 students, has to be satisfied with working places for only 46. Zoology, with the largest pure science intermediate Zoology class in the whole University, is almost completely cramped. Geography and Geology contend for the use of the same class-rooms, which are overcrowded by a double set of appliances.

Even after such overcrowding the College has had to shut its doors against students who would benefit by the education given. This term it has been impossible to admit any new students.

£100,000 are needed for additional lecture-rooms and laboratories.

A second £100,000 for endowment. The College activities most urgently in need of endowment are notably: scholarships; the various departments of Science; where women are equipped for scientific research and industrial appointments; the department of Social Studies for the training of welfare workers, health visitors and other social workers; the training department for Secondary and Continuation School Teachers.

A third £100,000 is badly needed for a hostel. As the demand for residence has increased and the housing problem grown more and more acute, all available accommodation has been exhausted.

The Council are in treaty with the Department of Woods and Forests for an admirable site for a hostel just outside the Park. This is an opportunity which should not be missed. Whether it can be taken must depend on the generosity of the public.

Many people unfortunately think that Bedford College is rich. But in truth the income of the College is by no means sufficient to meet its heavy running costs. The enormous increased cost of maintenance and the necessity of raising, all salaries. Endowments for scholarships produce barely

T. J. V.
£400 a year. In the 27 departments there are no endowed chairs. The salaries of the teaching staff are inadequate in view of the increased cost of living. There are demonstrators with University degrees to whom the College is forced to pay a lower wage than that earned by unskilled manual workers. We do not want to raise the fees. The effect of that would be to destroy one of the features of which the College is most proud, viz., its democratic character. By excluding poorer students it would restrict women’s University education to the richer classes. Fortunately for education in England, such a course was not followed in the case of our older Universities. Their work would never have been done had there not lived long ago generous men and women who believed they could render no greater public service than by endowing colleges and thus furnishing opportunities for rich and poor to acquire sound learning. We hope a like generosity and a like belief exist today.

Her Majesty the Queen, Patroness of the College, has expressed interest in the scheme and given a donation.

Subscriptions should be sent to Viscountess Elveden, Honorary Treasurer of the Bedford College Endowment and Extension Fund, Bedford College, Regent’s Park, N.W.1.

We are, Sir,

Your obedient servants,
E. Hildred Carlile (Chairman of the Bedford College Endowment and Extension Fund Committee), Margaret Amphill.
Gwendoen Elveden.
Lettice Fisher.
Mary Hargrove.
Anthony H. Hawkins.
Arthur Steel-Maitland.
Mary Talbot.

LIFE OF THE DUKE OF NORFOLK
To the Editor of The Athenæum.

SIR,—Having been authorized by the Duchess of Norfolk to write the life of Charles Howard, eleventh Duke of Norfolk (1746-1815), I shall be most grateful to anyone who possesses letters written by him for permission to see them, or copies of them. Any originals sent to me at 7, De Vere Gardens, Kensington, would be taken the utmost care of, and would be returned promptly.

Yours faithfully,
Mary F. Sandars.

7, De Vere Gardens, W.S.

JOHN GOWER AND SOUTHWARK CATHEDRAL
To the Editor of The Athenæum.

SIR,—The erection of two windows in Southwark Cathedral to the memory of John Gower, by a private citizen, has attracted widespread interest in the press and among Londoners generally.

Many who have been to see the windows have noticed that the tomb of the poet is in a very poor condition. The plaster at the base is broken, and the architect has attached a very unsightly piece of stamp paper to the masonry, no doubt because he fears a subsidence. It is generally known that the cathedral is in very straitened financial circumstances, and has no money for necessary repairs. Will you allow me to state in your columns that I feel that it would be a graceful action if literary men would make themselves responsible for the renovation of this fifteenth-century monument?

Yours etc.,
George Isaacs,
Mayor of Southwark.

26, Blackfriars Road, S.E.1, April 3, 1929.

JOANNE STRADANUS’ “VESPUCCI LANDING IN AMERICA”
To the Editor of The Athenæum.

SIR,—I observe a reference to this picture in The Athenæum of April 2. Can any reader kindly inform me where the work is to be seen, or if any reprints of it are current, or on sale in England?

Your obedient servant,
J. Landfair Lucas.

Glondra, Hindhead, Surrey.

MR. WILLIAMSON’S “WRITERS OF THREE CENTURIES”
To the Editor of The Athenæum.

DEAR SIR,—I believe it was the late Oscar Wilde who once said that “imitation is the sincerest form of insult.” I am reminded of this, as I have just been glancing through a book noticed in your columns on March 26—“Writers of Three Centuries,” by C. C. H. Williamson. As I turned over the pages of this work [I have not read them all] I felt a strange familiarity with what I read there—so much so that I turned up some of the things which struck me. The following is the result:

C. C. H. WILLIAMSON.

Charlotte Bronte.

Passion was alive in her as a flame is alive in the earth. She lived with unparalleled energy a life of outward quiet in a loneliness which she shared only with her sister and the moors.

R. L. S.
To read him is to be for ever setting out on a fresh journey. Anything may happen, but the air is full of the gaiety of possible chances.

Rosetti.
What he calls “House of Life” is really “The House of Love.”

Meredith.
He thinks in flashes and writes in shorthand.

Lamb.
He reason in pictures, every line having its imagery, and he uses pictorial words to express abstract ideas.

Lamb.
Lamb had no sense of narrative, or, rather, he cared in a story only for the moments when it seemed to double upon itself and turn into irony.

For read Lamb makes a man more human, more tolerant, more dainty.

He was a cockney, a lover of civil traditions.

Pater.
In all his work his thoughts move to music.

“Gaston du Latour” (in which detail had already begun to obscure the outline of the central figure).

Pater did not permit life to come to him without a certain ceremony—he was on his guard against the abrupt indiscernibility of events—so he arranged life to come, as far as was possible, with a service of art.

Of Pater’s Style.
It has been praised and blamed for its particular qualities of colour, harmony, weaving, but it has not always been realized that what is most wonderful in the style is precisely its adaptability to all kinds of thought, sensation or intention.

Style in Pater varied more than is commonly supposed in the course of his development, was with him a constant preoccupation.

Zola.
He cannot leave well alone; he will not take the most obvious fact for granted. “It marche le premier, elle le suivra”;-of course she followed if he walked first, why mention it?

In Mr. Williamson’s essay on Poe the sentence occurs: “He could have done perfectly the thrill of the French vaudeville.” Happening to glance through Mr. Paul Ricard’s Colen’s essay on Poe prefixed to the “Everyman” edition of the Tales, I found: “Poe could have done perfectly the thrill of the French vaudeville.”

I have not read the whole book through; doubtless other readers may find further parallels. But, for my own part, when I re-read an author I prefer to do so in the original.

I am, Sir, yours obediently,
Alfred Barge.

March 29, 1929.

Just before his death Richard Dolben was engaged on the collection and arrangement of the poems of his first wife. The volume is entitled “Das liebe Nest,” and is a collection of child-poems. It is published by the Verlag Seemann, of Leipzig.
Foreign Literature
ARNO HOLZ

Das ausgewählte Werk von Arno Holz. (Berlin, Bong & Co.)
Sonnenfinsternis, A Tragedy. By Arno Holz. New and Revised Edition. (Same publisher.)

There is a well-marked tendency at the present day in Germany—where is there not?—to deprecate the literary movement of the late eighties and early nineties of the last century. To readers of current German reviews, to observers of the German stage of the past few months, it is difficult—a number of exceptions, the leading plays of Gerhart Hauptmann, for example, apart—to recall the fact that that period was the beginning of a real literary revival in which, however, discredited and old-fashioned, the naturalistic philosophy on which they were largely founded may have become in our day, there were produced a number of works of permanent individual value and decisive influence on the development of literary, above all dramatic and lyric technique. The present reaction against the achievements of thirty, twenty, even ten years ago in German literature, has gone rather too far, and there can be no doubt that it will be a loss to students if they are led, by the all-prevailing sway of "expressionism" and "mysticism," in German drama and poetry, as in pictorial art, to neglect at least the outstanding works of the previous generation.

An opportunity for this observation is provided by the production in a new form, on the Berlin stage in recent months, of Arno Holz's tragedy "Sonnenfinsternis," and by the appearance of this admirable volume of selections from Holz's work in general. With this latter it is possible to make a thorough preliminary study of Holz the poet and dramatist, thence to proceed to what is undoubtedly his finest single work and one of the most important German dramas of the twentieth century.

Arno Holz was born in East Prussia in 1863. He settled in Berlin at an early age, and used with facility the dialect of that city in his plays. Before his twentieth year he had written and published several poems in various periodicals. In 1885 he was associated by several contributions with the young poetic movement which found its principal expression in the anthology entitled "Moderne Dichter-Charaktere." In the same year he published a volume of his own, "Das Buch der Zeit," to which was added the subtitle, "Lieder eines Modernen." The form of these poems was in no way original. Holz retained the orthodox forms of rhyme and rhythm, and merely used quatrains and eight-lined verses and the like with extraordinary facility and effectiveness. Technically the book was, for a young man, a remarkably able following of the classic German tradition. In subject, however, Holz broke new ground, and it was in this that he immediately commanded attention. Fulfilling the promise of his secondary title, he took the themes of his verse, as Hauptmann was to do in drama four years later, from the life of common folk in Berlin and German city-life generally. A very characteristic and illuminating poem in this volume is that entitled "Berliner Frühling," in which the poet explains that he cannot sing of the spring as other poets have done before him. The perfume of violets has no attraction for him, and he does not wander in the woods and contemplate the spring-flowers. Then he gives his picture of springtime in Berlin. In another poem, the epigrammatic and ironical "Selbstporträt," Holz sums up his inclinations in the verse:

Nur wenigen bin ich sympathisch,
Denn ach, mein Blut rollt demokratisch,
Und meine Flagge wagt und weht:
Ich bin nur ein Tendenzpoet!

Holz's next medium was prose. Here he worked at first in collaboration with Johannes Schlaf. Together these two first exponents of the naturalistic method applied to naturalistic material wrote "Papa Hamlet," a series of sketches of working-class life which, together with a play by Schlaf, "Die Familie Seelké," appeared under the joint pseudonym Bjarne Holmsen in 1889. The influence of this volume, and more particularly of Schlaf's contribution thereto, is not only apparent on Gerhart Hauptmann's epochmaking play "Vor Sonnenaufgang," which appeared in the same year, but was avowed by its dedication to "Bjarne Holmsen."

In 1896 Holz himself wrote a play, "Sozialistokraten," a comedy of social life which did not secure the success it deserved. Two years later he published "Phantasus," two volumes of poems in which an entirely different style was shown to have been evolved from that of the first poems. This time Holz theorized at length, and elaborated his poetic doctrine to the effect that the age, which had found in prose the right medium in the modern novel, had not found the perfect medium in poetry. It demanded a widening not only of the content of poetry, as had been effected in the "Buch der Zeit," but also of the form. This was not to be interpreted as a declaration in favour of "free rhythm"—although the influence of Walt Whitman on Schlaf and Holz, particularly the former, was considerable—but as an assertion that, in Holz's words, "if you express what you feel directly as you feel it, then you make the natural rhythm." In the characteristically German phrases, Holz declared for the "immanent" or the "necessary" (notwendig) rhythm. And in this new medium of varied long and short lines, all unrhymed, Holz gave an astonishingly varied collection of short impressionist poems which constitute his most important poetical work.

With the exception of "Sonnenfinsternis" and a similar tragedy, published in 1913, "Ignorabimus," all Holz's other work is in the form of verse or of prose fiction. Examples of the first are "Dafnis," a delicious skit on the precious poetry of the seventeenth century, and the poetical satire, "Die Blechschmiede"; of the second the collection of charming sketches of child-life, "Goldene Zeiten."

The heroine of "Sonnenfinsternis" calls herself Beatrice Cenci, and with this the theme of the drama is indicated. The play opens with her, the successful actress, in conversation with a friend, a certain Url. Through the latter she meets Hollrieder, a painter. He, although at first neither of them recalls the fact, had rescued her from suicide when, a young girl living with her father, the artist Professor Lipsius, whose assistant Hollrieder was, she had attempted to end her shame. The full horror of the truth is gradually borne in upon Hollrieder's mind by the hints of Musmann, a mentally deranged rival of Hollrieder's, whose uncanny appearances at various points of the play are most effective. Hollrieder learns to love Beatrice and gives himself up to her by degrees. Then he meets her father, and in a terrifying tragic scene the daughter renounces him and chooses to follow Hollrieder. They live together in England, where one day they learn of the death of Lipsius. The shock of the news drives Beatrice to a reconsideration of her duty towards Hollrieder, and eventually she decides that she is unworthy of him and can love him no longer. Together they return to Germany, and at a meeting with Hollrieder's friend Url Musmann appears. Beatrice attacks him, and, after half throttling him, leaps from the window and is killed.

The debt of such a play to Ibsen is too obvious to escape notice, but the forcefulness of characterization, both of Beatrice and Hollrieder, the passionate language of the critical scenes—these are Holz's own work, an individual achievement of the greatest importance in modern German drama.
THE ALTO ADIGE

PROBLEMI DELL’ ALTO ADIGE. By Franco Ciarlantini. (Florence, Vallecchi, 3.50 lire.)

We are often credited with being merciless critics of ourselves and our institutions, but we can hardly hope to rival the outspoken condemnation of many aspects of their political system which characterizes many Italian writers and thinkers of today. Sig. Ciarlantini warns his countrymen that the inhabitants of the old Sud-Tirol have long hated July and the Italians. He believes that this feeling is already diminishing but that it will be long before it disappears altogether.

Apart from their nationality, these mountain people are in many ways an absolute contrast to the Italians, possessing virtues which our author readily acknowledges. For one thing they are far better educated, literates being almost unknown among them, and they are already showing great eagerness to learn Italian. Hence the Government will have to be very careful in its methods of reorganizing the system of education. Hitherto the military authorities have interfered as little as possible with existing institutions, and Sig. Ciarlantini warns his countrymen of the fatal consequences that might result from attempting to force them down the saddest of all ancient Italian bureaucracies, on which he is scathing in his denunciations, upon the Trentino. Similarly the Italian Code of Civil Procedure must, he contends, on no account be introduced, as it is distinctly inferior to the Austrian.

Sig. Ciarlantini hopes much from the fact that the material interests of the Trentino are bound up with Italy. The natural outlet is to the South, not over the Brenner. Trade suffered a deadly blow when Lombardy and Venetia were lost by Austria, and she did all in her power to cut off the Trentino from Italy. The railway system was planned with this purpose. Similarly, the vast reserves of water-power in these regions are hardly developed at all, since its export to Italy was prohibited, and the local demand was insignificant. In addition to the water-power, the scanty mineral resources, as well as the rich woods of the Trentino, will be of far more value to Italy than they could ever have been to Austria.

The very conservatism of the inhabitants of the Alto Adige may, it is suggested, make them prefer the Italian monarchy to the one at Vienna. Similar considerations may influence the Catholics. This little book gives a fair-minded and careful description of the Austrian administrative system and of the political and religious tendencies of the country. Socialism here has no anti-capitalist tendencies, as the capitalist system is so little developed, and Sig. Ciarlantini hopes that the anti-Socialist tendencies of the National party may throw it into the arms of Italy. How far these hopes will be realized it is impossible to say. The inhabitants of the Alto Adige have all the independence of a sturdy mountain peasantry, and if Italy succeeds in reconciling these new citizens to her rule she may claim that she has learned how to “win the peace” to some purpose.

L. C. M.

LETTERS FROM PARIS

I. THE PRIX GONCOURT

The awarding of the “Prix Goncourt” to M. Marcel Proust for the second volume of his “A la Recherche du Temps Perdu”: “Un roman des Jeunes Filles en Fleurs”—reviewed in The Athenaeum of November 7, 1919—has given rise to such a flood of comment in the press and in the so-called world of letters that, although the event belongs to the past, and the turmoil has already subsided, the whole episode has been so full of instruction, and throws much light upon the different kinds of danger which beset English and French literature.

In any literature the advantages derived from, or the drawbacks entailed by, the existence of literary prizes, depend entirely upon the part played by that literature by the tradition-element. When that literature is an ideal goal rather than a formal starting-point—a cumulative conquest more than an inheritance normally transmitted and, so to say, handed over—the literary prize may possess a distinctly civilizing value, and the essay competition recently started by The Athenæum is an excellent example of the wholesomeness of the prevalence as applied to English literature.

Of course, the object of the competition is to stimulate critical interest, and there is a sense in which to-day the stimulating of such an interest might appear just as necessary in France as in England. Yet it remains none the less true that no English writer can be seriously hampiered or spoiled by lacking up to one or two isolated cases. In any case, the number of cases of being thereby chastened and more finely tempered. And the reason lies near at hand: for the English writer, tradition is no comfortable legacy, but the outcome of a laborious individual struggle, it has the character of an achievement. Next to never does he start from tradition, but if he is appointed to greatness, he may cultivate in tradition. The danger of English literature, if one may not rather call it its καλός κόσμος, is overgrowth: the trees are too many, and in each tree the sap, whatever may be its ultimate quality, runs too vigorous, and each grows, in a way, for itself, without taking much consideration for the others, without even possessing any developed conscience of standing at all in any special relation to the others. But the danger is without its advantages, and the foremost of them resides in the fact that English literature, if without a definite, a specified tradition, affords the richest field out of which a broad tradition may be garnered. If the writer has in him the seeds of true greatness, if he has enjoyed to the full the advantages of that chaste education on which nothing takes the place, and which keeps constantly before the mind’s eye the highest models of Greece and Rome, such literary saturation may bring forth the chastened productions to which I alluded above: it engenders a Milton, or a Voltaire, or a Tennyson of “Tithonus,” or a Matthew Arnold of no few anthology gems.

But in France the conditions are the very reverse: however heavily the appearances may sometimes seem to tell against the statement—and it might be an interesting and perhaps not unreasonable task to attempt to prove it in the case of certain precise examples such as the French Romanticism—poor, battered entity, still always dragged into court—French literature suffers in a chronic way from an excessive preponderance of the traditional element. To examine the idea of tradition, such as it presents itself habitually to the French mind, and then to proceed to study it as it is put into practice in the works of both those writers of the generation of whom the innumerable pseudo-traditionalists, would indeed carry one far: the subject was perpetually agitated in the last years before the war, and has been more than ever since the Armistice; yet it is seldom really treated, or even apprehended in its true essence. But for our present purpose—the analysis of the tradition element in French literature— it is sufficient to note that tradition in France is viewed in the terms of an enjoyed privilege, of a birthright—and, what is even more important, of a birthright that belongs to the race: every Frenchman considers himself as a sharer in tradition: in France tradition is a phenomenon of a general—one might almost say—distinctly not an individual—order: a phenomenon that in no way is held to depend upon the niceties of personal adjustment. Such remains, and will probably ever remain in France, comprehensive and sympathetic treatment at the hands of that extremely reliable master—as Hazlitt would have said—M. Roger Allard (in the Nouvelle Revue Française for February) immediately after the Goncourt verdict, received the “Prix de la Vie Heureuse,” and when all is said, there is such a thing as relative importance, and it does determine the scale of values.

Yet behind all this futile quibbling the real motive for such an anxiety lies the apprehension from the beginning it was, as usual, the old story. The unexpectedness, the rich and manifold originality of M. Proust’s work, took the public and the press unawares. They simply did not know what to do with it, so that there was nothing left to them but to retaliate against the work and the man who reduced them to such an uncomfortable and amplified position.

It was only after the outburst had spent itself that a few authorized voices began to make themselves heard. M. Jacques Boulenger was the first to take the field. M. Jacques Boulenger, who assumed a few months ago the task of literary critic in the weekly paper L’Opinion, is rapidly making his reputation in the literary world. He wrote two articles on M. Proust, the first at the time the prize was awarded; the second as an answer to the critics of M. Proust. The articles were all the more interesting because they present the reaction towards M. Proust’s work of a mind of a very definitely French cast and training, but the intellectually alive that the very things he would not be inclined to condemn on the general excitement, he has his very best faculties. The article of M. Jacques Rivière, “Marcel Proust et la Tradition Classique” (Nouvelle Revue Française for February), is the one that agrees most with the line taken up by the Théâtre, reviewer, who sees in M. Proust a faithful follower of the great eighteenth-century tradition; but the article which seems to me to show the case most in the round is the article of M. Edmond Jaloux in Les Écrits Nouveaux—January-February number—from which I detach for your readers the most important passage, as it states what I consider as the foremost and nearest quality of M. Proust’s work.

Ce qui caractérise Marcel Proust et fait de lui un auteur hors pair, c’est qu’il est absolument vrai. J’entends par là que, depuis une centaine d’années que le roman a pris une importance capitale, il s’est formé peu à peu un grand nombre de poneus psychologues, auxquels il est fort difficile d’échapper. Tant de mouvements d’âmes nous semblent évidents, depuis Balzac et ses successeurs, que nous avons tous une tendance à les utiliser, pour ainsi dire mécaniquement, et sans trop penser que les uns ont toujours été faux, sans trop exagérer de manière décadente avec notre propre sensualité, que la pluspart, enfin, ne demeurent possibles que dans telle ou telle circonstance donnée. Peu d’écrivains contemporains échappent complètement à cette erreur et je pourrais citer nombre d’entre eux, sans en sortir à l’autre qu’une série de ces ponces. Or, Marcel Proust n’en a jamais commis un seul. On dirait qu’il renouvelle constamment la psychologie ; malgré l’extreme médiocrité, les innombrables facettes d’esprit subtil, minutieux et impitoyable, disposant, après l’agacement, nous avons tout le temps avec lui l’impression de nous trouver, non en face d’un livre, mais de la vie même. Ce prodige, c’est de faire quelque chose d’autant plus direct, d’autant plus vrai, d’autant plus authentique, avec une forme pleine d’allusions, d’ornements et de détours. Il y a dans une des parties de son premier ouvrage, “Du côté de chez Swann,” quelques pages sur l’amour, sur sa naissance, son apogée et son déclin, qu’ils l’impression qu’ils n’en feront jamais de sujet d’autant plus que l’auteur de Stendhal.

Quand je lis Marcel Proust, quand je vois les éléments de la vie se combiner, s’aglutiner, se dissoudre, se décomposer chez lui, comme des cellules, nerveuses, que j’assistais au travail, non d’un romanticien, mais d’un biologiste.

The work of M. Proust is, before anything else, an enrichment, and so to say, a “thickening” of the French literary treasury.

In England you possess that admirable, indigenous product called the wedding cake. M. Proust has given to French literature its “wedding cake,” and of course it is only food for the strong. In England such a work as his would be, perhaps, a less surprising performance, but for those in France who, however deep may remain their allegiance to the clear-cut outline, the restrained grace, the crystal lucidity of so many French masterpieces, yet are not ready to give up for the country that numbers Stendhal among its titles of honor any hope of a George Eliot or of a Meredith, the coming into his own of M. Marcel Proust is an event full of glad tidings.

CHARLES DU BOS.
List of New Books
Prepared in co-operation with the Library Association.

The method of classification adopted is a series of groups roughly corresponding with the Dewey Decimal System, the sub-classes being indicated, for the benefit of librarians and others familiar with the system, by the class-numbers given at the end of each entry. The first numeral in these represents the main class, the second one of the subdivisions, and so on.

Those works in the List which appear most suitable for purchase by Public Library Authorities are marked with an asterisk.

300 SOCIOLOGY.
See review, p. 476.

*Jacobs (Herbert). STEVENS' ELEMENTS OF MERCANTILE LAW. Butterworth, 1920. 8 in. 747 pp. app. index, 12/6 n. 347.7

This sixth edition of a well-known and valuable text-book has been brought up to date with a careful regard to recent applications of the old principles of the common law, and to the developments of their meaning. The effect of war on contracts is considered; and Mr. Jacobs has included in the volume a few cases which were not referred to in previous editions. These cases either elucidate important principles or help the student to understand the modern authorities.

Professor Kimball discusses the national government of the United States, as distinguished from the state, city, and local governments; and, while tracing the political, historical, and economic development of American institutions, he endeavours also to present an adequate picture of the actual workings of the Government. Bearing in mind that the Constitution is the supreme law of the land, and that its interpretation by the Supreme Court is authoritative, the author quotes freely from the opinions of the Court. The volume therefore has a twofold character: that of a text-book in which institutions are described and analysed, and that of a source-book in which appear the actual words used to expound or limit the powers of the Government. The book is provided with an excellent index.

Members of Education Authorities, managers of schools, teachers, and others will be considerably helped by this guide to the various legal provisions dealing with education. Every Education Committee and Council in the near future will have to prepare a complete scheme for the development of the educational resources of its area, and those concerned should be acquainted with the legal aspects affecting education. Mr. Moulton's book states the law as it will be when the 1918 Act is in full operation.

In the preparation of this work the editor has made use of the 1907 edition of the Reports of the Conference of 1899.

Higham (Charles Frederick). LOOKING FORWARD: MASS EDUCATION THROUGH PUBLICITY. Nisbet [1920]. 9 in. 192 pp., 12/6 n. 659
See review, p. 477.

As the hydrophone service was a secret one, and no technical report is allowed by the official censor, Lieut. Wilson's account is limited to a mere narrative of the campaign against the submarine and a description of life at one of the training and experimental stations. Two chapters deal with the purpose and design of the apparatus used from the naval base at Peterhead and afterwards from Haukshead, Aberdour.

700 FINE ARTS.
See review, p. 484.

The illustrious sculptor Cailleterre is a clever hit at some future fadsand aesthetic cant or affectation. He had already reached the ne plus ultra in the artistic hierarchy, when one day an arm was accidentally broken on one of his statues. The workmen were panic-stricken. But Cailleterre winked his eye, and said, 'It's much better like that.' It proved a discovery. Henceforth mutilated statues were all the rage. The art galleries and public places looked like Pompeii and Herculeanum.

Neech (G. Christian). BACK TO THE OLD STONE'S AGE. Eliot Stock, 1920. 5½ in. 85 pp. il. tables, index, boards 2/., cl. 2/6. 720.9

In his brief account of historical architecture Capt. Neech is clear and mnemonic; the sketches and diagrams provide the beginner with the correct point of view. But the pages on prehistoric times are hazy and dubious. To say that the menhirs, trilithons, and dolmens were set and worshipped is worse than risky.

Svoronos (J. N.). L'HÉLÉNISME PRIMITIF DE LA MACÉDOINE, PROUÉ PAR LA NUMISMATIQUE ET L'OR DU PANGÉE. Paris, Leroux; Athens, M. Eleftheroudakis, 1919. 11 in. 281 pp. il. map, paper. 737
The purpose of the author of this monograph, which is excerpted from the JOURNAL INTERNATIONAL D'ARCHÉOLOGIE NUMISMATIQUE, vol. 19, 1918-19, and includes nearly a score of admirable plates, is to show, by a study of the characteristic features of the ancient coins of Macedonia, that the ancestors of the inhabitants of the Macedonian were neither Slav, Turkish, or Italian, but Greek. M. Svoronos claims that the numismatic evidence collected in his work proves that the whole of Macedonia was peopled from the very dawn of history by hardy tribes of pure Hellenic race.

800 LITERATURE.
This tragedy by Lambert van den Bos or Bosche was published at Amsterdam in 1651, and is here reprinted with an English translation, as an appendix to the long prologomena maintaining that it is a rendering of a lost English play which more than any extant version resembled Shakespeare's "Richard III."

Eagle (Solomon), pseud. BOOKS IN GENERAL. Second Series. Secker, 1920. 7½ in. 274 pp., 7½ n. 824.9

*Goldberg (Isaac). STUDIES IN SPANISH-AMERICAN LITERATURE. Intro, by J. D. M. Ford. New York, Brentano's, 1920. 5½ in. 358 pp. bibliog. of transcripts. index. $2.50. 880.9
These fourteen modern critical studies on the chief pre-hispanic and later exponents are the subject of this study, which deals with Ruben Darío, José Enrique Rodó, José Santos Chocano, Rufino Blanco-Fonseca, and other writers.
Kaiser (Georg). From Morn to Midnight: a play in seven scenes. Translated from the German. Hendersons [1920]. 58 pp., 2/ n. 832.9
See ante, p. 487.

Mackay (Helen). Chill Hours. Melrose, 1920. 8 in. 191 pp., 6/ n. 824.9

Mrs. Mackay's new book of sketches follows on the familiar lines of her earlier volumes, although the occasion of it brings the additional pleasure of recording the inclusion of an exquisite story, "Odette in Pink Taffeta." The writer's success is very definite in capturing the pensive and romantic atmosphere, which, being no mere effect of warfare, but a periodical expression of the French provincial spirit, has been made familiar to us through the general writings of Alphonse Daudet, and by M. Rolland in, say, the story of Antoinette in "Jean Christophe." The most ambitious section of the volume is the series of vignettes entitled "Nostalgia," in which Mrs. Mackay recollects her childhood, the days when the trees and skies and birds were more wonderful, and the mood of all things "a place one seems to have lost the way to." These and the remaining fifteen stories are written with a tender, though never sentimental or too slight touch, that gives the suggestion of music heard in the twilight from an old harpsichord, and something of the abiding fragrance.

Riddell (Agnes Rutherford). Flaubert and Maupassant: a literary relationship. Chicago, Univ. Press [1920]. 95 in. 130 pp. bibliog. paper. $1 n. 843.84

Writers of American university theses often perform tasks of great utility to their fellow-men; but the example before us illustrates how much of such work is practically useless. Flaubert and Maupassant, apart from their relation as teacher and disciple, were both Normans, and affinities of character and humour were to be looked for: a more fruitful subject, perhaps, would be their differences. Can anything be more more pedantic than to state, with voluminous references, that "Both describe nights of rain in Paris and the country. Both speak of the 'heavy beat' of summer. In all the rising moon is sometimes represented by both men as appearing from behind trees"?

These letters from an artist serving as English interpreter seem to be an essay in epaumism, the humour, or "l'Umour," of which has no point that the ordinary reader can discern.

POETRY.

These poems were written, the author tells us, partly under the inspiration of his wife during her lifetime, partly in memory of her after her death. We are conscious throughout the book of profound emotions expressing themselves for the most part in terms more or less religious. Mr. Benét has a great command of rich language and rich rhythms, and many of his poems are of a high literary value.

Breteton (Cloudesley). Mystica et Lyrica. Elkin Mathews, 1919. 8 in. 126 pp., 6/ n. 821.9
See notice, p. 478.

Bridges (Robert). October; and other poems: with occasional verses on the War. Heinemann, 1920. 8 in. 76 pp. boards, 5/ n. 821.9
See review, p. 472.

Great facility and skill characterize all these poems of the spiritual life. The two sonnets entitled "Vox Amoris" are the high-water mark of Dr. Clark's accomplishment; but all, this side of being great poetry, are good. It is amusing to compare Dr. Clark's How did the days go, dearest, Ere thou wast known?

with Donne's poem on the same theme:

I wonder, by my troth, what you and I Did ere we loved. Were we not weened till then, But sucked on country pleasures senselessly? Or snorted we in the seven sleepers' den?

One could hardly conceive of two more dissimilar minds.

Dawson (A. J. Eardley). Night Winds of Arabia. Grant Richards, 1920. 7 in. 46 pp., 3/ 6 n. 821.9

Mr. Dawson wrestles bravely with inarticulateness. His diction, when finally it wells forth, is peculiar. We sympathize with the thought contained in such lines as:

For man is man, and no anemic cry
Will place him weathercock on high church spires;
but we cannot help feeling that it might have been better expressed.

See review, p. 472.

Green (A. E.). Fragments. Dublin, Talbot Press (Fisher Unwin), 1920. 7 in. 64 pp., 4/ 6 n. 821.9

A sculptor, when hewing out his conception from a block of marble, casts aside many a fragment of precious material. In the same manner, a writer, who is engaged upon the composition of any extensive work, often meets, in the course of his study, with incidents of great value, of which, however, he cannot make no direct use. In the following pages some such fragments have been collected, and roughly shaped into the forms for which they seemed best suited.

Mr. Green's "fragments" are for the most part rhymed reflections on history, ethics and politics. We think he might have been wise to broaden his thoughts (often interesting in themselves) in prose rather than verse. For it is a melancholy fact that the greatness of the thought contained does not necessarily guarantee the greatness of the containing poetry. Indeed, most of the worst poetry of the world is made up of "great thoughts," that is to say of large and noble ethical generalizations. A great poet can make great poetry out of "great thoughts"; but great thoughts will not make great poetry out of the verses of those who are not poets.

Gregory (Padric). Ulster Songs and Ballads. Dublin, Talbot Press (Fisher Unwin) [1920]. 7 in. 62 pp., 2/ 6 n. 821.9

Mr. Gregory writes some spirited ballads in what, from its resemblance to the dialogue of "John Ferguson," we take to be the language of Ulster. The best thing in the book, however, is a fragment of a traditional Antrim love-song, which Mr. Gregory has printed with his own pieces:

"It's not the coln’ wind that makes me tremble,
Nor yet the frost that binds up yon well;
The rain ralis o’ my vexations
I love a young man, an’ daren’ tell.

Shure many’s the night he has sat beside me
Till my long ringlets were wet wi’ dew;
But he’d a heart that was false an’ cruel
Tae leave an ool’ sweetheart for a new.

But ather evenin’ there comes a mornin’,
An’ither mornin’ a sunny day.
An’ither false love there’ll come a true love
That from my side will nae go away.

There is an admirable absence of sentimentality in this little piece which makes it particularly worthy of imitation by any would-be ballad- and song-writers to-day.

Heine (Heinrich).

These translations, from one whose lyricism is even more untranslatable than is Goethe's, are so commendable in some ways that we hesitate to find their only justification, or lack of it, in the personal pleasure which the task has evidently been to the translator. But Mr. Webb, like his predecessors in general, has fallen into the mistake of believing that rhyme and regular metre are essentials in lyric poetry, and especially its translation; he follows the fashion, therefore, of packing his lines with what are well-nigh childish inversions. His rendering of the thirty-second—not the thirty-third as he incorrectly numbers it—of the lyrics in the "Intermezzo" is a fair example of the consequences of his method:
The violets blue her eyes that light,
The roses red of her cheeks' delight,
The lilies white of her hands so slight,
They blossom and bloom for ever and aye,
And only her heart hath withered away.

There is nothing in the closing line to suggest the savage bitterness of the poet, who surely speaks of a heart gone "rotten to the core" rather than of that which has merely undergone the usual processes of nature. Mr. Webb's success lies in his ability to capture the milder moods, and if his task had been confined to this aspect of Homer he would have produced a more reliable if one-sided book.

Hewlett (Maurice). FLOWERS IN THE GRASS (Wiltshire Plainsong). Constable, 1920. 8 in. 78 pp. boards, 5 n. 821.9

See review, p. 472.

Hodgson (W. Hope). THE CALLING OF THE SEA. Selwyn & Blount, 1920. 7½ in. 48 pp. por., 2 6 n. 821.9

The sea has had better poets to celebrate it than Mr. Hodgson. His poetry lacks the variety and breadth of its subject. His vocabulary is limited, and to express the force and fury of the sea he has to rive within narrow limits, to mark time with frenzy.

Maclean (Murchóch). FROM CROFT AND CLACHAN. Deane & Sons, 1919. 7¾ in. 99 pp. boards, 3 n. 821.8

Mr. Maclean is best in his most Scottish and conversational pieces, such as "Requiescat in Pace." His serious verse is often marred by a stilted traditionalism of language. Lines like "Twas you who led my child astray
From virtue's path to ways of death;
She died beside her infant's clay,
And curst you with her dying breath, might have been written by a minor poet of the eighteenth century.

MacTomáis (Peadar). SONGS OF THE ISLAND QUEEN. Dublin, Talbot Press (Fisher Unwin), 1919. 6½ in. 39 pp. paper, 1 n. 821.9

Mr. Mac Tomáis writes in a post-Swinburnian style tinged with Celticism. At moments, too, we are reminded of the loud emphatic hurdy-gurdy of Rudyard Kipling. He sings of Ireland oppressed, of
A people begotten of freemen,
Rocked in the cradle of song,
Fondled in the arms of beauty,
Fed on the milk of the stars,
And the food of immortal desire.

His poems will be admired, if they find admirers, not so much for their literary beauty as for their political fervour.

See review, p. 478.

Percy-Davis (Mrs. C.), pseud. LADY GRAY. HUMAN THOUGHTS IN POETRY AND PROSE. Lywood's, 1919. 7½ in. 96 pp. paper, 2 6 n. 821.9

Set to music "Lady Gray's" poems would make admirable "ballads," in the concert-hall sense of the word:
I sought thee, dear, in the press and throng
Of the things that never last very long,
But I found, beloved, in the silver dew
Of the heart of a rose, the lips of Yon.
One can almost hear the dying falls of a rich melody.

Philip (Terence). POEMS WRITTEN AT RICHLEIGH. Grant Richards, 1920. 7½ in. 60 pp., 3 6 n. 821.9

"Mr. Philip has interesting thoughts and moods to express, and he gives them shape in carefully wrought verse. "The Plot" and "To Clouds" are accomplished sonnets, and there are good things in 'Letter to a Friend.'"

The emotional sincerity which constantly contrives to break through a crust of indifferent and often absurd verse makes this series of prison meditations a very interesting and moving human document. "Red Band" tells the story—so often repeated in the annals of religious experience—of how he found comfort in despair, how need and privation created their fulfilment:

Ye a, when of every blessing I was bare,
And to the deepest pit down, down I fell;
 Whilst crying, "There's no God!"—I found him there.
God dwells in Hell.

FICTION.

A Spanish version of this tragic love-story, the scene of which is in Norway.

This novel, the heroine of which has difficulties in determining her matrimonial "affinity," was originally published under the title of "Anne Inescourt." The present edition is stated by the publishers to have been "almost entirely rewritten."

The sole survivor of an ancient and noble family which he hopes to perpetuate, the hero of this absorbing novel is married to a beautiful woman who—loves-presses to release him. He brings into the Chamber a Bill making sterility a ground for divorce; but before this passes into law a final dénouement is provided.

The leading characters are two entirely inexperienced girls. One is a "magnificent specimen of girlhood with an overpoweringly sensual beauty," who is poor, but of high birth. The other, her friend, is a plain "nobody," possessed of wealth acquired in trade. The narrowness of their schoolmistress's mental horizon may be gauged by the fact that she believed that at a meeting of suffragettes questions had been discussed by women which should only be spoken of in the dissecting room of a hospital or the lecture hall of the Y.M.C.A. "It is quite to be expected that the beautiful girl becomes a "poor little victim of a corrupt circle," and that her meagre life ends in a great disaster. Her friend has better luck.

The text of the first edition (1836) of this Arabian Night in a modern Parisian milieu has been reproduced.

Leblanc (Maurice). COFFIN ISLAND. Translated by Alexander Teixeira de Mattos. Hurst & Blackett, 1920. 7½ in. 320 pp., 7 6 n. 843.9

To readers asking for vertebral shivers and cerebral shocks this book should be very satisfying. The dreadful Aréne Lapa investigates the horrible doings of a homicidal maniac, who is supposed to be the son of a Hunsling king and has escaped from an internment camp. The action takes place on an island where there are menhirs, dolmens, sacrificial chambers, and subterranean ways sufficient for the most voracious consumer. In the course of the story more than a score of murders are committed, without counting the crucifixion of four women. The villain is worsted.

Lutz (Grace Livingston Hill). THE SEARCH. Lippincott, 1919. 7½ in. 317 pp. front., 6 n. 813.5

Piety and sentiment are dominant notes in this love-story of Corporal John Cameron, a poor but estimable hero in the war, and well-to-do Ruth Macdonald, who becomes a stolend Paladin to bodily health and mental case, and accepts him for her husband. Incidentally, the evil schemes of a boastful lieutenant, who is a rival lover of Ruth (or her money), are defeated.

An effective and successful character-study, with a carefully filled-in background, giving in the main an accurate picture of various nuances of English mentality immediately before, and after, the outbreak of the great War. The hero's temperament is sharply contrasted with that of his unstable cousin; and the heroine is sympathetic and convincing. The picture of the young clerks at the War Office is satisfying open : but as a whole the book is commendable, and may be read with pleasure.

The author of "Les Silences du Colonel Bramble" here sketches thehumours of the Alsation. Lightly and in short compass, but with insight, he shows how the people of a village in Alsace lived and what they thought in the epoch-making year, for them, 1919. Round-table talks, anecdotes, and displays of idiosyncrasy are the simple materials.

A Spanish translation of M. J. Rosny's "Les Indomptés."

813.5

The author has already described Winona and her friends round their camp fire and on a war farm; and now that the war is over she tells how they devoted their energies to "Community Service," organizing games and singing parties for demobilized soldiers and the girls employed in stores, and enabling the latter to obtain their meals reasonably and comfortably. The mixture of nationalities in a small American town is well illustrated, a Russian Bohemian Jewess and a Syrian girl being prominent characters.

910 GEOGRAPHY, TOPOGRAPHY.

913.4223

The question whether the bones discovered in 1888 are those of St. Thomas Becket is fully discussed, with a review of the authorities on the history of the martyrodom, of the relics, and the shrine, and all the topographical information bearing on the subject. Where documentary evidence is not set out in full in the original and in translation, it is, for economy of space, translated into English.

914.0

This is a book of travel sketches in various parts of Europe. The author's chatty and discursive method betrays her at times into the expression of rather fatuous opinions. The art of the Cubists, she writes, "seems like a disease of the brain," the artists being "lazy swine, scamps that won't work." Genoa as a traveller's resort goes out of favour because it is the town in which the writer lost the keys of her trunk; and because the loss was unreported, "I do not think I shall ever again like Genoa again." A cathedral service in Tours is recorded: "I was labouring in a blue mid-air, a rose mid-air, in her clean faded cotton, an aged man of the people with his rusty coat and white beard, and an overworked mother of a family in her plaid shawl." Mrs. Walker's descriptions are always as naive. Lighting-up time on the harbour ships is "a gala night of fireworks." She complains of a certain person who "described an Italian landscape in such a way that we felt we had passed through Italy with our eyes shut." In this passage she has unwittingly supplied an adequate commentary on her own volume.

920 BIOGRAPHY.

929.3

A transcript from a copy of the register, made in 1829 by the wife of Sir Thomas Phillipps of Middle Hill, which was preserved in the Public Library at Cardiff. The editor has collated his proofs with the original book, which, after the transcript had been made, was discovered to be in the possession of the University College of South Wales.

929.3

A transcript, with footnotes, of the oldest register book of the parish of Llanddewi Rhydderch, Monmouthshire.

Quin (Henry), Henry Quin, M.D., President and Fellow of the King's College of Physicians in Ireland, and King's Professor of the Practice of Physic (1718-1791). Dublin, Univ. Press, 1919. 11 in. 66 pp. paper, 4/6 n.

920

A memoir of a well-known Irish physician who is stated to have "enjoyed what was probably the most fashionable and most extensive medical practice in Dublin during the latter half of the eighteenth century." But he did not leave "anything as a permanent contribution to the study or progress of medicine." Henry Quin was interested in numismatics and in the making of glass pastes for the reproduction of ancient cameos and intaglios. The book includes a considerable account of Quin's family.

Williams (David), The Author, the Author's Wife. London, Simpkin, Marth, 1919. 8 in. 310 pp., il., 7/6 n.

920

See "Notes from Ireland," p. 480.

930-990 HISTORY.

Cianlantini (Franco), Problemi dell' Alto Adige. Florence, Vallecchi, 1919. 8 in. 151 pp. paper, 3,50 lira. 945.09

See review, p. 491.

941.59

Irish republicanism of to-day, though in lineal descent from the insurgents of the past, differs in many particulars of the highest importance. The present movement is in great measure a revolt against its predecessors, and is inspired by a conviction of their futility, which was due to the fact that the old revolutionists, though they knew what they wanted, did not really know why they wanted it, or how it could be gained. Men hatred of British rule never carried them very far, and "r. purpose based on hatred tends to become blurred and dim as memory grows dull."
Appointments Vacant

STOKE NEWINGTON PUBLIC LIBRARY.

JUNIOR MALE ASSISTANT.

Applications are invited for the POST of JUNIOR MALE ASSISTANT.

Salary, £150 per annum, including war bonus. Public Library experience essential.

Preference will be given to candidates holding Library Association Certificates, or who, by reason of service in His Majesty's Forces, have been prevented from qualifying for these certificates.

Applications, endorsed "Assistant," to reach me not later than April 30, 1920.

GEORGE FREECE,
Librarian and Clerk.

EAST SUFFOLK COUNTY EDUCATION COMMITTEE.

The Committee invite APPLICATIONS for the under-mentioned VACANCIES:

SOUTHAMPTON COUNTY SECONDARY SCHOOL.

ASSISTANT MASTER or MISTRESS (Graduate or with equivalent qualifications), to take Chemistry throughout the School and to assist in the teaching of Arithmetic.

ASSISTANT MISTRESS (Graduate preferred), to teach History and English to the lower forms and assist with Physical training of girls.

LEISTON COUNTY SECONDARY SCHOOL.

ASSISTANT MASTER (Graduate), to teach Chemistry, Physics and Elementary Mathematics.

It is desired to fill the above vacancies as soon as possible after May 4 next.

Salary applicable to the above appointments are:—Graduates, men £190 to £350, women £175 to £300. Allowance will be made for previous service in fixing initial salary.

Apply not later than April 30, 1920, on Form 23, copy of which may be obtained from W. E. WATKINS, Secretary, County Hall, Ipswich.

BARNSTAPLE GRAMMAR SCHOOL.

WANTED, in September next—

A SENIOR ENGLISH MISTRESS.

A JUNIOR SCIENCE MISTRESS.

Scale for Graduates, £180-£300, according to experience. Forms of application may be obtained from the undersigned on receipt of sixp pence addressed "Librarian" Barnstaple, Clerk to the Governors.

BIRMINGHAM PUBLIC LIBRARIES.

APPLICATIONS FOR POSITIONS AS MALE ASSISTANTS ARE INVITED.

EXPERIENCE in Library work essential, and preference will be given to candidates holding certificates of the Library Association. Salary £100, plus war bonus £50, making £150 per annum.

Applications in candidates own handwriting, stating age, qualifications, Library Association Certificates held, accompanied by copies of three recent testimonials (which will not be returned), and endorsed "Assistant" to be forwarded to me not later than the 30th inst.

WALTER POWELL,
Chief Librarian.

Appointments Vacant

BOROUGH OF SWINDON.

SECONDARY SCHOOL AND TECHNICAL INSTITUTION.

Applications are invited for the POST of HEAD MASTER OF THE ART DEPARTMENT. Applicants must have had experience of teaching and organisation in a School of Art and in a Secondary School. Salary according to new scale, a copy of which, together with further particulars and form of application, may be obtained from the PRINCIPAL, Technical Institution, Swindon.

W. SEATON,
Secretary.

SHEPTON MALLET GRAMMAR SCHOOL, SOMERSET.

WANTED, immediately, ASSISTANT MALE or FEMALE for Mathematics and Science or Rural Science and Woodwork with some Mathematics. Salary, according to County scale.—Apply W. B. WELCH, Headmaster.

THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

SOUTH KENSINGTON, LONDON, S.W.7.

Incorporated by Royal Charter, 1822.

CARDS: His Majesty the King.

President: H.R.H. THE PRINCE OF WALES, K.G.

Hon. Secretary: George A. Macmillan, Esq., B.A., B.D., Litt.D.

The Competition for the SIXTEEN FREE OPEN SCHOLARSHIPS in May and June, 1920, as follows:

PIANOFORTE... 2

SINGING... 1

VIOLONCELLO... 1

VIOLIN... 2

ORGAN... 1

COMPOSITION... 2

BASSOON... 1

HORN... 2

CLARINET... 1

FLUTE... 2

The Scholarships are open to all classes of His Majesty’s subjects within the prescribed limits of age stated in the particulars issued to applicants. They entitle the holders to a thorough and systematic free education at the College only, in theoretical and practical music, and are as a rule, tenable for a period of three years. In some cases grants towards maintenance are added, but these cannot be decided until after the election of the scholars has taken place.

Preliminary examinations will be held on Wednesday, May 26, 1920, in various local centres throughout the United Kingdom, and the final competition will take place at the College about June 9, 1920.

All persons desiring of competing must apply on the official entry forms, which may be obtained with all particulars from the College, Prince Consort Road, South Kensington, London, S.W.7.

The last day for receiving these forms, which must be accompanied by an official stamped registrar’s certificate of birth, is April 21, 1920.

CLAUSE AVELING, Registrar.
Art Exhibitions

R.W.S. ROYAL SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER-COLOURS.
174th EXHIBITION NOW OPEN, 10 till 6. 8a, FALL MALL, EAST (near National Gallery).

ETCHINGS BY IAN STRANG
THE CHENIL GALLERY
b.4 the Town Hall, Cheltenham.

GRAFTON GALLERIES.
FRENCH EXHIBITION of GALERIE DES BEAUX ARTS of PARIS.
10 till 6. Admission 1½ inc. tax.

GAUGUIN, DEGAS, MANET, RENOIR, CEZANNE, VIUILLARD, BONNARD, TOULOUSE, LAURETTE, STEINLEN, etc., etc.

EXHIBITION of Modern French Colour-Prints.
Etchings, etc., at the
ELDAR GALLERY
40, GREAT MARLBOROUGH STREET, W. Open 10.30 to 6. Admission 1s. (including Catalogue).

The Burlington Gallery, 15 Green Street, Leicester Square.

The Society of Australian Artists.
April 12th-30th Daily 10-6.
The First Exhibition of PAINTINGS AND SCULPTURE by the "7 x 5."
Walkers Galleries, 118, New Bond Street, April 12th-May 1st.

AUGUSTUS E. JOHN'S War Peace Conference, and Other Portraits.
The Gallery of the Alpine Club, Mill Street, Conduit Street, W.
There is one thing Mr. Augustus John has above his contemporaries; that is, an instinct for painting."—Morning Post.
"It needs no prophetic insight to foretell that the exhibition...will be one of the sensations of the season."—Daily News.

The Late Mabel Nicholson.
A Series of Paintings on View at 5, Regent Street, S.W. 1.
Admission 1s. 5d. (With Catalogue). 10-5.30. Saturdays 10-1.

New Art Salon
160, Shaftesbury Avenue (First Floor)
Exhibition of Paintings by Bracque, Derain, Lhote, Marchand Modigliani, Picasso, Signac, Vlaminck.
Daily 10-6. From 17th February

Typewriting &c.
Typewriting of EVERY DESCRIPTION carefully and promptly executed at home, 1s. per 1,000 words; carbon copy, 3d. per 1,000 words. Duplicating. Cambridge Local.—Miss N. McFarlane, 11, Palmeira Avenue, WestclifF Essex.

Typewriting.—Authors' MSS., Examination Papers, Letters, Circulars, Testimonials, General Copying, Duplicating, etc.—J. Trimnell, 8, Moira Terrace, Cardiff.

Entertainments

Holborn Empire
Lewis Casson and Bruce Winstone's Season of Daily Matinees at 2:30 (Including Saturdays). Next Week, April 18th—
Sybil Thorndike in "The Show Room."

Educational

Careful Tuition in Public Speaking and Reciting, given by DOUGLAS STEVENS, A.L.A.M. (Elocution). Highly commended by The Times, Telegraph, Morning Post, etc., Schools and Academies visited.
Terms for Tuition, Recitals, etc., from 85, New Oxford Street, W. I. Tel. Museum 1785.

Authors' Agents, etc.

THE AUTHORS' ALLIANCE are prepared to consider and place MSS., for early publication. Literary work of all kinds dealt with by experts who place Authors' interests first. Twenty years' experience. Please note new address: 93 and 94, Ganchery Lane, London, W.C.2.

Authors MS. Typed. 1/- per 1000 Words. Neat, Intelligent work. Circulars, Testimonials, etc., duplicated from 3/ per 25 copies. Literary Manager, Oxford Bureau, 3, Crosshall Street, Liverpool.

Meetings

Henry Bryan Binns
Will give Two Addresses
On FREEDOM AS CREATIVE POWER at Dr. Williams' Library, 14, Gordon Square, W.C., On Tuesdays, April 19th and 26th at 8 o'clock.
Admission Free.

Syllabuses on application to the League of Peace and Freedom, 90, Avenue Chambers, Southampton Row, W.C.

Appointments Wanted

Research Work.—Lady Graduate going abroad would undertake research work in foreign archives or libraries. Special diploma in Paleographic. Thorough knowledge of German (old and modern), French (old and modern) and Latin.—Answers, B.R., Athenæum Advertisement Office, 170, Fleet Street, E.C.4.

Gentleman, 30, single, seeks POST in LIBRARY: PUBLISHERS, or as SECRETARY, fully qualified excellent testimonials.—Box 14, Athenæum Advertisement Office, 170, Fleet Street, E.C.4.

Financial

Partnerships.—Employment with investment wanted by fully qualified YOUNG MEN who have £1,000 to £10,000 to invest.—The Officers Partnership Guardian, 53, Victoria Street, S.W.1. Calls preferred.

Miscellaneous

Fading Photographs, Old Miniatures, etc., reproduced in facsimile of original. Valuable prints, china, etc. photographed.—F. Moore, 10, Titchfield Terrace, London, N.W.1.

Excellent Bank Paper for Pen or Typewriter. Sample Ream, 480 sheets, (10 by 8), 4s.; three at 8s. 6d. each; six at 3s. 6d. Post Free. Cream Laid Envelopes, Cards. Samples on application.—Alfred Erickson & Co., 2, Tudor Street, E.C.4.

Sales by Auction

Books & Manuscripts
Messrs. SOTHEBY, WILKINSON & HODGE
WILL SELL by AUCTION, at their Large Galleries 34 and 35, New Bond Street, W.1, on Thursday, April 29, and following days, at One o'clock precisely.

Valuable Books, Illuminated and other Manuscripts, comprising the Properties of Coningsby C. Sibthorp, Esq., Sudbrooke Holme, Lincoln; E. K. Stephenson, Esq., M.A.; Alfred Durham, Esq., Alton, Warrington, Surrey; Violet Viscountess Melville, 11, Lowndes Street, S.W.; C. Constable Curtis; Esq., of Langford Hall, Newark, Notts; Brigadier-General W. G. Brathwaite, C.B., C.M.G., D.S.O., late of Plumtree Hall, Milthorpe, Westmorland; and other properties, including a Fine Collection of Duplicate Copies of Old English Plays from the library of Worcester College, Oxford (sold by order of the Provost and Fellows); Shakespeare's Poems, 160; and Second Folio; Tragedy of Othello, 1622, &c., &c.; Rare Early Editions in English and Foreign Literature; Historical Playing Cards; Collections of Book-Plates; Americana, including rare maps; Illuminated MS., Horae on vellum; Oriental MSS.; Publications of modern private presses, books with coloured plates, &c., several books in fine bindings, including needlework, embroidered covers. May be viewed Two Days Prior. Catalogues may be had. Illustrated Copies price 1s. each.
THE POEMS OF
WILFRID WILSON

GIbson £. £.

Price 6d. Postage 1d.

No. II. of The Westminster Classics consists of a collection of twenty-three of the Poems of Wilfrid Wilson Gibson, the special merits of which have been widely recognised by the Press.

The Nation says of them:—"The main thing about these poems is just that they are extraordinary poems; by means of their psychology, so less and so more than by means of their metre, their rhyme, their intellectual form and their concrete imagery, they pierce us with flaming understanding of what war is and means—not merely what it is to these individual pieces of ordinary human nature who are injured by it and who yet dominate it, but, by evident implication what war is in itself, as a grisly multitudinous whole. It seems to us beyond question that Mr. Gibson's 'Battle' is one of the most remarkable results the war has had in literature."

THE ATHENÆUM LITERATURE DEPT.,
10, ADELPHI TER., W.C.2.

JUST PUBLISHED.

THE ECONOMIC CRISIS IN EUROPE

By "Economist."

An admirably clear and concise popular presentation of the existing economic chaos in Europe, its causes, and its probable future effects, with certain suggestions as to the lines upon which restoration should proceed.

ROSE AND DRAGON BOOKS

A biographical Series for Young People. The Friend says: "Dainty in appearance, well-printed, concise, there is quite a freshness of outlook in the choice of subjects."

A Plain Friend

By ANNIE MATHESON. 2s. 6d. net. The first of the Rose and Dragon Books; it consists of—

"The life of a noble woman—one who stands in the front rank of philanthropists—Elizabeth Fry. It is related in an attractive human way—portraying her great work among prisoners, her strong and lovable character and the social world in which she lived."—Times Literary Supplement.

John Bright

By BERTRAM PICKARD. 2s. 6d. net.

The Friend says: "Very successful in its historical background."

The Scotsman: "A readable sketch of the career of the Tribune of the People."

Our Hero of the Golden Heart

By ANNIE MATHESON. 2s. 6d. net.

The Scotsman: "An inspiring collection."

Nottingham Journal: "A delightful little volume."

BRITISH PERIODICALS, LTD.
15 & 16, Gough Square, Fleet Street, E.C.4
OUT OF MY LIFE

Early

Morning Post:
"It enables us to understand why the German people should have pitched upon the author as their national hero."

Times:
"No one, after reading the book, can doubt that its author was not the man who wielded the thunderbolts."

Daily Graphic:
"A volume of high interest."

Reviews.

Observer:
"A book to be read and carefully digested . . . a fascinating revelations of a personality and a creed."

Scotsman:
"His memoirs are the most fascinating and instructive that the war has yet produced."

Daily Chronicle:
"The life story of an impenitent Junker."

---

Marshal von HINDENBURG

With Portrait Frontispiece and
3 large Maps. Cloth, 31/6 net.
Of all Booksellers and Libraries.

---

"AN HELPMEET"

BY

Hannah Needham.

A Novel of educational value in its treatment of vital questions of the day:
The Sex-problem—A Study for Home and School.
Intensely interesting to the Idealist in Education, as well as to the intelligent reading public.
Cr. Octavo, cloth, 302 pp. 6s. net. (Postage 8d.).
"The book should make a strong appeal."—Manchester City News.

Published by:

MORLAND, Amersham, Bucks.

---

ATTRACTIVE BOOKS

AT LESS THAN HALF THE PUBLISHED PRICES.

Books on a great variety of subjects—Sport, Travel, Fiction, Biography, Theology, etc., etc.
All in New Condition as published. Catalogue on application.
WILLIAM GLAISHER, LTD.,
265, HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.1.

---

BOOKSELLERS' PROVIDENT INSTITUTION

A Registered Friendly Society founded in the year 1837 for the assistance of members and their widows and children when in necessitous circumstances.

Patron: Her Majesty Queen Alexandra.
President: Charles James Longman, Esq.
An Annual Subscription of One Guinea, or a Donation of Ten Guineas, entitles the donor to Honorary Membership with the privilege of voting at General Meetings; whilst a bequest of Twenty Guineas constitutes the executor an Honorary Member for life, with power to vote.
Subscriptions or Donations will be thankfully received by the Secretary, Mr. William Poulten, Stationers' Hall Court, London, E.C.4, who will gladly furnish any further particulars that may be desired.

---

"Broadly speaking the advance of adult education can proceed only as quickly as voluntary agencies can stimulate, focus and organise the demand for it. In the last resort the volume of educational activity is determined not by the capacity of the universities and education authorities to provide facilities, but by the ability of organising bodies to give shape and substance to the demand. The organising work of voluntary bodies should, therefore, be maintained and developed."—From the recommendations of the Ministry of Reconstruction Adult Education Committee's Final Report. (H.M. Stationery Office, Cmd. 321. 1s. 9d. net.)

---

Essay Competition.

ESSAYS ARE INVITED ON THE SUBJECT OF

The Future of

The Adult School Movement

in the Light of

The Adult Education Report

---

First Prize - £20
Second Prize - £10
Three Prizes of £5 each.

---

CONDITIONS.

1. The Competition is open to men and women, irrespective of membership of Adult Schools.
2. Essays must not exceed 15,000 words.
3. Essays must
   (a) Be signed with a nom de plume.
   (b) Be accompanied by a sealed envelope containing the writer's full name and address.
4. The competition will close on May 31st, and essays must be posted to reach the Editor of "One and All," 30, Bloomsbury Street, London, W.C.1, not later than that date.
5. The judges will be Wm. Chas. Braithwaite, B.A., LL.B., Miss A. L. Littleboy, and Albert Mansbridge, M.A.
6. The decision of the judges will be final.
7. Essays may be hand or type written, and must be on one side of the paper only.
8. The National Adult School Council will have the right to publish any or all of the essays in whatever form it may deem desirable.
SOME LETTERS OF EDWARD THOMAS

O

F the men I have known Edward Thomas had the most delicately tempered nature, in its purity and self-defensive questioning of life. Most masculine in his independence, never swerving in his proud, self-contained attitude, his was a sensitiveness almost feminine in its shy diffidence. The beauty of the spiritual vision which inspired the "Poems" was fully revealed, years back, in "Rest and Unrest" and "Light and Twilight." But these little books received scant attention from his contemporaries, and even a long enthusiastic review in the Times Literary Supplement did not lead to a sale of more than a few hundred copies. The fact is that Thomas's imaginative reveries were too pure in tone, 'oo delicately haunting in their poetical appeal, to be apprehended by one in five hundred of the reading public. The modern Englishman cannot recognize beauty of imagination in a writer till a vast fuss has been made about him; or the author's reputation has been wrecked after death with a sentimental nimbus, alien to his temperament, as has been the case with Rupert Brooke. And in 1910 and 1911 even the poets were too busy with their own plans and their own reputations to notice that the fine flower of Celtic Magic was blossoming then before their eyes in "Light and Twilight."

Thomas was brought to our Surrey cottage by a mutual friend, I think, at the close of 1905. Our friendship struck root in an onslaught of mine on some fastidious criticisms of his on Walt Whitman; and the implications of the discussion affected him more than I guessed. He was then emerging from the stage of scholarly aestheticism of which "Horae Solitariae" (1902) was the product. I paid a return visit to his cottage at "The Weald," Sevenoaks, when he showed me the farm and oasthouse, where I met his wife and children fresh from picking in the near hopfields. That scene lingers in my memory as an idyll of gracious youth. The charm of Thomas in the freshness of his strength, of his beautiful eyes and hair which shone in the sunlight, brown bleached to fair gold, appeared at its best in the open air, recalling the people of the "Mabinigion," or some hero myth, such as that of the Argonauts. Some years later, after 1910, Thomas's freshness and force became a little dulled by his never-ending literary toil in writing books "at £1 per thousand," as he says in one of the following letters. On a later visit to "The Weald," Thomas took me to a tiny two-roomed cottage in a field near by, and there appeared in the doorway a short, black-haired man, the "super tramp," W. H. Davies, whose eyes revealed the poet. The cottage had been placed at Davies' disposal by Thomas when the poet was yet unknown. We strolled about the fields and inspected a pond where Thomas liked to bring children to fish. I remember later my boy David returning proudly with a tench, which that pond had yielded to his or to Thomas's skill. If I speak of this incident it is to record another Conrad told me once how he had come across his little son, Boris, and Thomas fishing, in intense absorption, with a line without a hook in a pond which had no fish in it! The power of the contemplative illusion held the two fishermen in its grip. Thomas smiled with shadowy irony, but he sat on, fishing, and Conrad left the fishers to their contented reverie.

Thomas disdained all the arts that help a man to personal success and popularity. Shy and fastidious, he defended himself from the world by a critical manner which many men resented. But for those friends who had won his confidence, his fine dry aloofness, his guarded sensitiveness, his introspective melancholy all blended in a peculiar delicate charm. All Thomas's being, his thoughts and energies, were dominated and directed by his fine, fastidious taste. From his mind and personality emanated a sort of defensive, secret essence of cold, clear taste, intensely individual, which contemned all vulgaritv, banality and mediocrity. And the critical side of him guarded jealously, though it could not hide, the poet within, also shy, austere, melancholy in his depths, and chaste in spiritual isolation—a poet possessed by his passion for spiritual beauty, as for the simple, the natural, the homely things of the earth.

Every friend of Thomas who writes of him probably wonders, as I wonder, whether he ever threw wholly aside his defensive armour. One of his poems, "I built myself a House of Glass," suggests that he could not. Perhaps he guarded all the more jealously the life of the soul through distrust of exposing his melancholy and his clouding circumstances. But in respect to his normal interests, tastes and ideas, Thomas was perfectly frank with me in self-expression. Naturally fairly frank and outspoken myself, I always instinctively talked to Thomas without arrêre pensée, and our conversation was chiefly of books, mutual friends and contemporaries and of his experiences in his long country excursions. How grateful to one's sight was Thomas's tall figure in brown homespun and tweed hat, striding along a dull London street! Often he called for me at 3, Henrietta Street, and the light in his eye, inquiring and questioning, responded to my warm greeting. Frankness was an antidote to Thomas's introspective moods, as one found at the Mont Blanc restaurant, where a little party of us frequently met at lunch. There he would often break his pauses of silence by clear, dry flashes of ironical insight. Looking back at those meetings, one recalls that Thomas's edged comments added an indefinable salt to the talk. He appreciated wit in others and so unconsciously drew it forth, responding himself by a subtle riposte, finely malicious, yet clear and ingenious. When anything hurt his temperament he would draw his rapier of cold taste, dropping a few critical words, subtly ironical.

I do not know whether his letters to me, of which I give a selection below, are typical of his correspondence. No doubt he showed other sides to other men, and so a comparison between them may be of interest. For me, the strength of Thomas's genius, its essence lies in his imaginative pieces, such as "The Flower-Gatherer," "A Group of Statuaries," "Home," and "Olwen"; also in the early chapters of his "Life of Richard Jefferies," in "The Happy Go Lucky Morgans," and to them one must of course, now, add the "Poems." He did not defer to my opinion so much as might appear from some of his letters 1 print, and any expressions of his thanks for any service I might have rendered as a friend and "a publisher's reader" must be read in the light of our mutual desire to help one another, and of our wish more than of our power.

The first letter refers to W. H. Davies' "The Autobiography of a Super Tramp":

---

DEAR GARNETT,

I am sorry about the Poet's life. But I think I have succeeded in setting him to work to increase it—as far as possible in the way you suggest. I agree about the details and I think he can do them pretty well. All the additions he has planned are elaborations of episodes hardly touched on before, e.g. on tramp in the States and pedling in England; also he himself wished to cut out and mend the London passages. This he has begun to do and he has written to Bernard Shaw. If Shaw fails will Arthur Symons do? I know Nevinson would do it, but he may be off in a month's time and perhaps his is not the kind of name. Davies says you shall have the MS. when it is ready and he is grateful to you for troubling on his behalf . . . for he is under a little cloud as the summer is going away and we are leaving him alone so soon, and he has hardly made a penny yet. It was very pleasant to have David again, but I wish his fishing had been more fortunate. Please tell him I was wrong about Douglas English's book—I was thinking of "Bobbies Courageous," which perhaps David has not seen.

YOURS,

EDWARD THOMAS.

The next letter relates to Thomas's "Life of Richard Jefferies," an achievement for which I felt and expressed to him keen enthusiasm:

Ashford,

Petersfield.

'10, B. 09.

MY DEAR GARNETT,

Thank you for your letter. You have a paternal right to criticize my book since very little but the expression is mine. I held the pen, but since you contradicted me about Whitman at the Corrie (it seems a long time ago), you have done the rest and I value your opinion more than anybody's because they are your ideas or the ramifications of them. Your letter has, therefore, given me and my wife great pleasure, and I only wish a thorough sense of indebtedness were sufficient return. I shall look out for your review. Is it to be in the Nation or the D. N.?

As to the uncalled essays,[1] [of Richard Jefferies] I shall be glad to edit them. I enclose a full list of possible ones. Of these a few are of little importance, yet sure to be interesting to the majority of his readers, but "Nature and Eternity" is one of the finest he ever wrote. . . . She [Mrs. Jefferies] might be persuaded to include some unpublished pages meant for "The Gamekeeper," or "The D. N." in the proposed book—I have never seen them, but I know they exist and were in her possession lately. . . .

Yours,

EDWARD THOMAS.

In the first weeks of 1909 Thomas felt a great flow of creative energy and he wrote a variety of tales and sketches, which, with others, were collected later in "Rest and Unrest," 1910, and "Light and Twilight," 1911. The five letters that follow are chiefly concerned with these sketches and some criticisms upon them and with efforts made to place them. The anonymous writer of a well-meant but invidious dissertation on Thomas as a critic, in the Nation, October 13, 1917, curiously failed to remark that the pathos of Thomas's lack of success lay in the almost total lack of response on the part of the public and the editors to such imaginative masterpieces as "Home," "July," "The First of Spring," "Maiden's Wood." It is indeed possible that the writer had not even read them! But we know that the finest work,

---

* This is Thomas's delicate flattery. We held identical ideas about Jefferies, but Thomas made the subject his own in a fashion no one could rival.

† Subsequently published by Messrs. Duckworth. of a high, poetic, imaginative order, may go begging for years, while writers of very ordinary talent are being surfeited with applause.

Berryfield Cottage, 11, ii, 09.

My dear Garnett,

Have you time to look at another sketch of mine? I don’t like troubling you again, especially with manuscript, but I am strongly impelled to because I have now had about six weeks of unusual energy. I have written about a score of tales and sketches, real and imaginary, some never attempted before; and though I feel a little more condescension than I used to, I am not at all sure that I am on a wise path—far less a profitable one—and you are the only man I can turn to for an opinion. I have been working so far, and thus I have only copied out one or two of these things, and those only the shortest, or else I should have sent you something of a more elaborate and realistic kind. Perhaps you are very busy—I know you must be about now engaged in arranging for your Icelandic play—and if so I hope you will return this piece at once and let me show it you at another time, perhaps.

Yours,
Edward Thomas.

Ashford, 13, ii, 09.

My dear Garnett,

Your letter that came this morning was too flattering but entirely pleasant to me. I am not exaggerating when I say that I have long hoped to please you and that I now feel glad of whatever praise the book wins, because it is some return to you for all your direct and indirect criticisms of me and my work. You have been my chief guide to such knowledge as I have of the relationship between life and literature. But I am too confused with pleasure and shyness to say what I am feeling, even on paper. I will only offer affectionate homage. I hope I shall have a chance of talking to you sooner—won’t you come down here some time before, as well as after, the new house is built? They are only just digging out the foundations and bringing up the bricks. I am to have a little room right away from the house to work in, and that may be finished soon after the beginning of spring. I hope—it looks through trees to a magnificent road winding up and round a coombe among beeches and to the Downs, four miles away south...

I shall not forget what you say about going forward still more into contact with the world at my gate and over the hills. You mean the world of men, I think. I should like to, equally as a man and a writer, but the ability grows slowly. I am still very much afraid of men and too easily repulsed from them into myself, and I feel very humble when I think how seldom I can be myself and enter into them at the same time—either I remain sullenly self-centred or lose myself on the stream of their usually stronger or more active character.

Yours,
Edward Thomas.

Ashford, Friday.

Dear Garnett,

Thank you for your criticisms. I seem to see your meaning in nearly every case and have altered most of the quoted passages, and have added a piece which makes the whole more intelligible. You will see that from the start his chances of pulling the trigger were small.* Perhaps he is even more morbid and self-conscious than you thought, and thus, perhaps, the last part of p. 4 will no longer seem “intolerably affecting,” especially since these conditions do not rest as he points out—really weigh with him in his decision. You are unjust in your view of what you call literary “phrases” that “smell of the lamp.” Such phrases, however bad, came to me without thinking or seeking. It is your “simple and direct” phrases that I have to seek for. I think you might accept my objectionable gracefulness now as no offence of mine. About the first pages I cannot decide, but was inclined to think they should stand, as they—and even their “leisureliness”—help to suggest the man who is going on make a fool of himself once more.

If you approve I should be glad if you would offer it to Country Life. I am writing nothing but stories, sketches, and episodes now. Thank you again.

Yours,
Edward Thomas.

Ashford, 15, viii, 09.

Dear Garnett,

Thank you for your letter and the papers. I am taking your advice, and altering and much shortening “July” and “The Patriot.” Also I have entirely recast, shortened by half, and rewritten partly “The Lady of the Fountain,” which I hope you will reconsider. “The Lady of the Waste Lands” I have cleaned up a little by taking out some of the detail which makes it hang. I will get a typescript copy of “Winter Music”* (the dragon hunt) and show it you, as I think you might change your mind, especially if I cut out the introductory pages before the music begins. Then the portrait of a girl after a storm of wind and rain—called “The End of a Day”—I have an affection for. I expect your objection to it is the same as to “The Fountain.” So I will detach her almost entirely from the setting. So also with “The Earthly Cloud”—was it the description of the town, etc., at the railway station that you did not like? I wish I knew what you meant by condemning “The Tower” as “romantic.” I shall probably take the book in its corrected form up to town on the 21st (when the Square Club meets), and I will put at the end those which you condemn and which I have thought it possible to revise and give it to Milsted: just one or two I shall be able to show him in typescript.

Yours,
Edward Thomas.

* I thought this was one of the best, and one or two people have seen it and liked it. Perhaps as it came at the end of the book you were harsh to it.

The next letters will describe Thomas’s stay at Llaugarcine, in Caermarthenshire.

Edward Garnett.

(To be continued.)

A PRAYER

While still the light shines on the trunks of trees,
The sea-wind blows across the grassy hill,
The tender sight of flowers makes me glad,
Let me lie down and be for ever still,
Then I shall sleep and sleep beneath the grass,
And feel no more the bitter winter cold,
And in my head shall be no endless sounds,
But only quiet, and life-giving mould.

Joan Arden.
REVIEW

COLERIDGE'S CRITICISM

By WORDSWORTH: Biographia Literaria, Chapters I.-IV., XIV.-XXII. (Cambridge University Press. 10s. 6d. net.)

It is probably true that "Biographia Literaria" is the best book of criticism in the English language; nevertheless, it is rash to assume that it is a book of criticism of the highest excellence, even when it has passed through the salutary process of drastic editing, such as that to which, in the present case, the competent hands of Mr. George Sampson have submitted it. Its garrulity, its digressions, its verbiage, the marks which even the finest portions show of submersion in the tepid transcendentalism that wrought such havoc upon Coleridge's mind—these are its familiar disfigurements. They are not easily removed; for they enter fairly deeply even in the texture of those portions of the book in which Coleridge devotes himself, as severely as he can, to the proper business of literary criticism.

It may be that the prolixity with which he discusses and refutes the poetical principles expounded by Wordsworth in the preface of "Lyrical Ballads" was due to the tenderness of his consideration for Wordsworth's feelings, an influence to which Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch directs our attention in his introduction. That is honourable to Coleridge as a man; but it cannot exculpate him as a critic. For the points he had to make for and against Wordsworth were few and simple. First, he had to show that the theory of a poetic diction drawn exclusively from the language of "real life" was based upon an equivocation, and therefore was useless. This Coleridge had to show to clear himself of the common condemnation in which he had been involved, as one wrongly assumed to endorse Wordsworth's theory. He had an equally important point to make for Wordsworth. He wished to prove to him that the finest part of his poetic achievement was based upon a complete neglect of this theory, and that the weakest portions of his work were those in which he most closely followed it. In this demonstration he was moved by the desire to set his friend on the road that would lead to the most triumphant exercise of his own powers.

There is no doubt that Coleridge made both his points; but he made them, in particular the former, at exceeding length, and at the cost of a good deal of internal contradiction. He sets out, in the former case, to maintain that the language of poetry is essentially different from the language of prose. This he professes to deduce from a number of principles. His axiom—and it is possibly a sound one—is that metre originated in a spontaneous effort of the mind to hold in check the workings of emotion. From this, he argues, it follows that to justify the existence of metre, the language of a poem must show evidence of emotion, by being different from the language of prose. Further, he says, metre in itself stimulates the emotions, and for this condition of emotional excitement "correspondent food" must be provided. Thirdly, the emotion of poetical composition itself demands this same "correspondent food." The final argument, if we omit one drawn from an obscure theory of imitation very characteristic of Coleridge, is the incontrovertible appeal to the authority of the poets.

Unfortunately, the elaborate exposition of the first three arguments is not only unnecessary but confusing; for Coleridge goes on to distinguish, interestingly enough, between a language proper to poetry, a language proper to prose, and a neutral language which may be used inappropriately in prose and poetry, and later still he quotes a beautiful passage from Chaucer's "Troilus and Cressida," as an example of this neutral language, forgetting that, if his principles are correct, Chaucer was guilty of a sin against art in writing "Troilus and Cressida" in metre. The truth, of course, is that the paraphernalia of principles goes by the board. In order to refute the Wordsworthian theory of a language of real life supremely fitted for poetry you have only to prove the golden points, and to judge the fitness of the language of poetry you can only examine the particular poem. Wordsworth was wrong and self-contradictory without doubt; but Coleridge was equally wrong and self-contradictory in arguing that metre necessitated a language essentially different from that of prose.

So it is that the philosophic part of the specifically literary criticism of the "Biographia" takes us nowhere in particular. The valuable part is contained in his critical appreciation of Wordsworth's poetry and that amazing chapter—a little forlorn, as most of Coleridge's fine chapters are—on "the specific symptoms of poetic power" elucidated in a critical analysis of Shakespeare's "Venus and Adonis." In these few pages Coleridge is at the summit of his powers as a critic. So long as his attention could be fixed on a particular object, so long as he was engaged in deducing his general principles immediately from particular instances of the highest kind of poetic excellence, he was a critic indeed. Every one of the four points characteristic of early poetic genius which he formulates deserves to be called back to the mind again and again:

The delight in richness and sweetness of sound, even to a faulty excess, if it be evidently original and not the result of an easily imitable mechanism,

A second promise of genius is the choice of subjects very remote from the private interests and circumstances of the writer himself.

A third of genius is the first indication of personal passions, which would prove indeed but little, except as taken conjointly with the former,—yet without which the former could scarce exist in a high degree...

Images, however beautiful, though faithfully copied from nature, and as accurately represented in words, do not of themselves characterize the poet. They become procès of original genius only as far as they are modified by a personal passion; or by associated thoughts or images awakened by that passion; or when they have the effect of reducing multitude to unity, or succession to an instant; or when, a human and intellectual life is transferred to them from the poet's own spirit.

The last character which would prove indeed but little, except as taken conjointly with the former,—yet without which the former could scarce exist in a high degree...is depth, and every of thought.

In the context the most striking peculiarity of these distinguishing marks of poetic power, apart from the conviction which they bring, is that they are not in the least concerned with the actual language of poetry. The whole subject of poetic diction is dropped when Coleridge's critical, as opposed to his logical, faculty is at work; and, although this Chapter XV. is followed by many pages devoted to the analysis and refutation of the Wordsworthian theory and to the establishment of those principles of poetic diction to which we have referred, when Coleridge comes once more to engage his pure critical faculty, in the appreciation of Wordsworth's actual poetry in Chapter XXII., we again find him ignoring his own principles precisely on those occasions when we might have thought them applicable.

Coleridge enumerates Wordsworth's defects one by one. The first, he says, is an inconstancy of style. For a moment he appears to invoke his principles: "Wordsworth sinks too often and too abruptly to that style which I should place in the second division of language, dividing it into the three species: first, that which is peculiar to poetry; second, that which is proper only in prose; and third, the neutral or common to both.” But in the very first instance which Coleridge gives we can see that the principles have been dragged in by the hair, and that they are really alien to the argument which he is pursuing. He gives this example of disharmony from the poem on “The Blind Highland Boy” (whence washing tub in the 1807 edition, it is perhaps worth noting, had been changed at Coleridge’s own suggestion, with a rash contempt of probabilities, into a turtle shell in the edition of 1815): And one, the rarest, was a shell
The shell of a green Turtle, thin
And hollow;—you might sit therein,
It was so wide, and deep.

Our Highland Boy oft visited
The house which held this prize; and led
By choice or chance, did thither come
One day, when no one was at home,
And found the door unbarr’d.

The discord is, in any case, none too apparent; but if one exists, it does not in the least arise from the actual language which Wordsworth has used. If in anything, it consists in a slight shifting of the focus of apprehension, a sudden and scarcely perceptible emphasis on the detail of actual fact, with a deviation from the emotional key of the poem as a whole. In the next instance the lapse is, however, indubitable:

Thou hast a nest, for thy love and thy rest,
And though little troubled with sloth,
Drunken Lark! thou would’st be both
To be such a traveler as I.

Happy, happy liver!
With a soul as strong as a mountain River
Pouring out praise to th’ Almighty Giver,
Joy and jollity be with us both,
Hearing thee or else some other
As merry as a Brother.

I on the earth will go plodding on,
By myself, cheerfully, till the day is done.

The two lines in italics are discordant. But again it is no question of language in itself; it is an internal discrepancy between the parts of a whole, already debilitated by metrical insecurity.

Coleridge’s second point against Wordsworth is “a matter-of-factness in certain poems.” Once more there is no question of language. Coleridge takes the issue on to the highest and most secure ground. Wordsworth’s accidentality is a contravention of the essential catholicity of poetry; and this accidentality is manifested in laboriously exact description whether of places or persons. The poet sterilizes the creative activity of poetry, in the first case, for no reason at all, and in the second, because he proposes as his immediate object a moral end instead of the giving of aesthetic pleasure. The question of language in itself, if it enters at all, enters only as the indifferent means by which a non-poetic end is sought. The accidentality lies not in the words, but in the poet’s intention.

Coleridge’s third and fourth points, “an undue predilection for the dramatic form,” and “an eddying instead of a progression of thought,” may be passed as quickly as he passes them himself, for in any case they could only be the cause of a jejuneusness of language. The fifth, more interesting, is the appearance of “thoughts and images too great for the subject... an approximation to what might be called mental bombast.” Coleridge brings forward as his first instance of this four lines which have taken a deep hold on the affections of later generations:

They flash upon the inward eye
Which is the lily of solitude!
And then my heart with pleasure fills
And dances with the daffodil.

Coleridge found an almost burlesque bathos in the second couplet after the first. It would be difficult for a modern critic to accept that verdict altogether; nevertheless, his objection to the first couplet as a description of physical vision is surely sound. And it is interesting to note that the objection has been evaded by posterity in a manner which confirms Coleridge’s criticism. The “inward eye” is almost universally remembered apart from its context, and interpreted as a description of the purely spiritual process to which alone, in Coleridge’s opinion, it was truly apt.

The enumeration of Wordsworth’s excellences which follows is masterly; and the exhilaration with which one rises through the crescendo to the famous: “Last, and profoundly, I challenge for this poet that fit of imagination in the highest and strictest sense of the word...” is itself a pleasure to be derived only from the gift of criticism of the highest and strictest kind.

The object of this examination has been to show, not that the “Biographia Literaria” is undeserving of the high praise which has been bestowed upon it, but that the praise has been to some extent indiscriminate. It has now become almost a tradition to hold up to our admiration Coleridge’s chapter on poetic diction, and Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch, in a preface that is as unconventional in manner as it is admirable in most of its substance, maintains the tradition. As a matter of fact, what Coleridge himself had to say on poetic diction and its powers perilously necrophilous commonplace. Instead of making to Wordsworth the wholly sufficient answer that much poetry of the highest kind employs a language that by no perversion can be called essentially the same as the language of prose, he allows himself to be led by his German metaphysics into considering poetry as a Ding an sich and deducing therefrom the proposition that poetry must employ a language different from that of prose. That proposition is false, as Coleridge himself quite adequately shows from his remarks upon what he called the “neutral” language of Chaucer and Herbert. But instead of following up the clue and beginning to inquire whether or not narrative poetry by nature demands a language approximating to that of prose, and whether Wordsworth, in so far as he aimed at being a narrative poet, was not working on a correct but exaggerated principle, he leaves the bald contradiction and swerves off to the analysis of the defects and excellences of Wordsworth’s actual achievement. Precisely because we consider it of the greatest importance that the best of Coleridge’s criticism should be studied and studied again, we think it unfortunate that Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch should recommend the apprentice to get the chapters on poetic diction by heart. He will be condemned to carry about with him a good deal of dubious logic and a false conclusion. What is worth while learning from Coleridge is something different; it is not his behaviour with “a principle,” but his conduct when confronted with poetry in the concrete, his magisterial ordainment (to use his own word) and explication of his own aesthetic intuitions, and his manner of employing in this, the essential task of poetic criticism, the results of his own deep study of all the great poetry that he knew.

It would be ungenerous to end this review without expressing our gratitude to Mr. Sampson for his admirable notes on the text. They contain nothing but information that is really apposite.

J. M. M.
THE CRIPPEN CASE

The Trial of Hawley Harvey Crippen. Edited with Notes and an Introduction by Filson Young. "Notable English Trials." (William Hodge & Co., 10s., 6d.)

This is an excellent book, both in the material provided and the form in which it is presented. We are especially grateful for the editor's useful, thoughtful and humane preface, symptomatic of the change which is coming about in the mind of our Western communities with regard to their abnormal individuals. Our reactions to insanity, immorality, crime have been in the past, and still are for the most part, insane, immoral, and criminal. It is perhaps expedient and justifiable to segregate the insane, to attach penalties to some forms of immorality, to hang the violent criminal; it is hardly justifiable, it is inexpedient, to forget that rather our good fortune than our merit keeps our steps upon the broad highway of social tolerance.

It is not quite clear why Crippen should have deviated from it at last so fatally. Till January, 1910, his actions and demeanour, so far as they are recorded, are characterized by a rather commonplace amiability and inoffensiveness; his conjugal infidelity will hardly be counted for a mark of abnormality. His intimate relations with Miss Le Neve had lasted for three years; his attachment appears to have wakened in him qualities of self-forgetting devotion. It is suggested that his discontent with the equivocal situation, coupled with his wife's threat to leave him and take her possessions with her, urged him to the crime. But there is no evidence that his financial position was actually distressed; and had his wife carried out her threat, the situation must, one would think, have been partially relieved in all respects. The advantages to be looked for from his wife's death were the possibility of marrying Miss Le Neve and the acquisition of property worth in all perhaps £1,000. Had she remained alive and deserted him, he could have brought Miss Le Neve to live with him at Hilldrop Crescent, as in fact he did two months after the murder; the property which his wife treated as her own would in this case have been lost to him.

It is hard to discover a cogent motive in all this for the crime. Even if we assume that extreme callousness was hidden beneath his pleasant manner—an assumption perhaps difficult to maintain in view of his solicitude for Miss Le Neve and his utterances in the evening of her life (published in Appendices B and C)—we have yet to explain why he exposed himself to such difficulties and dangers as the deed must involve. He ordered the hyoscin which caused Mrs. Crippen's death on January 1; she was last seen alive on February 1, 1910. He had, then, time to weigh the consequences, if, as appears probable, his purpose was already formed at the time when he ordered the poison. We must conclude that the real causes of the tragedy, the emotional sequence, perhaps even the significant facts, have not come to light.

After the tragedy, Crippen displayed coolness, cunning and fortitude.

If [remark Mr. Filson Young] the course of his life were to be marked on a chart one would not see it, as is usual in the case of criminals, turning suddenly at a right angle and continuing in that direction; it would appear as a straight course with one little step aside in the middle of it and then continuing as before. His manner underwent no noticeable change. He told the lies which he thought would serve to account for his wife's disappearance; retracted them when he found them false; and no longer served, and offered another, still plausible explanation. When the darkening cloud of suspicion threatened to break upon him destructively, he fled. During all the harassing incidents of his flight, capture, trial and imprisonment in the condemned cell he remained apparently almost unconcerned, except for the safety of Miss Le Neve, who had accompanied him in his flight. To the last he protested his innocence. Perhaps, by virtue of facts unknown to us, or of some curious mental process, he protested sincerely. We endorse Mr. Filson Young's opinion: "Rightly read and understood, this is an admonishing, sobering and instructive story."

F. W. S.

UNDERNEATH THE BOUGH

From Persian Uplands. By F. Hale. (Constable. 10s. 6d.)

As a clump of wallflowers, rich in generous colour, against the drab of a Dorset stone wall, so is a book on Persia when it has come from the pen of an Englishman who has long taken delight in the good literature of his own country. A new class of traveller—hunter and consul has arisen, taking the place of the broadly-conceived but simple heroes of Kipling, who in their turn replaced the brassy-pawnee exiles of John Company. To-day you will find, now here, now there, the Englishmen of the civilian services abroad still seared with the fire of their Norse ancestry, which compels them to live in far countries, and yet so dowered with poetry in their nature that they can take vivid pleasure in the land of their sorrow. Mr. Hale have we a cunning web of language to tell what they have seen.

Mr. Hale's book is just such a patch of colour. From 1913 to 1919 he was at Birjand or Kermanshah, where he could mark the rise and fall of the Persian temperature during the war. Most of the inhabitants knew nothing of Germany except the name in their world for synthetic indigo, nil-i-almani, and when the crash came their chief feeling was for the loss of their trade in exported carpets, and their hope was that the war would result in the withdrawal of Russia from Persia. It was the German dream to emulate Alexander's deeds by an overland march to India, and their agents scattered largesse with no niggard hand in 1915 throughout Persia. But these agents were without success; the despised British diplomacy countered their every move, captured every piece they had on the board, and "rounded up" the bands of German agitators wherever they raised their heads. Persia would have known little of the war had it not been for the terrible famines which it brought in its train.

One gathers that the educated Persian of Birjand is rather a good fellow, ruddy, black-moustached, jovial, pretty much, in fact, like other educated Persians: ready to take a hand at bridge or listen to a "gramafon"; perhaps a little addicted to opium. Returned from his travels in Europe, Hajji Baba sighs for the appurtenances of civilization which he finds lacking in his country, forgetful of our slums and our monopoly of steam-driven industries. Once he is at home, however, he can boast himself superior to us in one point: few of us have so intelligent an understanding as he of the manufacture of our daily necessities of life. In a Persian town the inhabitant need not go far afield to see for himself how cloth and carpets are woven, how hats are made, how cakes are baked, for he will find these and other trades plied almost at his very door. To him the very breath of life is Politics, of the kind described by Count Smorlott, the word "politic" surprising by himself in this case Social-Revolutionaries, Democrats, Monarchists, Republicans, so that he need lack no occasion for discussion.

Here, there is a different picture. From the beginning of the war made by one who can describe his own times in delicate phrasing and neat speech: he will write delightfully, now of Persian infantrymen and the vagaries of their individual salutes, now of a timorous syce who saw three jinns playing with their own heads, now of his own house of faerie, where the water gurgled under the trees and the nightingale carolled in the moonlight. The book is all too short.
SINN FEIN

THE EVOLUTION OF SINN FEIN. By Robert Mitchell Henry. [Dublin, Talbot Press; London, Fisher Unwin. 5s. net.)

THIS is the latest contribution to a review of Irish revolutionary politics in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, and comes from the pen of an Irish Professor of Classics in the Belfast University. It deals with Irish Nationalism in the nineteenth century, of which there is an introductory sketch, but the bulk of the book is devoted to a history of the Sinn Fein movement. It displays generally the gift of patient research into the details of the newest development of revolutionary Ireland, and in this respect supplies much information from the writings and ideals of the present leaders which must be of considerable value to future historians. It is always a very doubtful point how far contemporary writers can be depended upon to express the true inwards of any political movement, but at all events Professor Henry has done his best to present a plain statement of facts from the point of view of the Sinn Fein party. From the historic point of view the weak point is that the case of England—politically and strategically—is hardly considered at all. What he demonstrates at the outset is the present identity of the Sinn Fein movement with the policy of all former Irish rebels against British ascendancy in the sister island, from Wolfe Tone, Emmet, Davis, Mitchel and Stephens down to Conolly and Griffith. Curiously enough no mention is made of Michael Davitt, who was perhaps too much of an internationalist to be included, though he had certainly been a Fenian in his early days and served a term of penal servitude for his crime.

Over against the downright rebels we get along the same period the Constitutionalists, men who, while accepting the Act of Union by taking their seats at Westminster, nevertheless worked for the revival of Grattan's Parliament, accepting loyalty to the Crown of England. Such were O'Connell, Butt, Parnell, and Redmond, for whom twentieth-century rebels have but little or no admiration. Compared with the revolutionaries of '98, '48, and '65-6, they were "as moonlight unto sunlight and as water unto wine." Parnell would have accepted Home Rule within the Union in his own day but, as he often said in public, only as a first step to national independence. When he made his great tour of the United States he said at Cincinnati on February 23, 1880: "Let us not forget that none of us—who we be in America or in Ireland or wherever we may be—will be satisfied until we have destroyed the last link which keeps Ireland bound to England." To him "the British Empire was an abstraction in which Ireland had no concern, though, like the Gulf Stream, it had a real and preponderating influence on the destinies of Ireland." Professor Henry might have added to his metaphor, that it is a difficult task to deflect the Gulf Stream, however heroic the effort may be.

The nineteenth century was, of course, the period of Home Rule lying very low in the Irish horizon. There was disunion amongst the Nationalists, apathy, falling vigour and vanishing ideals. Professor Henry says the foundation of the Gaelic League in 1893 may be regarded as the turning-point in Irish politics, and declares that it will be recognized in history as the most revolutionary influence that ever came into Ireland. This may be true from an intellectual, moral and spiritual point of view, but as far as language is concerned English travellers seldom hear the Irish language spoken except on the western seaboard.

Here is quite an academic definition of Sinn Fein by Mr. Henry: "Sinn Fein is an expression in political theory and action of the claim of Ireland to be a nation, with all the practical consequences which such a claim involves." He very frankly demonstrates that this was exactly the same as John Mitchell's theory and shows by an interesting quotation from that staunch Ulster rebel how he propounded the theory would be put into action.

"A plan," [said John Mitchell], "for the repeal of the Union must show (for one way) how a Parliamentary campaign conducted honestly and boldly might bring the state of business in Parliament to such a position that repeal would be the only solution; for another way, how systematic opposition to, and contempt of, law might be carried out through a thousand details, so as virtually to supersede English domination here and to make the mere repealing statute an inanimate formality (this I may observe is the way); and for a third way, how in the event of a European war a strong National party in Ireland could grasp the occasion to do the work instantly..." It would also show, how, and to what extent, all these methods could be combined.

In this one passage Mitchell sketched successively the Parnell policy, the Sinn Fein policy, and the Easter Rising policy of 1916.

The interesting fact is made clear by Professor Henry that Sinn Fein in its early years believed in constitutional action with a practical policy not unlike that of Thomas Davis in 1843. It was not until 1905 that it existed as a political organization, though Mr. Griffith had been since 1899 running a weekly paper with marked ability, called, after Mitchell's organ, the United Irishman. It became the organ of Sinn Fein and was frequently suppressed. Though the paper did not advocate at first armed revolution, it opened its columns to those who did. Its policy was the re-establishment of Grattan's Parliament as in 1782, and not the establishment of an Irish Republic. Everything turned upon the inculcation of the doctrine of self-reliant nationalism—"Sinn Fein"—as the sooner or later goal of the republican movement. The old Parliamentary party from the beginning was bitterly attacked and charged with futility. It was compared contemptuously with hot memories of the hatred of the old rebels, who desired vengeance on the "foreigner." No opportunity meanwhile was lost in attacking the Imperial policy of England. Professor Henry especially notes the case of the South African War and the Burmese question.

Between 1906-8 the spread of Sinn Fein principles was considerable and the movement grew bolder. A Nationalist M.P. became a convert, retired and stood again as a Sinn Feiner, but polled less than a third of the votes. This was a bad setback to Republican politicians. One Davitt's paper was then set forth to capture all the local authorities, as was long ago suggested in 1879 by Davitt and Devoy. It met no response. The old Nationalists, with the support of the Catholic hierarchy and the Dublin Nationalist press, were too strong for Sinn Fein. The quarrel only grew bitter. The last strongly objected to the subservience of Mr. Redmond to the Liberal party in 1910, and would have none of the Liberal Home Rule programme. Still from 1910 to 1913 the Sinn Fein movement, according to Professor Henry, was "practically moribund."

Now came a sudden change in the situation. Fresh forces in Ireland had come to life in the shape of the Irish Republican Brotherhood, announced by James Larkin and his paper the Workers' Republic, run on the lines of Karl Marx' anti-capitalist writings. Another Labour organ called Irish Freedom joined in the fray. In these papers the definitely Republican movement found an underground channel of expression in 1910-11. Its object was to rehabilitate and re-establish Sinn Fein on Separatist lines. The opportunity came on the introduction of the Home Rule Bill of 1914. It was here that the Republican party antagonized Sinn Fein. The latter had in 1912 resolved unanimously that if the Bill was a satisfactory measure of reform it should be accepted. If, however, it was rejected as unsatisfactory by the Irish people, the organization was prepared to lead the country by other and effective methods to the attainment of self-government. This latter loophole led to the ultimate fusion of the Republican party with Sinn Fein. The portent of the Ulster
Volunteer movement appeared, and exacerbated the whole situation. What Ulster did the new Irish alliance could do also. The South imitated the North, and the heather was set on fire in earnest. Both the Republicans and Sinn Fein were well aware that Home Rule meant a setback to their programmes. They seized the opportunity, and when the Bill was passed they denounced the Nationalists for having betrayed their country, and started the Irish Volunteers, with whom were brigaded the Citizen Army of the Labour and Socialist party. Very many followers of the old Nationalist party now enlisted under the Sinn Fein banner, and the results are apparent to-day in the collapse of the old Parliamentary party led for so long by Parnell and Redmond. Such is briefly the story of the evolution of Sinn Fein, the old story of the cuckoo in the nest of the hedgesparrow.

It is unnecessary to follow Professor Henry through the domestic intricacies of Irish politics throughout the war. They remind us of the thrills of a cinema play. But between 1916 and 1918 there was an extraordinary resurrection of republican fervour and sympathy. The Convention had failed. The Conscription policy of the War Office for Ireland had fired a new mine of opposition. Mr. Redmond’s stand of leadership was discontinued throughout Ireland. The propaganda of Sinn Fein went on in spite of martial law, and at the General Election the defeat of the Nationalist party was complete. Since then the situation has gone from bad to worse. As in the days of Ribbonism and the Land League, the campaign of terrorism and assassination holds the field. What next? The League of Nations refused to interfere and declare Ireland independent. Has Sinn Fein the means at its disposal to accomplish its object? The answer of Professor Henry is contained in the last paragraph of his book. It is:

No. To induce England to acknowledge the independence of Ireland is no solution. The independence acknowledged in 1783 was repealed in 1800, and has been denied ever since. To induce the League of Nations as at present constituted to acknowledge the independence of Ireland is out of the question. The means at the disposal of Sinn Fein at present hardly seem adequate to accomplish its object. It may bring about the moral and intellectual independence of Ireland: it may secure a certain measure of economic independence, but to secure political independence in face of the forces opposed against it seems impossible.

It is not our business to argue this point. But the outlook is menacing in the extreme. There is a moderate party in Ireland, but it is dumb and without leadership. What is wanted is a new Nationalist party and a new Nationalist leader who can rally sane and sensible Irishmen to a sane and sensible compromise. Is this possible for a race that hates compromise and despises discretion?

P. B.

GOOD SENSE AND "RECORDS"

CRICKET REMINISCENCES. By P. F. Warner. (Grant Richards. 15s. net.)

A RAGE for "records" and personal trivialities has invaded sport of late years. It is encouraged by too many journalists who do not appear to realize that the fine points of English games are known to a vast multitude of Englishmen, and are of greater interest than X’s hundredth wicket, or Y’s thirteenth goal this season, which is more than he got in the same number of months six years since. A high score may not be the most useful score for the side, or represent the best cricket of the day. All-round merit and keenness often deserve more praise than the blazings of some "star." The megalomania which induces a captain to put on a bowler who is not wanted, just to give him a chance to secure a hundred wickets, does no good to the game. We expect an expert chronicler to write about the game as an expert, to add to our knowledge by the fruits of his closer observation, instead of retailing nicknames, or other personal talk which has as much to do with cricket as the loud voice of some M.P. has to do with politics. Mr. Warner, an accomplished bat and captain, here reprints journalism, and goes back to history beyond his own observation. At his best his remarks are just what we want, but he repeats himself, and has descended to trivialities which do not interest us. What is the use of filling half a page with the names of Oriel men who have secured cricket blues?

Mr. Warner hit on a "stunt" which was a success when he started the idea of best possible teams of various kinds selected out of the many cricketers of the past and present. The idea is attractive, because there is no finality about any solution. Cricketers, except W.G., seldom last long enough to have a near view of more than one generation of players, and the vast improvement of modern pitches has to be counted in favour of the batsman. At present there is, as Mr. Warner remarks, a dearth of fast bowling, for which a player has to keep himself in first-rate training. A fast bowler, as a rule, lasts but for a few years. Is the long run up to the wicket really necessary? It has been exaggerated of late; it was the way of Richardson, but not of WG.

Mr. Warner criticizes justly the stupidity of the public which does not see the merit of defensive play. It has to be noticed, however, that some players are not so keen as they might be, and that there have been evident cases in the past of games prolonged for the sake of gate-money. These things make the sporting public impatient and suspicious, and it is possible that they do not know the points of the game so well as their fathers, being immersed in the love of "records." The remedy lies in the hands of experts like Mr. Warner, who have a public ready to read them, and should write on the game itself instead of compiling lists of past and present achievements. The natural writing of an expert is preferable to the popular tricks of journalism. What are the modern ideas of placing the field, and are they justified? This is the kind of inquiry which suggests itself to lovers of the game, who do not care a doit whether so-and-so was the first man to begin both batting and bowling for England.

Many English enthusiasts will regret the death of Victor Trumper in 1915, which passed almost unnoticed in the tumult of war. At his best he was not surpassed as a batsman, and we welcome Mr. Warner’s tribute. He might have added that Trumper’s ease and grace were developed by practice, for in his first long innings at Lord’s he played stiffly, though soundly. When he was at the height of his powers, no one could make good bowling look sillier. Half an hour of Trumper was better than many a mammoth score by steady and lucky batsmen.

REPROACH

Your grieving moonlight face looks down
Through the forest of my fears,
Crowned with a spiny bramble-crown,
Dew-dropped with evening tears.
Why do you spell "untrue, unkind," Reproachful eyes plaguing my sleep?
I am not guilty in my mind
Of aught would make you weep.
Untrue? but how, what broken oath?
Unkind? I know not even your name.
Unkind, untrue, you charge me both,
Scalding my heart with shame.
The black trees shudder, dropping snow,
The stars tumble and spin.
Speak, speak, or how may a child know
His ancestral sin?

ROBERT GRAVES.
THE HISTORICAL METHOD

RECENT DEVELOPMENTS IN EUROPEAN THOUGHT. Essays arranged and edited by F. S. Marvin. (Milford. 12s. 6d. net.)

The wide historical survey, the survey in four dimensions, presenting simultaneously the march in time and the distribution in space, makes the most seductive of all reading. The subject of the history is of no great moment: it is enough that our passion to comprehend be gratified, that every item of the subject-matter be fitted into its place in a scheme, that we are enabled to look before and after. But it is to be remarked that the delightful feeling of comprehension afforded by the historical survey is not quite the same as that afforded by, say, mastering Einstein’s theory or following one of Capablanca’s games of chess. In reading history we are not, like the same extent, detached observers. For in reading history we are constantly aware of one indisputable fact which is a constant source of satisfaction.

That fact is that we are the last product of time. The historian may make us abashed for our morals, uneasy about our intelligence, but nothing can alter the fact that the whole tremendous process he describes has so far culminated in us. Hegel has been laughed at for tracing all things from chaos to their embodiment in the Prussian State. But does not every historian who brings his narrative up to date do the same thing? Even if our activities are represented as a mere “reaction,” or even as a “decline,” it remains true that we are the last point on the curve. Of course, our satisfaction must be illegitimate.
It cannot be true that we are superior to the whole of the rest of creation merely because we are the last thing produced. Perhaps historians have a tendency to link up things a little too much; perhaps there has been no great process and we are just one of the confused happenings of the world. This extremely sceptical thought, on which we do not insist, has been occasioned by the glowing optimism, the marked “onward and upward” note of this collection of essays. Such unity as the volume has is a unity in hopefulness. In his introductory “General Survey” the editor sets the key in the words: “Soul-making—the practice and the theory—has become more and more clearly and consciously the object of human thought and action.” The effect of the whole book is to reinforce that statement.

When we listen to the individual voices, however, and are no longer carried away by the general exhilaration of the chorus, we become less confident about the meaning of the words. Professor A. E. Taylor, for instance, traces for us the course of those two streams, science and philosophy, and shows us that they are about to unite and flow in one bed. This appears to be the necessary result of the mathematical theory of infinite series and the absolute and unconditional nature of the moral law.
But on achieving this union we find that another junction is now effected, this time with theology. The triple stream leads us in the end to: “a theoretic interpretation of life, that it is in the living God Who is over all, blessed for ever, that it will find the common source of fact and value.”
The way in which modern treatises on arithmetic conspire to this end is by disproving the Kantian doctrine that sensor-data are a necessary constituent of scientific knowledge.
We suppose that by science Professor Taylor here means logic. He cannot mean that sense-data are not a necessary part of Physics, Chemistry, Biology and the rest of the sciences. We mention this because Professor Taylor goes on to say: “And with this dogma falls the main ground for the denial that knowledge about the soul and God is attainable.” We do not know to what denial he refers: its author would seem, in any case, to be a rash man. But the transition from this to the assumption that such knowledge has been obtained depends on the kind of knowledge that is claimed. If it is communicable and verifiable knowledge it may be scientific, but not otherwise.

It will be seen that the effect of Professor Taylor’s essay will depend upon the philosophical views of the reader.
The arguments by which he supports his exposition will certainly not convince those who do not already agree with him, and in consequence his attractive picture of growing unity will inspire but a limited number of readers.

Professor Herford’s essay on European Poetry also induces a feeling of uneasiness, but of a different kind.
In the first place we must admit that he is skilled in that delightful accomplishment of the historian—we see our present activities as the more or less logical result of a long and extended process. One literary “school after another rises before our eyes; we are shown the connecting links—sometimes a development, sometimes a reaction, and sometimes, most delightful of all, a merging of two or more schools into a larger unity. As we follow this simous movement and abandon ourselves to its increasing momentum, the whole subject becomes, in a curious way, abstract and, still more curiously, magnificent. The function of poetry becomes subtly altered until, in our excitement, we ask for more and more poets, more and more schools—just to keep the ball rolling. We are annoyed at missed opportunities for forming schools. “Surely an amalgamation was possible there,” we mutter petulantly, or, “Did no one see that splendid opportunity for a reaction?”

It is when we arrive at our own time that we begin to suspect a vice in the method. We are shocked, this time, to realize that the whole epic culminates in us—to be precise, in us. The culmination must be logical, so far as we can make out. Somehow our modern war-poetry contains within itself all those past developments and reactions, as the human embryo somehow contains within itself the dogs and fishes and what-not that preceded it.
When we realized this the spell of the historian was loosed; we came back to our forgotten division of poetry into good and bad, and saw that it has no necessary connection with the historian’s division into earlier and later. But there is no question that Professor Herford makes the method exciting.

The most exciting essay in the book, however, is that by Mr. Gooch on Historical Research. Compared with his description of the thrilling advances in the knowledge of ancient Egypt, Assyria, Babylonia, Greece, Rome, our impending discovery of the Hittite language and history, the tremendous achievements of the German historians, their incredible learning, their vast industry, the modern ramifications of history, histories of ideas, of economics, of everything under the sun—compared with this Professor Bragg’s account of atomic theories, although he does mention Einstein and hint at Quanta Theory, seems bloodless and inhuman, while Professor Doncaster on Biology—one long confession that we know much less than we expected to know by this time—seems positively pessimistic. It is Mr. Gooch and Professor Doncaster, both of whom have given us a glimpse of the future, who are the main exponents of the historical method.
Our satisfaction is legitimate: we are not the youngest child of creation for nothing because, so far as we can tell, our learning has never before been equalled.
We are the youngest, and we have most to learn. Earlier generations exist to provide material. That is why the essays in this volume which describe the march of human knowledge culminate rightly in this present age. It is a genuine culmination. But in matters like poetry and music—on which Dr. Walker has written an excellent essay—our position in time, so important to the historian, affords no presumption for a judgment of value. In knowledge of fact, even in a creative activity, such as science, which depends so much on knowledge of fact, we may fully absorb the acquisitions of our predecessors.
The whole of post achievement, in this domain, is
THE ATHENÆUM

Mr. Herbert Fisher's Essays

Studies in History and Politics. By the Right Hon. Herbert Fisher. (Oxford, Clarendon Press. 12s. 6d. net.)

The engulfment of Mr. Herbert Fisher in politics has been a serious loss to literature. These lectures and essays of his show such a wide range of reading, such a mitis sapientia, that many will regret that he should be tied to the Treasury bench when he might be exploring the Romantic Movement, or giving us the first adequate History of England between the Irish Union and the Vienna Congress, or even the Act of Reform. They are, however, in the nature of what Max Müller used to call "chips," and as such calculated to perplex a reviewer, unless he hops like a starrler from one of Mr. Fisher's stultities to another. Let us start, therefore, with discarding Amiens, remarking merely that the essayist leaves him pretty much where Gibbon found him, and some thoughts on "Imperial Administration," with the comment that they should be much to the taste of his colleague Mr. Montagu. Lord Acton? Well, Lord Acton is an authority on the French Revolution, and so he will serve our purpose. For the connecting link in Mr. Fisher's volume is to be found in France—in France "famed" it may be, as Matthew Arnold says, in all great arts, in none supreme, but dynamically the most potent factor in the story of the modern world.

The criticism of Rousseau fills many shelves, but then he is at once the most delightful and the most exasperating of writers. Lord Morley has lectured Jean-Jacques for his inconsistencies, and Mr. Fisher follows suit, though in a gentler spirit. What is to be done with a man who belches private property in one place and conceals it uncommonly near collectivism in another? who told the Corsicans to find salvation in peasant farming, without currency or commerce, and the Poles to remain true to their elective monarchy, their liberum veto, and the other eccentricities of their constitution? The best way to treat Rousseau is to disregard him as a political philosopher, and to accept him as a prophet who foresaw many things, including the equality of man under the law. "Tous veulent que les conditions soient égales pour tous, et la justice n'est que cette égalité." Lord Acton took exception to this doctrine, because, as translated into practice by the Constituent Assembly, it was accompanied by the idea of liberty. "Having put the nation in place of the Crown," he wrote, "they invested it with the same unlicensed power, raising no security and no remedy against oppression from below, assuming or believing that a government truly representing the people could do no wrong." It is difficult, however, to decide what exactly Lord Acton meant by liberty, since while his Liberalism pulled him one way, his Catholicism dragged him the opposite. A thinker who regarded the Reformation as reactionary, and found consolation in the mediaval dualism between Church and Empire, certainly reversed all current conceptions of progress. The Revolution at least gave France free institutions, and safeguarded personal and real property, even if it was none too compliant to corporate bodies. But it could be fairly argued that they had become abuses.

This system, as codified by Napoleon, extended itself over the face of Europe. As Mr. Fisher reminds us in one of his happiest essays, it penetrated to distant Illyria, where under the rigid rule of Marmont a State was established which anticipated, though with differences, the Jugo-Slavs of to-day. Everywhere feudal dues disappeared; trade-guilds were abolished, not altogether to the advantage of labour, and civil marriage proclaimed the divorce of the State from the Church. The great plan was imposed with rigour, particularly on Belgium, where, however, as the memoirs of Dumouriez point out, Danton had acted on the principle, Sois mon frère ou je te tue, before Napoleon had arrived. Much of it went by the board after his fall, but its principles germinated, and when united Italy came into being, it was on the Napoleonic model. But the most remarkable instance of French influence is to be found in the resurrections of Prussia after the crushing disaster of Jena. German historians have laboured to prove that Stein was an original reformer, and there is some force in their contention that similar grievances must demand similar remedies. But Hardenberg, at any rate, was an avowed copyist, only, being a pliant creature, he allowed the nobility to mangle his scheme for the emancipation of the peasants, probably without much regret. His bureaucracy was purely Napoleonic, and in conjunction with the military teaching of Clausewitz, it became the instrument of the absolutist State.

Napoleon was non-moral, imposing reforms on the Rhenish Provinces and Belgium, not for their benefit but his own. His nephew, though a man of much larger humanity, inherited that lust for conquest which inspired the Emperor's every thought. There can be no doubt that Napoleon III. set himself from first to last to undo the consequences of the Vienna Congress, and that his hankerings after the Rhine frontier took a desperate turn when the collapse of Austria, at Sadowa, brought home to him the fact that he could not hope to acquire it as mediator between two exhausted combatants. Mr. Fisher illustrates his visionary yet crafty character with much skill, taking as his text that buoyant apology for failure, the memoirs of the late M. Emile Ollivier. The process clearly throughout the dupes of the Emperor, who kept him in the dark as to his actual policy, a delusive one, as it turned out—the draft treaty of an offensive and defensive alliance between France, Austria and Italy—and allowed the bellicose Duc de Gramont to steal marches on his colleague at every turn of the negotiations with Prussia. Bismarck's Ems telegram shrinks into a very small scrap of paper under Mr. Fisher's serene eye. It brought matters to a head, but the causa causans came rather from Paris than Berlin.

The degeneracy of Germany and the regeneration of France can be studied from their literary side in Mr. Fisher's pages. In the Fatherland we get the historians for most of them, preaching the doctrine that a powerful State was an end in itself, before which all other considerations must give way, and war one of the just means to that end. There were, indeed, exceptions; and Mr. Fisher might have put in a good word for Ihne, Curtius and even Gregorovius, who wrote as scholars, not as pamphleteers, though the last descended with undue vigour on political Hamlets like Rienzi. In France, on the other hand, Paul Déroulède told his countrymen to take heart in accents that were somewhat raucous, while after him came M. Maurice Barrès, preaching a patriotism of a less aggressive brand. But the influence of pure literature on national upsurplings can be easily exaggerated. M. Barrès has been a power in modern France because he has represented a Church which has borne with supreme dignity an enforced impoverishment.

L.L.S.
BUTTERFLIES

The Black Curtain. By Douglas Goldring. (Chapman & Hall. 7s. 6d. net.)

If we may know an author by the books he writes we should not hesitate in saying that Mr. Douglas Goldring’s hobby, enthusiasm and passion is collecting superficialities. He is revealed in “The Black Curtain” as an ardent and highly successful hunter. For there are displayed in its pages not only all the “common” ones—particularly large, fine specimens in an excellent state of preservation—but a complete set of those superficial opinions and ideas which enjoyed a brief flutter in the art circles of London between the years 1913 and 1920. These are the cream of the collection and although we remember seeing them in a cloud over Chelsea, over Bloomsbury, over Soho, it does not lessen our astonishment that the author should have captured them so successfully, pinned them down, made of them such a great, brave show. His characters are compact of them.

Here is the Russian revolutionary, with the blue eyes of a child and the short black beard of a fanatic, crushing strength, crushing sweetness out of his violin, talking of the earth as “my mother’s breast,” crying the stranger “friend,” appearing and disappearing in the Russian way we have learned to accept, making the discovery—and announcing it—that human beings are like sheep, their true leaders the shepherds and their enemies may be compared to wolves, and plucking out of the air at the appropriate moment that steaming glass of tea with a slice of lemon floating in it. It says much for the superficiality of the hero, Philip Kane, writer, cosmopolitan, a little weary of Barcelona and Madrid, Vienna and Paris, that he should be at first glance entirely overwhelmed by Ivan Smirnoff. Years of foreign travel, loneliness, wrestling with and overcoming “inward dissatisfactions,” and the development of “that rich inner life in which alone there was peace” had left him unprepared for the encounter. They might have met in the Oxford train rather than the funicular from Tibidabo ... Is it not strange that a “citizen of the world” who was, he felt, equipped at all points for the battle to preserve freedom against the world’s encroachments, who believed in the ideal of human brotherhood, who was “rid of many early prejudices,” should on the occasion of that meeting with Smirnoff “first, dimly, realize that the common people who worked with hand and brain were not quite so contented as, to the careless eye, they looked”? But Mr. Goldring is very tender to his hero and does not seem to find it strange at all; he leads him out of the wilderness, via Paris, into the heart of London. The time has come, we are given to understand, when Philip Kane must lie. “He was filled with the impatience of the trained athlete eager to put to the test.” ... Anne Drummond, her bobbed head bent over two boxes with the word “Fuller’s” printed on them, is the first human being he meets among the tiresome would-be Bohemians. When the absurd pictures are handed round she looks up with a grin and says she likes peppermint creams best. But at heart she is a Socialist, an internationalist, a scarlet revolutionary, desperately sincere, spontaneous, “with a hint of fresh sexuality,” longing to live for the people, to dedicate her life to the Cause, to go to the Venetian Ball, to smoke cigarettes. No wonder he finds her a “joyous enigma.”

Holy matrimony and the toddling feet of a bevy of little strangers? Heaven forbid. The snare was too obvious.

And so they love and are happy, except for those intervals when Philip ponders over the idea of “that monstrous figure round which the London pleasure-manics revolved ... that invisible altar on which they were pouring their libations of dry Monopole. When would the great idol become thirsty again for a salt and crimson wine?” This, bien entendu, is the cue for the Great War, and he stalks on while Philip calls him “humbug” and points the finger of scorn at indifferent England. But Anne is tossed to the monster, and the end of it all finds Smirnoff and our hero contemplating the “red Dawn—cold, terrible, relentless, but bearing with it the promise of the new day.” If the reader shuts his eyes at this point he will have no trouble in imagining the last superficiality. “Come, my friend,” said Smirnoff ... “Let us rest now, for we must work.”

K. M.

A PLEA FOR THE SEVUAGINT

A Handbook to the Septuagint. By Richard R. Ottley. (Methuen. 8s. net.)

Dr. Hitzig, of Heidelberg, the Old Testament scholar of last century, is said to have begun his class by addressing his students thus: “Gentlemen, have you a Septuagint? If not, sell whatever you have, and buy a Septuagint.” Mr. Ottley presents for a similar audience in this country the most ancient Greek version of the Old Testament. Indeed, English students ought to carry on the good tradition which Cambridge has done so much to establish among us. Oxford has given us the Concordance of Hatch and Redpath, but it is Cambridge which is producing a critical edition of the text. This is in full swing, and by Dr. O’Connor’s “Introduction” is a standard work. When Mr. Thackeray finishes his Grammar—and we hope he will out-distance Helbing—there will be no excuse for the English student or scholar undervaluing the Septuagint. Meanwhile, especially in days when Greek is struggling for its existence in academic circles, we welcome every competent reminder of the paramount importance of the Old Testament scholar. To quote Mr. Ottley’s own words:

The text available is so much improved that it may be hoped that the Septuagint is coming to its own, not only as a hunting-ground for specialists, but as a source of profit and interest to ordinary Biblical students. It may now be comfortably read by all Hellenists, and need no longer be a sealed book to that interesting but rare person the general reader.

The profit and interest are varied. In point of style and literary distinction the Septuagint ranges from third-class to first-class, and even its highest reaches, which are few, never attain the level of the Vulgate, for example, in the book of Psalms. So far as insight into the original text is concerned, the witness of the Septuagint is not quite as vital as it was once supposed by some critics to be. But its evidence is in constant need of being consulted. Mr. Ottley’s conclusion is “that here and there the LXX. may represent, or may give help towards recovering, a better text than the M.T. [i.e. the Massoretic Hebrew text]; but in the majority of passages the M.T. holds its own.” This is moderate, and on the whole the verdict is not unjustified. Historically the Septuagint has claims to special interest, for the New Testament writers as a rule used it as we do, or did, the Authorized Version, for dogmatic purposes. Even a later Father of the Church, like Hilary of Poitiers, preferred it to the Hebrew original. Its use by Christians, with its consequent use by the Jews, naturally tended to affect its text, and this is one of the intricate problems of Septuagintal study. How far is our present text of the Septuagint interpolated or adapted by Christian editors? To what extent does it represent the original text of the translators? On these and other points Mr. Ottley writes with excellent good sense. He has produced a text-book which is less technical than Professor Swete’s, but which has a place and function of its own. Part of his work is historical, part is textual; and practical hints are added for the benefit of the beginner, who might be bewildered if we were set down to Dr. Swete’s standard treatise. It would be a pity if the editors of the Septuagint had not taken greater attention from this monument of Hellenistic Greek in ancient religious literature. Mr. Ottley shows reason why they should not, and he has done his best to interest men with a minimum of Greek in the Greek Old Testament, as a translation which in one sense is a creative literary effort.
MARGINALIA

To read through the old Athenæums of ninety years ago is to discover that ours is not the only age in which the proportion of bad books to good ones has been overwhelmingly high. In only one respect had the reviewer of 1830 any advantage over his descendant of 1920: there were fewer books. The ratio of bad to good has remained, I should imagine, fairly constant; but where the reviewer of ninety years ago calculated in hundreds we have to think more imperially in terms of thousands and tens of thousands. But even with the comparatively tiny output of those days the literary journalist of 1830 had his fair share of nonsense to wade through. Looking through the old files of The Athenæum, one is astonished at the dismal quality, the depressing quantity of the bad books.

It was, therefore, with a thrill of pleased recognition that I came upon the name of William Godwin. "Cloudesley: a Tale," by the author of "Caleb Williams," was one of the features of the spring list of 1830. The Athenæum greeted the book with a hearty enthusiasm. Godwin in principle and theoretically it admired and respected. He was very nearly a great man. He was a historical figure, a link with the noble past, and through "Political Justice" might have come, in the course of mellowing years, to look a little comic, its author could at least write a fine pure English style.

The announcement of a new novel by so distinguished a writer as Mr. Godwin [says the reviewer] was welcomed with more indifference than we looked for by the reading world. To us it gave great pleasures of expectation, and we even hoped that the vigour of thought and style which makes "St. Leon" and "Caleb Williams" so delightful, might to some degree reclaim the public taste from those foolish idolatries that now degrade it, when a host of gentlemen, with no materials save fustian and the Court Guide, undertake to teach the mob how the great live and the wise talk in fashionable and political novels. We remember the breathless interest with which we first hung over Mr. Godwin's pages; the harrowing pathos with which he told the sufferings of the humblest and least attractive characters, the Auschotchian power with which he painted some wretched man struggling against irresistible necessity, condemned, though innocent, to all the pains of guilt, and above all the fervid eloquence that cast a burning splendour around these magnificent conceptions.

Godwin in principle, then, was admirable, and his novel might give the intemperate "pleasures of expectation." But when it came to reading "Cloudesley"... alas! the reviewer, being an honest man, has to admit that it is an atrocious novel. I have never read "Cloudesley"; nor, unless the secret of indefinitely prolonging human life is discovered within the next few years, do I propose to waste an hour of my brief existence in such a profitless occupation. "St. Leon," which so much delighted the reviewer of 1830, is one of the books I have tried to read, miserably failing in the attempt. But "Caleb Williams" I have read, and read with pleasure, though not perhaps with all the transports of the reviewer of 1830. Godwin's total inability to draw a character, the impotence of his imagination to comprehend and enter into the chaos of human life—these were defects that made it impossible for him to be a good novelist. But he made up to some extent for these defects by the intensity of his political convictions. "Caleb Williams" is a dramatized essay on the evils of the tyranny of one class over another. "Cloudesley" is a tragic poem. "Cloudesley" was written by Thomas, when he sees Caleb Williams chained up like a wild beast in the county goal. "They told me what a fine thing it was to be an Englishman, and about liberty and property and all that there; and I find it is all a flaxm." The intensity with which Godwin believed that social life was "all a flaxm," his passion to show up "Things as they are" (the sub-title of his book), carried him on to triumph. It is the warmth of this intellectual fire that makes the book still readable.

In 1830, when "Cloudesley" made its appearance, Godwin was a totally extinct volcano. Forty years before he had been a prophet, a voice, the inspiration of noble spirits; now he was just a harmless and cheerful old gentleman. There are few fates more melancholy and at the same time more absurd than that of the once famous man who lives on to see his ashes carried to the Pantheon and there duly buried and forgotten. Godwin's case reminds one of that even more remarkable example of a man who outlived a generation the death of his early fame. Philip James Bailey published his "Festus" in 1839, when he was twenty-three years of age; he died in 1909.

Bailey had many of the attributes of greatness, not least among which was his appearance. His bust, taken in 1846, shows us a young man with a more than Shakespearean brow, wide, high and precipitous, large rapt eyes, a mouth set obstinately firm and a mass of hysterical hair. (One of the causes, by the way, of the apparent lack, at the present time, of great men lies in the poverty of the contemporary male coiffure. Rich in whiskers, beards and lionine manes, the great Victorians never failed to look the part; nowadays it is impossible to know a great man when you see one.) Besides the grand appearance, Bailey possessed the grand outlook and the heroic energy of greatness. He was at home in interstellar space, he was familiar with angels and devils; he had spacious views about Man and Destiny, he was not afraid of being didactic;

(Where true philosophy presides Pleasure it is to teach him) he remarks with a rather pleasing ingenuousness) and he was not afraid of length. But there was something not quite right about his imagination. Transmuted into verse, his grand ideas and his energy became highly coloured fustian. At its best this fustian was very good fustian. There are great gaudy similes and purple passages which, in certain moods, are a pleasure to read. One enjoys, every now and then, to hear of liquescent plains
Of ever seething flame, where sink and rise Alp-beats of fire, vast, vagrant.

At the same time one can easily have too much of this kind of thing. In tenderer, and more lyrical moments Bailey could display a lucidous facility that makes Moore seem exquisitely refined. Here is one of his songs:
I dreamed of thee, love, in the morn,
And a poet's bright dreamings drew nigh:
I woke, and I laughed them to scorn;
They were black by the blink of thine eye.
I dreamed of thee, love, in the day,
And I wept as I slept o'er thy charms:
I awoke as my dreams went away,
And my tears were all wet on my arms.

It makes one blush to commit such lines, even at second-hand, to paper.

"Festus" was received with transports by the public of 1839. (The Athenæum raised almost the only inharmonious voice in the general chorus of praise: "The idea is a mere plagiarism of 'Faust' with all its impiety and scarcely any of its poetry.") People might still look at the work if Bailey had been content to leave it as it originally appeared. But no, in the course of a long and leisureed life he set himself to make a hundred Miltonic lines grow where only one grew before, so that, when the jubilee edition was published in 1889, "Festus" was a work of forty thousand lines. Thenceforward it was in vain that Bailey adjured humanity in his Envoi:

Read this, world! He who writes is dead to thee,
But still lives in these leaves. He spake inspired:
Night or day, thought came unhelped and undesired
Like blood to thy heart. The course of study he Went through was of the soul-rack. The degree
He took was high.

Autolycus.
SCOTTISH DIALECT IN EARLY ENGLISH LITERATURE

FROM the English standpoint, long before the union of the crowns in 1603, the Scottish language was regarded as a dialect of English, the Northern dialect—distinguished by certain forms of phrase, pronunciation and grammar from the other dialects, the Midlands and the South—earliest case in point. We may say that respect in English literature is to be found in the "Canterbury Tales" of Chaucer, who made the East Midland (already the language of the Court) the literary and ultimately the national or standard language of England. In one of these tales, the Reeve figures as a Scottish student, resident at Soler Hall, Cambridge (or Granta-bridge); and the gist of the tale is their series of adventures at Trumpington Mill in the neighbourhood of that ancient collegiate seat of learning. Their names, appropriate to the North Country, are John and Allan; and both belong to Strother (probably Anstruther, in the east of Fife), described by Chaucer as "far in the north, I can't say exactly where." They swear by St. Cuthbert, a Northern saint; and their general characterization is as evidently from the life as their use of the Northern dialect is perfect. When the Miller asks them what they are doing at the mill instead of the steward, they say: "Nee, hee, we have nae need for him; we are wi' our corn, and I'll see yer at the mill. "Nae, I'll see yer at the mill." And they add, "I'll slow, e, I'll certain the corn, "to the miller, who says, "Well, I'll be med."* (i.e., We have no choice: it behoves him that has no servant to serve himself); and explain that the steward is laid up with toothache—"Sae wrikers aye the wanges in his heid; an' therefo' is I come with Allan " (says John) "to grind our corn, and carry it hame again." Oustensibly to satisfy their curiosity in the working of a mill, but really to prevent the miller from thieving, they take up their position in the mill with a simplicity of cunning which does not deceive the miller. "I'll stand by the happener," says John, "an' see how the corn gies in: yet I never anything like the way the happeners ways tills an' fra! And I'll be benenith," says Allan, "an' see how the meal fa's down into the troic; that sal be my disport—for, John, I'll see yer at the mill. As it is so clear and large a place, I am as ill a miller as are ye!" The miller, however, was their match. He unbond their horse, which they had fastened to a tree at the back of the mill, and while they went off in pursuit of the runaway, he helped himself to a half of the College meal, filling up the sack with bran to the same amount. John was the first to discover that the horse was missing, and raised the alarm. "Haro!" he shouted; "our horse is lost! Allan, for gideon! step on your feet! Come out, man, a' at ance! Our warden has lost his pony!"

Whil's wae is he gone?" cried Allan, making his prompt appearance. At last they despaired him at the far end of the brog around the mill, enjoying himself with his horses there at pasture. They prepared to capture him by divesting themselves of all encumbrances. "He'll no' escape us baith!" says John; "but why did ye no' pit the capl i' the lathe? Ye were a fule no' to pit the capl i' the lathe!"

*"Captive" is a more literal rendering of a term used in the Genesis of the Scottish dialect. The word means a prisoner, or a man who is held in the esteem of another. It is a word that is used in the Scottish dialect to describe a person who is held in high esteem or respect.

Captive, meaning a horse, is still in occasional use on Ochil farms: I incline to connect it with the Latin "caballus.""I'captive," meaning a shed, or barn, or byre, is now obsolete in current speech, though it survives in many a place-name all over Scotland—Lethangie, Lathro, Loldiack, Lathrisk, etc.

But to return to the two scholars. It was a busy day to catch the horse, and all ran about, the miller and mill-boy and the children; and, to the miller, they shouted: "Kep, keep!" they cried to each other. They met again and again to consult. (Gae wlochly i.e. quietly thou,) says John, now quite exhausted, and I sal kep him here." The miller stood at the mill-door and saw! the children, and enfew! the recent, and tofind him with the children; and," says they, "now not so easily." The miller was right; it was nightfall, and indeed quite dark, when in a ditch they caught him at the last.

Elsewhere in the tale they quote a North Country proverb:

Man sal tak o' twa things.

Slyk as he finds or slyk as he brings.

Slyk is, of course, so—such-like. They also speak of having "siller for to spend," and call a wonderful thing a "ferly," and a sound sleeper a "draft-seck."
Science

THE NATURE OF INFERENCE

IMPLICATION AND LINEAR INFERENCE. By Bernard Bosanquet. (Macmillan. 7s. 6d. net.)

THE analysis of inference is a matter which has been dealt with very copiously by philosophers, and yet has made but little advance towards a solution. The reason of the small progress that has been made is chiefly that various different questions have been confounded, and the solution of each rendered impossible by the influence of the others. "Inference," says Dr. Bosanquet, "includes prima facie every operation by which knowledge extends itself. When, by reason of one or more things that you know, you believe yourself to have arrived at the knowledge of something further, you claim to have effected an inference." There is nothing that can be objected to in this definition. At the same time a little consideration shows how many quite diverse problems are raised by it. It will be seen, in the first place, that the definition only allows the name of inference to operations which give knowledge, that is to say, to valid inferences from true premisses, and the question of truth and validity is therefore involved. In the second place, the phrase "by reason of" is capable of various meanings: it may mean psychological causation merely, or it may mean something which appears to the person making the inference to be a transition according to the laws of logic, or it may mean something which actually is according to the laws of logic. We are thus forced to ask ourselves two kinds of questions, the one kind psychological, the other logical. Let us begin with the psychological questions.

Inferring, considered as an event which actually takes place, is, among other things, a passage from one or more beliefs to a new belief which is an effect of them. We do not wish to suggest that, whenever certain beliefs cause a new belief, we have inference. We wish to suggest only the converse of this, that whenever we infer, certain beliefs cause a new belief. Most people would agree that there is no inferring, in the proper sense of the term, unless we are aware of the connection of the premisses with the conclusion which they cause; but the connection of which we have to be aware is not a causal connection, but a connection of logical dependence. So long as we remain on the psychological level we ought to admit among inferences those that are invalid as well as those that are valid. In that case we must not say that we are aware of the logical connection of premisses and conclusion, but only that we believe there is such a connection—a belief which may, of course, be mistaken. In any case, when we believe that there is such a connection, we believe that there has been an inference. It often happens that one belief causes another directly, and that, from unwillingness to suppose ourselves irrational, we believe that there is a logical connection between them, and therefore believe that we have inferred. If Hume is right, something of this sort occurs in all our beliefs as to causes, or at any rate in many of them—for it is difficult to state Hume's theory in a way which does not assume some knowledge of the causation of beliefs. One might, perhaps, state the essence of Hume's sceptical theory of causation in this way: When A and B have been frequently conjoined in our experience, belief in A is apt to be succeeded by belief in B. Observing this succession, and wishing to imagine ourselves rational beings, we invent a "law of causality," according to which A is always followed by B, so that we are logically justified in passing from belief in A to belief in B. In this form the theory assumes that the sort of sequence which we should like to regard as universal does very frequently take place, at any rate as regards psychological matters, but it does not assume that any such sequence is actually universal. It is difficult to refute Hume's theory. Every philosopher since Kant has professed to refute it, but no refutation has been so decisive as not to need emendation by later philosophers. We may presume that no doctrine could have needed so much refutation, unless it had been true. It seems probable, further, that practically all the substantial inferences that we make, as opposed to the purely formal inferences of logic and mathematics, are more or less of the above nature, that is to say, we have first a purely psychological causation of one belief by another, and then a general principle invented with a view to making the inference seem logically legitimate.

This view, however, is the very antithesis of Dr. Bosanquet's. He, as is well known, believes that "reality is a system of mutually determinate parts." He believes that from any one part of truth any other part can be inferred, at any rate in theory. He believes that the world is organic, and that its portions are so interdependent that no one can be changed without changing all. This view governs his whole theory of inference. Inference for him depends essentially upon the perception of system. It is made actually formal as well as to the rules of the syllogism, or the modernized substitute of the mathematician. Such deduction—whether called deduction or masquerading as induction—is what Dr. Bosanquet calls "linear inference," and is his especial bugbear. In all inference, according to him, the whole of truth and the whole of reality is relevant. "The essence of an inference, then, would be in showing of any suggested assertion, that unless we accepted it, our province of truth would as a whole be taken from us." He condenses this into the formula "this or nothing," i.e., whenever we infer, it is supposed that a refusal to admit the inference would involve us in a universal scepticism not only as to the matter in hand but as to all our knowledge. This view rests, of course, upon the familiar Hegelian logic which has been set forth by Mr. Bradley, by Dr. Bosanquet himself, and by many other writers. The grounds for this logic will not be found in the present volume, which merely assumes it. "It is enough to rely," he says in one place, "on the insight that nothing is really certain except the whole, for it is impossible to say that, apart from the conditions which the whole furnishes, anything would be what it is." But is Dr. Bosanquet really content to rely on "insight" in this fundamental matter? He is never tired of urging that logic does not proceed from direct self-evident principles such, for example, as that of the syllogism, yet passages like the above suggest that Dr. Bosanquet, too, has his fundamental logical principles which he accepts solely because to him they appear self-evident. Those to whom it seems that the world is a very fragmentary place will have difficulty in accepting his insight. To them it will seem that all sorts of things are accidental, and might very well have been quite other than they are without infringing any principle of logic. In this view they will be supported by the perception that the laws of nature, including the laws of causality itself, are wholly devoid of logical necessity, and that any one of them might be infringed without damage to pure logic. Kant, who perceived that all these laws are synthetic, would have been more hostile to the view that a law may be without principles.

This brings us to our second set of questions in regard to inference, namely, logical questions. Dr. Bosanquet's definition, as we saw, requires that, in an inference, the conclusions should really follow logically from the premises. The question is therefore forced upon us: In what circumstances does this occur? When we pare away all that is derived from causality and experience, we seem reduced to one terribly simple answer: The conclusion only follows logically from the premises when it is actually part of what the premises assert. From the premise that "Socrates was a wise man" we can validly infer that he was a man. Such inferences are considered trivial when they are simple, as in the above instance, yet they cover the whole of pure mathematics. But they do not cover anything else. They do not cover, for example, the sort of inferences which lead to a man's being condemned in a criminal trial. All such inferences rest upon causality and are in some degree extra-logical. To demonstrate this conclusion is impossible within the scope of a review. It could not be done in less than two volumes, the first devoted to refuting the organic conception of knowledge and the world, the second to tracing the logical consequence of what we may call the atomic conception.

Dr. Bosanquet devotes a chapter to a question which is a difficult one for the point of view which he represents, namely, "What sense logic appeals to the study of mind." The problem arises in this way: It is what we infer, and therefore mind is involved in the occurrence of inference, but it is not we who decide the conditions of validity, since these are the conditions of the truth, and the truth of our beliefs depends upon facts outside them. It is, however, desired by all philosophers that some method should be found of proving that an inference actually made will be valid if certain assignable conditions are fulfilled. No philosopher is content to say, "We often pass, by what appears to us to be an inference, from certain beliefs to certain others. But it is quite impossible to know when the new beliefs to which we pass are true, or truly consequences of the old beliefs, in the sense that they must be true if the old beliefs were true." Such a view would be too sceptical to be comfortable, and it is the business of philosophy, as of religion, to administer comfort. It is therefore necessary to demonstrate that the human mind is so constructed as to "secrete truth, as the liver secretes bile." True, it sometimes secretes falsehood, but this has to be shown to be exceptional and avoidable. There has to be, therefore, some affinity between logic and the operations of the mind. It has to be shown that logic represents, in some degree, the way we think. It is clear that such a proof can only hope to succeed by dint of great obscurity, and it must be admitted that in the pursuit of obscurity Hegel's immediate forerunner Hegel's followers have easily outdistanced all competitors. It is proper to have been necessary to invent the study of theory of knowledge, intermediate between psychology and pure logic—a study in which we are not concerned with the way in which actual men and women do, in fact, think, for that would include the thoughts of idiots, maniacs, savages and non-Hegelians generally. What we are concerned with in this study is a norm, a way in which "the mind" works ideally, just as Hegelian politics is concerned with the working of "the State"—a body which, though adumbrated by Prussia, has never really existed on earth. And so we find Dr. Bosanquet saying:

"To deny that logic is founded on psychology is one thing. To deny that pure logic involves propositions about mental process is quite another. The former negation seems to me unquestionably true, but the latter unquestionably false."

Dr. Bosanquet is led, by his view that mental process is relevant to logic, to take sides on questions of empirical psychology:

The separation of Psychology from Logic [he says] has largely been due to a vicious doctrine of Association. Mind, it has been thought, begins with chance conjunctions of particulars, and the laws of association are mere causal laws of conditions under which presented particulars come to be conceived and reproduced in connection. If this were true, there would be a chaos between logic and psychology which could hardly be managed. But this is not so, and with the refutation of this point of view the plausibility of the severance between real and ideal vanishes, as its truth has vanished before.

It is difficult to believe that any theory of logic can be valid which requires a particular view on a moot point of an empirical study such as psychology. Indeed, the attempt to establish a study of mind other than empirical psychology must always break down on just such points. For our part, we cannot see any basis for the suggested view of logic, except the partial immunity from error which it is supposed to secure; but this is a basis in desire, not in psychology. If the opposite point of view leads to the conclusion that we can never be sure of the validity of our inferences, that is no doubt highly regrettable, but does not afford any ground for supposing the point of view mistaken.

B. R.

SOCIETIES

ROYAL.—March 18.—Sir J. J. Thomson, President, in the chair. The following papers were read: "On a Form of Botrytis cinerea with Colourless Sclerotia," by W. B. Brierley; and "A Preliminary Account of the Meiotic Phenomena in the Pollen Mother-cells and Tapetum of Lettuce (Lactuca sativa)," by R. R. Gates.

ZOOLOGICAL.—March 30.—Dr. A. Smith Woodward, Vice-President, in the chair.

Sir Frank Colyer exhibited and made remarks on a series of photographs of skulls of Macacus rhesus, showing pathological conditions of the teeth. Professor H. Maxwell Leitch exhibited photographs attesting the existence of egret farms in Nild.—Mr. R. H. Burne exhibited a series of pigs' mandibles from the New Hebrides, showing overgrowth of the lower tusk owing to removal of the maxillary tusk.

Dr. C. C. Somnall read a paper on "Abnormalities of the Abdominal Arteries of a Young Panda."—In the absence of Mr. A. Loveridge, his paper on "East African Lizards collected in 1915-19, with Description of a New Genus and Species of Skink and a New Subspecies of Gecko," was taken as read.

FORTHCOMING MEETINGS

Sat. 17. Royal Institution, 9.—"The Thermionic Vacuum Tube," Lecture I., Dr. W. H. Eccles.

Viking (University of London, South Kensington), 3.—Annual Meeting.

Mon. 19. Society of Arts, 8.—"Aluminium and its Alloys," Lecture I., Dr. W. Rosenhain. (Cantor Lecture.)

Surveyors' Institution, 8.—"Some Problems connected with Agricultural Policy," Mr. C. Browning Fisher.

Royal Society, 8.30.—"An Air-Route Reconstructed from the Pacific to the Amazon," Flight Commander G. M. Dyott.

Royal Statistical, 5.15.

Institution of Civil Engineers, 5.30.—"Coal Conservation in the United Kingdom," Sir Dugald Clerk.

Dr. C. C. Somnall, Royal Anthropological Institute, 8.15.—"The Races of the Chindwin, Upper Burma," Mr. R. Grant Brown.

Geological, 5.30.—"The Devonian of Flanges Basin (Bolodonlava)," Mr. J. W. Dudley Robinson; "The Cambrian Horizons of Comby (Shropshire)," and their Brachiopoda, Priapetos, Gastropoda, etc., Mr. F. Suterling Cooeold.

Royal Microscopical, 8.

Thurs. 22. Royal Institution, 3.—"The Tensile Strength of Liquids," Mr. Sydney Skinner.

Fine Arts

NEGO SCULPTURE AT THE CHELSEA BOOK CLUB

WHAT a comfortable mental furniture the generalizations of a century ago must have afforded! What a right little, tight little, round little world it was when Greece was the only source of culture, when Greek art, even in Roman copies, was the only indisputable art, except for some Renaissance repetitions! Philosophy, the love of truth, liberty, architecture, poetry, drama, and for all we knew— all these were the fruits of a special kind of life, each assisted the development of the other, each was really dependent on all the rest. Consequently if we could only learn the Greek lessons of political freedom and intellectual self-consciousness all the rest would be added unto us.

And now, in the last sixty years, knowledge and perception have poured upon us so fast that the whole well-ordered system has been blown away, and we stand naked to the blast, scarcely able to snatch a hasty generalization or two to cover our nakedness for a moment.

Our desperate plight comes home to one at the Chelsea Book Club, where are some thirty chosen specimens of negro sculpture. To if to our ancestors the poor Indian had "an untutored mind," the Congolese ignorance and savagery must have seemed too abject for discussion. One would like to know what Dr. Johnson would have said to anyone who had offered him a negro idol for several hundred pounds. It would have seemed then sheer lunacy to listen to what a negro savage had to tell us of his emotions about the human form. And now one has to go all the way to Chelsea in a chastened spirit and prostrate oneself before his "stocks and stones."

We have the habit of thinking that the power to create expressive plastic form is one of the greatest of human achievements, and the names of great sculptors are handed down from generation to generation, so that it seems unfair to be forced to admit that certain nameless savages have possessed this power not only in a higher degree than we at this moment, but than we as a nation have ever possessed it. And yet that is where I find myself. I have to admit that some of these things are great sculpture—greater, I think, than anything we produced even in the Middle Ages. Certainly they have the special qualities of sculpture in a higher degree. They have indeed complete plastic freedom; that is to say, these African artists really conceive form in three dimensions. Now this is rare in sculpture. All archaic European sculpture—Greek and Romanesque, for instance—approaches plasticity from the point of view of bas-reliefs. The statue bears traces of having being conceived as the combination of front, back and side bas-reliefs. And this continues to make itself felt almost until the final development of the tradition. Complete plastic freedom with us seems only to come at the end of a long period, when the art has attained a high degree of representational skill and when it is generally already decadent from the point of view of imaginative significance.

Now the strange thing about these African sculptures is that they bear, as far as I can see, no trace of this process. Without ever attaining anything like representational accuracy they have complete freedom; it seems to have no difficulty in getting away from the two-dimensional plane. The neck and the torso are conceived as cylinders, not as masses with a square section. The head is conceived as a pear-shaped mass. It is conceived as a single whole, not arrived at by approach from the mask, as with almost all primitive European art. The mask itself is conceived as a concave plane cut out of this otherwise perfectly unified mass.

And here we come upon another curious difference between negro sculpture and our own, namely, that the emphasis is utterly different. Our emphasis has always been affected by our preferences for certain forms which appeared to us to mark the nobility of man. Thus we shrink from giving the head its full development; we like to lengthen the legs and generally to force the form into a particular type. These preferences seem to be dictated not by a plastic bias, but by our reading of the physical symbols of certain qualities which we admire in our kind, such, for instance, as agility, a commanding presence, or a precise brow. If a negro sculptor, it seems to me, has no such preferences, or his preferences happen to coincide more nearly with what his feeling for pure plastic design would dictate. For instance, the length, thinness and isolation of our limbs render them extremely refractory to fine plastic treatment, and the negro scores heavily by his willingness to reduce the limbs to a succession of ovoid masses sometimes scarcely longer than they are broad. Generally speaking, one may say that his plastic sense leads him to give its utmost amplitude and relief to all the protuberant parts of the body, and to get thereby an extraordinarily emphatic and impressive sequence of planes. So far from clinging to two dimensions, as we tend to do, he actually underlines, as it were, the three-dimensionality of his forms. It is in some such way, I suspect, that he manages to give to his forms their disconcerting vitality, the suggestion that they make of being not mere echoes of actual figures, but of possessing an inner life of their own. If the negro artist wanted to make people believe in the potency of his idols he certainly set about it in the right way.

Besides the logical comprehension of plastic form which the negro shows, he has also an exquisite taste in his handling of material. No doubt in this matter his endless leisure has something to do with the marvellous finish of these works. An instance of this is seen in the treatment of the tattoo cuticles. These are always rendered in relief, which means that the artist has cut away the whole surface around them. I fancy most sculptors would have found some less laborious method of interpreting these markings. But this patient elaboration of the surface is characteristic of most of these works. It is seen to perfection in a wooden cup covered all over with a design of faces and objects that look like clubs in very low relief. The gable of this cup shows a subtlety and refinement of taste comparable to that of the finest Oriental craftsmen.

It is curious that a people who produced such great artists did not produce also a culture in our sense of the word. This shows that two factors are necessary to produce the cultures which distinguish civilized peoples; there must be, of course, the creative artist, but there must also be the power of conscious critical appreciation and comparison. If we imagined such an apparatus of critical appreciation as the Chinese have possessed from the earliest times applied to this negro art, we should have no difficulty in recognizing its singular beauty. We should never have been tempted to regard it as savage or unrefined. It is for want of a conscious critical sense and the intellectual powers of comparison and classification that the negro has failed to create one of the great cultures of the world, and not from any lack of the creative aesthetic impulse, nor from lack of the most exquisite sensibility and the finest taste. No doubt also the lack of such a critical standard to support him left the negro artist at the mercy of any outside influence. It is likely enough that the negro artist, although capable of such profound imaginative understanding of form, would accept our cheapest illusionist art with humble enthusiasm.

Roger Fry.
EXHIBITIONS OF THE WEEK

Concurrently with the collection of negro sculpture, the Chelsea Book Club has arranged an exhibition of paintings and drawings by four young artists. Mr. Baynes is a painter whose progress in the last few years has been observing for some time. He has received his training at the Slade School, and his first encouragement from members of the Camlen Town Group, who influenced his early work. Later he responded to the Cézanne revolution. His water-colours shown from time to time in the London Group exhibitions revealed an appreciation of essential relations, a quality which is also evident in his exhibits at Cheyne Walk. These are oil paintings and their merit is sufficient to justify the employment of the more ambitious medium. Too often young artists plunge into oil painting from arbitrary or non-aesthetic motives; but in the case of Mr. Baynes the change clearly indicates a determination that the momentum gained for the solution of major problems and the revelation of his personality as a painter. This personality, as it appears here, is made up of a gentle sensibility directed by considerable intelligence, and a vision which has a genuinely plastic bias. The paintings labelled “Falmouth” and “Farm” are both very promising indications.

Mr. Seabrooke’s work has a certain colour-resemblance to that of Mr. Baynes, but there is no real community of outlook between the two artists. For Mr. Seabrooke’s vision is essentially decorative, and his approach, though completely free from flippancy, strikes us as rather overconfident; he has as a result a habit of summary statement which, unless reinforced by continuous study, may eventually degenerate into mere formalization. Mr. Lee is interested in animals and in abstract art, but he has not yet welded the dual interest into single realization. He frequents, as it were, both the Zoo and Parnassus, without having completely staked out his claim in either place. Mr. Walton’s “Old Bridge at Bath” is the better of his exhibits. It is, considering the nature of the subject, refreshingly unsentimental, but the colour is surely unnecessarily crude.

The New Art Salon continues its campaign to introduce the work of continental Cubists and Expressionists, and it also finds from time to time much which is new and stimulating. The present collection is more interesting than the opening exhibition, although the general effect is bewildering and unsatisfactory. It consists, in the main, of minor works, many of which do scant justice to the names which stand beneath them. This is particularly unfortunate in the case of pioneer names such as Verner, who committed himself to the dualism which has cut away the figure of the tutor from the Wilson group of the Royal Princes on the sofa and to admire once again the delightful painting in what remains, we descended to the landing. Here we found Sir John Lavery’s Royal Group, the best picture he has yet painted, now sadly in need of varnish; and on the landing, on each side of the entrance to the rooms, are pictures of the Meudon and the St. George’s Parks, Kitchener, Lord Roberts and General Gordon. And so, fumbling for our umbrella disc, we came down the last flight of steps and passed out into the rain, hoping to return at the earliest opportunity.

K. H. W.

MATERNITY IN ART

MOTHER AND CHILD. Twenty-eight drawings by Bernard Meninsky, with text by Ian Gordon. (Lane. 15s. net.)

BERNARD MENINSKY is a young artist who attracted attention last year through his exhibition at the Salon Gallery, which included much promising work, notably a series of drawings of a mother with her infant child. Admirers of these drawings will welcome this book of reproductions, which conveys an adequate impression of Mr. Meninsky’s achievements in this field. The studies vary in technical method and in merit; but it is evident throughout that the artist, inspired with genuine enthusiasm and a draughtsman of considerable attainments, is impossible to avoid comparing the great heritage of Mother and Child representations which have come down to us in Christian art, and Mr. Gordon is possibly right in suggesting a root difference in attitude between the medieval and the modern. However, in these intimate studies of infancy; he is certainly right in pointing to Mr. Meninsky’s preoccupation with real life as the basis of his art.
Music

SHAKESPEARE AS A LIBRETTIST

Mr. Barkworth, whose opera "Romeo and Juliet," was produced for the first time on April 7 at the Surrey, struck out a new line in presenting his audience with a sort of analytical programme. It was an interesting and a well-written document. It expounded not merely the musical themes on which the opera is based, but also the artistic principles which guided the composer in its construction. An opera, he very properly maintains, should not be confused with the text, elements that are already familiar. So he has taken Shakespeare's play as it stands, except for considerable cuts. It would have been a labour of love, he says, to set every word of the play. As it is, the opera lasted till nearly midnight. Except for the introduction of Heywood's "Pack, clouds, away," sung as a serenade to Juliet on her wedding morning, his text is pure Shakespeare.

Almost every sentence of Mr. Barkworth's apologia indicates the spirit of reverent humility in which he has approached his task. So deep is his devotion to the poet that he appears to imagine that all a musician need do is to take a plot from the greatest of dramatists, a text that contains some of the most beautiful poetry in the world, and then simply translate it into music. The composer, however, is of the opposite sentiment. He has taken Shakespeare's play as it stands, except for considerable cuts. It would have been a labour of love, he says, to set every word of the play. As it is, the opera lasted till nearly midnight. Except for the introduction of Heywood's "Pack, clouds, away," sung as a serenade to Juliet on her wedding morning, his text is pure Shakespeare.

Almost every sentence of Mr. Barkworth's apologia indicates the spirit of reverent humility in which he has approached his task. So deep is his devotion to the poet that he appears to imagine that all a musician need do is to take a plot from the greatest of dramatists, a text that contains some of the most beautiful poetry in the world, and then simply translate it into music. The composer, however, is of the opposite sentiment. He has taken Shakespeare's play as it stands, except for considerable cuts. It would have been a labour of love, he says, to set every word of the play. As it is, the opera lasted till nearly midnight. Except for the introduction of Heywood's "Pack, clouds, away," sung as a serenade to Juliet on her wedding morning, his text is pure Shakespeare.

Mr. Barkworth sometimes seems to have gone back a whole century and to have taken Cherubini as his model. His music is old-fashioned; he himself admits it. But it is homogeneous in style, always scholarly, and entirely free from the least trace of pretentiousness or vulgarity, even of that antique vulgarity which we have now accepted as classical.

The audience appeared to enjoy the opera thoroughly from beginning to end. The interludes that were meant to cover the frequent changes of scene were listened to in comparative silence, even though they had to trail off awkwardly into nothing and start afresh when the scene-shifters were ready. Two more performances are announced for this week; the management evidently regards the opera as a success. This may appear surprising, but it is certainly no discredit to the Surrey audience that they should derive pleasure from this new "Romeo and Juliet."

Mr. Barkworth's devout adherence to the words of Shakespeare constitutes at once his strength and his weakness. It disguises to some extent his lack of real musical inspiration. "It might be thought," he writes, "that the continuous ten-syllable verse would lead to monotony of rhythm in the music, as Wagner's verse does in "Lohengrin." But Shakespeare's rhythm is too subtle, varied and splendid for any such danger. The criticism is just, yet "Lohengrin," with all its faults still remains a more stirring opera than "Romeo and Juliet." Shakespeare has, in fact, forced Mr. Barkworth into some variety of rhythm; when he is not actually setting words his rhythm very soon lapses into monotony. Wagner's monotony is not due to his verse rhythms. If Wagner had tried to set Shakespeare he would probably have set him just as monotonously as he did his own verses. The monotony of "Lohengrin" and of other Wagner operas comes almost entirely from two things: the tendency to draw syllables out to a length that is tolerable in German but unbearable in English, and the curious mannerism of beginning nearly all melodies with that rhythmic figure which is illustrated by the Bridal March. But Wagner's tunes, however, bored of them we may be by now, were at least vigorous and individual enough to impress themselves on the memory—so forcibly indeed that few people care much what the original words were; and in fact Wagner, writing words for a score to set, naturally wrote them in the rhythm of the sort of tunes he liked to compose.

In "Romeo and Juliet," Mr. Barkworth, like Henry Lawes before him, has often fallen between two stools. The careful declamation of his blank-verse text has hampered him in writing full-blooded and expressive melody, and at the same time the technical exigencies of the musical style in which he writes make it impossible for him to quicken up his declamation to anything like a real continuous speaking pace. Hence the best moments in the opera are either the comic scenes, in which melodic expression is not a very serious matter, and the scenes of brawl and bustle, in which the orchestra easily gets an effect of energetic movement, or, the other hand, the purely lyrical moments when the voices rise in an ensemble and the composer yields to the happy temptation to write music and let declamation go hang. At other times he contents himself too often with setting the words of his libretto rather than seeking to express the feelings which lie behind them.

One could indeed often wish that he were less scholarly and correct. He has the decent monotony of so many English composers trained on the honourable lines of academic counterpoint. With difficulty he resists the temptation—invariable, and invariably fatal—to write, as the examination papers used to say, "in four flowing parts." He has acquired facility in making his inner voices move, but he does not make them really expressive. They keep up their amiable small talk when they ought either to say something that really matters or hold their peace. There were moments when one was grateful even for the awkwardness of the orchestration in so far as it broke up the regularity of the harmonic texture. Instead of being a tragedy of passion against a background of sixteenth-century Italy, the work suggested rather an English drawing-room in which a cultivated English gentleman reads Shakespeare aloud to his family after dinner.

The performance of the opera showed that the Surrey company can do splendid work when they are really put on their mettle. It is inevitable that the old opera should be insufficiently rehearsed, but most of the singers in any company are aware to think that they know all about them, and the rest can generally be pushed through their parts somehow. A new and difficult opera such as "Romeo and Juliet" has to be thought out carefully from the beginning, and very well thought out it was. Capulet (Mr. Sumner Austin) seemed a little uncertain about his age, but made a dignified figure in a part to which Mr. Barkworth has given considerable prominence. The Nurse is a good deal cut down, but Miss Mabel Corran seized its opportunities with her invariable strong sense of characterization. Miss Myra Munsen (Lady Capulet) is evidently going to be the Surrey what Mile. Bauermeister used to be to Covent Garden—the indispensable lady who knows all the secondary parts and sings them all well. Juliet was hardly up to the level of Romeo (Mr. Frank Webster), who both sang and acted with much charm and distinction.

Edward J. Dent.
MUSICAL NOTES FROM PARIS

Ms. Oléria d'Alheim gave an admirable concert at the Salle des Agriculteurs on March 15. Mme. d'Alheim is a wonderful interpreter of Mozart, and an ardent and purest kind, completely free from the egotism of so many executants (especially singers) and caring only for one thing—the faithful interpretation of the composer's meaning. Consequently, in all that she sings, and especially in works of the Russian School, we feel that the composer is really being given a chance and that it is her music we are listening to and not somebody else's notion of what he meant it to sound like, which is too often what is served out to us by singers and players who are thinking more about themselves than about the music they are performing.

Mme. d'Alheim also sang a Schubert and Schumann group in German, and it is planned to publish it as much attention and delight as when she had been singing French or Russian. The practice of singing songs in other than the language in which they were written is becoming far too common, and has nothing to commend it—although during the war there were, of course, obvious objections to singing German in public. But the quicker we get back to normal conditions the better, and the prejudice against the German language on account of the German war is both stupid and illogical. It is a little curious that Mme. d'Alheim should have fared better in this respect in Paris than Mrs. Mischa Léon in London; but both are to be congratulated for having thus broken the ice.

M. J. Berlioz, who has been singing at the des Champs Elysées recently, is a most interesting dancer, and his performance was altogether remarkable and unlike anything we have seen hitherto. He is the "Premier Danseur" at the Royal Opera, Stockholm, is a Swede and has been a pupil of Fokine. He dances entirely alone, and unsupported, except by the orchestra—and that he was able to hold the attention of the audience throughout the evening is some indication of the striking nature of his performance. All his dances are sharply contrasted, and whether he personifies a Derm ("Dance de Salome"—Glazounov), a Trigane ("Ballet de Henri VIII."—Saint-Saëns), a Swedish country lad, a Hindoo caddy ("Danse Céleste" from "Lakmé"—Delibes), an emaciated martyr-saint, clad only in a scarlet loin-cloth ("St. Francis walking on the Waves"—Issac), or a primitive negro effigy, adorned with bristling and barbaric tufts and fringes, and waddling with uncouth and ape-like gait ("Poême Nocturne—Scrabbain), M. Berlioz remains a master of his art and reveals an almost uncanny power of reproducing the "stylistic" features of all plays and human-types of all ages.

During the week preceding Easter there was, as usual, great musical activity in all the chief choirs and organ-lofts of Paris. The famous "Chanteurs de Saint-Gervais" in particular performed some of the masterpieces of sixteenth- and seventeenth-century Church music.

These performances took place in the ill-fated church of St. Gervais (a large part of which is still boarded up), where so many people were massacred on that other Good Friday, two years ago, by the explosion of a shell from the German long-range gun.

R. H. M.

THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC OPEN SCHOLARSHIPS

Preliminary examinations for 16 Open Scholarships at the Royal College of Music will be held on May 26, in various local centres throughout the United Kingdom. The Scholarships to be competed for are as follows: 2 Pianoforte, 2 Singing, 2 Organ, 2 Violin, 1 Violoncello, 1 Composition, 1 Operatic Composition, 1 Bassoon, 1 Horn, 1 Clarinet, 1 Flute. The Scholarships are open to all classes within the ages stated in the particulars issued to applicants. They entitle the holders to free musical education at the College, and are as a rule tenable for three years. In some cases grants towards maintenance are added. Further information and official forms of entry may be obtained from the Registrar, Royal College of Music, Prince Consort Road, South Kensington, S.W.7. No entry form can be received after Wednesday, April 21, and each form must be accompanied by an official stamped Registrar's certificate of birth. Correspondence must be marked on the outside of the envelope "Open Scholarships."
THE DRAMA AS A MEANS OF EDUCATION

Queen's Theatre.—"The Fold." By the Marchioness Townshend.

T HEN Tamnhäuser came down from the Venusberg and found a little Ella Wheeler Wilcox in the home. Indeed one's first impression is that no less a person than this latest deceased optimist had been in touch with Mr. Pelman; that she had dictated most of this play from the spirit world. The Society of Psychical Research advises us, however, to attribute no phenomena to supernatural causes which can be accounted for by material means, and, rejecting the spirit hypothesis, we believe that the authoress of this work might have fished up her murex, or other submarine diet, from the columns of "Ladies' papers" and women's pages, aspiring here to the wit of Miss Heilgers and there to the wisdom of "Lady Di" or "Corisande."

A steady dribble of didacticism, on subjects, all and sundry, from the releasing of larks to the powdering of the female nose, infests the dialogue; it is all given in full, a complete shilling manual for suburban wives, all of it, "y'ea, y'all," with the fullness of the dressing for boiling an egg in hot water: Let the egg boil for four minutes if you wish to avoid the danger of running white on the one hand and of the stiff yolk on the other. Then remove the egg with a silver table-spoon or some suitable implement. The water should have reached the boiling-point before the egg is immersed. Serve with salt upon a crisp piece of, &c., &c. and so on.

Most of the lessons of "The Fold" are inculcated weekly in the press: the Russian vampire is not such a deep-dyed extra-colour article as the dark Latin or gipsy woman of the "old" melodrama; she has less persistence, she fires her butler's eaves-tips, having that touch of Tobotayan mysticism, that Oriental leer, which leads her to prefer atonement (in this case by means of an opera-cloak of silver-blue tissue) rather than Venmgeance, with the capital V and three "'n's."

The play is carefully acted and mounted; Mr. Paxton and Mrs. Tapping are excellent in the two museum pieces; Mr. Tearle carries the burden of all the possible virtues without being offensive; and, in their minor rôles, Mr. Richards and Miss Lindsay present just the right degree of suburban gaucherie.

As the play brings with it so much of the atmosphere of the ladies' page, we might perhaps reply with "Telegraphic Inquiries," thus: How did the young school-master buy that dress suit out of his pay? What kind of school is in session on Monday the day before Christmas when Christmas falls on a Tuesday? What kind of an editor telegraphs to suburbia for more verses three months after he has printed a young lady's poem? And: Is the supply of baronets great enough? Great enough, we mean, to supply jobs at £500 per annum to all worthy and poetical schoolmasters at sight, and because they have penetrated the Russian milieu? &c. And why, if he wished to avoid embarrassment, the young man remained with the Russian lady after all the others had left and at 1.15 in the morning? Even in pre-war Utopia how did he catch the last train?

But the British playgoer has a pliable gullet; these details worry him or her as little as the husky carter was worried when he swallowed the mouse in his beer with: "Bit o' op, or zumm'ut!" The playgoer also wipes his lips and prepares for the next ingurgitation.

The suburban wife should read Ruskin and Anatole France's "Jeanne d'Arc," she should go for long walks with her lyric mate, she should not be slack in her attire, otherwise the bohey woman will kidnap her schoolmaster. I think these are the morals of the play; for moral the play certainly is, even though it does dispareg Non-conformists and the Victorian era. We should balance this Swinburnian tendency by the familiar homilies on "The Chance of the Colonies" and the "Birth-Rate." The Marchioness has got most of it in.

Of course, the play ought to be "toured," it might do a lot of good in the provinces. The Venusberg is not wholly satisfactory, it is not the best London can do, but as good as a man can expect to find on his first emergence from "Balsden." One cannot meet all the best people during three months of nocturnal excursions. As it stands, the actors deserve most of the credit for the success of the gentle trickle of comic incidents which keep the audience, manifestly, in good temper.

T. J. V.

THE REACTION FROM MANCHESTER

Little Theatre.—"Other Times." By Harold Brighouse.

I F we allow that an impersonal affair such as the theatre is not entirely afloat from dependency on the effort of individuals, then it is in urgent need at the present moment of the Mr. Brighouse whose work made something more than an ephemeral impression on us in the old repertory days. His was an accomplishment that showed other qualities than skilfulness, because he came of a fellowship inspired by another principle than that bad work well done is better than done not at all. Whatever failings became characteristic of that particular kind of drama described by the ineffective epithet "the Manchester School," there was at least one which could not in fairness be attributed to any of its associates. In Mr. Brighouse's case it seemed to be the fact, almost as much as in that of Mr. Allan Monkhouse, the truth of them all, and considerably more than in Stamford-Houghton's, that the theatre-sense was never allowed to dominate the sense of art itself. The artist who masters a craft will reveal virtues in his work that no craftsman can hope to do who masters and exploits an artistic form.

So it was with Mr. Brighouse. There was dour beauty in "Hobson's Choice" as well as technical fitness; it is true that such beauty ran thinly, but this was because the vein of comedy in all our dramatists since Wilde has, perhaps through that very dourness, run more thinly still. And we felt that if only Mr. Brighouse would permit his comic vein to flow as broadly as might be, and refrain from diverting it along this and that artificial, deftly-scoped channel, we could cease our sighing, if not for a more, Wilde, at least for comedy-craft which after the first few moments does not become merely a painful spectacle of degeneracy into witticisms that are not even wit.

Mr. Brighouse's more recent appearance as a writer of novels and of a play remembered (or forgotten) as "Bantam, V.C.," caused us a certain amount of disturbance; but it was easy to exercise forbearance during a period of reaction which the theatre felt as badly as did the tailor who had stocked his shops just prior to the armistice with unconscionable quantities of khaki. Shall we extend that forbearance to Mr. Brighouse's new play at the Little Theatre? After all, the reaction is not yet ended, and because he has got hold of the essential idea of one of Sir J. M. Barrie's later plays (and of many other plays, for that matter) and toyed with it wittily instead of prettily, we are not necessarily required to make dismal comparisons with his Manchester work. Let us rather proclaim it a distinct improvement on last year's less pleasant failure and look forward with sturdy faith to the plays to come.

It is a rather puerile sort of justification to attempt of any play to point out that "Other Times" gives scope for Mr. Dawson Millward to exercise to the full those
Correspondence

"SHAKESPEARE" IDENTIFIED

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Dear Sir,—The article headed "Another Shakespeare" in your issue for April 2 raises a question of great interest to all readers of critical reviews—"What is the proper scope of a book review?" Arc the preconceived ideas of the reviewer on a subject that is so debatable that it is classed as Controversy to be considered the main point or should the view that "the book's the thing" control the position?

When I take up a journal such as yours I hope to find in any and every book review sufficient material to enable me to judge for myself as to the value of the work criticized. I expect to find in the criticism offered something that will assist me in forming my own opinion, and that, I know, is the view of many readers.

Opinions expressed in a dogmatic and prejudiced manner (using the word "prejudiced" in its root "sense," judging not from argument, parade of learning, or show of critical faculty whatsoever, are of no assistance in this direction, nor are vague and gratuitous recommendations to the author.

The article in question has no value to the reader who desires to know whether the book reviewed is worth the buying and the reading, and the writer, therefore, appears to have failed in his proper function as a reviewer.

Yours truly,

FRANCIS CLARKE.

The Chelsea Bookshop,
April 9th, 1920.

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sir,—The reviewer of Mr. J. T. Looney's book states (April 2, p. 450) that "at bottom the argument of the anti-Stratfordians ... is that William Shakespeare was a half-educated country boy who had to leave the grammar school at thirteen. Therefore he could not have written in manhood Shakespeare's plays."

He is under a false impression. We do not know when he entered or left the school. We do not even know that he ever attended it. If, however, he wrote that most polished and cultured poem "Venus and Adonis," then we feel bound to ask where he learned the language, which is something very different from what would naturally have proceeded from a Warwickshire rustic; and, certainly, as an indication of our contemporaneity English has never been wielded before or since his time. Those who do not believe in miracles must endeavour to find out how things are perfected.

I am, Sir,

Yours obediently,

R. L. EAGLE.

19, Burghill Road, Sydenham, S.E. 26.
April 8, 1920.

[We regret that we have not satisfied our correspondents' conception of what a review ought to be. On the other hand we made our position with regard to Mr. Looney's book perfectly clear. We hold that it is a waste of time and energy, and an abuse of our readers' patience, to criticise in detail any theory of the authorship of the plays of Shakespeare which is based upon the improved assumption that Shakespeare did not write them. To the familiar arguments that Shakespeare could not have written the plays Mr. Looney adds nothing at all. On his own admission he merely recapitulates the negative arguments of the Roscians. These are, in our opinion, based upon an imperfect knowledge of the psychology of creative genius. To make this clear is the critic's only task when confronted with such a book as Mr. Looney's. In so far as "reviewing" is a different activity from that of criticism, we have as little to do with it as possible in the pages of The Athenæum.—Ed.]

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS AND THE YOUNG

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sir,—The International Moral Education Congress, which has already met in London, 1908, and The Hague, 1912, will assemble in Paris, 1921. Meanwhile, the Executive Council (of which the Right Hon. Sir Frederick Pollock is Chairman) seeks the advice of educationalists all over the world on various important subjects, and, among them, on the relation of education to the League of Nations.

We assume that all concerned in the education of the young wish to secure the sympathy and support of youth in the moral purpose of the League of Nations. In this sphere our studies should deal with (1) General Aims of the Appeal and the Instruction, (2) Methods of Presentation.

(1) GENERAL AIMS.

To humanize (i.e., moralize) the teaching of geography, literature, art, science, economics, industry, and of history in the widest sense, so as to elucidate the ideas of national values and international co-operation.

And to announce, in an interesting manner, from time to time, the work done by the League of Nations, and improvements in its constitution and programme.

(2) METHODS OF PRESENTATION.

We might, in the first place, issue (after consultation) a draft programme of such instruction, leaving teachers, parents, and writers in each nationality to develop the themes in accordance with local habits, requirements, and ideals.

And we might begin to sketch the contents of a book for the universal instruction of the youth of the world, to be translated into many languages, its object being to cultivate a spirit of mutual understanding and fraternity.

All constructive ideas will be welcomed.

Yours faithfully,

Frederick J. Gould.
Armotel, Woodfield Avenue, Hon. Sec.
Ealing, W.5.
April, 1920.

COPYRIGHTS AND INCOME TAX

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

In the first place, as all profits are now to be assessed, whether of a capital or non-recurring character or not, an author will be indisputably taxable even on his first production, and small contributions by occasional writers in other professions will be chargeable. Moreover, proprietors of journals, &c., will be called upon to make returns to the Revenue of all such payments, however trifling.

Then as to depreciation of copyrights. For some reason the Commission distinguishes profits arising by contract which they think should receive special consideration. In any case they do not recommend any allowance when copyrights are in the hands of the original owner. If, however, they have been purchased from a vendor who is not within the scope of the British income tax, they should be treated in the same way as other "wasting assets," and be entitled to a sinking-fund allowance on the difference between their life and 35 years.

Yours faithfully,

Char. H. Tolley.

4, Great Winchester Street, E.C.2.
March 30, 1920.

MR. WILLIAMSON'S "WRITERS OF THREE CENTURIES"

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Dear Sir,—I also have been reading the above book, but, as your correspondent Mr. Alfred Barrie so wittily says, "It is much better to re-read an author in the original." Especially is this the case when the "copyist" transposes the subjects, as in the following:

C. C. H. Williamson on G. B. Shaw.

Mr. Shaw's genius is far too big to be packed into a definition, but it may be suggested that his decisive gift is a vivid faculty for bold improvisation, for striking out swift general truths and potent improprieties and backing them up with life in the way of epigrams that leap like arrows to their mark.

One arrow at all events seems to be rather wide of the mark.

Yours faithfully,

T. M. Dale.

68, Bedford Avenue, Barnet.
April 10, 1920.

Foreign Literature

CHÉNIER AND CONSTANT

Œuvres Complètes d'André Chénier. Publiées d'après les manuscrits par Paul Dimoff. Tome III. (Paris, Delagrange. 6fr.)

Adolphe. Par Benjamin Constant. Edition Historique et Critique par Gustave Rudler. (Manchester, l'imprimerie de l'Université. 7s. 6d. net.)

O have put before one, whether by coincidence or design, work of Chénier and of Constant together deserves more than merely separate and "cataloguing" attention. They were, by birth-date, pretty close contemporaries, though the life of one of them was tragically cut short. They were engaged in different stages of the same great political upheaval; and though Chénier was half a Greek (or at least a Byzantine) and Constant was only, in the Roman sense, a "provincial" Frenchman, they represent, in a curious way, opposite but real sides of the French character in life and literature. You might have to eliminate some points in both, and add some things not to be found in either, before getting the whole of Frenchness and nothing but Frenchness. But your combination would at any rate save you from more than one or two mistakes which are frequently made about that idiosyncrasy.

Chénier's work was almost inevitable in the circumstances of his latter days and death, took a long time before it was accurately and completely put before the world. Its first editor, Henri de Latouche, just a century ago, was not, and perhaps in the time of the Restoration could not be, quite faithful, while, though by giving away some of the MSS. he seems to have lost those—or some of them—which he kept. About half-way between that time and this the editions of Becq de Fouquières and Gabriel de Chénier added a great deal to our knowledge, though (unless we mistake) they added also some of the unlucky bickering which too often results in such cases. And now M. Dimoff is giving the whole, from the MSS. themselves where possible, with all the meticulous care of an ancien Normand, and with, as we read his annotations, good critical discernment. The volume is the third of the set, and does not contain some of Chénier's best-known odes, but most frequently quoted things, such as the "Tarentine" and the "Captive." Some of it is quite fragmentary—scrap and first drafts; oddments in various languages—some Fessonne, but including a very enthusiastic and strictly "proper" tribute in Greek to the Britanides, "goddesses in face and stature" [compare Tennyson's "divinely tall and most divinely fair"], white-armed, modest of glance, golden-haired, and sweetly smiling; than whom no other land nurtures fairer girls." Of more substantial things, however, we have many beautiful "Elegies," including "Amities" and "Amours"; interesting Odes and Epistles, the former including the great "Charlotte Corday" and the brief but splendid "Jambes," which, revealing the old fable of sweetness coming from the strong, show what strength here accompanied the already well-known sweet. And everywhere there floats the curious atmosphere of transition which makes André Chénier not a Romantic classic, not a Romantic before Romanticism, but something strangely different from either. We have nothing to match him except Landor, and to work out the points of likeness and unlikeness in a Plutarchian parallel between these two would take half the pages of the current Athenæum.

It is though of course, an idle, rather a fascinating question what Chénier would have been and done if the quelque chose là referred to in his famous dying utterance had been allowed to develop in the unsevered head. We have, no doubt, fairly close instances of actual development in the cases of Wordsworth and Coleridge. But it must be remembered that Chénier was nearly a decade—and a most important decade, that of 1793-94—the senior of both, and that his success, which in him is ingrained, sits on the others, and especially on Coleridge, merely as a garment—easily cast off. With the other author before us the circumstances are as different as the disposition. Benjamin was five years—and again five of those very most important years—younger than André, and instead of being cut short by the Terror, he starts with the lessons and the warning of that Terror full before him—a political, and as we may say temperamental, start in favour hardly second in importance to the escape from death itself. That the second generation of a Revolution is very different from the first is a well-known and well-proven historical fact. It may have less glaring faults, but such virtues as it possesses are not apt to be of the most attractive kind. It nearly always "plays for safety"; and this peculiarity is quite as noticeable in love as in war and politics. It certainly never was much more noticeable than in Benjamin Constant's private and literary life; for we have not here anything to do with his public career, except as a sort of instrument for checking estimates of his character.

And perhaps by this time his character and his life and everything connected with him are chiefly interesting because he wrote the wonderful little book which the new and first Professor of French at Oxford has re-edited and published, though not at Oxford itself. It should be understood that the 'him' in Professor Rudler's title is to be taken in the strict sense of 'apparatus criticus'; that is to say, he does not here attempt aesthetic appreciation of "Adolphe." He gives us the text, edited with the same normalien minuteness which has been noted in the other volume here yoked with his; variants of the different editions and some MS. fragments, prefaces of these editions, facsimile title-page and what not. One is not so much accustomed to this sort of thing in the case of novels as in that of poetry, and it may be a little irksome to some readers who have not learned the great art of not seeing what you don't want to see in a book when you don't want to see it, yet of utilizing it when you do. There is plenty to utilize. The "historical" part of the editing, however, admits of less dry places; and hardly the most stalwart devotee of literature for literature's sake can refuse to admit that "Adolphe" almost insists, if not on having a "key" applied to it, at any rate on having the question, "Is there a key or not?" considered. That Adolphe was Constant himself—partly as he was, partly as he thought he might be, partly as he would have liked to be, but knew he was not—is of course clear enough; and his own denial, in his letter to the Morning Post (duly given here), of the fact of and any personal reference in other characters really goes far enough; at all events it is no more a lie, but also no more a piece of evidence, than "not at home." But when you come to Ellenore, and in a very minor degree to the "supers," the case becomes different. The old idea that the lady was Madame de Staël, and Madame de Staël only—politely "made up" in facial attractions, and obligingly provided with the characteristics of her own heroines—will not sustain five minutes' expert examination. Professor Rudler undertakes the survey of this very inconstant Constant's numerous other loves, including even his not very enviable wife, and to some extent distributes the part between them all and "Corinne." Nobody need suspect in him the gross and puerile error of the usual "key"-critic, who wants to make every incident and almost every utterance in a work of literary art biographical, if not autobiographical. There is very much interest and real critical expertise in his dealing with the matter. But perhaps we should ourselves approach it from rather a different side, and come to the conclusion—not that Ellenore was inspired up from the various mistresses (as the rather inartistic story has it of the Greek painter's image), but that she was a real creation of fancy, touched and coloured and clad from hints and reminiscences supplied by Corinne, and Charlotte, and Belle de Zuylen and all the rest. That way, not the other, Genius works; and Benjamin Constant, if only for this once, had genius in composing what has been called "the swan-song of Sensibility."

One little point we may be permitted to dwell on for a moment. Professor Rudler says: "Du pénom bizarre [why bizarre?] d'Ellenore je n'ai pu encore retrouver l'origine." He consulted Professor Ker, than whom he could hardly have had a better adviser, and his counsel found him an "Ellenore" in Hutcheson's "Arran Journal" [1783]. But is it necessary to go so far? There is no other name to which Fate and metaphysical aid have decreed so many variants as to that of Helen. Ellen, Elaine, Eleanor, Elinor, Eliénor, Eleanor, half a dozen others, exist and occur. But without actual "presuming to dictate" as to the existence of "Ellenore," and having too few books at hand to settle the whole question, may we not suggest that Spenser's "Hellenora" (so called in the prose preface to the "Faerie Queene," but in the verse usually shortened to "Hellenore") is quite sufficient, and at any rate entirely removes any "bizarre" character? Constant knew a good deal about English; he must have known how we frequently de-aspirated this "Helen" group of names, and as a Frenchman he would have been inclined to do so himself. At any rate, here is a contribution to the puzzle, if puzzle it be. For one cannot help thinking that one has seen "Ellenore" itself elsewhere.

GEORGE SAINTSBURY.

CROCE AND CARDUCCI

Giosè Carducci: Studio Critico. By Benedetto Croce. (Bari, Laterza. 5.50 lire.)

Many readers will be glad to have these essays in a separate volume. It is difficult for a foreigner, living out of the battle area, to understand the violent agitation they awakened in some quarters in Italy. The very title of the first, "Anticarduccionismo Postumo," in which Croce deals with Thovex's strictures, is surely a clear indication of his point of view. In an appendix he gives an interesting account of his relations with Carducci. His admiration for his poetry from his first acquaintance with it as a schoolboy and of his pride at being asked to assist him in his scholarly researches when a young man. But this devotion does not blind Croce either to Thovex's ability or to the truth that underlay some of his charges, and apparently nothing but an absolute refusal to see the valid points in the sun would satisfy the majority of the critics. To our mind, Croce's account of the development of Carducci's poetry is among the best things of the kind he has done. When we first came across those terrible German-sounding categories, political-ethical, historical-epical and the rest, we rubbed our eyes in astonishment; but once we are launched upon the essay, we realize that in his hands they are merely the spontaneous outgrowth of a lifelong communion with the poet, with nothing artificial about them. They would have passed almost unnoticed had not such stress been laid upon them in the contemporary literature for Italy made Carducci a true prophet-poet, and Croce insists that the European war was Carducci's war. Hence for him recent events are not awaiting their poet. They need no other poetry than the words: 'che Giosè Carducci muti del miglior sangue del suo cuore. But fortunately or unfortunately, the younger generation must always have poetry of its own. It cannot rest satisfied with that of its fathers, however great it may have been.
THE GREAT NAME AND THE INSPIRING PERSONALITY IN MODERN SPANISH EDUCATION IS THAT OF DON FRANCISCO Giner de los Rios. The best introduction to him is the essay by "Azorin"; he had been tramping in the Sierra Guadarrama, and was sitting on a rock eating his lunch—a little old man with twinkling eyes, dressed very simply. What was his philosophy? It was merely love of life and respect for it. He was more interested in men than in mere culture. In the second half of the nineteenth century there was among thinking men in Spain an attitude towards life of which Giner was, if not the originator, at any rate the chief representative. It was called "Krausism," but the men who adopted this attitude had been influenced by Krause. His works were not so much a model as an inspiration; indeed, many of the things which Krause said had already been said before by old Spanish writers. Moreover, Krausism, as practised by Don Francisco Giner and his disciples, was not a philosophy; it was as much a mode of action as of thought; it was a way of feeling towards life. Its tangible result was the foundation of the "Free School"—the "institución libre de Enseñanza."

There was something very Anglo-Saxon about the attitude of Giner. In any emergency, before a problem of thought or action, the question was not so much: What are the theories bearing of the case? but: What shall our attitude towards it? What shall we do? And what shall we do first? Open your eyes (said "Don Francisco"); look about you; and get hold of all the aspects of the thing. Don't act necessarily on the first impulse; don't go too fast. "Sharpen your wits, man, sharpen your wits!" He knew that these practical virtues were not strange to his countrymen; but he saw that something—bad education, bad government, mysticism (or whatever it might be)—had pushed them into the background. An example of this unpractical thinking occurred not long ago in Madrid. A girl coming out of church was run over by a tram, and remained beneath it. The driver had been travelling rather fast, and the fury of the crowd was unbounded; they knocked him about, and broke the windows of the tram. Then someone suggested that it might be well to fetch a jack, so as to get the poor girl from under the wheels. It was a long time before the tram could be raised, and by then all help was too late. This is the kind of thing which would have infuriated Don Francisco; he could not tolerate a type of mind which thought it more important to punish the conductor for his act than to try to save the victim. It was mistaking the shadow for the substance; ignoring the practical and immediate side of things.

It is beside the point to criticize the views of Giner from the position of a doctrinaire philosopher, and think him a back number because he believed in "Krausism." His view of life was a manner rather than a philosophy; it is incarnate in the "institución libre de Enseñanza." Indeed, it is hardly an exaggeration to say that the things in modern Spain which a stranger can most approve and admire are due to the precept and example of this "Free School." Literature, art, education, have felt the reviving breath, and even politics have not been unaffected by it. Gradually, in the last thirty years, the influence of this little group of thinkers and teachers has been extending over the whole of Spain. The spirit of the Institution libre, the spirit of Giner, determined the direction of the group of writers known as "the Generation of 1898." It has revived interest in nature, and consequently in the landscape and appearance of Spain; it has renewed Spanish painting in the work of Sorolla, Zuloaga and others; it has led to re-examination of traditional literary values. People are really reading the old poets instead of talking about them or merely accepting them; and, especially while the rest of Europe has been engaged in destruction, it has led to the publication of editions of the Castilian classics which are admirable in their production of real scholarship and surprisingly cheap. And even in manners, cleanliness it is not altogether fanciful to detect, as "Azorin" does, something of the influence and the personality of Don Francisco Giner.

Don Francisco is like most thinkers in foreign countries, was profoundly impressed by the spectacle of Gladstonian England; and in 1884 he came here for the International Conference on Education. He became acquainted with the aims and achievements of English educationists; and on his return to Spain, he tried to introduce English methods into the Spanish schools. But the old gang were up against him; while he seemed at first to accept the situation, he and his friends planned and worked, and eventually, from small beginnings, the "Free School" took shape and gained in importance and prestige. "Free" in this connection did not mean that instruction was to be given gratuitously; the Institution was free, from the very beginning, from the inspection and control of both the Government and the Church, and for this reason it prospered exceedingly.

It made a firm stand for individualism; it went in for science, which up to that time had been little studied in Spain; and founded laboratories, which until then had been unknown in the Peninsula.

Giner realized that the problem of Spanish national progress was a miscellaneously connected with the problem of education; and on his return, he had become convinced that the human problem, not merely as a national one. He sought help from all the educational authorities in Europe. The idea of escruciones escolares and exchange of students he got from Paris; he learned a great deal from the masterly way in which the Germans were then reorganizing their own system; but he was never tired of thanking God for implementing the English for the sympathy and good-will which they had shown him and the very real interest which his English friends always took in his undertakings. Don Francisco insisted that his pupils should travel. Among those who became intimately acquainted with English life wrote a little book on Spanish music, and the guide to Spanish domestic art collections at South Kensington) and Cosio.

D. Manuel Cosio has achieved European reputation through his studies in painting and particularly his book on El Greco, whom he may almost be said to have re-discovered, and his friends are always looking forward to the day when he will write the great book on Rousseau, which no one in Spain could do better than he can. Sr. Cosio has preserved more of the fire and common sense of Don Francisco than any of his other pupils. Moments passed in his company listening to his conversation are among the greatest of any that are to be experienced in Spain. He is himself the memorial of a great friendship—"a light transferred, not lost." As we sat in the firelight after tea it was impossible not to be entranced by the humour, sympathy and "sane benevolence" which sparkled in his eyes. Sr. Cosio is never tired of saying how inspiring Don Francisco was as a master, both of small boys and of older ones. All the best living Spanish teachers were educated by him, or have felt his influence through him. Many of them owe to his ability to teach, to Don Manuel Cosio. And Englishmen should be particularly grateful to him for the way he stood up, not so much for the Allies, as for England, all through the war. His reasons were purely intellectual. He had no need to preach to his pupils on that subject; they were all pro-Ally for other reasons. He did not condemn prejaltudial to Englishmen, and would have given his right hand if he could have found a conclusive answer to the Spanish militarist's parting shot in any discussion—the question of Gibraltar. It never occurs to us to try to understand the bitterness which Spaniards feel towards our continued possession of Gibraltar. Many who are neither screaming militarists nor anti-English observe with annoyance how Gibraltar, under British rule, is a refuge for all the undesirable characters in the Peninsula, and a place where, as it seems, there is an open door for all kinds of smuggling into Spain.

Some people would describe Sr. Cosio as an old gentleman. But it is only reactionaries and mystics who could think him that. That little figure in his very Oxford- or Cambridge-looking armchair, with his eyes twinkling with keenness, like those of an undergraduate discussing metaphysics in the firelight—that figure could never grow old. On all the vital questions indifference to which is nowadays a test of the petrifying mind—the deplorable consequences of the peace, the value of international understanding, and the exchange of students and understanding of other races have always been cardinal points in his doctrine; and it was mainly with that object in view that the little band of intellectuals inspired by him or by Don Francisco quietly founded what is known as the "Junta para Ampliación de Estudios," the Board for the completion or widening of studies.

J. B. T.

MODERN BANKING

JEAN. Par Charles Heyraud. (Paris, Grasset. 5fr.)

The hero of this novel is the handsome and distinguished manager of La Banque Duchêne, who has a habit of discoursing to his mixed war staff on Atavism, Love, and the Advantages of Faith. Any lady member of the staff who finds the lectures obscure has the right, apparently, to invade his private office and politely demand elucidation. No fewer than three of the ladies fall in love with him and declare their passion in these interviews. Our hero is very much surprised and distressed at the results of his eloquence, for he is a peace man and the father of the class. He recognizes the advances of the first two sirens, but is about to succumb to the third at the moment when an accident robs him of one of his children. He interprets this as a judgment from Heaven and remains in the path of virtue. The moral of the story—pointed at some length by the author—is that such things are bound to happen in a mixed staff, and that the atmosphere is corrupt and dangerous, and the organization opposed to the intentions of Providence, which has decreed that the place of woman is the home. If M. Heyraud is right the outlook for the modern world is certainly alarming. If the administration of La Banque Duchêne is characteristic of modern banking we tremble for the condition of our accounts: For ourselves, we are confident that M. Heyraud is an alarmist; but we recommend our readers to scrutinize their pass-books with care, and to adopt a firm attitude if they have any reason to suppose that their bank manager has a turn for oratory.

W.

LA NUEVA REVOLUCION. By P. M. Turull. (Barcelona, Imprenta de Henrich, 3 pts.)—Really it begins to look as if Spain were one of the few countries in which people have a clear vision of international problems. Here, for instance, is Sr. Turull, the editor of Messor, a monthly review published in Barcelona, saying all the right things, and often putting them in a new and arresting way. There are no firmer supporters of the League of Nations as it ought to be than the Catalan thinkers; and in this book international understanding and communication are shown to be the basis of all progress, intellectual and material. Sr. Turull recommends himself to us by his sympathetic sketch of Engenio D'Ors, one of the greatest minds in modern Spain; he shows his practical wisdom in a most sensible article on the development of railways as a means of improving international understanding and culture. We are sure that the whole of Barcelona, not only the intellectuals, would rejoice if the line to the French frontier were reduced to normal gauge. Sr. Turull shows the folly of having made Spanish railways broad gauge for strategic reasons; Russian broad gauge did not prevent the German victories, nor did the normal gauge of the French and German lines shorten or lengthen the war in the West. In days when short-sighted malefactors are doing all they can to shut up each country by itself (by increasing foreign postal rates to 4d., for instance) a book like this is most welcome. It is pro-Ally in sympathy, but is not an unfair statement. Some of it would perhaps have been altered if Sr. Turull could have read Mr. Keynes' book on the peace; it is sure to be in the "Ateneo" at Barcelona by this time.

J. B. T.

---

List of New Books

Prepared in co-operation with the Library Association.

The method of classification adopted is a series of groups roughly corresponding with the Dewey Decimal System, the sub-classes being indicated, for the benefit of librarians and others familiar with the system, by the class-numbers given at the end of each entry. The first numeral in these represents the main class, the second one of the subdivisions, and so on.

Those works in the List which appear most suitable for purchase by Public Library Authorities are marked with an asterisk.

100 PHILOSOPHY.

See review, p. 509.

*Meiklejohn, Dr. Tuckett explains in his address at Southcalc Institute on March 18, 1920, may be defined as the mental attitude of persons who believe in hypotheses that elude empirical inquiry, and are satisfied with merely verbal explanations of phenomena. There are three keys to unlock the door of mysticism: (1) to understand the nature of evidence and scientific method, and apply tests to every hypothesis; (2) to realize the character of subconscious processes, and allow for their influence on our judgment; (3) to submit our individual beliefs to group guidance—the group being those who show that they are unbiased seekers after truth.

In language as clear as James's, Mr. Turner examines and criticizes certain salient features of the American thinker's philosophy—pragmatism, pluralism and empiricism, and James's relationship to Bergson. He considers that James attached an exaggerated value to simplicity, and thus was content with a superficial view of many problems. Pragmatism is a compromise, like Bishop Blougiam's compromise between truth and expediency; it is really nothing more than the universal and rationalized extension of what, in a more limited sphere, is called the "Rule of Thumb." A true principle always works," "but it is a totally different thing to say that because it works, therefore it is true." This is a good example of the critic's trenchancy of method.

200 RELIGION.

Beresford-Plisey (John.). Private Devotions for Men: a book for daily prayers, intercession, and Holy Communion. Society of SS. Peter and Paul, 32, George Street, Hanover Square, W.1, 1920. 5 in. 127 pp., front. paper, 1 n. 248

Of a size suitable for the breast-pocket, this manual comprises daily prayers, instruction on repentance, prayers for confession, preparation for Holy Communion, an Office of Endowment, and other matters.

Crafer (Thomas Wilfrid). The Books of Haggai and Zechariah ('The Revised Version, edited for the use of schools'). Cambridge, Univ. Press, 1920. 7 in. 131 pp. map, index, 3 n. 224.97

Dr. Crafer's clear introductions and useful notes will be exceedingly helpful to students interested in the writings of these two minor prophets.

*Moore (George Foot). History of Religions: 2. Judaism; Christianity; Mohammedanism ('International Theological Library'). Edmund, T. & T. Clark, 1920. 8½ in. 568 pp. bdg., index, 14 269

The Professor of the History of Religion in Harvard University deals in the present volume with fathms which are so intimately related that morphologically they might be regarded as three branches of Western Asiatic and European monothetic religion. The origin of Christianity in Judaism, and the association of Islam with the impression made upon the mind of Mohammed by Jewish, and, in smaller degree, Christian ideas, are discussed by the author, who points out that the three theological systems have the same doctrines of creation by divine fiat, and a catastrophic end of the world; and each religion believes itself destined to universality. But each has an individuality which is stronger than the affinities; and many variations have arisen in each system which depart widely from the primitive type. This "multifarious" makes the author's task peculiarly difficult. Professor Moore considers the general trend of Christianity in Protestant countries to be towards a practical or "socialized" Christianity, which makes much of the thought of God as the Father of all men; of service to fellow-men as the essence of true religion; and of the reconstruction of society on the principles of the Gospel. "Original sin and the paralyzed or even eunuched will are quite antiquated, and with them the Pauline Augustinian doctrines of grace."

Outley (Richard R.). A Handbood to the Septuagint. Methuen [2020]. 8 in. 312 pp. bibl. app. index, 8/ n. 221-248

See review, p. 511.

300 SOCIOLOGY.

Although the British system has been in existence for sixty years, this is claimed to be the first book to set forth its principles. The writer regards the British system as including the Swedish, though it avoids the latter's "narrowness," its own great virtue being the book's order, the positions and movements used in mass exercises in graded groups, arranges them in progressive order as far as possible parallel with cerebral evolutions, and explains the value and different uses of fixed apparatus. It is a comprehensive and businesslike manual.

The book is planned for a three years course. In the successive groups of chapters the author discusses, firstly, general principles; secondly, practical questions connected with the geography of the British Isles; and thirdly, the various countries, studied by groups based upon their relation with the world's great trade-routes.

Hill (David Jayne). Present Problems in Foreign Policy. New York, Appleton, 1919. 7 in. 375 pp. apps. index, 8/2 n. 327

The author contends that "the League of Nations, as it has been framed, does not correspond to American traditions and ideals; it is in some respects an abandonment of them." He discusses the whole question from the American point of view, holding that the fundamental problem is the restoration of the reign of law, and that the lesson of the war is that the enforcement of international law is a universal, and not merely a national interest. He is severe on President Wilson for leaving the country and for acting too much on his own initiative.

Tarull (P. M.). La Nueva Revolución. Con una carta presenta de M. Lén Bourgeois de París, y seguida de una casuela sobre la Sociedad de Naciones. Barcelona, Imprenta de Henrich, 1919. 8 in. 250 pp., 3 pts. 341.1

See notice, p. 525.

Peppers, Evelyn, Sir Clodgesley Slove; Holmbooks, Nelson; and Adimals. His Good, Kellicoe, Sir Rosslyn Wemyss and Sir Eric Geddes, are the authors of these obituary dicta, which have been put together to remind us of the debt due to the officers and men who kept the Empire intact and have made Britain what she is.

400 PHILOLOGY.

The section comprises 1,571 words, of which 917 are main words. Adoptions, or formations on, Latin words and stems predominated. Comparatively few of the words present remarkable features, but the extraordinary number of variations in the word "vouchsafe" down to the sixteenth century is especially noteworthy. The important word "vivam" does not appear.

The aim of this pamphlet is to be "to prove and make evident the naturalness, international [sic] and Anglo-Frenness of Esperanto."

500 NATURAL SCIENCE.

Boapuet (Bernard), Implication and Linear Inference. Macmillan, 1919. 8 in. 180 pp., 7/6 n. 513

See review, p. 514.

Ridgway (Robert). The Birds of North and Middle America: a descriptive catalogue of the higher groups, genera, species, and subspecies of birds known to occur in North America, from the Arctic lands to the Isthmus of Panama, the West Indies, and other islands of the Caribbean Sea, and the Galapagos Archipelago: part 8 (U.S. National Museum, Bulletin 59). Washington, Govt. Printing Office, 1919. 10 in. 886 pp. 34 pl. index, paper. 596

Part 8 (the present volume of this important catalogue) deals with the Order Charadriiformes (plover-like birds).

The author has avoided purely artificial examples, and illustrates mathematical principles by cases drawn from everyday life. The inductive method is used, and the instances given are, as a rule, necessary parts of the argument. *Graphical representation, maps and plans, mensuration, logarithms, formulæ, chance, and games are among the subjects treated.

700 FINE ARTS.

Mennisky (Bernard), Mother and Child: 28 drawings. With text by Jan Gordon. Lane, 1920. 10 in. 79 pp., 15/ n. 741

See review, p. 517.

790 AMUSEMENTS, GAMES, SPORTS.

Owen (A. G. L.), Modern Bridge. Heath Stanton, 1920. 7 in. 95 pp., 2/6 n. 795

Major Owen's book is the outcome of many actual games played by a Bridge four—games set out here as illustrations of his ideas, which are suggestive and stimulating.

Warner (P. F.), Cricket Reminiscences: with some review of the 1919 season. Grant Richards, 1920. 9 in. 238 pp. il. pors., 15/ n. 797

See review, p. 508.

800 LITERATURE.

We have seen undergraduate papers that gave, on their first coming into the world, better promise than does the Cocoon. Its keynote of our notice is worth. That is excellent; but youth need not necessarily be associated with jejuneness, and the greater part of this number of the Cocoon is singularly crude and unripe. The three critical essays on Balzac, D'Annunzio and "Modern Poetry" do not strike one as being very interesting or new, and among the original verses we find but a gem which deserves Archipelago.

I shivered through some filthy slime in Hell. Losing my balance, once again I fell Headlong in some foul slime, so loud of smell My very innmost soul did belch in agony.
They were doing that at Oxford in 1910. It is to be hoped that the future numbers of the Cocoon will be more interesting than the first.

Gillea (E. A.). PERSEPHONE; AND OTHER PLAYS. Amersham, Morland (Foyle), 1920. 71 in. 86 pp., 3.6 n. 192.9

Four little plays by a young man, and prose, one of which is founded on Christina Rossetti's "Goblin Market." They are intended, we imagine, for children. Personally, we believe in giving children something rather more solid than such a very mild and diluted form of literature.

Legat (Maurice). PENSEES SUR LA SCIENCE, LA GUERRE ET SUR DES SUJETS TRES VARIES. Brussels, Lamertin, 11 in. 59 pp., 3.6 n. 848.9

An immense and well-selected commonplace book. For the lovers of what Chaucer would have called "high sentence," and for all who like to ornament their style with unfamiliar quotations. M. Legat's book will be a treasure-house.

POETRY.

Carducci (Giosué). Croce (Benedetto). Giosüé CARDUCCI: STUDIO CRITICO. Bari, Laterza, 1920. 8 in. 182 pp. paper, 5.50 lire. 851.84

See notice, p. 523.

*Chénier (André). ŒUVRES COMPLÈTES DE ANDRÉ CHÉNIER, publiées d'après les manuscrits par Paul Dimoff ("Collection Pauls"). Paris, Delagrave [1919]. 71 in. 349 pp., 6fr. 841.56

See review, p. 522.

This little book is the first of the "St. George Series," which is, we understand, to comprise original work in poetry and prose as well as reprints of older literature. The printing and paper are both excellent. Miss Forde's poems on Love, Joy, Peace and the other "fruits of the Spirit" are unpretentious little pieces in a variety of measures.

Guest (Edgar A.). SUNNY SONGS. Fisher Unwin, 1920. 71 in. 101 pp., 1.6 n. 811.5

Mr. Guest is an American poet who, to quote the publisher's announcement, "is keenly sensible of the humour of domestic life, but is deeply sympathetic with the associations which combine in the word 'Home.' In his own line he is an extremely accomplished writer who deserves the success he has had in America.

Napier (Margaret). SONGS OF THE DEAD. With an introduction by Edward Garnett. Lane, 1920. 3/4 in. 80 pp., boards, 5/ n. 821.9

We are reminded that we read Miss Napier's book of that problem of our schooldays: What would happen if an irresistible force came up against an immovable object? We feel in these poems the struggle of an irresistible force of emotion with an immovable barrier of dumbness. They are poems of frustration, imperfect verbal equivalents of great spiritual experiences, greater in intention and conception than in realized execution. Miss Napier writes in free verse, in a curiously tortured style full of inversions (one has the feeling that she is trying to express, by the unnatural quality of the style, the more than normal intensity of her emotion). At moments she can write with complete simplicity:

Daily I watched over the hill
Day broke in blood-red glory,
Nature in her beauty appalling
As in her cruelty.

Tiger to me the one and the other,
Digger I delved not for meaning.

There is a strange quality in these lines that makes us look forward with interest to Miss Napier's next book.

Stewart (Edith Anne). POEMS. Second Book. Swarthmore Press, 1919. 71 in. 42 pp. paper, 2.6 n. 821.9

Most of the poems in Miss Stewart's volume are religious or ethical in theme. She writes for the most part with that almost forced simplicity, that deliberate flatness, which seems, among our contemporaries, to be the result of a kind of intellectual asceticism; they reject the easy beauty of rich words and phrases, preferring the dry crusts of language.

FICTION.

Constant (Benjamin). ADOLPH. Edition historique et critique par Gustave Rudler. Manchester, Univ. Press [Longmans], 1920. 71 in. LXXXVI-168 pp., apps. index, 7/6 n. 849.83

See review, p. 522.

Crommelin (May). SUNSHINE ON THE NILE. Jarrolds [1920]. 7 in. 256 pp., 7/6 n.

Robert Franklin, the son of a clergyman, in order to help his widowed mother and invalid sister, accepts the position of secretary-valet to Lord Ludsworth, who had been at the same college at Cambridge. Robert possesses from a position of great danger a rich Canadian girl with whom her father, is on a visit to Lord Ludsworth, and afterwards with his patron-employer meets her again in Egypt, where her father has gone on an archaeological expedition. This gives scope for plenty of local colour, and the outcome of the story may easily be divided.

Heyerdal (Charles). JEAN. Paris, Grasset, 1920. 71 in. 273 pp., paper, 8fr. 843.9

See notice, p. 525.

These sketches for the most part deal with the war. "Damn Good Fellers," in which the author pillories a certain type of shallow-brained army officer; "Equality of Sacrifice," a satire upon the difference between the treatment of a subsaharan whose father has twenty thousand francs a year, and that meted out to a private who in civil life is an omnibus conductor; and "In Token of Gratitude," which shows a business firm's meanness to a clerk who had voluntarily enlisted, are super-charged with arguments for the anti-militarist. The best sketch, from a literary point of view, is "Ahémiot: Goddess of Kindliness." The heroine is a French nurse—a living personage. "My Lady of Hoxton" also is a real character.

Lavender Drayton, who writes songs and has the face of a Madonna, becomes acquainted with David Osborne, a medical practitioner in the East End of London. The two fall in love, but are parted for a while. Osborne, however, is called upon to attend Lavender's artist brother, whose death the doctor afterwards thinks he has hastened by a misadventure. Matters are straightened out before the end of the book, which is stated to be the author's first novel. There are some subsidiary love episodes. The story is pleasant.

Mr. Le Queux lives up to his sub-title, for the Red Widow and her accomplices adopt the latest discoveries about germs and bacteria for doing to death the victims they have marked down in order to enrich themselves. Poisoners gained an unenviable notoriety in Italy in the Middle Ages, but they were often employed for purposes of revenge. The motives of Mr. Le Queux's characters are merely sordid.

910 GEOGRAPHY, TOPOGRAPHY, ANTIQUITIES.

*Buchanan (Angus). WILD LIFE IN CANADA. Murray, 1920. 8 in. 286 pp. il, map, 15/ n. 917.12

The silent solitudes traversed by Captain Buchanan in an eight months' journey of some two thousand miles beyond the white man's frontier of Saskatchewan, are still as they were, unvisited by any other white man. He was an observant student of the animals, birds, and fishes, a graphic delineator of the scenery, and an understanding friend to the Cree and Chipewyan Indians, who are well portrayed in the photographs. The catalogue of birds are valuable, and the book is full of practical information for future explorers.

Chase (Beatrice). PAGES OF PEACE FROM DARTMOOR. Longmans, 1920. 71 in. 191 pp. il, 6/6 n. 914.235

A correspondent tells his. Chase, "though, as everyone knows, you can write English, you won't." Presumably she takes no trouble with her punctuation because she won't yet it would improve her English. The book is the loving, the enthusiastic expression of all she feels and all she has felt in her life on Dartmoor, which “stands for unspoilt and magnificent creation fresh from the hand of God. No one can love Dartmoor without loving, even if only unconsciously, that part of the world that conceived and created it.”

*Hale (F.), FROM PERSIAN UPLANDS. Constable, 1920. 9 in. 248 pp. maps, 10/6. 915.3

See review, p. 508.

Mr. Newton’s bright narrative of the Prince’s tour in Canada only confirms the charming impression already formed by the public. We close this pleasant book with the conviction that the Prince of Wales will have almost unprecedented opportunities of influencing the world for good; and we believe that he will endeavour to take advantage of them.

Sousby (L. H. M.), THE AMERICA I SAW IN 1916-1918. Longmans, 1920. 7½ in. 217 pp., 6/6 n. 917.3

The worthy authoress spent two years in America, passing the time in a series of short visits; she found the Americans extremely kind and gracious. She felt like Tobit in Paragino’s picture, “wandering over the world with successive angels holding my hand.” Her heart is full of one big “thank-you.” Country life in Maine, Massachusetts, Connecticut; summer at Dan Harbour; delightful months in and near San Francisco; the deserts of Arizona whilst she lost the old-world atmosphere of Richmond and Charleston; conventions, mothers’ unions, and meetings at St. Louis, and undenominational meetings at Northfields under the Moodys—her impressions came from such varied sources. She appears to have dwelt in a spiritual Eldorado, a veritable earthly paradise. At the Moodys’ she felt “as if you passed the Lord at every turn on the stairs, and heard the rustle of his garments just leaving the room as you enter.”

920 BIOGRAPHY.

D’Oyly (Sir Hastings), TALES RETAINED OF CELEBRITIES AND OTHERS. Lane, 1920. 8 in. 171 pp. por., 7/6 n. 920

For a great many years in the Indian Civil Service, Sir Hastings D’Oyly put down these stories, he says, for private circulation among his relatives and friends. They may have been written with a mild interest for members of the general public.

A review, will appear.

930-990 HISTORY.

*The Annual Register: a review of public events at home and abroad for the year 1919. Longmans, 1920. 9 in. 550 pp. index, 30/ n. 909

There are far more important and valuable works of reference than the “Annual Register,” the present volume of which possesses all the excellent characteristics with which long user of the book has familiarized readers. The summaries of English History and of Foreign and Colonial History are admirable. Outstanding features of 1919 were the conclusion of the Peace of Versailles and the occurrence of many disputes in the world of labour. A very clear account is given of Lenin’s dissolution of the Russian Constituent Assembly in January, 1918.

See review, p. 507.

The author has produced a lively and interesting resume of Japanese institutions and conditions. He writes throughout as an admirer of the Japanese, although he is by no means undiscriminating in his enthusiasm. His book is distinctly illuminating, although we may complain that too much space is devoted to the dry bones of political and military matters, and not enough to the psychology of the people and its expression in literature and the other arts. The comparison of civilization with W. J. Locke is not calculated to awaken great interest in modern Japanese literature on the part of all readers.

940.9 THE GREAT EUROPEAN WAR.

Fuller (J. F. C.), TALES IN THE GREAT WAR, 1914-1918. Murray, 1920. 9 in. 355 pp. ill. maps, index, 21/ n. 940.9

Brevet-Colonel Fuller, who was Chief General Staff Officer of the Tank Corps from December, 1916, to August, 1918, gives an account of the work of the tanks, compiled from official records and the reports of eye-witnesses: shows that petrol will revolutionize warfare; producing a new type of weapon which is more efficient and less costly; and explains how the coming of the tank rendered possible a true “war of attrition,” with economy of life. “The main factor in future warfare,” says Colonel Fuller, “will be the replacing of man-power by machine-power.”

This work, by one of the most chivalrous, humorous, and kindly German officers of high military rank who took part in the war, is of great interest. The author, who remarks that he knew that the fate of the colonies, as of all other German possessions, would be decided on the battlefields of Europe, describes in concise terms the role of the East African natives, alludes to the “incredible way” in which rumours and news are spread even in the interior of Africa, and relates much that is instructive about European colonization in the “Dark Continent.” Alluding to the German shortness of supplies of medicine, General von Lettow-Vorbeck mentions that the “liquid quinine, produced by boiling Pervian bark, had an infernal taste,” and was known among the patients as “Lettow-Schnaps.” The author’s account of the receipt of the news of the armistice being signed is followed by the statement that the German troops, native as well as European, could have held out for at least another year, and it is pointed out that “in cold truth the German force, which at the most comprised some 300 Europeans and about 11,000 Askari, had occupied a very superior enemy force for the whole war.” Distinction is added to this notable book by the thirteen striking drawings contributed by General von Lettow-Vorbeck’s adjutant.

Livesay (J. F. B.), CANADA’S HUNDRED DAYS: WITH THE CANADIAN CORPS FROM AINSLIE’S MOUNDS, Aug. 8—Nov. 11, 1918. Toronto, Allen, 1919. 10 in. 431 pp. front. (por.) maps, index, 940.9

A detailed record of the fine work of the Canadian Corps under Sir Arthur Currie. The dash of the Canadians and the brilliant qualities of their commander are spiritedly delineated. The operations before the capture of Cambrai and the wanton destruction of that town previously carried out by the Germans; the entries into Valenciennes and Mons; the citizens’ rapturous reception of the Canadian troops; and numerous other matters of interest are reviewed by the author.

*McLaren (Eva Shaw), cd. A HISTORY OF THE SCOTTISH WOMEN’S HOSPITALS. Hodder & Stoughton, 1919 9 in. 224 pp. maps, pi., 15/6 n. 940.376

The name of Dr. Elsie Inglis will long be revered in association with the foundation and organization of the Scottish Women’s Hospitals—a work for which, in 1917, Dr. Inglis sacrificed her life. The devoted labours of her colleagues, among whom were Miss Frances Ivins, Dr. Eleanor Soltau, Dr. Archibald Hutchinson, and the Hon. Mrs. Haverfield (who died very recently), will also be recalled with lasting gratitude abroad, as well as in England. The hospitals at Royaumont and Villers Cotterets, and at various centres in Serbia, were established very early in the war, and the achievements of the staffs were superb. The book before us, of which much has already been said in the various reviews, is particularly interesting; and there is a notable account of the celebrated retreat of the Serbians across the plain of Kosaovo and through the passes of the Albanian mountains.
Appointments Vacant

COUNTY BOROUGH OF SUNDERLAND EDUCATION COMMITTEE.

WANTED, an ASSISTANT ART MASTER, specially qualified in Design as applied to Metal Work, Pottery and Process Work for reproduction. Preference will be given to applicants capable of taking life classes.

Salary £180 by £10 per annum, to £220 and then by £18 per annum, to £370. Teaching experience, including approved courses of training abroad and to a maximum of ten years, will be taken into consideration in fixing the initial salary.

Applications, on forms to be obtained from the undersigned on receipt of stamped addressed envelope, should reach this office not later than Wednesday, May 12, 1920.

HERBERT REED,
Chief Education Officer.

Education Offices, 15, John Street, Sunderland.

APRIL 13, 1920.

IPSWICH HIGH SCHOOL (G.P.D.S.T.).

 SCIENCE MISTRESS WANTED in September. Chemistry and Botany. Experienced teacher essential. Able to organize Advanced Course. Salary £200-£250, according to qualifications and experience.—Apply HEADMISTRESS, The High School, Westerfield Road, Ipswich.

UNIVERSITY OF LONDON KING’S COLLEGE.

EVENING SCHOOL OF ENGLISH.

APPLICATIONS are INVITED for the POST of LECTURER in ENGLISH LANGUAGE AND LITERATURE in the Evening School of English. The duties of the office will commence on October 6, 1920.

Salary, £300 per annum.

Applications, with copies of not more than three recent testimonials, should be addressed to the SECRETARY, so as to reach him not later than Wednesday, May 5.

CITY OF SHEFFIELD EDUCATION COMMITTEE.

TECHNICAL SCHOOL OF ART (ARUNDEL STREET).

REQUIRED.—A well-qualified ART INSTRUCTOR to teach Preparatory Art Subjects. Applicants who have had experience with special art classes for teachers in training colleges, elementary and secondary schools will receive preference. Salary, according to qualifications and experience; minimum, £200, rising by annual increments of £12 to £400.

Application forms, which may be obtained at this office, should be completed and returned to the undersigned by May 21.

Education Office, PERCIVAL SHARP, Director of Education.

TWICKENHAM PUBLIC LIBRARY.

APPLICATIONS are invited for the POST of SUB-LIBRARIAN.

Salary, including bonus, £177 per annum.

Applications, in candidate’s own handwriting, stating age, experience, L. A. certificates or other qualifications, accompanied by not more than three recent testimonials, and endorsed “Sub-librarian,” to be delivered not later than May 3 to The Librarian, Public Library, Twickenham.

Appointments Vacant

ALICE OTTLEY SCHOOL, WORCESTER.

SCIENCE MISTRESS REQUIRED for May 4, in large girls’ Secondary School. Good Botany and Chemistry. Temporary or permanent post. Salary to well-qualified lady, £75 for the term.

Apply, Miss SPURLING, Alice Ottley School, Worcester.

STOKE NEWINGTON PUBLIC LIBRARY.

JUNIOR MALE ASSISTANT.

APPLICATIONS are invited for the POST of JUNIOR MALE ASSISTANT.

Salary, £150 per annum, including war bonus. Public Library experience essential.

Preference will be given to candidates holding Library Association Certificates, or who, by reason of service in His Majesty’s Forces, have been prevented from qualifying for these certificates.

Applications, endorsed “Assistant,” to reach me not later than April 14.

GEORGE PREECE,
Librarian and Clerk.

Scholarships, etc.

UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO.—Three Ouseley Memorial Scholarships of the value of £50 for one year will be offered on the results of an examination to be held at the University in July, 1920, in the following languages: Arabic, Persian, Hindi. Copies of the form of entry and further particulars will be forwarded on application to the undersigned. Entries must be received on or before May 15.

P. J. HARTOG,
Academic Registrar.

THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

Prince Consort Road, S.W.7.

Incorporated by Royal Charter, 1883.

Patron: His Majesty The KING.

President: H.H. The PRINCE of WALES, K.G.

Director: HUGH P. ALLEN, Esq., M.A., Mus.Doc.

Hon. Secretary: GEORGE A. MACMILLAN, Esq., D.Litt.

THE MID-SUMMER TERM will commence on Monday next, April 26. Entrance Examination, Thursday, April 22. Syllabus and official Entry Form may be obtained on application to the Registrar.

SIXTEEN FREE OPEN SCHOLARSHIPS (including the WALTER VAN NOORDEN SCHOLARSHIP for Operatic Composition) will be competed for in June, 1920. Last day for receiving official entry forms, accompanied by Registrar’s Official Stamped Certificate of Birth, is April 21, 1920.

THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC PATRONS’ FUND.

(Founded by Sir S. ERNEST PALMER, Bt., for the encouragement of British Composers and Executive Artists.)

Particulars may be obtained from the Registrar of the College.

CLAUDE AVELING,
Registrar.

THE ATHENÆUM

A JOURNAL OF ENGLISH AND FOREIGN LITERATURE, SCIENCE, THE FINE ARTS, MUSIC, & THE DRAMA.

SIXPENCE.

Postage: U.K., 1d.; Abroad, 1d.
Art Exhibitions

R.W.S. ROYAL SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER-COLOURS.
174th EXHIBITION NOW OPEN. 10 till 6.
5a, PALL MALL, EAST (near National Gallery).

ETCHINGS BY IAN STRANG
THE CHELIY GALLERY
by the Town Hall, Chelsea.

GRAFTON GALLERIES.
FRENCH EXHIBITION OF GALERIE DES BEAUX ARTS OF PARIS. 10 till 6.
Admission 1½ inc. tax.

GAUGUIN, DEGAS, MANET, RENOIR, CEZANNE, VUILLARD, BONNARD, TOULOUSE, LAURET, STEINLEN, Etc., Etc.

Last Week of the EXHIBITION of Modern French Colour-Prints, Etchings, etc., at the ELDAR GALLERY, 40, GREAT MARLBOROUGH STREET.
Open 10.30 to 6. Admission 1s. (including Catalogue).

NEGRO SCULPTURE
"Some of these are great sculpture.—greater, I think than anything we produced in the middle ages."
Mr. Roger Fry.

NEGR. OF THE GREAT TRADITION.
by the Town Hall, Chelsea.

DAILY and SUNDAYS, 10 till 6 UNTIL 29 APRIL.
ARMS OF THE ALPINE CLUB, Mill Street, Conduit Street, W.
"There is one thing Mr. Augustus John has above his contemporaries: that is, an instinct for painting."—Morning Post.
"It needs no prophetic insight to foretell that the exhibition will be one of the sensations of the season."—Daily News.
THE LATE MABEL NICHOLSON.
THE GOUPI GALLERY.
A SERIES OF PAINTINGS ON VIEW AT 5, REGENT STREET, W. 1
ADMISSION 1s. 3d. (WITH CATALOGUE), 10-5.30, SATURDAYS 10-1
The First Exhibition of PAINTINGS AND SCULPTURE by the "7x5.
Walker Galleries, 118, New Bond Street, APRIL 12—MAY 16.

Educational

ELOCUTION—Careful Individual Tuition in all branches for Pulpit, Stage, Platform, Public Recitals, etc., by DOUGLAS STEVENS, A.L.A.M.
"Mr. Douglas Stevens is an elocutionist of marked ability and considerable range."—Morning Post.
Particulars from 56, New Oxford Street, W.1. Tel. Museum 1785

Typewriting &c.

TYPETWIRING OF EVERY DESCRIPTION carefully and promptly executed by hand, 1s. per 1,000 words; carbon copy, 3d. per 1,000 words. Duplacting, Cambridge Local—Miss Nancy McFarlane, 11, Palmeira Avenue, Westcliff, Essex.

TYPETWIRING—Authors MSS., Examination Papers, Letters, Circulars, Testimonials, General Copying, Duplicating, etc.——1. TRIMNELL, 8, Moira Terrace, Cardiff.

TYPETWIRING and Duplacting carefully executed.—A GADD, 58, Acte Road, Kingston-on-Thames.

Miscellaneous

FADING PHOTOGRAPHS, Old Miniatures, etc., reproduced in facsimile of original when new. Valuable prints, china, etc. photographed.—F. MOORE, 10, Titchfield Terrace, London, N.W.1.

EXCELLENT BANK PAPER for Pen or Typewriter. Sample Ream, 480 sheets, 10 by 8½; three at 3s. 9d. each; six at 3s. 6d. Post Free. Cream Laid, Envelopes, Cards. Samples on application.—ALFRED ERICSON & CO., 2, Tudor Street, E.C. 4.

Authors' Agents, etc.

THE AUTHORS' ALLIANCE are prepared to consider and place MSS. for early publication. Literary work of all kinds dealt with by experts who place Authors' interests first. Twenty years' experience. Please note new address: 93 and 94, CHANCERY LANE, LONDON, W.C.2.

AUTHORS MS. TYPED. 1/- PER 1000 WORDS. Neat, Intelligent work. Circulars, Testimonials, etc., duplicated from 3/- for 25 copies. Literary Manager, OXFORD BUREAU, 3, CROSSHALL STREET, LIVERPOOL.

Proof reading, indexing, researches, revision—linguist, good experience.—Mr. F.A. HADLAD, 18, BELLEVUE MANOR, FOREST HILL, S.E.23.

Booksellers & Catalogues

BOOKS AND AUTOGRAPHS.
CATALOGUES FREE.

For Sale

SUITABLE FOR INSTITUTION OR SCHOOL,
BERKS.—ADJOINING WINDSOR FOREST.
In a Park. Fine Views.
An exceptionally well-built HOUSE, containing thirty to forty large Bedrooms, fine suite of very spacious Reception Rooms. Cottages, Garden, Stabling and numerous outbuildings.
HOME FARM AND PARK, 277 ACRES.
For Sale at mere fraction of original Cost.
RALPH PAY & TAYLOR, 24, Davies Street, Berkeley Square, W.

Appointments Wanted

A COMPLISHED LADY seeks Literary, Secretarial, or Education Post.—Address Box A, ATHENAEUM Advertising Office, 170, Fleet Street.
LADY, educated, capable, expert shorthand-typist, seven years' good commercial office and secretarial work; DESIRES POST as DAILY SECRETARY, or in office. S.W., district preferred. Accepted responsibility. Salary £3—Box B, Athenaeum Advertising Office, 170, Fleet Street, E.C.4.

Sales by Auction

BOOKS IN FINE BINDINGS FROM THE BRITWELL LIBRARY.
Messrs. SOTHEBY, WILKINSON & HODGE
WILL SELL by AUCTION, at their Large Galleries, 34 and 35, New Bond Street, W.1., on Monday, May 3, and following day at 1 o'clock precisely, a remarkably extensive SERIES OF BOOKS from the LIBRARY OF JACQUES AUGUSTE DE THOU, 1553-1617, the Illustrious Bibliophile Historian and Statesman; with a few other Books notable for their fine bindings, including important mosaic bindings, by A. M. Padoue and Le Monnier, and the only binding signed by Florimond Bodard known to exist in private hands, the property of S. R. Christie-Miller, Esq., formerly of Britwell Court, Burnham, Bucks.
May be viewed two days prior. Catalogues may be had. Illustrated catalogues, containing eight coloured plates, may be had, price 5s.

WORKS IN THEOLOGY FROM THE BRITWELL LIBRARY.
Messrs. SOTHEBY, WILKINSON & HODGE
WILL SELL by AUCTION, at their Large Galleries, 34 and 35, New Bond Street, W.1., on Wednesday, May 5, and two following days, at 1 o'clock precisely, VALUABLE EARLY ENGLISH AND SCOTTISH WORKS in Theology, Divinity, &c., from the renowned library formerly at Britwell Court, Burnham, Bucks, the property of S. R. Christie-Miller, Esq., including many books from the presses of Wynkyn de Worde and other English printers of the Sixteenth Century.
May be viewed two days prior. Catalogues may be had. Illustrated catalogues, price 2s. 6d. each.

Financial

£1,000 to £30,000 available. Immediate introductions given to highly educated, fully qualified men seeking Partnerships, Directorships and Employment with Investment.—The OFFICER'S PARTNERSHIP GUARDIAN, 53, Victoria Street, S.W.1., Call.
Ex-Service Men are being specially cared for by the

CHURCH ARMY

by means of
HOSTELS FOR THOSE ATTENDING THE HOSPITAL FOR fitting of artificial limbs, and those seeking work and learning trades;
EMPLOYMENT BUREAU FOR MEN OUT OF WORK;
TRAINING FARM in Essex (700 acres) and MARKET GARDEN at Stonebridge Park, Willesden, for training men to work on the land.

Friends of the DISABLED AND SHELLSHOCKED for helping men who have lost their health in the Country's cause.

THE MOTHERLESS CHILDREN of Ex-Service Men are taken in full charge.

THE EVANGELISTIC AND SOCIAL WORK is again in active operation. The WORK and its COST are both increasing.

CONTRIBUTIONS will be gratefully received by the Hon. Chief Secretary, Prebendary Carlisle, D.D., Church Army Headquarters, Bryanston Street, Marble Arch, London, W.1. Cheques, &c., should be crossed "Barclays, % Church Army."

THE POEMS OF WILFRID WILSON
GIBSON

Price 6d. Postage 1d.

No. II. of The Westminster Classics consists of a collection of the Poems of WILFRID WILSON GIBSON the special merits of which have been widely recognised by the Press.

The Nation says of them:—"The main thing about these poems is just that they are extraordinary poems; by means of their psychology, no less and no more than by means of their metre, their rhyme, their intellectual form and their concrete imagery, they pierce us with flashing understanding of what war is and means—not merely what it is to these individual pieces of ordinary human nature who are injured by it and who yet dominate it, but, by evident implication, what war is in itself, as a greatly multifarious whole. It seems to us beyond question that Mr. Gibson's "Battle" is one of the most remarkable results the war has had in literature."

THE ATHENÆUM
LITERATURE DEPT.,
10, ADELPHI TER., W.C.2.

Important.
The Publisher will be glad to hear from readers of "The Athenæum" who experience any difficulty in obtaining copies. All communications sent to 10 Adelphi Terrace, W.C.2, will receive immediate attention.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Inland,</th>
<th>Foreign,</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>£1 8s. 2d. per annum</td>
<td>£1 10s. per annum</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>post free.</td>
<td>post free.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Subscriptions should be sent to The Publisher, "The Athenæum," 10, Adelphi Terrace, W.C.2.
MACMILLAN'S LIST—NEW BOOKS.

LIFE OF LORD KITCHENER.

By Sir GEORGE ARTHUR, Bt., M.V.O.
3 vols. With Portraits and Plans. 8vo. £2 12s. 6d. net.

Letters of Henry James.
Selected and Edited by PERCY LUBBOCK. With two Plates of Portraits and Facsimile. 2 vols. 8vo. 36s. net.
The Morning Post: "Henry James here among his friends as a distinguished figure, but his chief interest is in his work, or rather the theory and rationale of his work which his life in his Letters discovers. It is this which makes him fascinating."

TWENTIETH THOUSAND.
The Economic Consequences of the Peace.
By JOHN MAYNARD KEYNES, C.B. 8vo. 8s. 6d. net.

NEW BOOK BY OWEN WISTER.
A Straight Deal, or The Ancient Grudge.
By OWEN WISTER, Author of "The Peutecost of Calamity," etc. Crown 8vo. 6s. net.

"A candid discussion of Anglo-American relations both from the historical and present-day point of view, and an earnest plea for closer and more friendly relations between the two countries."

With Introductory Essay by RABINDRANATH TAGORE.
Sakuntala.
By KALIDASA. Prepared for the English Stage by KEDAR NATH DAS GUPTA, in a New Version written by LAURENCE BINYON. Extra crown 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

The Idea of Progress:
An Inquiry into its Origin and Growth. By J. B. BURY, M.A., Regius Professor of Modern History in the University of Cambridge. 8vo. 14s. net.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON, W.C.2.

"CHRIST CRUCIFIED

THE POWER OF GOD AND THE WISDOM OF GOD."

The True doctrine of salvation according to the teaching of Christ and the Apostles.

"A brilliantly analysed Treatise on the Doctrine of Salvation which as orthodoxly interpreted has been such a stumbling block to many earnest thinkers." The Outlook.

By 'Colonel Garnier, Author of "The Worship of the Dead," etc., etc.

Price 4/6 net. Postage 2d.

CHAPMAN & HALL, 11, Henrietta Street, W.C.2.

MAY LIST OF PUBLISHERS' REMAINDERS
CONTAINING: MANY INTERESTING BOOKS, ALL IN NEW CONDITION, AT GREATLY REDUCED PRICES, NOW READY.

Write also for New List of the most popular Books on Natural History, Gardening, etc.

THE ECONOMIC CRISIS IN EUROPE

An admirably clear and concise popular presentation of the existing economic chaos in Europe, its causes, and its probable future effects, with certain suggestions as to the lines upon which restoration should proceed.

BRITISH PERIODICALS, LTD., 15 & 16, Gough Sq., London, E.C.

Mr. T. Fisher Unwin's Books.

A HISTORY OF MODERN COLLOQUIAL ENGLISH.

By HENRY CECIL WYLDE, Professor of English Language and Philology at the University of Liverpool. Cloth, 21s. net.

The book deals more particularly with the changes that have taken place during the last five hundred years in the spoken form of English. The development of English pronunciation and the changes in grammatical usage are dealt with in considerable detail, and there is a chapter on idiomatic colloquialisms, modes of expressing, forms of address in society, conventional and individual, methods of beginning and ending private letters, exclamatory, etc. The main part of the book is almost entirely upon new material collected from the prose and poetical literature, and also from letters, Diaries and Wills written during the five centuries following the death of Chaucer. A sketch is given of the chief peculiarities of the English dialects from about 1150 to the end of the 14th century, and special chapters are devoted to a general account of the language of the 16th, 17th, and 18th centuries respectively.

GEORGE TYRELL'S LETTERS.

Edited by M. D. PETRE, Author of "The Life of Father Tyrell." With a Frontispiece. Cloth, 16s. net.

Had Father Tyrell not been possessed by that religious passion which can be stronger than any other, he might have been known, as other members of his family were known, for his literary and classical gifts; for a style of singular grace and simplicity; for an irresistible and all-pervading humour.

The pronounced collection of his letters has been chosen with a view to presenting his varied personality; to show him in his lighter and brighter as in his sad and grave moods.

FEMINISM AND SEX EXTINCTION.

by DR. ARABELLA KENFALY. Cloth, 8s. 6d. net.

How, during, did women so easily take men's places? or is it that the Female sex threatens to supplant the Male in almost every department? In "Feminism and Sex Extinction" Dr. Arabella Kenfaly explains this by a new and arresting theory of the evolution of sex.

ABOUT IT AND ABOUT.

By D. WILLOWBY. Cloth, 12s. 6d. net.

A volume of sketches and studies with a bearing on many of the problems of the day.

LIFE AND LETTERS OF SILVANUS PHILLIPS THOMPSON, F.R.S.

By JANE S. THOMPSON and HELEN G. THOMPSON, Illustrated. Cloth, 21s. net.

An intimate account of the career of a man of great and varied gifts. It includes appreciation of his works as original investigator, teacher, writer, artist and "propagist."

ZANZIBAR: Past and Present.

By MAJOR FRANCIS B. PEARCE, C.M.G. (British Resident in Zanzibar). With a Map and 32 pages of Illustrations. Cloth, 30s. net.

"Major Pearce has taken immense pains in the compilation of his book; he has canvassed the archives, consulted the records of the British African and Eastern authorities, and drawn upon his own experiences to produce a well-constructed compendium of all that there is to be told of Zanzibar."—The Times.

MODERN JAPAN: its Political, Military, and Industrial Organization.

By WILLIAM MONTGOMERY McGOVERN, Lecturer on Japanese, School of Oriental Studies (Univ. of London), Priest of the Nishi Hongwanyi, Kyoto, Japan. Cloth, 16s. net.

"We have read no book on Japan that gives such an admirable picture of this forcible nation as Mr. McGovery's."—Daily Chronicle.

SUNNY SONGS.

By EDGAR A. GUEST. Poems. Cloth, 4s. 6d. net.

In America Mr. Guest is an extraordinarily popular writer of verses, though this is his first introduction in book form to the British public.

Mr. T. FISHER UNWIN's Spring Announcement List is ready, and a copy will be sent post free to any address on application. Special attention is directed to the "FIRST" Novels included in the list.

T. FISHER UNWIN LTD.,
1, Adelphi Terrace, London.
RAQUEL MELLER

D. RYDEN defined the characteristic failing of the English in the arts as never knowing when to leave off. And, though Dryden's instances of the failing were less convincing than the diagnosis itself, his judgment was sound. Not that the fact is wholly lamentable; not Dryden himself believed in his heart that it was. At the root of much that we hold most admirable in English literature lives the spirit of fine excess. But too often we find the excess without the fineness, the luxuriance without the pruning, a richness from which the dross has not been thoroughly purged.

Because we are a self-repressive race, we are inclined when embarked on a passion to tear it to tatters. Having with such pains broken through our first restraint, we lose all. It is hard for us to find the golden mean between too much control and none; we swing violently from under-to-over-statement. At times in our history we have become acutely conscious of our defect and have summoned the principles of our sweet enemy to our aid. As Dryden turned to the criticism of Bossu and Rapin, a generation ago we were directed to study the theories of a Flaubert and a Maupassant. But neither then nor now has much good come of the enforced engraftment. We have a finer fineness native to ourselves which languishes in the clear, cold chamber of French theory. In the matter of literature at least our neighbours have always had more to learn from us than we from them.

What we need is the control that supervenes upon complete abandonment, that is distilled like a quintessence from luxuriance itself, not superimposed upon it, at the source. We shall learn it chiefly from an assiduous frequentation of our own great heritage. But there are times when that process seems too slow and the tendency of the age is against it; and then it doubly behoves us to seize upon the examples of that strange perfection which occasion offers.

We have one in the acting and singing of Raquel Meller. In her, passion, of sorrow, of regret, of refusal, of physical surrender, is made expressive by the discipline of its own complete abandonment to itself. If the imaginative experience of the artist has been allowed completely to penetrate her soul, and her response is therefore subject to an instinctive governance so intimate that her acting and singing is a continuous and subtle revelation. There are no standards to which her gesture or the modulations of her voice can be referred; for she has achieved the end of a true artist and created something that bears the authentic impress of uniqueness. In her the control and the impulse to expression are no longer separate; they are, we feel, born together by reason of the fineness of her receptivity. The imagined experience strikes clean upon the whole of her sensitive being, and her response is modulated by an organic principle, an adjustment of the whole of herself to her new universe.

So we may conceive the slow turning of a flower toward the light or the languishing of a mind under the stress of pain crowded into an instant. There is a passing, a change, a rebirth of the whole being. It is this wholeness of Raquel Meller that sets her among the great dramatic artists of the world. She reveals to us never the surrender of a part to a part, but of the whole to a whole. So that, seeing her, we say to ourselves that this is how men and women would be if they were wholly what they are by intention, if the lie had not yet indurated their souls; and we understand once more, more fully perhaps than Keats himself, the words of his letter:
May not there be superior beings, amused with any graceful, though instinctive attitude my mind may fall into as I am entertained with the alertness of the Stoat or the anxiety of the Deer? Though a quarrel in the streets is a thing to be hated, the energies displayed in it are fine; the commonest Man shows a grace in his quarrel by a superior Being our reasons may take the same tone—though erroneous they may be fine. This is the very thing in which consists poetry.

This is, indeed, the very thing in which consists poetry.

M.

SOME LETTERS OF EDWARD THOMAS

THOMAS'S low state of spirits continuing, I told him of a little, romantically situated town, Llaurhan, in Caermarthenshire, that had much taken my fancy; and the three letters that follow describe his stay there for some weeks.

c/o Mrs. Wilkins,
Victoria Street, Llaurharne.
5. xi. 11.

DEAR GARNETT,

There was hardly any choice of lodgings, but I took the rooms at the bend in the road from the ferry, and they have turned out well so far. . . . By the way, if you do hear of any work that I can do, I wish you would let me know. Things go from bad to worse. . . . I hope it is nothing more than bad luck. I don't make friends, but neither do I make enemies, as a rule. Is my work worse? I shouldn't be surprised if I were made more careless than I used to be, having to do so much against the grain. I told you I was doing a book on 'Borrow.' What is there to say? yours,

E. THOMAS.

Llaurharne.
2. xii. 11.

MY DEAR GARNETT,

I am glad to hear from you, though everybody is becoming rather remote by this time. I have been to Manorbier, Haverfordwest, and St. Davids, and Swansea, but otherwise I have been immersed in Borrow and in my grievances. I tried to get Borrow's letters from Belloc, but got no book or answer; I will try something else. As to my 'Mullinick'—and many thanks for the review—that 'second edition in the press' is apparently only a dodge, as it has been announced six weeks now. I was glad to see De la Mare get that prize, tho' I much prefer the 'Mulla-Mulgars' to 'The Return.' A little while ago I borrowed 'Gerakli the Welshman,' but it is excruciatingly written and colourless, and at present I can't persuade myself to read anything—this is literally true; I read nothing except in the cause of my writing about Borrow. Mine will be a pure ex nihilo book without any foundation at all. It is written, and once it is done I shall hardly stay on here. After the New Year I may try Oxfich—if I go away at all, but I have convinced myself that food, etc., and any physical régime is practically worthless. Something will have to take place which cannot be brought about by any deliberate method, I think. I get no books here to review; I suppose I have disgraced E., as he never responds; same with the Saturday; while X. hypocritically 'regrets,' etc., and employs new reviewers twice weekly.

I am very sorry about Hudson and Mrs. Hudson. I have meant to write to him. Please give him a message if you see him on Tuesday.

Yours ever,

E. THOMAS.

Llaurharne.
13. xii. 11.

MY DEAR GARNETT,

My temperature being what you know it is, I naturally can't thank you properly for your letter—and also for the book sent me by Dewar at your suggestion, of which I am now using the wrapper for note paper. . . . The fact is I finished my Borrow on Tuesday, and then suddenly found myself reading it, for no reason, in order to stay on here for the present. So I am going to have a look at Swansea and Newport and Caerleon again, and may see you on my way home on Tuesday; I hope so, and Hudson, too.

If I had a few quiet months I could write a Welsh itinerary now, partly at any rate following Gerald, as I have been a good deal in his steps at St. Cleirs, Whitchurch, Llwhaden and Haverfordwest, Camrose, Newgate, St. Davids and Llanrhian, and I already know Caerleon, Newport, Neath, Swansea, Kidwelly and Caermaethen. Perhaps I shall fix myself somewhere on his northern route early next year and in a real Welsh district. Llaurharne is mostly English in language and other ways, though all the surrounding villages, except close to the coast on the West, speak Welsh and are only moderate at English. I have had some splendid bright windy weather, but of course too mild. I am just beginning to master the geography here and also the gossip of Llaurharne. But Borrow has absolved me, and I have scarcely written anything else. Sometimes a tune makes me think: 'Give me health and a day—' and I leave it at that. Did you ever see Haverfordwest? A most fascinating dirtyish old town with steep narrow streets up a hill, and with a castle and two fine towered churches on top, at the brink of a tidal river with many-windowed storehouses by the little quay, and some river mist, sawmill smoke, and a half moon before frost. I went twice, and walked up and down as I never did before in a town. The one drawback was that I felt Murhead Bone ought to be there for a few years. If I can possibly manage it I shall make some sketches out of this visit. I want to do a book on Swansea, which I know better than any town, but nobody wants it.

It was kind of you to speak to Dewar. Like everyone else—nearly everyone—he probably has 200 people to please and doesn't please any single one very much. Look at X. I am now competing for Xmas books with the Editor's little daughter and Y's schoolboy son and Z's niece and so on, above all of X himself. Some day I shall do a book on X's prose. I am collecting specimens now. Belloc did send me Borrow's letters after all, but I don't know if he will print my remarks.

The reason I asked you about Borrow was that you scoffed me out of doing the book three years ago. You probably didn't mean it as I took it, and will probably remember nothing about it. I don't revive it out of unkindness, but to show that, miserable sinner in journalism as I am, I am not the hardened and unconscious sinner that my misdeeds seem to proclaim. I sin with a sense of sin in these matters also. You sometimes rub it in, as if I needed telling!

Please tell me of your own, poet, prostitute or other hero that I can write a book about. My own list includes none that publishers will look at. Seriously I should like to see what I could make of some non-literary man or woman.

Yours ever,

E. THOMAS.

Scott James's notice of Davies was very good, and I hope you found something to like in the book. I think he is advancing into something stronger and more passionate as he gets sure of himself.

The two next letters refer to the composition of 'The Happy Go Lucky Morgans,' a book which, though of wistful, sensitive charm in atmosphere and characterization, had no more success than had Richard Jefferies' 'Amaryllis at the Fair.'

Wick Green,
25. xi. 12.

DEAR GARNETT,

We expect one immediately in search of a house. Did I tell you we very probably leaving ours for a cottage near the school which will save us a lot of rent and also garden trouble, but may mean rather more town life for me? a thing otherwise perhaps necessary if I am to pack up work. I have just finished the rough draft of a very loose fiction founded on early memories of a remarkable Welsh household in London twenty years ago. It has less pretensions in being a novel than E. V. Lucas's 'Listeners' Lure' or A. C.
enson's "Thread of Gold," but is something more than a connected series of essays. I wrote it to prove (to myself) that I could do something without being told to and on a fairly large scale.

Yours ever,
EDWARD THOMAS.

Wick Green.
Petersfield.
6. ii. 13.

My dear Garnett,

I am sending you my MS. to-day. Is the thread too slender, too important? Do you ever perceive a thread? I hope the book was better than any probable collection of essays, but quite see the possibility that artistically the prentice of being more than a collection of essays may spoil it. I think of writing a preface stating that all the characters but one are from life and offering prizes for identification. My idea was to be pseudonymous—calling myself Arthur Foxfield.

Yours ever,
EDWARD THOMAS.

The letters of 1913-14, which refer chiefly to private matters, I pass over, except one of October 24, 1914, which shows incidentally that Thomas, after producing for twelve years many books of remarkably fine imagination and critical quality, was in a worse position at the end than when he started. It recalls a remark of Conrad to me in 1899, viz., that the strain and anxieties of a seaman’s life were as nothing to those of a literary man.

Steep,
Petersfield.
24. x. 14.

My dear Garnett,

I got this letter more than a week ago and I ought to have sent it on to you at once. It is a very belated reply to the one I at once wrote to de la Mare after our conversation. Nothing has turned up since then. I get scrappy work, very few, and plenty of time to write what I like and find I can write. The other day I sent the Guardian something, but don’t know yet if they are keeping it. I was in Wales again lately in the Black Mountains of Caernartheshire — also at Carreg Cennen Castle — and among the Brecknock Beacons. I believe I could easily spend all my days this way, other things being equal, which they are not.

I hope to be up in London in a week or so to see you. Rupert Brooke, I hear, was under fire at Antwerp.

By the way, did Hudson ever lend you the book of poems I told you about—"North of Boston"—by Robert Frost? If he didn’t, I will. I should be very glad if they pleased you.

Yours ever,
E. T.

The following five letters refer to Thomas’s new experiments in verse and the lack of encouragement he received, and contain his replies to some of my criticisms:

Steep,
Petersfield.
11. iii. 15.

My dear Garnett,

These verses have just come back from Blackwood’s. I sent them, but under an assumed name, and the poor man Blackwood found them "puzzling." I think I shall try the Nation.* But I do not want my name to be connected with verses yet. Will you let me have these back?

Yours,
E. T.

Steep,
Petersfield.
13. iii. 15.

My dear Garnett,

Thank you for your letter and your criticism, which I can mostly agree with, except that I think the line England, old already, was called Merry.

* But the editor of the Nation agreed with his fellows, later on, in rejecting Thomas’s verse as a note to me testifies—"Mr. M. much regrets," etc.

looks more eccentric than it is and sounds. I like that piece best perhaps. But I don’t think I could alter "Tears" to make it marketable. I feel that the correction you want makes is only essential if the whole point is in the British Grenadiers, as might be expected in these times. I can’t be sure about the jog trot. Perhaps you are right in finding it at the end of “November,” where it gets a shade sententious and perhaps echoes the end of the “Sensitive Plant” in rhythm.

I am now sending you the greater part of what I have done since I began, including the very first, which is the longest one placed at the end, called "Up in the Wind." I hope you will forgive me and allow the swapwng. You cannot imagine how eagerly I have run up this byway and how anxious I am to prove it is not a cul de sac.

I did the article you suggested, and am sending it to the Nation first.

Yours ever,
EDWARD THOMAS.

Steep.
17. iii. 15.

My dear Garnett,

Your letter gave me a lot of pleasure this morning when few other things could because I had tided myself to death with two days’ cycling (to the sea and back) in this tempestuous and biting weather—which is my reason for writing only a short note. I am fit for nothing at all, really. I am glad to find you preferring certain things—like "Old Man" and "The Cuckoo" and "Goodnight"—and sorry to find you preferring them to certain others like "The Sign". But the great satisfaction is you obviously find them like me. I had fears left I had got up in the air in this untired medium. So long as I haven’t I am satisfied. Of course I must make mistakes and I hope your preferences help me to see where they may lie, though I shall risk some of them again—e.g. what you find petty in incident. Dimness and lack of comracteness I shall certainly do my best against. I hate them too much in others to tolerate them in myself—when I see them.

It was almost as pleasant to know you like Frost.* The reviews they got here were one by Abercrombie in the Nation, one by Haecker in the Outlook, and a number by me in the New Weekly, etc. In America he got only one or two of these. He had been at American editors ten years in vain. . . . Most English reviewers were blinded by theories they had as to what poetry should look like. They did not see how true he was and how pure in his own style. I think the "Hired Man," the "Wood Pile," the "Black Cottage" and one or two others—such as "Home Days"—masterpieces. I was surprised, in this book, Much of it is very early indeed. Look, however, at "Moving" and the "Tuft of Flowers" (pp. 34 and 25). Hudson didn’t return "North of Boston," or not to me. I will send him some of my verses.

The reason of my wire is that I am only sending out verses at present under a pseudonym, and have already done so to the Nation, Times and English Review. I don’t want people to be confused by what they know or think of me already, although I know I shall also lose the advantage of some friendly prejudice. And I should be glad if you would not mention my verses to friends.

Frost is descended from early English (Devonshire) settlers, with a Scotch mottle. He has farmed for some years and has gone back to farm. He has also been a teacher of English and of pedagogy. There are some of his latest verses in the last number of Poetry and Drama.

Yours ever,
E. THOMAS.

Steep.
21. iv. 15.

My dear Garnett,

I am forwarding your letter to Frost. It will please him very much, for I had often spoken of you. I look forward to the article. From what he says it only to give a sufficient push to a ball that is now beginning to roll.

I didn’t tell you I was doing a book on Marlborough for Chapman & Hall. It is the most congenial job I ever took on. But as it is the only one I have, I think myself lucky. So far I have not given up verses. I will show you some more later on. No editor takes them.

MARSH I have only met once, and I don’t know his friends well enough to think of approaching him. The War Office has said nothing further.

Probably I shall look you up on Tuesday.

Yours,

Edward Thomas.

Steep, Petersfield.

Monday.

MY DEAR GARNETT,

Your parcel came this morning. My best thanks for it, particularly for the letter and "Frost." I don’t know yet how much I have to thank you for the "Dials and Poetry." The article* on Frost is absolutely right. I don’t think you could have scored more than by insisting on his subtlety and truth and quoting the "Hired Man," "Home Burial," and the "Hundred Collars." And you have shown his nativeness—his Englishness very delicately and without a possibility of hurting anyone’s feelings. There were two or three slips in the typescript that I took it on me to correct.

I am doubtful about the chiselling [of the poem] you advise. It would be the easiest thing in the world to clean it all up and trim it and have every line straight forward in sound and sense, but it would not really improve it. I think you read too much with the eye, perhaps. If you say a couple like

If they had mowed their dandelions and sold them fairly they could have afforded gold—

I believe it is no longer awkward. Then “because” at the end of a line looks awkward if one is accustomed to an exaggerated stress on the rhyme-word which I don’t think I should.

But I can’t tell you how pleased I am that you like the long piece in the main, and "Feltive" too. I am going to try and be just about the lines you have marked in "Feltive," though I am not sure whether you question the form of them or the "divagations" of the idea, but probably the latter. If only I could hit upon some continuous form such as you suggest! I doubt if it will come by direct consideration. But I think, perhaps, intermingled prose and verse would add a difficulty. Even as it is, I fancy the better passages in my prose lose by not really being happy in their places; verse might not lose so much, but the intervening prose would, unless of course, one was very lucky. I shall cast about for half a fiction twelve months ago in one attempt, but throw it up.

I am looking for a title for my volunteer stories.† If you like them I hope to have a title to suggest before they go before Duckworth. They are rather English, I fancy.

Scott James—I had almost forgotten to say—wrote and offered to recommend what I wrote on Rupert Brooke to the Bellman, and I am just setting about it. The English Review also wants a short notice of R. B.

Next week I expect to be up on a final visit to the Museum before beginning to write about Marlborough. It is a wretched summer task. I hope I shall see you again then.

Yours ever,

E. Thomas.

Thomas’s "Life of Marlborough," in fact, is a fine piece of critical biography, fresh in colour and atmosphere, and full of penetrating judgment. But from my long experience as a "publisher’s reader," I may say that had the book been pretentious and devoid of individual quality, it would probably have sold as well—nay, better. Although Thomas had certainly bad luck in the last few years of his life, the secret of his lack of success was simply that what he had to offer the public—fastidious taste, subtle insight and creative imagination—was beyond its comprehension, as is shown by the nigh universal rejection of his best poems by the London editors.

The last letter I received from Thomas was written a few days before he left England for the front. It contained a touching tribute to our friendship, inspired, no doubt, by a conviction that he would not return alive.

Edward Garnett.

* This appeared in the Atlantic Monthly.

UNREST

Whence comes this restlessness that maketh me
When in Montmartre remember Italy?
And when at last I see the falling leaf
In Vallombrosa, why this almost grief
That I can hear not the incoming seas
Roll in toward Appin, ‘twixt the Hebrides?

Where is my home? I have not any home
Save all the world. To rest I can but roam.
Strange names are friendly to me and I tell Them o’er as beads. They move me like a spell.

’Twas ever thus since in my boyish years,
Blurring my school-books, there rose up Algiers;
The very names of caliph and of haik
Called me to Africa for their names’ sake.
And now how many an island, mountain, bay
From the blue crescent curved toward Monterey,
Outlined in silver thread ‘gainst yellow sand,
To where I first saw light illuminating
In Chili are as dear as any friend,
And how far severed!” ‘Tis some way to wend
From Aconagua unto Cruanchan!

Only in dreams can I wing up and scan,
As there were orange in my clutch, the whole
God’s bauble, magical from pole to pole.

My school-books sloughed, I did not once abate
My travel-speed when Illercilla weat.
Then caught my ear. I lived with discontent
Till I had seen the Rocky Mountains rent
By the great waters there, the cataract walls.
I saw, and passed; and now again it calls.

When I come home from each outlandish place
Each lure me back, as his beloved’s face
Called back Odysseus. Home is not my home;
I have no other rest except to roam.

How shall I rest? There is no rest for me
On any continent, or isle, or sea.

Down the steep gulch of Fleet Street I descried
Mount Shasta, not Saint Paul’s, against the sky;
My eyes are dim, I am lost utterly;
I must go forth again across the sea.

In Okanagan I shall buy a horse
And to the mountains ride. Perchance the gorse
Of Keston Common, breaking then, shall send
A message to me, but I shall not lend
An ear to that; shrewdly I shall recall
The mists of England, their distressful pall;
Or so I purpose as I walk the deck
And Rathlin fades into a foam-flecked speck.
There shall I camp on fir-boughs feathly laid
Neath some tall fir, in balsam-scented shade.

But shall I rest there? Waking in the night
Among meshed planets and the half-moon’s light,
Will not the old-time wonder come again,
Gazing on Mars, if bobolink or wren
Flit thereupon; the longing to inquire
Out of the ether on these sparks of fire
Again torment; once more the Milky Way
Rain restlessness to haunt my joyous day?

There is no home, there is no rest for me
Till, disembodied, all the worlds I see.

Frederick Niven.

This evening (April 23) Sir Israel Gollancz will deliver an address at the Royal Institution on "Shakespeare’s Shylock and Scott’s Isaac of York." Next Friday evening Dr. F. O. Bower will take as the subject of his discourse "The Earliest-known Land Flora."
REVIEWS

THE PROBLEM OF HENRY JAMES

T hat sort of good luck which is the reward of good management attended Henry James all his days, and still attends. Having edited his own works, he finds for his familiar correspondence, in which his genius is expressed hardly less completely than in the works, an editor after his own heart, perfectly discreet in selection, perfectly competent, intelligent and sympathetic in comment. Yet, while heaping on Henry James every felicity, fortune withholds something essential. Everything has been done for him by himself and his admirers, except to"place"him. Never has a first-rate writer's personality been enshrined with such copiousness of explanation in so vast a monument of ink and paper—in rows of novels and stories, in analytical prefaces, in autobiographical reminiscence, in a mass of treasured and unpublished letters, and now in these two fat volumes which are the merest fraction of the mass. Why, then, is there an instinctive conspiracy to refrain from doing for him what he urged Mr. Gosse to do for Swinburne—"formulate and resume a little more the creature's character and genius"?

The fact seems to be that our appreciation of him differs in kind from our appreciation of other writers. It is a sort of fascination. If we like him at all, he goes to our heads, so that, quite naturally and instinctively, our enjoyment excludes the specifically aesthetic judgment. Or rather, it includes a certain peculiar depreciation, involving a plea to be let off from making the sort of judgment which, however crudely and unconsciously, we make of other writers as part of the mere act of enjoying them. The reason is that he is the most contagious of writers—contagious in the sense that he communicates an attitude. As we turn the charmed page or fondly recall the coloured and measured talk, we slip from the everyday world into a magic region, where a definite set of values purports indeed to be presented, but where it seems best, it seems only decent, to take the values for granted. When we ascribe this begulement to the perfection of his technical achievement, we are on the right track; but we must take a further step, and remember that there can be no first-rate technical achievement which is not the expression of an attitude to real life: so that we are led, if we want to isolate the germ of the infection, to attempt the analysis of that attitude, and to ask whether it does not include, deep in its central fibres, an element of refusal, a special kind of depreciation, nicely calculated to pull, while seeming exquisitely to satisfy, the critical faculty of a tired but exacting generation.

Henry James lived intensely from beginning to end. His letters will prove that, even to those who neither knew him nor read his novels.

If there be a wisdom in not feeding—to the last thro— the great things that happen to us, it is a wisdom that I shall never know or esteem. Let your soul live—its the only life that isn't on the whole a sell.

And not only did he live intensely, he set himself deliberately to live fully, to expose the broadest possible surface to experience. Accordingly he exiles himself in youth from the thin American social scene, and settles in London. "It takes an old civilization to set a novelist in motion"; and where but in London—certainly not in the tight, unmoral conventions of Paris—can he get, if his art is to be rich and deep, access with the riper fruits of times? And as soon as he feels that his receptive surface is growing stale and dull, he returns, late in life, to America to refresh it.

But the singular feature in this indefatigable cultivation of an omnivorous sensibility is that the experience is not absorbed into his being as the normal man or the normal artist absorbs it. It passes over him, playing infinitely delicate interludes ever so subtly, caressingly and warily over the rich procession of phenomena, but never getting inside a single item of the procession. And this although his main object is intimacy of penetration: he desires, above everything, to"do things from the inside. In a sense he succeeds, but always as by a construction, not by immediate apprehension. He says of the London world when at the height of his early and rapid social success, "I knew it all as if I had made it," and he adds, significantly, "but if I had I would have made it better." He knew it, he had it in his pocket, just as he had the technique of the stage, but—the question begs pressing—what exactly was it that he knew? Not, to judge from his letters either the letters see the surmise—the real reality, but a dream society, based on the reality at a remove. Had he known the reality, he must have hated or loved it with a greater self-abandonment. It may be objected that this is only the normal detachment of the artist, that Henry James could not assimilate himself completely to his chosen environment, simply because art was his preoccupation, and that in any case his sense of values would have detached him spiritually from an environment which he judged gross and dull. But that is only another way of stating a problem which cannot be solved unless we consent to criticize his account both of himself and of his poetic method. To understand either the man or the letters as resulting from an interplay of attractions and repulsions, of whose nature, restless analyst though he was, he was inhibited from being explicitly conscious.

Life pulled him, as it pulls us all, with strings of which he was not aware, and there is no dishonour to his memory if the fingers which try to disentangle them, though they fumble, are moved by sincerity. He believed, then, that his motive for dining out every night of the season was to saturate himself with something indispensable to his art, the atmosphere of an old civilization. We are tempted to suspect that there was more in it than that, when we consider the queer process by which in his earlier period he persuaded himself, against all the evidence, first that the drama was his proper form, and then, although fortune had placed him beyond anxiety about money, that the need to make money was his reason for writing plays. His appeals to his friends in the world of sawdust and orange-peel strongly suggest that the key to the process is desire for public success. For no success is so obviously success as that of the theatre. Later, when he has returned to his true vocation, we detect the same impulse at work in his unceasing sense of the failure of his mature art, as shown by the gap between his receipts and his reputation. He had won recognition, both here and in America, early and with comparative ease, and that he should have desired its continuance and enhancement is not strange. What is strange is the nature of his disappointment combined it with his Olympian contempt for even the most sympathetic criticism, and a settled conviction that the public is a gross beast whose paws can do nothing but mangle and defile. To ask why he should bother about public success, especially when he is smothered with the plaudits of the cultivated few, is to touch the hidden springs of character. Is it possible that in him, the desire for success is one of the forms in which fear masquerades? That clue, at any rate, will resolve much that is paradoxical. Although his whole existence is a dedication to the Muse, an intense and high-minded devotion to the solution of formal aesthetic problems, we watch him punctually, anxiously, and as by a hidden mechanism, obeying the impulse to be "respectable," to conform to the conveniences, to observe every current decency almost to the point of mania. How, again, can we reconcile his austerity of spirit, and the power and subtlety of his intelligence, with his infallible selection, out of all the possibilities that life offered, of the most expensively cushioned side of civilization? The explanation, we suggest, can only lie in a profound need for safety—profound in proportion to his sensitiveness, and so imperious that it produces, since it has to be morally justified, one of the most elaborately far-branching systems of illusion that an imaginative mind has ever created. These well-dressed people who command the resources of the world, and who alone are really immune from the abyss—they must be exquisitely refined, they must somehow be made out to have the rarest, the subtlest passions and interpenetrations, their blandness must be interpreted as the index of “the real, right thing”—else life becomes intolerable for terror. And, to avoid awkward questions, let us walk ever so delicately. Types are safer than individuals, and the type, in an old and ordered society, can be determined by external appearances.
Thus he develops towards the outward show the respect of a mandarin and the sensitiveness of a fashionable woman—indeed, of a feminine mind. The hard case of a shell with a spiritual activity which defies all vulgar standards, but which bears to the actual complexities of the human spirit about the same relation as a geometrical diagram does to the cluster of points at a railway junction.
It is the safety-impulse again, which, in the soil of his genius, flowers into forms as fantastic as they are characteristic—into that extravagance of preciosity by which, in the daily accidents of life, the need for emotion is avoided or its absence conceived, and into those involved manoeuvres by which he ineretavely doxes the dreadful act of calling a spade a spade. The classic instance of this is in “The Ambassadors,” where the whole machinery turns on the fact that there is no notice how important a master (Mass.) by the manufacture of some small article which, only the point of being named, is too sordid actually to defile the printed page.
Now this rôle of mystagogue, if played consistently—and Henry James is all of a piece—must interpose a veil between the artist and his material. He played the rôle, we suggest, because he needed the veil; and a veil it remains, though it is shot with irony, though it is neither pompous nor sentimental, and though it is the very stuff out of which is made that miracle, his style. The irony should not disguise from us the protective character of the decrease; indeed, it is essential, if his work is to be appraised, that we should notice how important a part the method of comic appeal plays in the defensive structure with which he carefully enamelled his soul. It would be not too much to say that he achieved victory over life by inventing and cultivating a comic posture. The picture of “poor little old Lamb House and its corpulent, slowly circulating and slowly masticating master” is like the product of the insects that build a coral-reef; lifted from the deep touch by touch, it stands at last as the triumphant embodiment of a long battle fought and won. How important is the humorous element in the structure is only recognized when we notice that there is hardly anything which this delicious instrument cannot do. It compasses enviously and admirably, almost every object in the universe. Do you want to describe a dog’s illness, or the laying out of a garden, or an outbreak of fire in your study, or a crisis in the servants’ hall, or the horrors of a crowded train-journey, or your feelings when asked to be a godfather? Look in these letters, and you will almost be persuaded that Henry James’s way is the best way. But it is inadequate to the passions. You will not think so, as long as you are under the enchantment. It is chiefly in its application to public matters—the Parnell case, Protection v. Free Trade, or the war—that its inadequacy becomes easily apparent, for these must be handled without ambages, if at all. The flatness of all such references when they occur, in spite of his strong and genuine feeling about the war, is very significant. Significant again, though we have no space to prove this, is the fact that this particular flatness almost disappears in his letters to Americans—not the letters to the friends who resemble himself in their eminence and their expatriation, but on those in which he is in contact with the atmosphere of Boston and Cambridge (Mass.). It is here that he reacts most directly and sincerely.
This suggests that the analysis can be pushed a stage further, and that the safety-impulse, for all its issue in comedy, can be tracked to an ethical, to a religious source.
Not that he was interested in religion or in cosmic questions. He had vague feelings about the British Empire (that it was animated by a mysterious principle of toughness) and about Free Trade (that it ranged everything decent on its side), but, apart from the problems of his craft, he had no intellectual energy to spare for the general or the abstract. Still, it can hardly be doubted that religion, the same in a large sense, is an instinct in his man, and that his instinct is to approach both life and art as a problem, so that, as an artist, he can never dive directly into his material, but must focus his apprehension on the difficulties to such a tune that the material, almost with a sigh of relief, is sublimed away. In this light his controversy with Mr. Wells is full of instruction. It pained him to gather from “Boon” that, while he had enthusiastically appreciated and generously proclaimed the merits of Mr. Wells’s work, his own art seemed to the younger man “extraordinarily futile and void.” It is only void, he urges in effect, if no method is valid but that of a pell-mell impressionism. For himself, he holds that Interest is a thing which may be, must be, exquisitely made and created, and that if we don’t make it, we who undertake to,
and nothing will make it for us.

Things, that is to say, are not, as Mr. Wells’s method implies, interesting just in themselves; the whole significance of life (and it is only through art that life becomes significant) lies in the endless problem of making them interesting. Admirable doctrine, but it advances us no further. Everything depends on what is projected; if a fullness of life, well and good; if not, however fascinating the gesture of projection, there must in the long run be futility and vacuum. Was it, then, a fullness of life that Henry James projected?

I think Mrs. Brook the best thing I’ve ever done—and Nanda also much done. Voilà! Mitchy marries Aggie by a calculation—in consequence of a state of mind—delicate and deep . . . . It’s absolute to him that N. will never have him—and she appeals to him for another girl, whom she sees him as “saying” (from things —realties she sees). If he does it (and she shows how she values him by wanting it) it is still a way of getting and keeping near her.
She becomes, as it were, to him, responsible for his happiness—they can’t (especially if the marriage goes ill) not be—given the girl that Nanda is—more, rather than less, together . . . . Far-fetched? Well, I daresay: but so are diamonds and pearls.
William James, it appears, used to complain, surely with some justice, that this kind of thing was not life, and would urge his brother to address himself to realities. But the whispering ancestors, luxuriating in perplexities and clinging to a transcendental salvation, were too strong for the lover of life; inexorably the soul endured to create a phantom of God by unsubstantial Nandas and Aggies, and discreetly but firmly divorced from the lusts of the flesh, as the only world in which his emotions and his intelligence could be liberated. On those terms the surface of the visible world was free to his sensibility to range at will. With incredible virtuosity he made the fullest use of that freedom to set the two worlds in a created relation which, even if it lacks the qualities of the greatest poetic art, will continue to delight as long as any capacity to enjoy the refinements of literature survives.

SYDNEY WATERLOW.

THE BENT OF SCOTLAND

THOUGHTS ON THE UNION BETWEEN ENGLAND AND SCOTLAND.

By Albert V. Dicey, K.C., and Robert S. Rait. (Macmillan. 16s. net.)

FROM the Reformation down to the French Revolution, and even later, the genius of Scotland was religious and philosophic rather than political. It is true that especially in the seventeenth century, politics were religion, and religion to some extent politics. But if we take the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland and the Scottish Parliament as separate entities, we perceive at once how important was the first in the life of the nation, and how insignificant the second. The Assembly controlled education, both university and popular; it could give orders to inferior courts; it had its say in the administration of the poor-law. Round it, as Mr. Dicey and Professor Rait well remark, had collected all the romance of Presbyterianism and its martyrs. On the other hand, the Parliament, a unicameral body, with a representative system restricted to King's freetholders, was merely the mouthpiece of the Lords of the Articles, a committee nominated in turn by the Crown. Devoid of popular sanction, it raised no effective opposition during the "killing time," whereas the Church never exercised a greater moral power than while the Assembly was suppressed.

The union of the two crowns, which Edward I. tried to bring about by conquest and other English kings by marriage, all failed to establish any permanent connexion with the Tudor line. An incorporating union might have followed if James I. had been less of a pedant, and Charles I. not a bigot. But of all the hopeless religious adventures, that of imposing an episcopalian form of worship on Scotland was the most pronouncedly desperate, more especially when the comparative tactfulness of the "Five Articles of Perth" was followed by the ceremonial rigidity of Laud. Cromwell's legislative union was on the right lines, so far as the freedom of trade was concerned, but, imposed at the point of the sword, it was in the nature of a military occupation. His policy, at any rate, experienced a complete reversal at the Restoration, and upon the oppressions of the later Stuarts there ensued the massacre of Glencoe and the failure of the Darien scheme, wrecked, as every Scotch subscriber believed, through English intrigue. The two nations seemed further apart than ever, and yet, as so often happens, they were on the eve of junction, just as the South African war, a civil war in many of its features, led up to the Union of South Africa. And the compelling cause was not political or commercial, though the two Parliaments debated both topics at much length, but religious. A Union alone could avert the possibility of the return of the Stuarts, and their reappearance meant the domination of Louis XIV., the repealer of the Edict of Nantes.

Protestantism was thoroughly alarmed in both countries, and with reason. The General Assembly, therefore, threw its decisive weight on to the side of harmony, having obtained the all-important guarantee that the Presbyterian government, worship and discipline of the Church of Scotland is to be subject to no authority by the Commissioners. If what we now call a referendum had been taken on the Union between England and Scotland, both countries would unquestionably have rejected it with derision. But there was no question of that, of course; a few wise men, with Somers as their leading spirit, imposed their cut-and-dried plan upon two docile Parliaments, and their will prevailed. Was there much bribery of the Scotch Parliament? It is difficult to say; Mr. Dicey and Professor Rait take a charitable view, but some of the conversions seem to have been abrupt. At all events, the Union was carried in the teeth of such public opinion as then existed, and its unpopularity was progressive for over a half a century. In Scotland there was the feeling that the measure was not final, and the revival of the law of patronage, an adroit Tory move, unquestionably lent colour to the general apprehension. Complaints of over-taxation abounded, and while economists disputed the points at issue without satisfying anybody, smugglers, as the Porteous riots showed, were converted into public heroes. The decline of Edinburgh, through the removal of the Parliament, was not forgiven for generations. Sir Walter Scott confessed that, though he accepted the Union, he would never have voted for it.

In England the chief grievance was the intrusion of forty-five politicians into the House of Commons who voted precisely as they were told. The authors of this well-informed book make out as good a case for the forty-five as they can, and even discover principle in their revolt against Walpole, whereas the plain fact is that Sir Robert quarrelled with the Duke of Argyll and his brother, Lord Isla, who "managed" the Scotch elections. They asserted their independence when the question arose of punishing the Edinburgh bands that had executed mob law on the unfortunate Porteous, and, under the guidance of "Malachi Malagrowther," when the Tory Government tried to suppress the £1 notes. Otherwise they could be reckoned on to support the Government of the day, given a tall Lord Advocate whom they could follow into the right lobby. English resentment came to a head when Lord Melville, not only opposed it with the Scotchmen, but appeared about to impose a monstrous regiment of that race on Southern constituencies. He thrust "Ossian" Macpherson, for example, on distant Camelford. So Wilkes got to work in the North Briton; Dr. Johnson converted "Scotchman" into a term of knockdown opprobrium, and one Maccall judiciously reversed the syllables of his name in order to become the famous Almack.

Great international causes, such as the War of American Independence and the French Revolution, tended to bind the nations together, since it was no longer a case of vertical, but of lateral division of opinion. And, as time went on, the advantages of cooperation became overwhelming, particularly on the Scottish side. Trade, or rather careers, brought the Gladstounes to Liverpool and the Drummonds to London; and Ophionites, Elphions, and countless others went forth to seek fame and fortune in India. Mr. Dicey and Professor Rait, who bring their "thoughts" to a somewhat precipitate conclusion, fail to take India into account at all. They also ignore Dugald Stewart, Playfair and other illustrious teachers to whom the brilliant young Englishmen of the day resorted, and who taught them in turn to be good Britons, thus consummating a union of minds far more vital than a union of legislatures.

L. S.
THE WESTERN TEXT AGAIN

S. T. LUKE: THE MAN AND HIS WORK. By H. McLachlan. (Manchester, University Press. 7s. 6d. net.)

TEXTUAL criticism of the New Testament in these days is moving towards a qualification of Hort's hypothesis. To call this movement a "reaction" would be too strong. Still, there are plain signs that Hort's resolute preference for the Neutral text over the Western text no longer commands the assent which it once enjoyed. Not that it was ever undisputed. Dean Burgon took care to make the world of letters ring with his protest, and he has had followers who have sometimes compromised their case by mixing up theological animus with critical analysis of the text. Nevertheless, for a time it did seem as if Hort had settled the general trend of criticism. That time is over, and from more sides than one the credentials of the Western text are being studied by men who profess to find more in it than Hort was willing to admit. This is especially the case with those who have had the patience to work over Von Soden's huge collection of arguments and data. Even by those who have no hypothesis to defend, it is realized that the Western text often preserves readings which intrinsically are superior to those of the Neutral text.

It is in Luke's two writings that the case for the Western text emerges most clearly. That the third Gospel and Acts came from the same pen is now axiomatic. That they were written by Luke is practically certain. That they bear a certain "medical" impress in their language is "a conclusion of modern scholars now seldom challenged," says Mr. McLachlan. As a matter of fact, it has been challenged recently by an American scholar, Mr. Cadbury, who is opening an attack upon this theory. But the theory will survive Mr. Cadbury's questioning, and, in any case, this is not a matter which really enters into Mr. McLachlan's business. He is out to uphold the superiority of the Western text of the third Gospel and Acts, to show how Western readings add often to our knowledge of Luke's personality and aim. His method is to select and discuss special passages which are regarded as salient. This makes the book somewhat scappy. The reader is hurried from point to point, from one aspect of Luke to another, through all manner of detail. What is provided is a handbook to the Lucan writings, which is dominated by the idea that their meaning is to be generally seized by adhering to the Western text. Instead of developing the idea along the lines of textual criticism, Mr. McLachlan has illustrated it at work. Which makes his book more interesting, we admit, but at the same time is apt to suggest a somewhat eclectic and impressionist judgment.

Whatever be the merits of the Western text, Mr. McLachlan has pushed his case too far. The Western reading in Luke xxiii. 15, for example, is surely not original, nor is the addition of the allusion to the "stratopedarch" in Acts xxviii. 16. The Western text of Luke iii. 22, on the other hand, is probably correct, as Mr. McLachlan argues; and there is a case for the Lucan affinities of the Pericope Adulteræ, to which he devotes a special chapter. But what are claimed in many cases as Lucan characteristics in the Western text are no more than scribal glosses, like that in Luke xxvii. 54.

However, apart from his theory, Mr. McLachlan has contrived to put some suggestive material into his book. Luke to him is a personality, a man with distinct sympathies, with an eye for character, with a literary sense, and even with humour. The evidence for the last-named quality is slender, however. For the most part, it is drawn from the later part of Acts. Luke, Mr. McLachlan concludes, had a keen sense of the ludicrous. The medley of great things and little, of things mundane and things celestial, of things low and things awful, is plainly shown in the juxtaposition of a Parable of the Kingdom with foolish pleas of guests invited to a feast, of the Lord's Anointer with the unlovely Friend at Midnight, of the thrilling scene at Ephesus and the part played by a ignorant mob, of the lofty address of Paul at Athens and the contemptible news-mongering of the citizens. It is in such contrasts that humour and satire have their place, pointing out an intense, unspeakable incongruity.

Perhaps. But it is grave irony rather than humour. And Mr. McLachlan has missed an instance of this dry irony in Acts ii. 15. When Peter is protesting against the excitement of the disciples being set down to intoxication, he remarks: "Drink? Why, it is only nine o'clock in the morning!"

It is right to add that the author has acquainted himself with the best literature upon the subject, and that his criticisms, e.g., of Professor Forrey on Acts, are occasionally to the point. This is a book from which the student of the Lucan writings will learn much, whether he is among the conservatives or the revolutionaries in textual criticism.

NEW STUDIES IN VIRGIL

THE TREES, SHRUBS AND PLANTS OF VIRGIL. By John Sargeaunt. (Oxford, Blackwell. 6s. 6d. net.)

VERGIL AND THE ENGLISH POET. By Elizabeth Nichie. (New York, Columbia University Press; London, H. Milford. 6s. 6d. net.)

VIRGIL has had a greater and longer influence on style than any other poet in the world, though to-day, in a century that defies tradition, he has somewhat lost his hold. Yet the aspirations which made him the guide of Dante are no longer so easily dismissed for their vagueness as they might have been. The mysteries of Life, Death and Nature still haunt us for all our new knowledge, and the grown man sees a new treasure in the verses he learned as a boy and did not really understand. No one else expressed with equal felicity and force the doctrines of Empire; but though there is much of the same spirit in the two greatest colonizing powers the world has seen, it is not fashionable to talk of our Empire to-day. No one glorified with a more charming pen the dignity of labour, or felt more deeply its distresses. What phrase could describe the ruined fields of Belgium better than "squalent abductis arva colonis," and who can render its force with equal conciseness and point? Readers are apt to forget that Virgil, though a writer of exquisite taste, began as a countryman and retained his rustic appearance as well as his love of the country. The Eclogues, which, with Dr. Nichie's leave, we rank above beginner's work, and the Georgics, though in spite of their obvious debts to earlier poets, are touched with realism, differing in this from the highly artificial and frequently porcine crowd of imitators. Horace in Jonson's "Poetaster" ends his generous praise of Virgil thus:

And for his poet, 'tis so rammed with life,
That it shall gather strength of life, with being,
And live hereafter more admired than now.

We can well believe that a rude soldier drove Virgil off his land into the Mincus, and that the "improbos anser" worried him more than the reputation of Bavinus and Mevius. It is a blot on English scholarship that there has been for years no edition of the "Vite Vergilianae" such as that produced by Dichtl (Bonn, 1911). The tree and plant lore of Virgil has also been neglected since Martyn's time by English editors, who have been satisfied with misleading renderings. Mr. Sargeaunt has now filled the gap with a masterly catalogue in alphabetical order, with Italian equivalents and, where possible, English ones. The subject is full of traps and difficulties. The Romans had no cedars, peaches, and strawberries of our sort Virgil sometimes used his own knowledge and sometimes followed the Greek flora. His adjectives may refer to a part of a plant which is of no importance to us; he may be embroidering tradition, writing as a Gaul rather than a Roman, or using obscure words for colours which give us no certain hints. Mr. Sargeant clears up these doubts convincingly. He has read, botanized in Italy, grown many of the shrubs himself, and even eaten some of the less desirable fruits and vegetables. He is able to compare the ancient and modern type of roses, though he slips over the name of Triptolemus Yellowley at the end of his account. We once heard a Canadian settler say that he had got some good hints out of the Georgics, and perhaps Mr. Sargeant could tell us more, if he chose, about the Virgilian angle for success. The distinction of the wild sort of verbena, the English vervain, not the cultivated flower known as verbena, is somewhat surprising, for it is not a showy plant at all. It has very small flowers which are surely not "blueish," but lilac in colour. Some lost folk-lore is at the back of its importance. One may compare the insignificant weed with the grand name Enchanter's Nightshade. Mr. Sargeant's work is full of interest and pleasantly relieved with touches of humour. He deserves in his own garden the success of the old Corydian.

A host of teachers in America want degrees, and get them with dissertations which are the result of industry rather than of original research, brilliant theory, or taste. Dr. Nitchie shows a splendid understanding of his subject and his taken to heart. Landor's caution about the folly of the parallel-hunter. But no one would take her for a Virgil enthusiast or a writer of distinction. She is solid and stolid. She puts forward, too, statements which are justified, perhaps, in America, but cannot be passed as true of this country. The connection between the English and classical literatures is perfectly realized over here, and not seldom "stressed" by the lovers and teachers of both. The man who can quote more than a few lines of Virgil is not rare with us, though he may be a prodigy round Columbia University. English education produces amateurs who are fully equipped and sometimes, when they turn into what O. Henry calls "error-sharp," give shocks to teachers. Even in Parliament Virgil has not been quite given up, as is frequently stated. A recent Prime Minister quoted him.

The most interesting of earlier users of Virgil is Chaucer, who put him on a pillar of tinmed iron. In explaining the use of a base metal Dr. Nitchie is ingenious and original. When we come to later poets, the amount of indebtedness of a direct sort is uncertain. Virgil belongs to the common stock of romantic material or everyday commonplace, and imitations of his imitators or translators are frequent. Milton clearly was a good Virgilian, and many parallels are cited. But when two which Keats admired intensely, Proserpine stolen by gloomy Dis, "which cost Ceres all that pain To seek her through the world" (P.L. iv. 270), and "nor could the Muse defend Her son" (P.L. vii. 38) strike Keats as "specimens of a very extraordinary beauty" and "exclusively Miltonic without the shadow of another mind ancient or modern." The scholar will recognize both as Virgilian. There is little of Virgil's spirit except his "curiosa felicita" in Pope, whose fine effects of metre are not in his pinchbeck Pastoral. There is some truth in Dr. Nitchie's contention that various admirers of Homer put Virgil in the background, but he carries it too far. From a short and rather vague sentence we gather that Gray preferred Greek to Latin. This is ridiculous: he was a man of great learning who knew, used, and loved both. His poems owe more to Latin poets from Virgil and Horace down to the Renaissance writers than to Greek.

It is odd that the learned notes of Milford (1814) and the latest American cram-book on the "Elegy" both ignore "mutas agitate inglorius artes" (Aen. xii. 307) as the source of "some mute inglorious Milton." The owl's "ancient solitary reign" is the "deserta regna" of Georgic iii. 476. The "bloom of young desire and purple light of love" in "The Progress of Poetry" is from Aen. i. 590. In "The Bard" the "sweeping whirlwind's sway" is Virgil at two removes via Dryden. Gray's Latin poems include such direct echoes as

Not ego vos posthac Arne di rape videbo,
and he has ventured "debellate" in a prose letter to Wharton, who doubtless understood the word better than one of Gray's modern editors. Collins wrote of "the temperate strength of Maro's line" in comparison with Lucan; and Byron, we note in view of the paragraph on him, thought it worth while to translate and publish over 400 lines concerning Nisus and Euryalus. Byron also ventured on the briefest fragment of a classical quotation known to us. Tantatn, appears in "Don Juan," xii. 33. Landor was a fine classic, but decidedly freakish in his judgment. His views lend a liveliness to Dr. Nitchie's page which is rare. Crabbe's protest against the Virgilian pastoral is duly quoted (p. 199); but no mention is made of the fact that it was considerably heightened in tone by Johnson, who revised the lines. The sequence of praise reaches its height in Tennyson's incomparable tribute to Virgil, which we are glad to see printed in full. But it is not improved by the spelling "forever," or a misquotation from it on the very next page. As Calverley remarked:

Forever; 'tis a single word!
Our rude forefathers deem'd it two
And nevermore must printer do
As men did long ago; but run
"For" into "ever," bidding two
Be one.

Tennyson would have groaned over this Americanism, but we suppose typesetters' unions rule everything in the States, even the text of English poets in University publications. Quoting Matthew Arnold's praise of Virgil in the Essay on Joubert, Dr. Nitchie might have added Newman's, which gives with deeper feeling that appreciation of his tenderness and sad earnestness which seems essentially modern. She is mistaken in saying that "the Latin poet has left little impress" on Arnold's poetry. The very narrow of Virgil is in his tribute to his dog in "Geist's Grave," noting

That liquid, melancholy eye,
From whose pathetic, soul-fed springs
Seem'd surging the Virgilian cry.
The sense of tears in human things.

Here is the divine vagueness of the original which still engages the battle of the pedants. Not less felicitous is " Felix qui potuit " applied to Goethe in "Memorial Verses":

And he was happy, if to know
Causes of things, and far below
His feet to see the liquid flow
Of terror, and insane distress,
And headlong fate, be happiness.

The present Poet Laureate is a declared Virgilian, and we remember a mock Elegy due to that strayed Augustan, Mr. Austin Dobson. "Autumn Idyll," with its "Say, formose pur," and rival singers for a prize, is delightful.

The biographer of Dickens on whom Dr. Nitchie relies for the statement that there is not one allusion to the classics in his books is wrong. "Christ's Church," is not English, though it might be, and Ben Jonson did not say that Shakespeare had "little Latin and less Greek." Finally, if the writer had read Donatus or Servius on Virgil, she would know that he was called "Parthenius," not "Virgo."
A CASE OF DEBILITY

Books and their Writers. By S. P. B. Mais. (Grant Richards. 7s. 6d. net.)

No book could illustrate better than this the want of balanced judgment in modern English letters. Not that Mr. Mais himself can be said in any high sense to belong to modern English letters, but unfortunately his method of frenzied and careless appreciation is just what may appeal to and deceive formless, illiterate minds with a vague sense of their own formlesslessness and a desire to improve without any self-discipline. At a time when critics of proved ability know that it is useless to visit a publisher unless they are ready to put their hands in their pockets, a second-rate chatterer who, on his own showing, has nothing of his own to say, is apparently profitable to his publisher because of his close affinity to the common mind. In Mr. J. A. T. Lloyd's new novel "Prestige" there is an editor of a popular journal who demands of his young writers "guts and glow." Mr. Mais would have warmed his heart indeed.

If it were only a case of Wilcoxism, one might say, like Falstaff to the over-appreciative hostess, "'peace, good pint-pot, peace, good tackle-brain," and proceed to other business, but what comes from Mr. Mais is much worse than pain.

He is a man of some education and intelligence troubled with auto-intoxication. The excuse that he makes for this exhibition proves it. Having, as he says, a very meagre mental garden of his own, and having been physically debarred from more useful occupations during the war, he has been reduced to plucking the flowers and fruit in other men's gardens, and wishes to share his "golden pleasures" with other people—that is how he puts it. But that is not what he has done. If he had displayed the posies and the fruit raised by other men, without any comment of his own, and offered them for sale to the public, it would have been as impudent but less unpleasant. Instead, he has passed all these "golden pleasures" through the irritable chemistry of his own brain, and it is the result of this process which he puts complacently before us. He has tried, he says, not to obtrude his personality, yet the whole book reeks of it. There is not one author so treated by him of whom the reader will get a just estimate, for frothy appreciation is not justice; but there is one author whom the reader will come to know all too well, and he is Mr. Mais. Even in his interminable and ill-written summaries of other men's work, of which the bulk of this book consists, Mr. Mais obtrudes himself. He cannot create, he cannot judge, and with his own clamour he deafens judgment.

He feebly promises that he does not set up to be a literary critic. Then why not keep these confessions for his own waste-paper basket? What excuse is there for writing a book of literary appreciations when you deliberately disclaim the only qualification for writing such a book, and when you deliberately set down opinions which imply critical judgments? It was not humility which dictated this excuse. No, Mr. Mais is not humble. He appears to himself quite a fine figure, a kind of jolly Grandgousier with a fabulous appetite for good things. "Ho!" he shouts, "I will show you how to be a literary trencher-man. Observe my gusto. Nothing comes amiss to me: solid joints and kickshaws, fish and fruit and fowl, I gobble them all. Look at me, you timid feeders, and learn how a man of parts enjoys himself at the lavish board of modern English literature!" And so with much smacking of the lips and sundry hicups Mr. Mais bolts Mr. Compton Mackenzie, Mr. Reginald McKenna, the Georgian poets, Dora Sigerson, Jane Austen, Dorothy Richardson, Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch, Sir E. T. Cook, Lafcadio Hearn and others—all with the same lamentable results. Of course he is always hungry when he cannot keep anything down. Mr. Mais is not a literary critic, it is true, but the real reason why he does not try to be one is that he will not, or cannot, take the trouble. His affliction leaves him no time. He is so hungry that he cannot stop to think before he feeds, and when he has fed he must rush to the ink-pot to relieve the intolerable gripping of his brain. Out it comes, helter-skelter, in slipshod, hurried language, without order, grace or distinction. The personal "I," the editorial "we" and the generic "we" are all jumbled up, and it would appear, in some cases, that, having read a book, Mr. Mais immediately props it up in front of him and proceeds to summarize it clumsily page by page, so imperative is the reaction due to his unfortunate diathesis.

It is the presence of beauty that never fails to show Mackenzie at his best. He is one of Nature's great interpreters—and I am not sure that he is not woman's best interpreter.

What does that last sentence mean? With what other writers is the comparison made? Mr. Mais knows not and cares not. On, on the pen must go and never cease. After two inadequate pages on Mr. McKenna, in which he quite fails to deal with that author's "case," he remarks:

Having written so far, I am troubled. I don't want to cross it all out because it is in some measure true. But it is not the whole truth.

And his way of getting at the whole truth is only to summarize another "readable" book by Mr. McKenna. Was there ever such futility?

I suppose "The Lily of Malad" is the most famous poem in the book, and certainly in this magic narrative he [Mr. Squire] justifies his use of his extraordinary metre.

Poets of his calibre [Mr. Sassoon's] are rare indeed.

For all must be he of vision who cannot realise from the very first pages of this book [Mr. Robert Nichols'] "Ardours and Embrances" that he pursues his one aim with consistent zeal and a wealth of diction that will ensure his reaching heights undreamt of by most other poets of our time.

If it is the test of genius that it feels more acutely than the rest of us, Dora Sigerson must stand at the head of the geniuses of our time.

Mr. Strachey does give us a picture of life: it is interesting to know that in that molluscous age there were found people of energy, people of ambition, crafty, mean, spiteful, petty; passionate men and women—this last being the final sentence of a long chapter in which Mr. Mais has the assurance to give a complete decotion (to call it nothing worse) of Mr. Strachey's witty book.

These are the specimens which Mr. Mais presents for our inspection. Only a few have been selected, but they are typical; and if anyone thinks that Mr. Mais is being wronged in this review, let him read the reasons given why Mr. Mais was not at first interested in Mr. Strachey's biography of Cardinal Manning, and the still more terrible final pages of the last chapter, in which Mr. Mais exhibits without restraint the awful banality of his mind. It would be intolerable to have these things inflicted on one in a chapter or at a table, and there is no reason why they should be tolerated in a book. They all imply critical judgments, but they are based neither on comprehension nor on discrimination. It is the voice of M. Perrichon speaking without the excuse of M. Perrichon's career: for Mr. Mais is an Oxford man and a schoolmaster. He has lately been appointed the chief teacher of English to the cadets of the Royal Air Force. It is a sad reflection.

O. W.

A collection of paintings from the Galerie des Beaux-Arts of Paris will be shown at the Grafton Galleries from April 16 to May 4. Works exhibited by Monet, Renoir, Manet, Tiepolo, Greuze, Rubens, and others; and there will also be numerous works by Steinlen, by Henry de Groux, the Belgian artist, and by Fornerod.
KENSINGTONIA
A REMEDY AGAINST SIN. By W. B. Maxwell. (Hutchinson. 8s. 6d. net.)

THE author who sets out deliberately to write a novel with a purpose must content himself with being a little less than an artist, a little more than a preacher. To accept life, and by thus accepting it to present us with the problem—that is not his chief concern. He is the brilliant lawyer who is bound to look at life from the point of view of his case—who cannot therefore afford to inquire into the evidence that would make the guilty less guilty, or, always with the success of his case in mind, to despise the ridiculous excess of painting the lily and throwing a perfume on the violet.

In "A Remedy against Sin" Mr. W. B. Maxwell has chosen to obscure his talents under a wig and gown that he may deliver a tremendous attack against the monstrous injustice of our present divorce laws. His description of the "typical" upper-middle-class family, of which the heroine, Clare, is the younger daughter, is very skilful and amusing. As we read of old Mrs. Gilmour drifting through her large, desirable family residence, always looking for something, or wondering what she has lost or forgotten or ought to have remembered; as we encounter full-blown Emily, the married daughter with the hard laugh and chaffing ways, and all the various members down to Clare, the young girl, just "out," whom nobody wants—who fitted in nowhere, we feel it would hardly be better done. It is an admirably painted portrait of what we might call an old-fashioned modern family. Then comes the adventurer, Roderick Vaughan, who makes up his mind to win Clare, and because she is lonely and vaguely unhappy and feels herself unwanted, he succeeds to the extent of her running away from home one afternoon and putting herself under his protection. The young man, trading upon the family sense of honour and horror of anything approaching a scandal, plays his cards so cleverly that they are forced to acknowledge him and to arrange for a fashionable wedding, even though he is almost a complete stranger and they know nothing of his past or his present and ignore the fact that he is vulgar, ill-bred and loud. Now, of course, comes the awakening for the poor heroine, and Mr. Maxwell makes her see that all are married to a beast, a bully, a torturer, and there is no escape. Up to this point we must admit that "A Remedy against Sin" is a great deal better than the majority of novels. The character of Roderick Vaughan—his disposition, which is, as it were, a series of bounds and rebounds—the whole temper and feeling of the book, place it far above the average. But then, more or less suddenly, we are conscious of the purpose.

Clare, from being an innocent, rather charming creature, changes into a martyr; she disappears, and is from henceforth a soft, cheery, consciseness, submissive to her lord, boundlessly forgiving, less than the dust, in fact, beneath his erosion wheels. We cannot imagine a more effectual goad to a bold bad man than the sight of so great meekness. The purpose becomes dreadfully clear. There is a child—of course there is a child—delicate, tender, born to wring our hearts and die. And as the book sets, the shadow of the Divorce Court grows larger and larger, darker and darker. Of course, the case is defended. Women of England—ye who have the vote—of course Roddy wins, and there is naught for the lily-white, white-as-snow Clare but to go out into the dark, a branded woman, with her innocent friend, a ruined man, at her side.

But—hold! Why did Clare's family let her marry the man? Why, having married, did she submit? Which was her greater tragedy—the loss of her innocence or seeing her name in the newspapers? And if the opinion of the lady shoppers in Sloane Street mattered so awfully—what was it worth? Why when the case was decided against her, did not her strong, splendid friend say: "Look here, darling, if people are so vile, let's go away and leave them to their villeness and be gloriously happy together"? Instead of which, she pinned on an hysterical hat and raved about being his mistress and "they went out into the darkness hand in hand." It is 1920, ladies and gentlemen! If we must have a novel with a purpose, let our novelist remember. Let him send them into the light hand in hand—with Kensington behind them for ever!

K. M.

AN AMMUNITION DUMP
THE CASE FOR NATIONALIZATION. By A. Emil Davies. (Allen & Unwin. 2s. 6d. paper; 4s. 6d. d. net.)

THE strength of the case for Socialist Democracy as it was presented by Karl Marx and his immediate followers lay in its appeal to man's passion for liberty. Capitalist society, in their view, was essentially a tyranny in which one class dominated and disposed of another. Nationalization, or rather communization, of the means of production was the method of liberation, the weapon by which the bourgeois tyrant was to be overthrown and a free society inaugurated and maintained; it was, so to speak, part of the strategy of emancipation.

With the development of a less revolutionary phase of Socialist thought, the case for nationalization inevitably and almost insensibly changed. If the common ownership of the means of production was to be achieved piecemeal, industry by industry, and through the ordinary methods of politics, it became necessary to justify each step not simply by reference to the ultimate and distant goal, but also by the results to be expected from it here and now in the existing structure of society. Hence the Fabian Socialists came to base their arguments more and more on the efficiency of State-owned concerns; to rely more and more on the plea that the nationalization of this industry or that would, even with society organized on its present basis, increase the wealth or, at any rate, the economic welfare of the community.

The current controversies about the mines and the railways will largely turn on this class of argument, and it is in this class of argument that Mr. Davies has specially concerned himself. The backbone of his book is the plea that the public will be better served if industry is in the hands of public authorities than it is by private enterprise. This view he supports not only on the ground that nationalization means substituting the "ideal of service" for the scramble for profit as the governing motive in industry, but principally by an appeal to experience; a large part of the book is taken up with quotations designed to show how successful various publicly managed enterprises have been in different parts of the British Empire. Mr. Davies is not very critical of the evidence he has collected; for example, several of his quotations are of the advertisements of the authorities responsible for the undertakings; would he himself accept the pronouncements of, let us say, Mr. Ponderelleo's publicity department as evidence of the efficiency of Tono-Bungay? Another prominent feature of the book is an array of damaging admissions from the speeches and writings of his opponents. Quotations of this kind are commonly accounted to be peculiarly effective on the platform—as also are "concrete" facts and illustrations. Mr. Davies' volume should, therefore, prove a useful armoury for propagandists in the forthcoming campaign; it is an invaluable ammunition dump for the army of nationalizing orators to draw upon. Scientific inquirers will look for a more critical and less one-sided presentation of the case.

APRIL 23, 1920 THE ATHENÆUM 543
LIVES OF THE HUNTED
Monarch, the Big Bear of Tallac. By Ernest Thompson Seton. (Constable. 7s. 6d. net.)

Mr. ERNEST THOMPSON SETON is a distinguished naturalist and a lover of animals. He is also a very excellent writer of stories; and it is this latter not easily definable quality that has won his fame. His tales of animals do not always ring quite true as records. We detect in them every now and then a tendency to "fake." They have not, on the other hand, the charm and power which give the "Jungle Books," frankly allegorical, a unique position in modern literature. They are the work of a good craftsman, not of a magician.

But they have, one and all, the real stuff of storytelling in them. Make a beginning of any of the stories of "Animal Heroes," and you shall find it hard enough to stop before the end. The author never lets your interest flag. He has many of the qualities of a good journalist—and the work of the journalist of the first quality has certain resemblances to that of the short-story writer of a quality a little lower than the first.

Mr. Thompson Seton lays claim to greater truthfulness than we have been prepared to admit. In each case, he tells us, he has adopted but two devices, each legitimate enough. He has selected for his hero an unusual individual, standing out from his fellows by reason of his size, strength, speed or cunning. Then he has ascribed to that animal a whole series of adventures which have been recorded of several of his kind.

The least composite, the truest to life, is said to be the story of Arnaux, the homing pigeon. It is certainly one of the best. But we confess we find some of it difficult to reconcile with the evidence of the Army "pigeonears," experts in their way. These admirably idle and contented persons whom we used to find, pipe in mouth, lying in the sun beside a motor-bus converted into a pigeon-loft, oblivious of the conflict of nations in which they played a not unimportant part, held that the memory of the very best pigeon even for his permanent home was relatively short. His memory for his motor-bus did not extend beyond a week, and it was the custom in the trenches, when birds were not released within four days, to take them back and repeat them by others from the loft. Conversely, they taught that a pigeon would lose a new place of abode as his home within a few weeks. Arnaux, the pigeon of this story, is imprisoned for breeding purposes by a fancier in Syracuse, N.Y., for two years, and on release makes straight for his loft in New York. We do not reject that story, but we should like to refer it to one of our "pigeonears" friends. They are scattered far and wide, living, we fear, more laborious days than when we used to converse with them.

We have spoken of Mr. Thompson Seton as a lover of animals. That is one of the characteristics which raise his work above the level of magazine fiction, to which it naturally belongs. There is a noble passion in his hatred of cruelty, a sympathy with the hunted, an admiration for the courage of the bear and wolf at bay, that give a real dignity to these stories.

Curiously enough, he seems to hold the dog in less esteem. But for Snap, the bull-terrier, the dogs of these books are a cowardly set. The difficulty in wolf-hunting is to combine sufficient speed with the requisite strength and courage. But surely Mr. Thompson Seton's foxhounds, "too thin-skinned to fight," that were routed by "Badlands Billy" and the "Winnipeg Wolf," were degenerates? We think four couple of really game hounds hunting "so that a table-cloth would cover them," as the saying goes, should be able to roll over in the open any wolf ever whelped.

MARGINALIA

To all lovers of unfamiliar quotations, aphorisms, great thoughts and intellectual gems, I would heartily recommend a heavy volume recently published in Brussels with the title "Pensées sur la Science, la Guerre et sur des sujets très variés." The book contains some twelve or thirteen thousand quotations, selected from a treasure of one hundred and twenty-three thousand great thoughts gleaned and garnered by the industry of Dr. Maurice Legat—an industry which will be appreciated at its true value by anyone who has ever made an attempt to compile a commonplace book or private anthology of his own. The almost intolerable labour of copying out extracts can only be avoided by the drastic use of the scissors; and there are few who can afford the luxury of mutilating their copies of the best authors.

For some days I made Dr. Legat's book my livre de chevet. But I had very soon to give up reading it at night, for I found that the great often said things so peculiar that I was kept awake in the effort to discover their meaning. Why, for example, should it be categorically stated by Lecamens that "si les animaux connaissaient Dieu, ils parleraient"? What could Cardinal Maury have meant when he said, "L'élégance, compagnie ordinaire de la liberté [astonishing generalisation!], est inconnue en Angleterre"? These were mysteries insoluble enough to counteract the soporific effects of such profound truths as this, discovered, apparently, in 1846 by M. C. H. D. Duponchel, "Le plus sage mortel est sujet à l'erreur."

Dr. Legat has found some pleasing quotations on the subject of England and the English. His selection proves with that fatal ease even the most intelligent minds are lured into making generalizations about national character, and how grotesque those generalizations always are. Montesquieu informs us that "dès que sa fortune se délabre, un anglais tue ou se fait voleur." Of the better half of this potential murderer and robber Balzac says, "La femme englaise est une pauvre créature vertueuse par force, prête à se dépraver. " "La vanité l'âme de toute société anglosaie," says Lamartine. Ledru-Rollin is of opinion that all the riches of England are "des dépouilles volées aux tombeaux."

The Goncourts risk a characteristically dashing generalization on the national characters of England and France: "Les anglais, filou comme peuple, et filou comme individu. Il est le contraire du Français, honnête comme peuple, et filou comme individu." If one is going to make a comparison Voltaire's is more satisfactory because less pretentious. Strange are the ways of you Englishmen, qui, des mêmes couteaux, Coupez la tête au roi et la queue aux chevaux.

Nous Français, plus humains, laisons aux rois leurs têtes,
Et la queue à nos bêtes.

It is unfortunate that history should have vitiated the truth of this pithy and pregnant statement.

But the bright spots in this enormous tome are rare. After turning over a few hundred pages one is compelled, albeit reluctantly, to admit that The Great Thought or Maxim is nearly the most boring form of literature that exists. Others, it seems, have anticipated me in this grand discovery. "Les de m'emuyer des pensées des autres," says d'Alembert, "j'ai voulu leur donner les miennes; mais je puis me flatter de leur avoir rendu tout l'ennui que j'avais reçu d'eux." Almost next to d'Alembert's statement I find this confession from the pen of J. Roux (1834-1906): "Emettre des pensées, voilà ma consolation, mon délice, ma vie!" Happy Monsieur Roux!

Turning dissatisfied from Dr. Legat's anthology of thought, I happened upon the second number of Prou rbe, a monthly review, four pages in length, directed by M. Paul Eluard and counting among its contributors Tristan Tzara.
of "Dada" fame, Messrs. Soupault, Breton, and Aragon, the directors of littérature, M. Picabia, M. Ribemont-Dessaignes and others of the same kidney. Here, on the front page of the March number of Prose, I found the very commonest of Great Thoughts for which I have long been looking. The following six maxims are printed one below the other: the first of them is a quotation from the Intransigent: the other five appear to be the work of M. Tzara, who append a foot-note to this effect: "Je m’appelle dorénavant exclusivement Monsieur Paul Bouret." Here they are:

I faut violer les règles, oui, mais pour les violer il faut les connaître.
I faut régler la connaissance, oui, mais pour la régler il faut les violer.
I faut connaître les viol, oui, mais pour les connaître il faut les règles.
I faut connaître les règles, oui, mais pour les connaître il faut les violer.
I faut régler les viol, oui, mais pour les régler il faut les connaître.
I faut violer la connaissance, oui, mais pour la violer il faut la régler.

It is to be hoped that Dr. Legat will find room for at least a selection of these profound thoughts in the next edition of his book. "Le sens de la vie," affirms M. Raymond Duncan on another page of Prose. It is precisely after taking too large a dose of "Pensées sur la Science, la Guerre et sur des sujets très variés" that one half wishes the statement were in fact true.

AUTOLYCUS.

NOTES FROM IRELAND

Dublin, April 16, 1920.

A fortnight ago as I wrote for this page there was nothing to disturb the repose necessary even to the most casual of literary joggers. It was the eve of Easter, to be sure, and the sensational press was making the preparations for a Sinn Fein rising which have become since 1916 as inevitable a journalistic annual as the sea-serpent. Our village Pressians, not to be outdone, were making great play with barred-wire entanglements and tanks, doubtless in order to refute the theory that the pen of Fleet Street is mightier for sensationalism than the sword of Dublin Castle. But, on the whole, it could be said, with the sublime inhumanity of the now consecrated phrase, that there was "nothing to report on this front." Heretofore, all events, to the exclusion of all else, were taken to the discipline of the Curfew law, and unattached to the service of militant Nationalism, nothing more terrible was promised by Easter than the opening of the Royal Hibernian Academy Exhibition. That threat, unlike the Rising, was realized, and on Easter Tuesday the worst was revealed. The experience proved no less formidable than usual, and, if a good average of "output" was recorded, nothing challenged special comment except the picture entitled "Homage to Sir Hugh Lane," by Mr. John Keating, A.R.H.A. Grouped about a table are Lieut.-Colonel Sir William Hamilton Poé, Bart., and Messrs. W. B. Yeats, George Russell, Dermot O’Brien, Richard Orpen, Thomas Boskin and Ahlemann Thomas Kelly, the recently released hunger-striking Lord Mayor of Dublin. These gentlemen all look exceedingly self-conscious and uncomfortable, presumably because they have just been shocked by the vision of Sir Hugh Lane as he looms in the background, green and wan, like one risen from the grave. Mr. Keating is one of our most interesting and original artists, but this defiant canvas does not throw him to advantage.

At the Academy there were only two pictures by Mr. Jake B. Yeats, but they stood out from the mass of conventional work by reason of their individuality and charm. Mr. Yeats is as original an artist as his brother with whom he is associated. His own exhibition, which followed the opening of the Academy in a couple of days, once more provided evidence of this, as well as an immense relief from the uninspired correctness of the academically blessed. The collection of drawings and pictures of life in the West of Ireland which is now being exhibited is exceedingly characteristic and representative.

Mr. Yeats, no doubt, has a convention of his own, which has already attracted imitators, but he has real vision and a perfect command of the means of expressing what he sees.

It is not the mere charm of the couplet which has charmed Mr. Yeats as the illustrator of "The Aran Islands" that again brings the two names in juxtaposition. For all his preoccupation with primitive life, Synge was sophisticated in his artistic delight in the selection of language and situation. The charm of Mr. Jack Yeats lies largely in the unafflicted naïveté of his scenes. His countrymen, no doubt, may have been led before us invested with the boyish glamour of their associations. A picture like the "Shamrock and Anchor Man" or "The Forester" is composed of elements as simple and as national as went to the making of Synge's "Riders to the Sea." While they evoke all the emotions with which each little detail is subtly tinted, they also have the universal emotion springing from a real vision of life. The gambler at a country fair, the ballad singer, the Indian rafier at a village circus, are figures called up out of the romantic memories of childhood, and drawn by a hand which can preserve the quality of childish imagination beneath a consummate technique.

Two creditable performances of Andrewes' "Life of Man" were given by the Dublin Drama League just before the activities of the whole country were rushed by the approach of a tragedy which banished all other thoughts from men's minds. For two days a national strike was made to protest against the refusal of the authorities to sign an agreement to recognize the status of the political prisoners in Mountjoy Prison. In the end a lawyer discovered that the hunger-strike to which the prisoners had resorted would involve the authorities in the crime of murder if, as they announced, they allowed the prisoners to die. The men surrendered at the point of death, and a period of ten days' excruciating tension ended in what the crowd regarded as a victory for the general strike.

In the circumstances our minds have been turned away from the pursuits which are normally the occasion of these Notes. Official institutions like the Royal Hibernian Academy remained open until the 13th April, but I noticed that Mr. Yeats closed his exhibition for the whole period of the strike. For myself, I was prompted to the only literary reference which the occasion suggested—the contrast between the punishment of mere detention inflicted on Cobbett and Leigh Hunt for proven political offences a century ago, and the barbarous treatment as common criminals to-day of men against whom no charge has been brought nor offence proven. When Leigh Hunt was condemned to two years' imprisonment for a treasonable libel on the Prince Regent, his prison quarters were described by Lamb as like "no other room except in a fairy tale" He had to grope in the dark whose face to Moone, and there, he says, "I wrote and read in fine weather." As for the interior, a full description of it would exceed the space at my disposal. The walls were papered "with a trellis of roses," the ceiling was "coloured with clouds and sky," the barred windows "screened with Venetian blinds," while his bookcases and a piano added to the amenities.

B.

We have received from the S.P.C.K. two excellent little tracts in their "Helps for Students of History" series: "Hints on Translation from Latin into English" (6d. net) and "Hints on the Study of Latin" (6d. net), both by Professor Alexander Souter. In the first, besides those general principles of translation which are totally ignored in nine out of every ten translations printed, the author insists on the value of consulting as many independent dictionaries as possible, not neglecting the very old ones. He insists on a fuller knowledge of meanings, instancing such words as debits, which means "mitted," not "weak," and comes, which is "attendant," not "companion." A list of good grammars, and a hint as to the reason for certain "poetical" forms of expression are also appended. Finally the translator is advised not to rely on the latest works—earliest printed sometimes preserve the correct form. The "Hints on Study" offer information as to the latest works on Latin, works connected with particular author, and special notes on their vocabulary. Even competent scholars might derive some information from Professor Souter's pages. The book is one mass of erudition.
Science

A PRINCIPLE AND ITS INTERPRETATION

If we contrast ancient with modern scientific theories we find that the chief distinguishing characteristic of the former is that they employ principles drawn from other branches of knowledge or speculation. It would be, perhaps, rash to say that modern science, in all its branches, is yet completely autonomous; sometimes, for instance, it seems to make assumptions which are the result of an uncritical philosophy, but even the grossest of these examples, compared with many celebrated early scientific theories, shows how great is the purification that has been effected. The chief error of the old speculators consisted in imagining that the world is a more obvious unity than we have now any reason to suppose. Hence they were always willing to argue by "analogy," comparing terms between which we cannot now find the slightest resemblance. The method was not only illegitimate, but sometimes led to quite unnecessary complexities of explanation. The Ptolemaic system of astronomy, for instance, conceived as the theory that the heavenly bodies revolve round the earth, was a perfectly reasonable and satisfactory theory. It was capable of explaining all the observed planetary motions, except a few minute irregularities requiring precise measurements for their detection. Its proper development required, of course, complete docility in face of new facts; but in an actual development it was forced to accommodate itself to quite other considerations. It had to take into account the venerable principle that, the celestial bodies being obviously sublime, incorrupt and perfect, their orbits must be perfect and described with uniform velocities. The only possible perfect orbit was as obviously a circle. Hence the Ptolemaic theory was loaded with the task of explaining the observed heavenly motions on two grounds: first, that the earth was stationary and at the centre of the system, and second, that the planetary orbits were circular and described with unvarying velocities. Alternative hypotheses were not only stupid but impious. The task thus set to the early astronomers was one of considerable difficulty.

The observed path of a planet, say Mars, or Jupiter, or Saturn, is by no means simple. If its motion amongst the stars be watched from night to night it is seen to be moving sometimes from east to west and sometimes from west to east. Further, in changing its direction of motion it does not retrace its path amongst the stars. Its actual observed path exhibits irregular loops, and, more rarely, a twisted line. It was at once obvious that a circular orbit, traversed with uniform velocity, would not suffice to explain these appearances. Nevertheless, the principle must be preserved. The astronomers overcame this difficulty by a device that strikes one as being almost disingenuous. They imagined a small circle whose centre traversed the circumference of the big circle with a constant velocity and round whose own circumference the planet moved with a constant velocity. By assigning suitable velocities to these two motions the crude features of the planet's actual observed motion could be represented— it would sometimes be retrograde and sometimes direct. This is ingenious, but it is questionable whether it preserves the principle. The planet's motion is obtained by circular motions, it is true, but it is not itself a circular motion with reference to the earth as centre. The astronomers have entered on a slippery path. We view them with the same suspicion with which we watch a Broad Churchman expounding the Thirty-Nine Articles. But they had to go further. The theoretical and the observed motions did not fit well enough. On the little circle it was necessary to imagine a still smaller circle, and to place the planet on that. After all, the interpretation of "circular motion" once admitted, there was no reason why it should not be followed up. But progress in this direction soon came to a halt. It became evident that this method would not, by itself, reconcile observation and theory. The principle had to be strained again, and this time in an almost indefensible manner. It was declared that the big circle was eccentric with respect to the earth and that the little circles were eccentric with respect to their supposed former centres. This assertion must have been a great strain on the faith of the orthodox believer. He may well have wondered whether, by this time, the pure doctrine of his fathers had not been subtly undermined. Circular motion was still preserved, in a way, it is true, but with so many circles, and their centres all over the place—this must have appeared something very different from what he supposed the principle to mean.

The same difficulty was felt by simple minds in modern times, when the correct explanations of statements in Genesis were worked out by the theologians. And just as the simple story of the Creation in Genesis became transformed into an extremely obscure and ambiguous anticipation of the discoveries of Geology, so the interpretation of circular motion advanced from complexity to complexity. Immutable principles must exist, of course—it is part of the glory of man that he should have been able to discover so many of them—but they sometimes seem more trouble than they are worth. The old astronomers found that yet again a more liberal interpretation must be given to the principle of circular motion. This time it was found that the circles do not all lie in one plane. Each circle has its own plane, which may be inclined at any angle to the others. By this time the theorists, whom we might call the "commentators," had forged a very powerful method. Circles could be multiplied; their centres could be placed anywhere; their planes could be inclined at any angle. The rich content of the principle of circular motion was now fully revealed. With all these variables to play with a very close correspondence between theory and observation was easily maintained.

The rise of the "higher criticism" of this system leads to the history of modern astronomy. It is to be noted, however, that the first higher critic, like the first higher critics in other departments, was not wholly emancipated from his early teaching. Copernicus effected the immense revolution of placing the sun in the centre of the system, but he did not abandon circular motion. So he had to retain parts of the epicyclic apparatus. The revolution was first completely effected by Kepler, but even he conducted his early researches as a semi-believer, a kind of very Broad Churchman. He made nineteen successive attempts to explain the motions of Mars by arrangements of orbits and observation was made, and only then did he frankly throw the great principle of circular motion overboard, and state that the actual paths of the planets were ellipses. And so, in a few years, a great immutable principle, a whole system of beliefs, the industry and thought of generations went for nothing, and now exist merely as an occasional cold reference in a treatise on Astronomy to the Ptolemaic system as a "monument of misplaced ingenuity."

S.

A licence, under Section 20 of the Companies' (Consolidation) Act, 1908, has been issued by the Board of Trade to the Scottish Shale Oil Scientific and Industrial Research Association, which has been approved by the Department as complying with the conditions laid down in the Government scheme for the encouragement of industrial research. The Association may be approached through Mr. W. Fraser, C.B.E., 138, Buchanan Street, Glasgow.
SOCIETIES

ROYAL.—March 25.—Sir J. J. Thomson, President, in the chair.

The following papers were read: "Note on the Central Differential Equation in the Relativity Theory of Gravitation," by Prof. A. R. Forsyth (in this note Professor Forsyth obtained an exact solution, in terms of elliptic functions, of Einstein's critical equation).

GEOLOGICAL.—March 24.—Mr. R. D. Oldham, President, in the chair.

Mr. Brinley Clifford George and Mr. F. W. White were elected Fellows.

The President, in announcing the death of Mr. Charles Laphworth, said: "He has added to our knowledge a wealth of observation and a number of those vitalizing concepts on which the life and progress of science depend, and has added lustre to our science and Society; not in this country alone, but in every land where geology is cultivated. Your Council has already put on record its appreciation of the services which our late Fellow has rendered, and sympathy with his family in their bereavement; but, considering, that the Society at large would desire an opportunity of associating itself with these sentiments, I will ask your concurrence."

The communication was unanimously approved.

The President announced that the Council had awarded the proceeds of the Daniel's Fund to the present year to Miss Marjorie E. J. Chandler, who proposes to investigate the Oligocene flora of the Horlick Chilts, Hampshire; and to Mr. Laurence Dudley Stamp, who proposes to make a comparative study of the Downtonian and Gallo-Brayian in North-Western Europe.

Two communications by Mrs. Eleanor M. Reid were read: "On Two Pre-Palaeozoic Floras from Castle Eden (County Durham)," and "A Comparative Review of Palaeozoic Floras, based on the Study of Fossil Seeds." Prof. A. Seward, Professor James Small, Mr. M. M. Allorge, Dr. C. W. Andrews and Sir Henry Howorth discussed the papers.

Portions of an atlas vertebra of a big elephant, probably near Elephas meridionalis, from the Downtonian of county Durham, were exhibited on behalf of Dr. C. T. Trechmann; and lantern-slides of fossil seeds, etc., were exhibited by Mrs. E. M. Reid in illustration of her papers.

ROYAL INSTITUTION.—April 12.—Mr. J. H. Balfour Brown, Vice-President, in the chair.

The Chairman reported the death of Mr. C. E. Groves, and a resolution of condolence with the relatives was passed.—Mr. F. W. Bain, Dr. C. J. H. Hancock, Sir Leigh Heskyns, Mrs. Bayford Owen, Dr. C. Salvin, Mr. F. C. M. Welles and Miss M. Woodhull were elected Members.

FORTHCOMING MEETINGS

Fri. 23. Egypt Exploration (Lecture Room of the Royal Society, Burlington House), 8.30.—"Revelations of Ancient Egypt," Prof. T. E. Peet.

Royal Institution, 9.—"Shakespeare's Shylock and Scott's Isaac of York," Sir Israel Gollancz.

Society of Arts, 3.—"Aluminium and its Alloys," Lecture III., Dr. W. Rosemann. (Cantor Lecture).

Wed. 28. Society of Arts, 4.30.—"Ancient Stained Glass," Rev. Mr. General C. H. SHEERILL.

Thurs. 29. Royal Institution, 3.—"The Origins of the Dwellers in Mesopotamia," Mr. R. Campbell Thompson.

Royal, 4.30.—"The Irish Eskers," Professor J. W. Gregory; "The Life-History and Cytology of Symphonia (Schilb.) Perz., the Cause of Wart Disease in Potatoes," Miss K. N. Curtis; "On the Structure and Affinities of Acrotyla Pan- cheri, Pilg.," R. Sahni.

Child-Study, 6.—"Edinburgh Palace Road, S.W.," 6.—"Biting Insects and Children," Dr. A. E. Shipley.

Fine Arts

THE TWO CUBISMS

The thirty-first exhibition of the Indépendants resembled none of its predecessors in its outward aspect. Those who were too much attracted by the picturesqueness with which the works were presented accuse the Grand Palais of supplying a too sumptuous and frigid setting to this exhibition, whose tranquillity deceived them. They attributed to the architectural framework an effect which is the result only of the cohesion of the efforts of young artists, who for the first time for many years have given up their extreme tumultuousness, and, weary of marking time in mere decoration, are slowly advancing towards a goal, if not identical, at least parallel with that of the new classicism.

Two things were characteristic of this Salon, things equally significant and of capital importance. The first is that which causes the greatest disillusion to those who previously were accustomed to look at the Indépendants for emotions whose force was derived from scandal. There was no "revelation." no genius came like a thunderbolt to set fire to the walls, no spontaneous birth, no lightning; the epoch of prodigies is over, our most recent experience having proved that they have no survival value. We see in this the sign that the time for outbidding each other is past, and that, even at the cost of a provisional effacement of their personality, the painter and the sculptor accept the function of levelling which will be the result of their less and less astonishing researches. They are seriously harnessing themselves to their task. The public on its part, interested for different reasons (of which the principal is that capital is involved) to know how to distinguish the good from the bad, authentic art from fake, has started work in the same way and commenced to pierce the mystery of techniques. It will become more and more impossible to impose on it by false masterpieces and astonish it by deliberate "revelations." Soon perhaps the play will be open on both sides, and what the contest loses in brilliancy it will doubtless gain in depth. If the expression which occurs to me to define the present tendency did not appear to me too slight, I would say that it will be necessary to substitute a single "ism" for the many which hitherto have been promulgated and which characterized only various infirmities. The new one would be "equilibrium".

What did the innovators of every kind—"accept my part in the responsibility—except cheat in the divine game of plastic exercise? I can find nothing better to express the artist's attitude than to compare him to a man walking a tight-rope, with his eyes fixed on a goal which is alternately illuminated and darkened by his instinct and his intelligence. On each side of the rope is danger: on the left the treacherous country of immediacy, the domain of nature, in the degraded sense in which it is understood by the realistic towards which his senses draw him; on the right the illimitable space of pure speculation, towards which his reason inclines. Refusing the difficult and insufficiently original work of maintaining equilibrium, many artists, lately anxious to demonstrate their false agility, have only taken the plunge to the right or to the left. It was then that the public at the sensational private views applauded, if there were some grace or some force about the fall. The failure was immediately baptized as a new "ism." General opinion seems now to have concluded that these amusements lead nowhere, not even to lasting pleasure, and that even a game implies rules. The rule here is to keep one's balance. Still to desire to discover a definitive formula too soon would be to confuse death with stability, and not to understand that the intoxication one experiences in constructing a work of art has after all some resemblance to a departure for distant adventures. We do not desire to apply a single method to solve the problems our imagination puts before us. (But I reserve the development of this idea for the moment when I come to speak of personalities.)

The second event is the admission, by almost unanimous consent, of Cubism, to the rank of honest formulae. The majority of the critics have finally pronounced the Dignus est intrare, to the great astonishment of the Cubists themselves. It is a sign of the times: we are certainly looking for a spiritual discipline, and I think I may add that the general artistic taste is becoming more sensitive. What is the cause of this success? Certainly that the public, now become more serious, prefers to sudden "revelations," "affirmations" and "confirmations" of talent. A sudden leap has only a feeble interest now; a balanced movement of which the predominant inclination may be either sentimental or spiritual, marked by the conscious adjustment of the rope-walker of whom I have spoken, is become (at least I hope so) the most attractive thing for the connoisseur.

The Cubist works, against the will of their authors, who wished to appear together, were placed in three separate rooms. The impression was weakened, but was perhaps more intelligible. Grouped by their affinities, the artists show clearly the differences which divide them, and thus express the vitality of their manifold ideal. There are four nuances of Cubism: two absolutely opposite currents lead, by the opposed roads of painters and sculptors, towards two goals, which are united only by their antagonism.

I do not wish to be suspected of exalting one of these groups at the expense of the other. There is plenty of talent in both camps, and talent alone will decide the final selection. I simply desire to define as precisely as I can the attitude of those whom I call, for my purposes only, Cubists a priori or pure Cubists, and the Cubists a posteriori or emotional Cubists. To say that I reckon myself in this second group is not, in my view, to claim any supremacy for it, but rather to confess a weakness, which is capable, however, of becoming a virtue.

In my article "A First Visit to the Louvre," *having more urgent business in hand, I did no more than indicate the difference (in my opinion radical and incurable) which separates French artists from foreign artists, Italians in particular. These latter, I wrote, paint Gods directly; our best painters paint men and achieve Gods. We find in Cubism, a European art born in France, a very definite trace of this profound distinction, which marks the two races of artists who divide the universe between them. "It was not on earth that I looked for this type," said Leonardo, speaking of a head of Jesus that he had drawn. And Michael Angelo: "It is foolishly, it is absurd to pretend to obtain from one's senses a type of beauty which moves and uplifts to the heavens every healthy understanding." These are words which throw an admirable illumination on the methods of work of these masters. Endeavouring to express the divine or the universal, they construct the whole of their ideal by generalizing, they set both feet in the Eternal. The great Italians of the Renaissance are idealists and idealogues (or rather ideists, as Remy de Gourmont said). For them a picture is above all a speculation of the spirit, a temple where God alone reigns and where man finds refuge in the last resort. The pure Cubist painters, Braque, Juan Gris, Maria Blanchard, Metzinger, Marcoussis, Severini, Hayden, and the sculptors Lipchitz and Laurens, all conceive their work as a world wherein nothing quotidian can be admitted at the outset. Metzinger loves to speak of l'effusion pure. This phrase perfectly describes the effort of the artist for whom the work is essentially only a medium into which spiritual elements alone enter. The inspiration does not belong to the sentimental order, but to the plastic combination of differently coloured forms whose dimensions, position and tone are obtained by the exercise of a rigorous procedure. The picture is finished as soon as the purely abstract surfaces dividing it are organized; the rest of the work only consists in choosing among a small repertory of acquired forms those whose geometrical absolute coincides with each of the compartments of the picture. A plate justifies the circle, and the box a rectangle. Plainly, "it is not on the earth" that the pure Cubists look for their types. The universal is their familiar domain; the utilization of the particular is only a concession, never a motive with them. Having to represent the objects which constitute a still-life, they paint the glass, the dessert plate, the grapes, the apple, "in general." They conceive the object stripped of all contingency, recreated, uncontaminated by all terrestrial adventure. They make an inventory of the qualities of each thing, and make a minute and subtle enumeration of them on the canvas. They proceed by knowledge, like the academic painters in the noble sense. As Michael Angelo knew his muscles by heart, they know by heart their guitar, their pipe, their fruits; to represent them they do not need to have them before their eyes. Their memory is an arsenal of dissociated forms, all ready to be organized to the learned laws of Cubist composition.

Everything, even to the clear light that bares their canvases, expresses their disdain for appearances. It is not the warm, the abstract, Venetian light I would compare that of the Cubists. Is it because many of them are Spaniards that it seems to me that the lighting of their works is the same which gives an aureole of mystery and the absolute to the heroes of Greco or Zurbaran? To define the Cubists of the first category in a brief formula, one may say that being in possession of traditional laws of painting, they formulate and enunciate them, taking the objects as their example only in the last resort; they project their plastic dreams on to the object as on to a screen.

(To be concluded.)

EXHIBITIONS OF THE WEEK

BROOMEHEAD, CUTTS & CO.—Memorial Exhibition of Works by Walter Crane.

WALKER'S GALLERIES.—Painting and Sculpture by the "Seven and Five."

BURLINGTON GALLERY.—The Society of Australian Artists.

FINE ART SOCIETY.—Decorative Pictures and Landscapes by William G. Robb.—Waters of the Sussex Downs, by Ruth Dollman.

REDMOND GALLERY.—Bird and Animal Life, by George E. Lodge.

TWENTY-ONE GALLERY.—Sculpture and Carving in Wood and Stone by Alec Miller.

WALTER CRANE was a very considerable celebrity in his day. He figured among the Victorian demigods who are perpetuated in the portraits of Watts, and he takes his place historically as the last and least of the Victorian Proraphælites. His reputation, which once burned with a steady flame, had sunk to a feeble flicker before his death in 1915, and we fear that the memorial exhibition of his easel pictures will do little to revive the half-cold embers. For the futility of these paintings and water-colours must be patent to the trained sympathy of the public. The majority are, it is true, parerga done for amusement or as notes to be utilized later; but it is precisely in such sketches and studies that an artist reveals himself most completely. When, as here, they furnish no evidence of mental force, or sensibility or power of execution, it must be assumed that the major works are also lacking in these fundamental qualities. And indeed Crane's main work, his books and decorations and craft designs, strike us to-day as intolerably trivial, mere

* See Athenæum, August 22, 1919.
THE FUNCTION OF THE CAMERA.

THE FINE ART OF PHOTOGRAPHY. By Paul L. Anderson. (Lippincott. 12s. 6d. net.)

The professional photographer and the amateur with ambitions in the field of so-called "pictorial" photography will derive much encouragement from Mr. Anderson's entertaining book, which explains a number of methods of teaching the camera to avoid the truth in the interests of "art." Mr. Anderson holds that it is the photographer's business to express the soul that lies behind the material aspects of things, and that this he achieves by essentially faking the outlines and values on photographic negatives. He believes in composition, manipulation, imagination—in anything and everything, it appears, except the camera. To judge by the examples of his work which illustrate the book, he has a horror of the sharp vision of the camera; his aesthetic sense is not apparent until he has transformed it into the sentimental approximate vision of the third-rate painter. This dissatisfaction with the camera strikes us as extraordinary. Here is a man who holds in his hand an instrument of perfect scientific precision and who refuses to allow it to be precise. It is as though a driver of a Rolls-Royce were to force the engine to run in jerks and bumps in order to secure the illusion that the motive power was an ill-trained horse. At its present pitch of development the camera can give us absolutely accurate black-and-white records of things both still and in motion. Properly exploited this power can be of inestimable profit and pleasure to man; and its exploitation is the urgent task of the photographer. Artists have been the first to accept and welcome the camera; the more intelligent among them have set about revising their standards in relation to its presence in our life. They must look with amazement at the spectacle of a photographer who deliberately impairs the efficiency of his machine and tampers with the admirable accuracy of its records. For, like ourselves, they demand nothing more than accuracy from the camera and refuse to accept anything less.

R. H. W.

AN IMPORTANT SALE

SAMMLUNG PAUL DAVIDSON : VERSTEIGERUNGSKATALOG. (Leipzig. C. G. Boerner. 30 M.; ohne Tafeln, 10 M.)

The Paul Davidson collection of engravings, woodcuts and etchings is about to be dispersed by auction in Leipzig. This magnificent collection, begun by Mr. Davidson in London about 1870, and continued subsequently in Vienna and Berlin, now numbers some 10,000 prints. All the great masters from the fifteenth to the first half of the eighteenth century are represented, in many cases by rare prints, and as a general rule it can be said that no important work in the medium is wanting. The first part of the sale, comprising prints by artists with initials A to F (2,200 lots), will be held from the 3rd to the 8th of May. From the auctioneer, Herr C. G. Boerner, of Leipzig, we have received the admirably printed and generously illustrated catalogue of this section, which constitutes in itself a valuable book of reference. A glance at the pages is sufficient to indicate the high quality of the prints. In addition to the practically complete sets of Dürer plates and blocks, collectors will be able to compete for works by Aldegrever, Albrecht and the Beham, Cranach, Callot, Giulio Campagnola, Van Dyck and Rubens, to take names at random from a list rich in masterpieces, which honours all ranks and all schools. The second section of the sale (to be held in the autumn) contains almost complete sets of Holler, Nanteuil and Van Ostade; and interest in the final section (timed for the spring of next year) will centre in the rarest set of prints.

It is sad to think that this almost unique collection, brought together with so much patience and enthusiasm, and epitomizing the art of three hundred and fifty years, is to be scattered once more across the earth. We hunger for a magic rug which could transport it intact to the new and accessible Gallery. Do we hope that some public benefactor will come to the rescue and take this opportunity of making good the gaps in our national collections? No one would grudge him a place in the Honours list after such a service, or deny his claim to national gratitude.
Music

"THE TEMPEST"

THE Surrey opera season comes to an end this week. It was a courageous venture and it has amply justified itself. The Miln-Fairbairn company have made their own audience and they have thoroughly deserved their popularity. Beginning with a modest repertory of old-fashioned favourites, they have gradually added to it operas which have attracted audiences to whom the south side of the river was none too familiar. More than that, they have given us two new operas by English composers. Their first season will be memorable for its latest achievement, the production of "The Tempest."

The play of Shakespeare which Mr. Nicholas Gatty has set to music may be regarded in itself as one of the historical foundation-stones of English opera. It is almost an opera as it stands. More than any other play, it embodies that Shakespearian attitude towards the dramatic function of music which Mr. Percy Scholes very thoughtfully analysed not long ago. When the Restoration reopened the theatres and added to the public stage those devices which in former times had been the exclusive property of the Court masques, it was "The Tempest" which pointed the way to English opera as conceived by Dryden and Purcell. From a literary standpoint it may be difficult to defend the additions and alterations made to Shakespeare's text by D'Avenant, Shadwell and Dryden; but to the historian of opera these atrocities were a necessary stage in the development of our musical drama. Purcell, at any rate, whose settings of the two well-known songs have become traditionally inseparable from the verse of Shakespeare. The principle of Shakespeare, which his seventeenth-century mitigators only amplified, was that music, apart from the grotesque songs of the drunken clowns, was the attribute of supernatural characters. It is because he sings and pipes that Ariel is Ariel.

In converting the play into a modern opera a composer might easily run the risk of destroying all that fantastic sense of the immaterial which gives it its peculiar beauty. When all the characters have to sing the whole time how is Ariel to be lifted on to a more ethereal plane? Mr. Gatty solves the problem with a very imaginative simplicity. As if he would hold that since he is older than the sea he makes his mortals sing Wagner and his spirits Purcell. The reader must not take this statement literally. Mr. Gatty has learned much from Wagner, as any musician of his generation did, and has learned much from Purcell too. But he has evolved in all his compositions a style of his own. It is not what is generally called a modern style, but it handles old material in a new and quite individual way. He is austere ascetic in his determination to use the fewest possible notes, the plainest possible chords; but this asceticism by no means prejudices either agility or passion, and at certain moments, both in "The Tempest" and in some earlier works of his, he attains by this very means a strangely rarefied and spiritual atmosphere of poetry, aspiration and romance. And this is the essential atmosphere of Shakespeare's play.

To see Shakespeare acted in a foreign language is an interesting test of what qualities in him make the deepest appeal to us. "The Taming of the Shrew" seemed to me to go better in Italian than in English. "The Merchant of Venice" and "Romeo and Juliet," staged in German with all possible care, left me convinced that Shakespeare could exist in no language but his own. Mendelssohn barely rescued "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Yet "The Tempest," in the crudest of modern German settings, unfamiliar in language, unfamiliar, too, in the musical setting of Humperdinck—a setting which, though always sensitive and poetic, is inconceivable with the English text—seemed to belong to a sphere where words, German or English, were things of no moment. It is not a story which the poet has taken from a prose original and verified. It is in itself poetry; and the actual words are poetry because they are the fewest, the simplest, and the most direct.

Hence it did not seem to matter much what alterations Mr. Reginald Gatty had made in the text to compress it into a libretto for his brother. He has reduced the play to three acts set in a single scene. The only occasions when the situation seemed at all awkward were when the ship appeared, and these difficulties might probably be adjusted by a little more careful designing on the part of the stage producer. It is perhaps the greatest tribute that one can pay to Mr. Nicholas Gatty's music to say that it triumphed even over the ship and complements and scenery. Full of fantasy and romance in the best sense, it is never realistic, and for that reason realistic scenery brings no advantage to it. Mr. Gatty's storms and apparitions are as remote from pictorialism as Purcell's. He has an extraordinary way of transporting the listener into the land of magic and fantasy with the simplest devices. With a few restorations of a common chord he brings in the spirits with the banquet, the masque of Juno—one of the most ravishingly beautiful moments of the whole opera; and a few shakes and arpeggios on the flute suffice him to portray Ariel. For the part of Ariel he was fortunate in having Miss Gladys Moger. Both as a singer and as an actress she had formed a real conception of the character, and the intelligence and subtlety with which she showed in every phrase and every movement made Ariel the dominant figure of the opera throughout. It was just this lack of certainty which prevented Mr. Andrew Shanks from doing full justice to the difficult part of Prospero, in spite of a fine voice and a great dignity of manner. Another hard part to act is that of Ferdinand, but Mr. Lyon Mackie's delightfully natural and unaffected grace made his first entry immediately successful. The simplicity and ease of his singing gave great charm to the love scenes, and Miss Ida Cooper was a very attractive Miranda. The villains and comedians were less effective. Mr. Gatty has given them music to sing which at first sight tempts them naturally to a Wagnerian manner. It is a pretty safe rule for interpreters of music not to seize upon and emphasise such resemblance to an earlier composer as they may discover, but rather to look carefully in such moments for the less obvious points of difference. The whole company would interpret Mr. Gatty's opera the better if they would put themselves to the trouble of reading Shakespeare's play aloud in the intervals of rehearsing.

"The Tempest" has been very appropriately chosen to celebrate Shakespeare's birthday on April 23. It is a very notable addition to the list of English operas, and there is no opera which it would give greater pleasure to see revived at the next Surrey season.

EDWARD J. DENT.

The second number of Music and Letters, 3s. 6d. net, published by Messrs. Barnictt & Pearce, of Taunton, whose London headquarters are at 18, Berners Street, W. 1) is decidedly an advance on its predecessor. The editor contributes an article on Dr. Vaughan Williams and his work, and Dr. Williams himself is the author of a timely protest against the doctrine (held by certain eminent academicians) that reading a full score is the same thing as hearing it played. Mme. Suggia discusses on the violoncello; and amongst the other contributors are Mr. Plunket Greene, Mr. Wardie Fowler, and Mr. J. B. Trend. The reviewing is well done, so are the letters—of which the London one is the best, although for some reason operatic matters are left undiscovered. Sir Edward Elgar's tribute to Parry is not the least notable thing in the number, though the shortest.
of the Russian Ballet. It was due largely to her excellent training that "Venus and Adonis" was put on the stage—and on the most painfully cramped stage—with a clear-cut sense of design. She has effected a striking improvement in the comportment of the whole company, and one of her pupils, Mr. Robin Ford, executed a solo dance with remarkable agility and elegance. The parts of Venus and Adonis were taken by Miss Gladys Moger and Mr. Clive Carey, both of whom thoroughly understand the singing of old English music. The accompaniments were arranged for harpsichord, viol d'amore and viol-da-gamba by Miss Chaplin, and sounded fairly adequate in the small room; but it is to be hoped that a full band of strings will be available when Mr. Boughton brings his company to the "Old Vic" in the first week of June.

EDWARD J. DENT.

CONCERTS

In point of general interest the Saturday Symphony Concerts this season have stood comparison with any others that have been given, although the London Symphony and the Philharmonic have also shown an unusual degree of enterprise. On April 17 we heard a new Suite by Roger-Ducasse, Chausson's B flat Symphony, and Glazounow's A minor Concerto. The suite is an attractive piece of miniature painting, in which for once in a way Ducasse does not seem to be melodic inadequacy to be partially amolshed; it does not aim to do more than please, but it does that very gracefully, although the composer has a talent of breaking off suddenly in what appears to be the middle of a passage and starting afresh, as if he had been at a loss to find the proper continuation. Neither in the Symphony nor the Concerto do his respective composers appear at their best. The Symphony is immature, and although it contains no such direct reminiscence of Franck as the Poème for Violin (played by Miss Margaret Fairless earlier in the week), it is a less vital and really a less individual piece of work. The Concerto has a gay and showy finale, but the rest of it is lamentably full. Even the composer's remarkable sense of colour seems for once to have forsaken him; the scoring is as dry as a Bath Olive biscuit. M. Melsa is an artistic player, but this concerto does not suit him; the finale calls for more power of tone and greater brilliance of style than he at present commands.

One of the chief events of the season was, however, the remade appearance, and completely routed the critics who have been complaining that she has no voice and does not know how to sing. Her tone (with something of the roundness of the oboe in it) was admirable, and her rendering of arias by Bach and Franck showed that, for all her dramatic power, her artist ensemble is solid and lustful, and if there is no occasion for them. The fervour and simplicity of her style in these songs left a vivid impression on at least one member of the audience.

Some new pianoforte pieces by Josef Suk were played by Miss Fanny Davies at the Wigmore Hall on April 13. The first, the sub-title "to the sub-title "to the d'Oliver," but to anyone who had heard the spirited performance of Beethoven's E flat Trio, which preceded it, there could be no doubt that the "Joie de Vivre" was supplied by Miss Fanny Davies herself. The other pieces were of an elegiac character, loose and rambling in construction, but with touches of real tenderness and poetry. They could not have found a more adequately sympathetic interpreter. In Brahms' Trio in C major Miss Davies was joined by Miss Marjorie Hayward and Mr. Arthur Williams. Every moment of her playing was a delight, and it was pleasant to note that no one appreciated it more keenly than the almost equally distinguished pianist who paid her the charming privilege of turning over for her.

Miss Doris Fuller, who made her first appearance in London the same day, is one of the many young pianists whose playing shows no outstanding qualities, but is always refined and agreeable. She hardly seemed to grasp the significance of Chopin's B minor Sonata, and was more at home in Weber's Duo for clarinet and pianoforte, which she played with Mr. Francis O'Connor. But it is one of those second-rate classics which are not worth resurrecting nowadays.
Drama

VULGUS PROFANUM

Phoenix Society (Lyric Theatre, Hammersmith).—Heywood's "Fair Maid of the West"; or, A Girle Worthe Gold.

Globe Theatre.— "Birds of a Feather." By H. V. Esmond.

The "prayers of past tyme" had ample cause for lamentation at the Phoenix Society's performance, where full evidence was produced that English taste has not decayed. "The Fair Maid of the West" has in it no single line of merit, there is no metric triumph above those common to any modern penny-a-liner, the plot would shame the brothers Melville, and no actor of current melodrama but would jib at its lack of sophistication. One endures five acts saved only by the potboyc, by a few broad phrases, by a "Go buy me concubines" bellowed by the blackamoor prince, by a few obscenities which would not be funny if uttered, as they daily are, among a crowd of undergraduates, and which assume but a doubtful importance even when uttered by the plotter of one clergyman and one member of the British Academic Committee. Masterpieces are not produced by the gross; it is a fallacy to imagine that this occurred in the seventeenth century, or that it will occur in our own.

More honour, of course, to Shakespeare for having ventured to put poetry into "Hamlet," for having compounded "Lear" and "The Tempest," when the popular taste was set toward "A Girle Worthe Gold." This play is puerile melodrama of the crudest, and nothing but faddism can pretend the contrary; it is instructive, archaeologically, to see what the spasms days liked; it is well that one popular play of the period should be seen once; for "one must know a certain amount of the bad literature of any time or country before one can rightly appraise the good." The Fair Maid's part might carry better if done by a boy; some of the male actors were possible, but there seems no reason even for an archaeological society to adopt a stage convention for emotional speech, and for Mullahog to entune through his narrowed nostrils such verbs as "bee-uyeet-tee-fi-ihh." It is conceivable that plays of this type, if acted by the "Little Eyases," in a spirit of burlesque, in the general tone of Jack Yeats' pirate pictures, might have amused an audience of fond parents, but as dramatic art this play is null.

There is, however, one point of psychological archaeology which may detain us. The month's theatres provide us with a series of "conversion plays"; in 1920 the theatre mind is running on avarice. In Mr. Esmond's play we have a conversion; and in "Uncle Ned" we have a conversion. These modern conversions turn on sentiment. In Ruffman's we find this difference: Ruffman is a swaggering, bullying coward on principle, he is, in a loose way, a Machiavellian coward, according to plan. When his system breaks down he "cuts a loss" instantly; his personal moral shifts its ground as rapidly as a modern business man's system would be shifted in face of a new condition. I am inclined to think that this apparently crude metamorphosis in Heywood's play is probably true to the type of his time; is probably a better invention than it looks, and is probably better, very considerably better, than the samples of conversion offered in current productions. Ruffman is a creature of intellect, and he is quite as much himself in his attack on the three sailors as in his cowardice in the field.

Heywood's play gives us another ground for interminable research; I mean the Elizabethan concern with chastity and the "proving of women." There is Griselda, and there are a score of stories in Boccaccio and Renaissance writers. The time had had a new spur toward this problem, but one must presuppose a long past of bald Christian metaphors about souls being tried by fire, and of unanalysed sex contests, and possibly pagan trials of initiation into secret mysteries, to account for these spyings and prying and plottings and temptings of the steadfast wife or mistress. (There is also the curious evidence in the Musée de Cluny.) The subject is without end, and one only indicates it as the material for two score of doctors' theses. If the spirit of these tests is not unmodern, it has at any rate been relegated to the lower types of humanity.

Mr. Esmond's play is amorphous, crudely joined and without impact or incision. Miss Marie Lorr as even a semi-Semite is racing unconvincing; if Rowena must play this part she should make up to it, not sheding her pallid beauty unavailingly. Mr. Esmond acts well. Yet the points of the play are not made. Herringham's success in breaking his word fits the general design; he, by this, darkens his plumage sufficiently to enter the house of Usher, and adds his slight weight to the author's theory of "the influence of environment," but only a critic faced by the necessity of writing an article is likely to notice this facet of the design. And where have I heard those words: "What you feel for me is not love, it is . . . ."? The blank half of this line can be filled in at the reader's pleasure; there are several variants now working on the London stage, but they all tend in the same direction. It is "not love," it is some consanguine of lower order and less worthy of the higher pantheism of our era.

Mr. Shaw would have had at least the grace to permit his hero to analyse his own feelings, and to tell the darling of his reveries that what he felt for her was the mere desire for a concubine or a housekeeper or for someone to make out the washing list. This may not be true to the English national character, but it is vastly more amusing for the audience and has the merit of saving the heroine the onerous labours of sermonizing.

"Birds of a Feather" is, as I have indicated, a play against money-lust, but, like its current congeners, it contents itself with an attack by sentiment. Mr. Esmond, like other dramatists, is out to reform millionaires, but like all the rest of his fraternity, he is content with trite texts; he does not want the trouble of thinking about economics or of tackling the problem of wealth. There is in the play no real conflict of ideas; and it is by just that much the weaker. The Greek tragedians were, I think, actually concerned with showing the folly of violent action. The Elizabethan master was searching for, or at any rate staged the philosophy of his time. Mr. Esmond rather seems to want the paraphernalia of a problem play without coming to grips with the problem. Hamlet looks at his "bare bodkin"; the implement is not wrapped in bumbast or in rhetoric. "If in that sleep . . .!"

If in these twentieth-century plays the dramatists want the cogency of Ibsen, they will have to come closer to problems to which the answer is less easy and far more definite. There are plenty of amiable rich. The kind heart and the coronet are not in permanent and necessary antithesis. An assumption to this effect merely weakens the force of an action.

Miss Usher is a good caricature, or, if you like, a fairly accurate allegory. From the technical point of view, it seems possible that Mr. Esmond would write better plays if he tried the Abbey Theatre recipe of reducing his characters to the minimum possible number. Grisson and Gorwin are brought into the play, but for a great part of the time they seem to be there simply to stretch the piece over the necessary number of acts and hours.

T. J. V.
GOGOL

DUKE OF YORK'S THEATRE.—Gogol's "The Government Inspector" ("Revisor"). Translated by T. H. Hall.

ACTED as farce and parody, "The Government Inspector" is so enjoyable an evening that one hesitates to question the wisdom or rightness of this procedure. It is, however, difficult to stifle all one's inner inquiries, and not wonder what the play would be like if acted as a scathing realist satire; not, of course, that it would be easy for the actors to behave like real people who have been garbed in billiard-table green coats, or possible for Mary Grey to act anything. The play is a curious series of soliloquies strung along a short-story plot; the actors soliloquize when alone, they soliloquize when they are supposed to be talking to others on the stage; there is practically no real dialogue, certainly small trace of construction or cogency in the action. The thing holds because of Gogol's wit and the soundness of the general outline.

Naylor Grimson, in the minor part of Ossip, is perhaps more convincing than any of his fellow-actors, though Claude Rains does good work as Klestakoff. Mosovitch is quite a good actor, but the attempt to exalt him into a great figure is merely another example of journalistic humbug. The last century did us ill service by its mania for great figures. The cult ascended from politics into literature, and descended from literature to dramatic presentation, breeding a distaste for exact criticism on the way.

The main point in a notice of this length should be that the play is worth seeing; the objections to acting it more closely and seriously are several. It would certainly be very difficult to get through the long soliloquies in any other tempo than the nattle-de-bang, file-and-drum corps tempo employed; also, as we have no criteria for the manners of provincial Russia in 1830, it may be advisable to present rather broad caricatures. Marya should perhaps be made a little less sympathetic if one is to feel satisfied with her final predicament. Mary Grey remains exactly the same figure that she presented as Portia, and one would do a kindness to the public if one could persuade her that this same character is not ubiquitously suitable for all plays of all species and kinds. It is, however, better as Anna than as Portia.

If Gogol was a rather grim satirist, this production of "Revisor" gives no hint of the fact, and one must admit that the tone of burlesque is maintained, in unity throughout the performance, and that this is perhaps, from several practical stand-points, the most advantageous way of producing the piece and of overcoming our public fear of "those gloomy Russians."

The proof of Gogol's vigour must rest in the fact that the series of almost detached monologues does not fail in interest, and that the play holds one's attention. Perhaps the nearest out of satire is on the programme: "Place. . . . Any small town in Russia." This is one of several indications that Gogol was being satiric, not merely boisterous.

T. J. V.

"CORIOLANUS" AT THE OLD VIC

THE producers of "Coriolanus" at the Old Vic have taken more than the customary amount of liberty with the Shakespearian text. By working into the stage action the castigation of Junius Brutus and converting it into the murder of both tribunes by the mob, a melodramatic significance was imparted to subsidiary characters, and there was, at the same time, something of the insignificance of melodrama in the portrayal of Coriolanus himself. Mr. Warburton's acting, indeed, lacked subtlety. There was too much of mere petulance in his manner to make the cleavage with the plebeians inevitable; he gave us class prejudice rather than a colossal and overwhelming naturalism. Marcus, with his attitude to war primarily as a means to get rid of "our petty superfluity," is a perfect example of the military overlord. The characterization was always thoughtful and serious, but it was no more hopelessly patrician than is the average portrayal of Othello that of a great helpless animal bruised in the wheels of the world. The consequence, of course, was that Mr. Mead and Mr. Fletcher as the people's tribunes were given too large a prominence. Their work was thrilling and sinister, and rounded off in a way suspiciously like teaching Shakespeare how to do it. The strength and dignity of the Volinaia of Miss Genevieve Ward (whose reappearance on the stage made the production memorable) were mostly allowed to run to waste, and our one consolation for it all was that added scope was provided for the company's truly excellent ensemble work. The suggestion of even greater crowds not visible to the audience was in itself a triumph, and the difficult groupings and concerted movements never failed, although in the Old Vic version of "Coriolanus" the mob is not merely required for listening and bustling purposes, but to fall on its unfortunate senators in our full view, belabouring them to death with intelligence and convincingly.

T. M.

PAVLOVA

DURRY LANE.—Ballet.

PAVLOVA, that bright bird of memory and fair flower of recollection, that image of whom no one was privileged to speak who could not compass blank verse, has returned in exquisite whiteness, in a shower of artificial snowflakes and the traditional Degas décor. She is well advised to begin her programme with a piece of technical bravura and to make her reappearance with sleights of foot which no inexperienced ballerina could perform. A decade ago it was Pavlova, it was her own delicate and very personal comment of emotion upon the choreographic lines of Pokine which won her the myriad hearts; today it is the mastery of her technique, chiefly the stillness of her pose and poise and the surety of her balance, which distinguish her from competitors. And she does well to demonstrate this maestria during the first section of the programme.

As a mime she is without merit, and despite the steps in her pas seul, "Amarilla" is a dreamy effort; it is also a stupid effort to mix two incompatible elements: expressionist dancing and the formal "classic" toe ballet. Volinine is delightfully elastic, but Pavlova's confusion when trying to seek sisterly consolations without giving up the modulus of the old-fashioned love dance is distressing. On the whole, the sooner this ballet is scrapped the better for her artistic reputation. The black-gowned "marchioness" who decorates the north corner of the stage is a danseuse of promise.

It, however, bodes ill for the management that, having such great resources at their command, they are so lacking in initiative and so mentally lazy that they do not even attempt to stage a third ballet. They give us a divertissement of scraps. Admitting that the youngest generation wants to see "The Swan," and that the Syrian dance is a decorative abbreviation of shorthand rendering of " Scheherazade," and that Mlle. Butovska is very supple and that Mlle. Beunova has talent, still the inclusion of this divertissement, when there are thirty men in England perfectly capable of designing new and really interesting ballets, is sufficient to dry up most of one's sympathy for the Pavlova-Chustine-Volinine enterprise. They are not so artistically serious as Massine, and if they are not very careful, they will be classed among historic revivals.

T. J. V.
Correspondence

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

DEAR SIR,—I am much interested in the first instalment of the article by Mr. Edward Garnett on Edward Thomas in your issue of the 16th. I was to have met Thomas through the agency of a common friend, but the outbreak of war prevented, so to him I cannot make the suggestion I intended to make. I take this opportunity of offering it to his friends. I have on my shelves a notebook in which I have pasted, during the last fifteen years, many articles by him, articles which were never collected into volume form. I think several of them are too good to be lost in the files of newspapers. Much of his nominal hack-work had nearly all the good qualities of the work that he would not have so called, but had also an ease which, at times, is lacking in his more ambitious work. I think he was one of those who thought so clearly to begin with, and had so clearly the virtue of love of perfection, devotion to the craft of words, that there were occasions on which "let well alone" would have been a good counsel, even better than: "Go over it again." This—but perhaps I need hardly say so—is no oblique plea for the slippash, or what Stevenson called "the slapdash and the disorderly." To take infinite pains is excellent advice for any writer; to re-read his sentences, and see if he has expressed himself clearly, is the mere duty of every scribe. Too often we gather what a writer means instead of being informed by him. What I mean here, apropos of Edward Thomas, is that in his nominally best work the phrases sometimes stilt, if self-conscious, while his nominal hack-work often equalled in many ways, and excelled in ease, the acknowledged and collected good things. His remark in one of the very interesting letters to Mr. Garnett, regarding "literary phrases" and that "smell of the lamp" coming easily to him, and that what he had to seek was "the simple and direct phrase," makes me have an open mind on this view, even as I express it. I may be wrong; but such is the effect conveyed to my mind by comparison of the two kinds of work. At any rate, whatever the mental processes behind the work, his ostensible hack-work can't be ignored by anyone who would make a selection of his essays. Some day, perhaps, such a volume might be prepared, and against that day I beg to call the attention of those who may undertake the good task to an article called "From an Old Home" which appeared in the Daily Chronicle years ago (in which we hear of an epitaph written by the auctioneer and the autumn races, a very moving and human paper); also to "The First Cockoo" (which appeared in T.P.'s Weekly); also to "How I Began" (published in the same journal); also to "The Colour of Selborne," published in the Daily Chronicle. A selection of his review articles, as these have literary qualities and suggestions in them of great interest, should, as well, be given a place in such a volume among The Stray Papers of Edward Thomas.

Yours faithfully,

FREDERICK NIVEN.

April 17, 1920.

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

DEAR SIR,—I have only just seen the letter of Mr. Farge in your issue of the 9th inst. May I say how grateful I am to him for the trouble he has taken to search for the source of many of the best things in my book? All the trouble has arisen on account of the loss I sustained in transit of the whole of the original MSS. of "Writers of Three Centuries" and of the other two books not yet published last year; and also of the fact that the printer did not correct all the alterations and mistakes when I returned the proof-sheets. To be perfectly candid, there must be more verbatim quotations not yet acknowledged. In the first place, the articles were put together roughly week by week to interest a few young people in literature, and I had little thought, besides that the book would ever be published. Secondly, to search for the source of every fact, quotation (sometimes anonymous) and idea would be—I am sure you will agree—almost beyond the power of anyone, now that I do not possess the slightest note of the original. As all the articles were written at various times and places, I am afraid that I cannot remember all the various books which helped me in the compilation of my volume. I alluded in the preface to being unable to properly acknowledge all my many obligations: I can only say "Pecavi."

I tender my sincerest apologies to our great critic Mr. Arthur Symons, and to any other writer and publisher whose copyright I have unintentionally infringed, as well as to those critics who have written kindly about my first endeavour in the world of letters.

Yours regretfully,

C. WILLIAMSON.

April 13, 1920.

MYSTICAL POETRY

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

DEAR SIR,—I have read with interest your reviewer's comments on my new book of verse, "The White Road" (Philip Allan & Co.), in The Athenæum of April 2, but cannot help feeling that it is somewhat unreasonable to object to the use of "mystical language" in what is obviously mystical poetry. If a "traditional language of mysticism" exists, surely the fact of its existence goes to prove that long experience has shown that certain spiritual states and ideas can only—or, at any rate, can best—be expressed by certain words and phrases. Any mystical writer (of either prose or verse) who should attempt to create a new "mystical language" of his own would, it seems obvious, only succeed in becoming either completely or partially unintelligible. Blake's "Hymnical Books" may be taken as an outstanding example, and, in another way, the works of certain poets of our own time, whose efforts to use new and often entirely incomprehensible methods of expression have caused among poetry-lovers widespread bewilderment and distress.

I may add that the translation mentioned by your reviewer is unknown to me, and that the words and phrases to which he takes exception were used simply because they presented themselves as a natural expression of the ideas I wished to convey. I have no extensive acquaintance with the mystical literature of the past, and was unaware that some of these words had been used with similar significance—which seems to suggest that the "language of mysticism" has a certain universality, and will be used naturally by any writer endowed with a mystical trend of mind.

Yours faithfully,

EVA MARTIN.

April 14, 1920.

The St. Martin-in-the-Fields Players are presenting at St. Martin's Theatre, on Wednesday, April 28, at 3 p.m., the London performance of Mr. John Mason's "The Locked Chest," followed by "Sir Paul" and the Holy Grail, by Christopher Home, and Mr. Miles Malleson's adaptation from Tolstoy's "Michael." A String Quartet and the Orima Madril society will provide music. This body of players is a company of professional actors who wish to renew the mediaeval Church and the theatre. It is their intention, if they receive sufficient support, to acquire a permanent home. At present they give performances in Parish Halls and similar places.
Foreign Literature

A DANISH PLAY

ENMANDGIVNEDFRAJERUSALEM. By Helge Rode. (Copenhagen, Gyldendal. 6kr. 75 net.)

I

IN 1917 Helge Rode, one of the most original and interesting Danish poets of to-day, published a philosophical study of man's spiritual attitude to war. By penetrating into the hidden mysteries of the soul the author endeavoured to convince his readers of the secret fascination which the idea of war unconsciously exercises over the human mind. "Krig og Aand" is a profound book, which as a contribution to the study of the psychology of war deserves to be translated and read also outside Scandinavia. It is of interest to contrast the author's views with those of another eminent Dane, Dr. Brandes. While the latter has refused to see anything in the war but a lamentable proof of the inconquerable stupidity of the human race, Rode has approached the problem with a spirit of true and genuine sympathy for humanity at large. His play "A Man went down from Jerusalem," which has just been published at Copenhagen, has again the war as its background.

Dr. Stern, a Danish Jew of European fame, has been living in France for years; he has been looked upon as a genius; eminent men and ministers of the Republic have consulted him and sung his praise. Now, a short time after the outbreak of war, he is told by the authorities that his German name has become a source of suspicion and that he will have to leave the country. His château in Brittany is commandeered and converted into a prison camp. He finds himself friendless; the treatment he is suddenly subjected to makes him regard himself as a martyr:

My name is soaked in lies— I fight for Peace—of course, one will say that I have been bribed. I fight for Truth—of course, one will shout that I am a liar. For twenty years I have worked for humane conditions in Europe—of course, they will howl that I am a beast, while they themselves are sprawling in blood.

The first act opens on a Southern scene of great beauty and calm. Here Dr. Stern has withdrawn with his wife and his vanity, a personal as well as a racial characteristic, to which the war has dealt this severe blow, is sustained by the frequent visits to his house of miserable revolutionaries and other questionable proletarian characters, who are still looking to him for help. He is flattered by their homage; but though he pretends to be able to adjust their grievances by composing all sorts of petitions to the various governments, he knows only too well the futility of his efforts and realizes fully his impotence. He grows more and more irritable towards his family. His only hope is set on Henrik, his wife's son by her first marriage, for whom he has a deep affection. When Henrik, who has been in America for many years, returns to join his mother and stepfather, Stern hopes to find in him the sympathy and devotion he so greatly needs. But Henrik has changed. During the years in America, a picture of his own dead father has formed itself in his mind; it has grown on him, and it now compels him to insist on changing the name of Stern for that of his own father. He is irritated with Stern's paternal tyranny, and gradually develops a dislike for the man, which soon after grows into a strong antipathy for the Jew.

The blow does not fall alone. One of Stern's daughters runs away from home to be married to an adventurer. The climax is reached when Mrs. Stern tells Henrik that Stern is his real father. She breaks this news to him in order to bring about a reconciliation. But Henrik feels nothing but disgust—disgust with his mother, disgust with his father, and disgust with himself:

Now I understand it all. Now I understand why I despise myself to the very core! and I loathe my own body, and I hate my own soul!

He leaves home to join the Army as a volunteer.

Thus Stern is deprived of his last hope, his deepest love. He is left alone with a wife, with whom he has nothing in common, and only his daughter to relieve his desire for human sympathy. When the curtain falls, he is standing leaning on his daughter's arm, watching the sunset behind the mountains, where the war is still going on, guns being fired and lives being lost, and where also his son will soon be.

Stern. Eli, do not leave me!

Eli. I remain, father.

Stern (weakly). Thank you, thank you! I do not believe in your God! But I thank also him, because you do not fail your old father. Pray that my lonely heart may stop.

Critics have complained that the character of Dr. Stern is shaped after the living model of Georg Brandes. Like Stern, Brandes enjoys a European fame, and like him he was once misunderstood and decried by his own countrymen. Further, Stern's views are exactly those of Brandes, while Stern's enormous personal vanity also reflects a well-known weakness in the eminent critic.

But the chief interest of the play is not concerned with this. Dr. Stern is drawn with a firm hand, but also with a gentle sympathy. The part of Stern played by a great actor would give life to an imposing personality endowed with the strong man's longing for affection. He would grow in magnitude as the play went on, till he absorbed the stage, till his tragedy became like that of Lear. The tragedy of Dr. Stern, it might indeed be said, is like that of a modern Shylock, suffering the fate of that unhappy King. It may be taken as a strong thrust against the invertebrate intolerance and deep-rooted antagonism with which the Jews are still looked upon in Europe. "Of all madness, the race-hatred is, after all, the most colossal stupidity of human malice."

The Jews may have many weaknesses, some perhaps greater than ours; but at bottom they are, like us, subject to the inevitable events that befall all human beings. To deprive them of our sympathy in such moments is, to say the least of it, utterly unjust. Dr. Stern is certainly not what one would call a prosy, characterization. But he claims our sympathy through the sheer force of his tragedy—like all men who have gone down from Jerusalem, and, like him, "fallen amongst thieves."

C. Ei.

THE FUTURE OF JEWS

AU PIED DU SINAI. Par Georges Clemenceau. (Paris, C. E. 5fr.)

WHEN a hack journalist writes a ridiculous story baiting the old bogey the millionaire Jew financier we know exactly why he does it. He hopes to make a few guineas by selling it to a popular journal. When he visits Carlsbad and writes brightly about the ringlets of Galician Jews and the antics of the Chassidim at prayer, we know that he hopes to defray part of his expenses by the sale of good "copy." But the raison d'être for the appearance of such superficial writing in book-form above the signature of a man who was but yesterday engaged in remaking Europe is not so apparent. Can M. Clemenceau really hope to add to his reputation as a statesman by the publication—or republication—of these absurd sketches? Is it possible that he really believes in the bogey Baron Moses? Is he serious when he states that the Jews are already rulers of modern society, and likely to extend their influence? Is he completely ignorant of the facts?
THE MAIMED SOLDIER

FAULH. . . ? Par Odette Dulac. (Paris, Calmann-Lévy. 4fr.90.)

THE hero of this novel is a young man who has lost a leg in the war. He wins the heart of a girl whose parents are horrified at the prospect of a marriage between them. We are led to expect an analysis of the delicate problem involved in the situation; but when the hero and heroine marry on the last page, we find that the problem is still unsolved, because the author has not made her figures generic. We are given a special case in which the judgment cannot be accepted as a precedent.

Madame Dulac has not attempted to grapple with the physiological aspects of her subject. The book deals more with the old problem of the maimed soldier and with the new problem of the maimed soldier. The major complication is beyond her powers; yet we are grateful to her for having divined its existence.

For there is a tendency nowadays to avoid the deeper aspects of the maimed soldier's tragedy. We can understand the reluctance of the armchair patriot to give the subject his attention. It is not pleasant to be reminded that youth bore and still bears the whole burden of the war; that what is left of the generation of boys which was battered to death, blind, crippled and driven mad has now to face the battle of life with a terrible handicap.

OBRAS COMPLETAS. By Felipe Trigo. 12 vols. (Madrid, Renacimiento. 4 ptas. each.)—Not long ago someone remarked that though the grimmest and most read books in every public library in Spain were certain novels of Pérez Galdós, the stories generally taken out by young people were those of D. Felipe Trigo. I never had the time or the curiosity to ask for one of his books in a Spanish library; but when a man's collected works are published in a country so rich in modern fiction as Spain, one ought to see what they are about. And it must be confessed, however that reading Trigo is depressing to read. Like D. Pio Baroja, he began life as a doctor; but unlike that writer he can never get away from the obsession of sex. When he describes student life in Madrid he is far less presentable than Baroja; but his "En la Carrera" is not half so convincing as Baroja's "Arbol de la Ciencia." It is rather second-rate D'Annunzio, with the fire of D'Annunzio's genius left out. If we were asked to recommend Spanish books for the drawing-room of a literary club, I should put down Pérez de Ayala instead of Trigo. Sr. Pérez de Ayala has not mastered the technique of writing novels as Sr. Trigo has; but he is interested in other matters besides pornography. Amongst other things, he is a devoted admirer of the music of Mozart. Sr. Trigo's books are not all tarred with the same brushe. They contain much observation of human nature and they are fluent; but they are not really very interesting, nor do they represent modern Spanish fiction at its best.

J. B. T.

The longest article in the belated Revista Lusitana for 1918 is that on manuscript ex-libris by the editor, Dr. Leite de Vasconcelos, who has now published twenty-one volumes of this important and original review. A Galician note, not included in this article, on the flyleaf of a copy of Frei Christovam de Almeida's "Sermoneos Varios" (1673) runs:

"This volume belongs to the parish priest Pedreres. Let him who finds it return it, and he shall be paid a farthing for chestnuts, for he greatly needs it for the preaching of his sermons." Other articles deal with philology and folklore.

The Amalthea Verlag, a German publishing house established at Vienna, Leipzig and Zurich during the war, has followed the practice of several of the leading German publishers in issuing an almanac for the year 1920. In a substantial and well-produced volume long extracts are given from important works which have been or are about to be published. The most interesting of these are a critical study of Gottfried Keller by the German critic Max Hochdorff, a new translation of "Peregrina de Tyre" by Karl Ettinger, the critical study of Opus Minus Ad Nymphaeum by Robert Baessi, which was reviewed in The Athenaeum for March 5 last, and a volume of important and hitherto unpublished diaries of Friedrich von Gentz, Metternich's political henchman. These last are expected to throw fresh light on European politics of the forties.
List of New Books

Prepared in co-operation with the Library Association.

The method of classification adopted is a series of groups roughly corresponding with the Dewey Decimal System, the sub-classes being indicated, for the benefit of librarians and others familiar with the system, by the class-numbers given at the end of each entry. The first number in these represents the main class, the second one of the subdivisions, and so on.

Those works in the List which appear most suitable for purchase by Public Library Authorities are marked with an asterisk.

100 PHILOSOPHY.

- The Initiate. By his Pupil. Routledge, 1920. 7½ in. 321 pp. 7/6 n. 133

The veiled history of an adept in occult wisdom is presented in these pages by an occultist who is "a very well-known Englishman who prefers to remain anonymous." Whatever may be the source of his inspiration, its effect has undoubtedly been to make for the writer's happiness, and promises many a reader's also. The deeper aspects of the subject are dealt with in the latter half of the volume, and the result is stimulating. "Wonders never cease because they never exist." Sin is a form of childishness; it is a roundabout way to spiritual happiness instead of the direct way." "It is a strange trait in certain religious temperaments that if you prove a man's religion to him on a rational basis, he is undeniably shocked." And so on; the spirit of love and tolerance pervades every page of what is really an inspiring book.

This is the third of the "Free Lance Books," a well-printed and well-bound series of modern English and American books, translations and reprints. Mr. Mencken's translation of Nietzsche's last considerable work is lively and energetic, and his introduction is a happy example of his critical writing. Mr. Mencken has had to suffer for his admiration of the philosopher:

On the strength of the fact that I had published a book on Nietzsche in 1906, six years after his death, I was called upon [during the war] by agents of the Department of Justice, elaborately outstanding it as my duty to meet the charge that I was an intimate associate and agent of "the German monster, Nietzsche." I quote the official process verbal.

Such is life in the great Republic of the West.

150

A thorough but readable treatise on the new American method of psychology known as Behaviourism. The essential feature of this school is that it regards man purely as a "reacting mass," and endeavours to determine his reactions without importing into the observation preconceived ideas affecting interpretation. The present author, indeed, does not find it necessary to use such terms as "sensation," "perception," "attention," "will," "image," and the like. He states that he does not know what they mean, and he suggests that no one succeeds in using them consistently. This rigid insistence on unambiguous terms is certainly "scientific," and the results already achieved by the method are of great interest.

200 RELIGION.

222.12

226.4

See review, p. 540.

237.4

300 SOCIOLOGY.

Beveridge (Sir William). The Public Service in War and in Peace. Constable, 1920. 7½ in. 71 pp. paper, 2/ n. 381.1

Delivered in October, 1919, as a lecture at the London School of Economics and Political Science, the substance of this pamphlet is concerned with the changes in the Civil Service which have been brought about by the war, and with the personnel and organization of the Service in the future. Salaries and terms of service, the author thinks, should be re-examined; departments need better organization; devolution to local bodies should be widely followed; and there will be advantages in the extended use of advisory councils. Many branches of routine work "can be as well or, at an equal cost, better performed by women"; and there will be an extension of the employment of responsible women officers in association with health, factory conditions, and the like. The pamphlet is suggestive and practical.

See review, p. 543.

Sixteen chapters are responsible for the sixteen chapters of this work, and the result is a great deal of overlapping. The language is simple, the technical terms are carefully defined. The object was to help thoughtful people to answer such questions as: What do we mean by the League of Nations? Is the philosophy underlying such a League? What duties should it be called upon to perform? What shall be American relation to the League? The object is laudable, and has perhaps been attained, but the book is not one that compels a man to read it.

Hermathena, no. 42. Dublin, Hodges & Figgis (Longmans), 1920. 9 in. 174 pp. paper, 6/ 378.05

In the place of honour is a graceful tribute to John Pentland Mahaffy, the lamented Provost of Trinity, who, it is truly said, "will be missed by Irishmen of every shade of politics and every shade of opinion." A personal reminiscence of "The Evolution of the Subjective Form"; "Some Examples of Greek Arithmetic," by Dr. J. Gilbert Smyly; Mr. E. H. Alton's "Anna Perenna and Mamurius Veturius" and "Notes on the 'Cules';" and Dr. W. J. M. Starkie's bright paper entitled "An Aristotelian Analysis of the Comic." Illustrated from Aristophanes, Shakespeare, and Molière, are among the items in an excellent number.

The first article, "The British Empire, the League of Nations, and the United States," expresses the general disappointment that the greater part of Europe is in deeper distress and that the proclamation of the terms of peace; and the writer endeavours to trace the causes. The Peace of Versailles, he is declared, attempted too much. The Covenant of the League of Nations "aimed too high and too far." The course of events since the signature of peace has shown that nationalSentiment is too strong to accept the limitations imposed upon it by the Covenant." Other important articles, dealing with "International Finance Co-operation" and "The Growing Responsibility of Labour," clearly reveal the present gravity of the world situation. An able paper, "The Irish Problem Once More," ends with an eloquent appeal for a spirit of reconciliation and appeasement. The papers relating to India, and in particular to the Amritsar tragedy, are enlightening. There is much other good matter in the number.

500 NATURAL SCIENCE.

Brook (Arthur). The Buzzard at Home. Witherby, 1920. 9 in. 38 pp. 12 pl. paper, 3/6 n. 598.2

In this record, all too brief, of Mr. Brook's watching and photographing of the buzzard during June-August, 1919, the resting-places and nests; the habits of the birds, especially when feeding their young;" the food—moles, frogs, and occasional wild ducks—and the final departure of the young, are described and depicted. The author made his observations from a "hide" cleverly constructed hard by the buzzards' home.

Coppock (John B.). VOLUMETRIC ANALYSIS: adapted to the requirements of students entering for the internal and external examinations of Schools, Institutes, Colleges and Universities. Pitman [1920]. 7½ in. 100 pp. il. index. 3/6 n. 545.3

*Tancock (E. O.). THE ELEMENTS OF DESCRIPTIVE ASTRONOMY. Second Edition. Oxford, Clarendon Press, 1919. 7½ in. 158 pp. index. limp cl., 3/ n. 523 This is one of the clearest elementary introductions to Astronomy that we have read. The author wholly eschews the verbage—a kind of bad prose-poetry—common to many elementary books, and confines himself to describing essentials as compactly and clearly as possible. The illustrations are admirable.

700 FINET ARTS.

800 LITERATURE.

Chateaubriand (François René, Vicomte de). MÉMOIRES D'OUTRE TOMBE, première partie, livres VIII. et IX. (Chateaubriand et Anglettere). Ed. with introd. and notes by A. Hamilton Thompson. Cambridge, Univ. Press, 1920. 7½ in. 120 pp. apps., 4/ n. 843.65 "Chateaubriand en Anglettere," as this is entitled on the cover, comprises those parts of the memoirs relating his life in England during 1793-1800 as a Royalist exile. Mr. Hamilton Thompson contributes an informing introduction, footnotes, chronological table, and a family tree.

The Gamut of the Poets: a saire. By VERITAS. Heath Cranton [1920]. 6½ in. 24 pp. paper, 1/6 n. 828.9 To argue lengthily is after all but twaddle; for, let us mind us just as letters make up words, so, these words do but trip their words towards, until at length they make a clear Parago [sic]. This farfago in unkempt rhymes is anything but clear to us; nor are we at all sure what it is that Veritas is trying to satirize.

O'Byrne (Dermot). RED OWEN. Dublin, Talbot Press, 1919. 7½ in. 51 pp., 2/ n. 822.9 The conflict between conventional respectability, or the instinct of the herd, and the call of imagination, poetry, romanticism, mysticism—or whatever you like to term the impulse of revolt—is the basis of this peasant drama. It is a kind of Comenius "Tambhăser" or "Faust," entirely Irish in manner; and the dialogue, though in prose, is as poetic as Synge's at his most imaginative.

Towseley (G.). MY HORIZON. Bell, 1919. 6 in. 120 pp., 3/6 n. 824.9 The main trend of these detached essays or series of reflections is ethical, and the teaching wholesome and uplifting. "Striving after Effect" exposes the viciousness of a common failing. Under "Reading" we are reminded that reading in the best of senses is its own reward, but it makes certain demands upon the reader. "Great readers are few, and, to be one of such, there is the necessity of a broad and understanding mind and heart." Virgil.

Waith (James F.). HENRY III. Allen & Unwin, 1920. 7½ in. 123 pp. paper, 2/6 n. 822.9 This is the first play in a proposed "Trilogy of Freedom," which is also to include an "Edward I." and a "Richard II." Mr. Waith has made what seems to us the mistake of trying to write in antique English. The result is, at moments, almost as peculiar as William Morris's translation of "Beowulf."

POETRY.

Anderson (John Redwood). WALLS AND HEDGES. Sidg-wick & Jackson, 1919. 7½ in. 83 pp., 3/ n. 821.9 Mr. Anderson is revealed as a poet of delicate yet virile perception, with an aptitude for word-manipulation. He is concerned with chimneys, lanes, a warehouse, an oil mill; and his freedom from conventional prejudice in subject is shown by these lines:

Rectangular,
A chaos of piled roofs that rise
Immense against the melancholy skies;
Rectangular,
The glare
Of many a lighted window square,
And here and there
Diagonal across the glow the bar
Of a great crane.

His vivid sympathy and poetic sensitiveness are particularly apparent in his poems on nature. His technique suffers occasionally from triteness of rhyme or phrasing, but the feeling is always genuine.

Browning (Robert).

Ryle (Effie). Robert Browning: His Life and Poetry: a handbook of study, prepared for the use of adult schools and study and reading circles. National Adult School Union [1920]. 7½ in. 47 pp. paper, 6d. 821.8 Clear, concise, and instructive explanations of typical poems, which are arranged in classes illustrating Browning's development and the varied interests of his mind; notes on the initial difficulties readers meet with; and sets of stimulating questions, make up this capital little primer.

Doyle (Sir Arthur Conan). The Guards Came Through; and other poems. Murray, 1919. 7 in. 78 pp. paper, 2/6 n. 821.9 The title-piece and others show Sir Arthur Conan Doyle to be a master of evening-paper balladry. The verses go with a swing, and state the plain man's sentiments on British valour and on "all things foul and black" with energy. "The Bigot," and "Fate" voice similar feelings on the "unco guid" and on the author's recent discoveries in the psychical world.

Glanville (Henry J.). Nature Poems. With a foreword by John Oxenham. R. Scott, 1919. 7½ in. 48 pp. paper, 1/6 n. 821.9 Mr. Glanville is content to express his emotions about nature in well-worn poetical language:

In that gay garden lilies blow,—
Daintiest lilies, fragrant, bright;
And beauteous roses blossom there,—
Sweet summer roses red and white.

It is bright and pleasant enough, but the words slide from the memory like water off a duck's back.

Gleeson (J. Desmond). Songs of Saints and Sinners. E. Macdonald [1920]. 7½ in. 79 pp. boards, 5/ n. 821.9 Mr. Gleeson has a cheerful energy and gusto, but he lacks the power to give his emotions a fitting form. His poems, of which he says that they "were written with a sincerity that must take the place of their literary shortcomings," are apt to be curiously inconclusive and shapeless.

Macnicol (Nicol). Psalms of Marâthâ Saints: 108 hymns translated from the Marathi ("The Heritage of India Series"). Calcutta, Association Press (Oxford, Univ. Press) [1920]. 7½ in. 95 pp. front, index. 2/ n. 891.46 Rythmed translations from the poetry of Marâthâ saints of the 13th-17th centuries. Seventy-five of the 108 pieces in this volume are by Tukârâm, the last of the great Marâthâ saints, who flourished during the 17th century. Mr. Macnicol's versions are neat, though one wonders if it might not have been more satisfactory, from a scholarly point of view, to give exact prose renderings.
Mallett (Reddie). Poems FROM BEYOND. Watts, 1920. 71 in. 123 pp., 3/6 n. 821.9

If Mackworth Praed had written the "Spoon River Anthology" this is how he would have done it. Mr. Mallett possesses a great measure of the fluency, the astonishing facility in fanning of that consummate writer of vers de société, and is placed after a dose of "Spoon River" and "Winstonbury Lines," to read something that rattles along so cheerfully as this:

Mr. Thirlmer's poems are solid and respectable, but at the same time a little dull. We never feel as we read them that thrill of excited discovery or recognition which a new illuminating phrase, or the perfect expression of some emotion we have often felt, can give us. Mr. Thirlmer comes nearest to capturing this quality of the best poetry in his poem "The Orchard," but here in no sense is he quite caught and we are left unsatisfied.

822.33 SHAKESPEARE.

Brooke (Stopford A.). ON TEN PLAYS OF SHAKESPEARE. Constable, 1919. 8 in. 315 pp., 7/6 n. 822.33

The sixth impression.

Brooke (Stopford A.). TEN MORE PLAYS OF SHAKESPEARE. Constable, 1919. 8 in. 317 pp., 7/6 n. 822.33

There does not seem to be any sufficient reason for the publication of this book. In learning it is inferior to more than one existing study of Shakespeare, and the author's original comment does not inspire one with great confidence in his insight.

FICTION.

Campbell (H. M. F.). The STAR OF DESTINY. Odhams [1920]. 7½ in. 320 pp., 7/ n. 821.9

This is a stirring tale of German plotting in India. Krishna Iyer, a Hindu fanatic, is exploited by Mrs. Flora Ferguson, a spy in the pay of Germany. She entices Krishna's interest and help in her propaganda; and the heroine, Stella Hamilton, in her turn, is greatly influenced by the Indian whom she loves. The plot is discovered, Mrs. Ferguson is arrested, Krishna dies, and Stella, saved in time from the consequences of her own foolishness, returns to England.

A simple love-story, told in readable letters, which pass between the heroine, Patricia Macdonell, her aunt, "A. J. B.," and others. The correspondence deals with literary and other topics. "A. J. B." turns out to be Patricia's lover.

See review, p. 555.

Cooke (Marjorie Benton). THE GIRL WHO LIVED IN THE WOODS. Jarrolds [1920]. 6½ in. 304 pp., 2/ n. 813.5

See notice, p. 536.

In this, the latest member of the series of "Sagas Retold," Mr. Heawood relates how the high-hearted Thormod ("Cobrowne's Poet"), "very little of a Christian, but very much of a man," avenged the death of his friend Thorgar.

Mrs. Belloc Lowndes is an experienced writer of charming fiction. The adventures of the innocent and eminently readable Lily Fairfield at Monte Carlo, where she is temporarily the paying guest of a distant connection, a dreadful person who does not hesitate at murder, are remarkable and sensational. Several of the dramatis personae stand out in bold relief—notably the agreeable Hercules Poirot, whose task it is to track down the authors of the horrid villainy.

Stated to be founded "upon fact—or less than fact," Mr. Norris's very long, but interesting story has for its principal character Griffith Adams, who is said to be "a type of American youth, to all unfortunately familiar." Griffith is unlucky in his mother, a frivolous, reckless sort of woman, who has married three times, and is a desperate gambler; unlucky in his educational experience, and finally hand-cuffed in his search for employment, and (unsuccessful), as this is indecisive in his love-affairs. But all comes right in the end.

The hero of Miss Patterson's psychological study is a Frenchman of good family, Armand de Vaucourt, who throughout his life is powerfully influenced by women. Armand's pious and austere mother, the vipers and immoral publisher's wife, the good-natured Princesse Rounanstorff, and the neglected little Bernardette are very actual people. The feminine influences, as may be gathered, are partly good, partly bad; and their relation to Armand's career is gradually revealed in the book.

Skelton (Margaret). The BOOK OF YOUTH. Collins (1920). 8 in. 342 pp., 7/6 n.

Beginning in a Georgian manor-farm in the country, in the school years of the heroine, Monica Harthen, the action of this story passes to London, and includes a number of stirring incidents, some of which are associated with the feminist agitation during the period before the war. In the closing pages Monica has become the wife of Anthony Ralph, a young musician, and their love carries just as the troops are starting for the front. The story possesses a modern atmosphere and outlook.

Anthony Brook devises a greatly improved aeroplane, and its commercial prospects lead to a fierce conflict between two big financiers. The contest for the hand of a lady introduces further complications. Many exciting moments occur, but the inventor reaps his reward in the end.

Trigo (Felipe). ORNAS COMPLETAS. 12 vols. Madrid, Renacimiento, San Marcos, 42, 1919. 7½ in. paper, 4 pts. each. 863.8

See notice, p. 556.

Watson (Frederick). PANDORA'S YOUNG MEN. Collins (1920). 8 in. 295 pp., 7/6 n.

Readers who appreciated "The Humphries Touch" will welcome the author's new story. Pandora and her Victorian mother are "incompatibles," and the former leaves home to enter the new "Ministry of Recreation"—which is a failure, and has to be reconstituted as a "Ministry of Concentration."

A stirring romance is set in Volynia and the Ukraine, and relates to the famous Hetman of the Cossacks, Ivan Stepanovitch Maceppa, who in boyhood was bound naked to the back of a wild stallion, sent galloping into the wilds. To him the hero, Michael Falubovsky, the lover of Nathalie Kotchoubey, is sent on a mission, the nature of which is unfolded in the tale. Peter the Great and Charles XII. of Sweden are leading characters.

910 GEOGRAPHY, TOPOGRAPHY, ANTIQUITIES, ETC.

The third of a series of four books intended to cover the geographical course of a secondary school for the four years leading up to and including the year in which an examination of matriculation standard is taken. The author anticipates criticism of the wisdom of publishing a book dealing with the geography of Europe when the new frontier delimitations are incomplete. To unlearn is laborious and confusing, and we think that it would have been better to delay the appearance of this volume a little longer.

Littlechild (W. P.), A SHORT ACCOUNT OF KING’S COLLEGE CHAPEL. Cambridge, Heffer, 1920. 61/ in. 30 pp. paper, 1/ n. 914.259

This noble example of the rich Perpendicular style of late Gothic architecture, designed by Reginald Ely, “master-mason,” possesses a roof which is probably without a peer upon the Continent, and is rivalled by very few specimens of English vaulting. The windows constitute “the finest series in the world of pictures in glass on a large scale.” The woodwork is remarkable. The memorials are of arresting interest. A building which combines these excellencies is justly world-famous, and can be neglected by no visitor to Cambridge. Mr. Littlechild’s book will be helpful to all who have the delight of seeing the chapel for the first time.

The object of this compendium is to furnish tourists with a brief but comprehensive guide to the ancient monuments of Rome, their history, purpose and architecture. It consists in the main of condensed articles on the various items of interest, which are indexed, and illustrated (not very satisfactorily) with reproductions of old engravings showing what they were like before the modern improver and restorer altered their appearance.

Sowerbutts (J. Crompton), KETTLEWELL PAST AND PRESENT. York, T. A. J. Waddington, 1920. 7 in. 50 pp. paper, 1/3 n. 914.274

The short preface to the Rev. J. Crompton Sowerbutts’ handy little guide to the delightful village of Kettlewell in Craven is a tribute by the late Professor Moorman. The topography, geology, natural history, archaeology, history, and modern features are briefly but adequately treated. The Aire in its passage from Malham Tarn does not emerge at Malham Cove, which is the exit of another subterranean stream, but at Airehead. We thought the “Lady’s slipper” (Cypripedium calceolus) was extinct, and are relieved to hear that a few flowers were seen in 1918.

*Thacker (Fred. S.), The THAMES HIGHWAY: a history of the locks and weirs. Thacker, 105, Mortlake Road, Kew, 1920. 8 in. 525 pp. il. maps, index, 12/ 6 n. 914.2 Thacker, in two other books on the subject, “The Thames” and “Thames Highway, General History,” which we reviewed at their appearance, Mr. Thacker here completes the task he had set before him by giving a methodical account of the locks and weirs, and, incidentally, of bridges, miscellaneous antiquities, lock-keepers, and such-like, working down from the source to Hammersmith. The photographs are interesting and appropriate, but the sketch-maps lack clearness.

Walbrook (H. M.), A HUNDRED YEARS OF THE ROYAL YORK, BRIGHTON. Brighton, 1920. 71/ in. 77 pp. il. 914.225

A readable sketch of the history of this well-known hotel, written in association with the hundredth anniversary of its opening, which was celebrated on September 27, 1919. Among the illustrations are reproductions of old prints, and there are several amusing caricatures, including some of Phil May’s work.

La Fayette (Gilbert Motier, Marquis de). *Morgan (George), The TRUE LA FAYETTE. Lippincott, 1919. 8 in. 489 pp. il. pos. index, 10/6 n. 920

“La Fayette, we are here!” These words of General Pershing when he landed in France, signifying that America had come to pay off the inexhaustible debt to the country of La Fayette, and had enlisted her millions in the cause that he had championed, were the inspiration for this very full, though very concise history of the man whose one great creed was liberty.

930-990 HISTORY.

Cresson (W. P.), THE COSSACKS: THEIR HISTORY AND COUNTRY. New York, Brentano’s, 1919. 8 in. 249 pp. il. por. map, $2.50. 947

Having spent two years and travelled many miles in Cossack country before and at the time of the Russian Revolution, the author was smitten with a desire to trace the history of this elusive people—a task he found to be extremely formidable. This sketch of their complicated story is the result. In the early half of the book Cossack legends and epitomes of Cossack documents—such as their arrogant and insulting letters to the Sultan and other potentates—provide a lively mixture of bariaic life. The narrative then becomes merged in the broader subject of the expansion of modern Russia.

*Dicey (Albert V.) and Railt (Robert S.), Thoughts on the UNION BETWEEN ENGLAND AND SCOTLAND. Macmillan, 1920. 9 in. 429 pp. aps. index, 16 n. 941.06

See review, p. 539. 904

See review in last week’s ATHENEUM, p. 510.

*Hazen (Charles Downer), MODERN EUROPEAN HISTORY ("American Historical Series "). New York, Holt (Bell) 1920. 8 in. 664 pp. il. por. maps, index, 7/ 6 n. 940.9 A revised edition of the excellent text-book first published in 1917; it deals with Europe from the period antecedent to the French Revolution.

* (Sir Charles Prestwood), THE GOLD COAST AND THE WAR. Milford, 1920. 8 in. 36 pp. map, app. paper, 2/ n. 966.9

There is force in the author’s remark that the record of the Gold Coast in 1914-18, which is summarized in the pages of this brochure, admirably illustrates how well the Empire was served in the war in every part of the world and by all its provinces. The colony not only “carried on, and more than carried on,” but also gave active and substantial assistance to the Imperial Government, in men, money and material. The present account and similar records of other colonies or protectorates, “should be compiled on the same lines and published through the same channel,” will be embodied in the work on “The Empire at War,” in which the Royal Colonial Institute and the Oxford University Press hope to give a comprehensive narrative of the “co-operative effort of the Empire in the Great War.”

An attractively and copiously illustrated edition of this work, in which are descriptions of Gainsborough, Austerfield, Scrooby, Leyden, and Southampton, Plymouth and other places associated with John Robinson, Governor Winslow, William Brewster and their brethren. The book appears at an opportune time, for 1920 marks the tercentenary of the sailing of the "Mayflower."

To be able to think in terms of history is a valuable qualification for students who are to cultivate the larger view of human affairs. This little book should go some way to help them. An idea of the groundwork of English history is presumed, and an atlas must be used. The bibliography and time-chart will be serviceable.

*Printed for the Proprietors of THE ATHENÆUM by BRITISH PERIODICALS, LTD., 15 and 16, Gough Square, Fleet Street, London, E.C., and Published by THE ATHENÆUM PUBLISHING CO., LTD., at their Offices, 10, Adelphi Terrace, W.C.2.
Appointments Vacant

EGYPTIAN MINISTRY OF EDUCATION.

Applications are invited for VACANT POSTS for ASSISTANT MASTERS to teach English in Egyptian Government Secondary Schools.

Applicants must possess a University Degree with Honours and should have some experience as teachers. A Diploma in Teaching would be a recommendation.

The initial salary is L.Eg. 484 (about £443) a year, rising to L.Eg. 504 (about £517) a year, on the pensionable staff, with temporary war gratuity of L.E. 16 a month. An allowance is given for journey to Egypt.

Further particulars may be obtained by letter from G. Elliot, Esq., Egyptian Education Office, 28, Victoria Street, Westminster, London, S.W.1, to whom application should be made not later than May 22nd.

UNIVERSITY OF THE PANJAB (LAHORE).

Applications are invited for (1) the CHAIR OF ECONOMICS and (2) the CHAIR: HISTORY. Salary Rs. 15,000 per annum (1,500 at the rate of 5% per rupee). — Applications must be received not later than 15th May, 1920, by the undersigned, care of Universities Bureau, 50, Russell Square, W.C.1, from whom further particulars may be obtained.

A. C. WOOLNER,
Registrar on leave.

COUNTY BOROUGH OF SUNDERLAND EDUCATION COMMITTEE.

SCHOOL OF ART.

WANTED, an ASSISTANT ART MASTER, specially qualified in Design as applied to Metal Work, Pottery and Process Work for reproduction. Preference will be given to applicants capable of taking life classes.

Salary £180 by £10 per annum, to £220 and then by £15 per annum, to £370. Teaching experience, including approved courses of training abroad, up to a maximum of ten years, will be taken into consideration in fixing the initial salary.

Applications, on forms to be obtained from the undersigned on receipt of stamped addressed envelope, should reach this office not later than Wednesday, May 12, 1920.

HERBERT REED,
Chief Education Officer.

Education Offices, 15, John Street, Sunderland.
April 13, 1920.

THE UNIVERSITY OF LEEDS.

DEPARTMENT OF FRENCH LANGUAGE & LITERATURE.

Applications are invited for APPOINTMENT to an ASSISTANT LECTURESHIP in FRENCH LANGUAGE and LITERATURE. Salary £300. — Particulars may be obtained from the SECRETARY, The University, Leeds.

TWICKENHAM PUBLIC LIBRARY.

Applications are invited for the POST of SUB-LIBRARIAN. Salary, including bonus, £177 per annum.

Applications, in candidate’s own handwriting, stating age, experience, L. A. certificates or other qualifications, accompanied by not more than three recent testimonials, and endorsed “Sub-librarian,” to be delivered not later than May 3 to The Librarian, Public Library, Twickenham.

Appointments Vacant

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL.

COMPULSORY DAY CONTINUATION SCHOOLS.

APPOINTMENT OF PRINCIPALS.

The Council invites applications from men and women for the POST of PRINCIPALS of Compulsory Day Continuation Schools to be established under the Education Act, 1918. Applicants will be required to produce evidence of good general education, recognised academic or technical qualifications, teaching or lecturing experience, and training ability. Experience in social and welfare work is also desirable.

The scales of salary are as follows according to size of school:

- Grade I: Men £500—£560; women £400—£475.
- Grade II: Men £580—£680; women £480—£550.
- Grade III: Men £680—£750; women £480—£580.

Applicants in the service of the Council, who may be selected for these appointments and who are receiving salary within the limit of the above scales, will be transferred at salaries not lower than their existing salaries.

Preference will be given in the case of male candidates to those who have served, or attempted to serve, with H.M. Forces.

Applications should reach the undersigned not later than May 15, 1920.

F. C. SMITHARD,
Secretary to the Education Committee.
Education Offices, Beckett Street, Derby.
April 26, 1920.

SUNDERLAND EDUCATION COMMITTEE.

HEDDE COLLEGIATE GIRLS’ SCHOOL.

Head Mistress: Miss M. E. Boon, M.A.

WANTED in September, MISTRESSES to teach the following subjects:

1. FRENCH (Residence abroad desirable).
2. ENGLISH LITERATURE AND LANGUAGE.
3. MODERN HISTORY.
4. GYMNASTICS (Ling’s Swedish System).

For (1), (2), and (3), an Honours Degree or its equivalent essential. In each case, good Secondary School experience desirable.

Salary according to Grade II. Scale, £175, rising by £10 increments to £250. Not more than ten years approved previous experience may be allowed for in initial salary. Suitable Grade II. Mistresses may be promoted to Grade III. Maximum £350.

Applications forms obtainable on sending stamped addressed envelope to the undersigned, to whom they should be returned as quickly as possible.

HERBERT REED,
Chief Education Officer.

Education Offices, 15, John Street, Sunderland.
April 29, 1920.
Art Exhibitions

R.W.S. ROYAL SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER-COLOURS.
174th EXHIBITION NOW OPEN, 10 till 6.
5a, PALL MALL, EAST (near National Gallery).

ETCHINGS BY IAN STRANG
THE CHENIL GALLERY
by the Town Hall, Chelsea.

GOUPI MINIATURES EXHIBITION.
MABEL NICHOLSON (the late), 5, Regent Street, S.W. 1.

THE LITTLE ART ROOMS
8, DUKE STREET, ADELPHI, W.C.4.
(Close to Little Theatre)

FRENCH WOODCUTS
also a few by ROBERT GIBBINGS
ADMISSION FREE.

Typewriting & c.

TYPEWRITING OF EVERY DESCRIPTION, carefully and promptly executed at home. 1s. per 1,000 words; carbon copy, 3d. per 1,000 words. Duplicating. Cambridge Local—
Miss Nancy McFarlane, 11, Palmers Avenue, Westcliff, Essex.

TYPEWRITING, — Authors’s MSS., Examinations, Papers,
Letters, Circulars, Testimonials, General Copying, Duplicating, with experience. — J. Trimmell, 8, Moira Terrace, Cardiff.

TYPEWRITING and Duplicating carefully executed.—A Goddard, 55, Acre Road, Kinsington-Thames.

Miscellaneous

FADING PHOTOGRAPHS, Old Miniatures, etc., reproduced in facsimile of original when new. Valuable prints, china, etc. photographed.—F. Moore, 10, Titchfield Terrace, London, N.W.I.

EXCELLENT BANK PAPER for Pen or Typewriter. Sample
Ream, 486 sheets, (10 by 8), 4s. 6d.; three at 4s. 3d.; six at 4s.

Educational

DOUGLAS STEVENS, A.L.A.M. (Elocution).
"A very clear, easy and natural delivery and a strong feeling for the dramatic."—Daily Telegraph.
Tuition given in all branches of Elocutionary work,
Schools and Academies visited. Public Recitals given.
Full particulars from 85, New Oxford Street, W.1.
Tel. Museum 1785.

Authors’ Agents, etc.

THE AUTHORS’ ALLIANCE are prepared to consider and place MSS. for early publication. Literary work of all kinds dealt with by experts who place Authors’ interests first.
Twenty years’ experience. Please note new address: 93 and 94,
Chancery Lane, London, W.C.2.

Literary

ESSAY PRIZE OF 200 GUINEAS.

The Carnegie Trust for the Universities of Scotland offers a Prize of 200 Guineas for the best "Survey of Anglo-American History," the author to be a graduate of any of the Scottish Universities who on January 1, 1921, is not over twenty-standing from the date of his first graduation.
Award will be made only where the essay is judged worthy of publication.

Essays, with mottoes and sealed notes containing a declaration by the writers that the essays are bona fide their own production, must be lodged, on or before April 15, 1921, with the Secretary of the Trust, The Merchants' Hall, Edinburgh.

Sales by Auction

PRINTED BOOKS.
Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson & Hodge
WILL SELL by AUCTION, at their Large Galleries, 34 and 35,
New Bond Street, W. I, on Wednesday, May 12, and
Two following Days, at one o'clock precisely.
PRINTED BOOKS, comprising the Property of Sir Spencer
Maryon Wilson, Bt., Eastbourne; the Property of the late Sir
Francis Mowatt, G.C.B.; the Property of H. W. Wykeham Musgrave, Esq., of Barnsley Park, Circensere; the Property of Mrs. Michael Coombs, deceased; the Property of S. M.
Robins, Esq., deceased, of Edgbaston, Birmingham, and other properties, and including Bookplates and Emblem Books, Works on Bibliography and the Fine Arts, Books illustrated by G. Cruikshank, Works of Dickens, Thackeray, and William Morris. Books with coloured plates and books in fine bindings, Sport, Travel, Natural History, &c.
May be viewed two days prior. Catalogues may be had.

For Sale

SUITABLE FOR INSTITUTION OR SCHOOL.
BERKS—ADJOINING WINDSOR FOREST.
In a Park. Fine Views.

AN exceptionally well-built HOUSE, containing thirty to forty
large Bedrooms, fine suite of very spacious Reception Rooms.
Cottages, Garage, Stabling, and numerous outbuildings.
HOME, FARM AND PArk, 277 ACRES.
For Sale at mere fraction of original Cost.
RALPH PAY & TAYLOR, 21, Davies Street, Berkeley Square, W.

Appointments Wanted

LADY GRADUATE, experienced historical research (Palaeography) desires POST as ARCHIVIST, LIBRARIAN or SECRETARY (shorthand, typewriting).—Box D., Athenaum

LADY, with high linguistic qualifications, seeks POST
LIBRARIAN, LITERARY, &c.—Box A. 33, Athenaum

Financial

£1,000 to £30,000 available. Immediate introductions given to highly educated, fully qualified men
seeking Partnerships, Directorships and Employment with Investment.—The Officer’s Partnership
Guardian, 53, Victoria Street, S.W.1, Call.

Booksellers & Catalogues

MAY LIST OF PUBLISHERS’ REMAINDERS
CONTAINING MANY INTERESTING BOOKS, ALL IN NEW CONDITION, AT GREATLY REDUCED PRICES, NOW READY.
Write also for New List of the most popular books on Natural History, Gardening, etc.

WILLIAM GLAISHER, Ltd.,

Charities

BOOKSELLERS’ PROVIDENT INSTITUTION.
A Registered Friendly Society founded in the year 1837 for the assistance of members and their widows and children when in necessitous circumstances.
Patron: HER MAJESTY QUEEN ALEXANDRA.
President: CHARLES JAMES LONGMAN, Esq.
An Annual Subscription of One Guinea, or a Donation of Ten Guineas, entitles the subscriber to a Partnership with the privilege of voting at General Meetings: whilst a bequest of Twenty Guineas constitutes the executor an Honorary Member
for life, with power to vote.
Subscriptions and Donations will be thankfully received by the Secretary, Mr. WILLIAM POLTEN, Stationers’ Hall Court, London,
E.C.4, who will gladly furnish any further particulars that may be desired.
HARRAP'S LATEST BOOKS.

JUST READY.

An important contribution to Reconstruction.

The Real Wealth of Nations or, a New Civilization and its Economic Foundations
By JOHN S. HICHT
Fellow of the Royal Economic Society.
332 pages, size 7½ by 4¾ in. Price 12s. 6d. net. With Full Index.
A book for the thoughtful employer and employee. The operation of a system of Economics such as is outlined would remove the causes of industrial unrest, and should convince the workers of the value to themselves of maximum production. Projections will be sent on application.

STUDIES OF CONTEMPORARY POETS
By Mary Stubbson. A new and enlarged edition. Crown 8vo, 4 pages, 7s. 6d. net. Antique Yap, 17s. 6d. net.
The first edition of this work has now been out for two years. The new edition contains chapters on Thomas Hardy, John Drinkwater, Michael Field, J. C. Smith, W. H. Yeats, and Contemporary Western Poets.

AN ANTHOLOGY OF RECENT POETRY
Selected by L. D. WALTERS. Crown 8vo, 128 pages, 3s. 6d. net.
This selection contains only the work of poets of to-day, and is thoroughly representative of their best work. More than fifty poems are included.

MEDIEVAL EUROPE
By LYNN THORNOCK, Th.D. With 24 Maps and Plans, and 32 Plates.
Demy 8vo, 640 pages, 15s.

HARRAP'S BILINGUAL SERIES. 1s. 6d. net.

General Editor—E. M. MAISDON.
Modern Language Readers for the student who wishes to enlarge his vocabulary through reading. Each book consists of a carefully selected story, or other suitable material, with translation on opposite pages and a few notes. The series will include books in all of the principal languages.

N.B.—When ordering please add the word "Bilingual" after title.
The volumes are of handy size for the pocket—6½ by 4½ in. Each contains 128 pages, bound in stiff paper cover. Price 1s. 6d. net.

FRENCH
A. Baudet, Lettres de mon Moulin.
E. Boulanger, Les Jumeaux de l'Hôtel Corrèsi.
G. de Mauperant, Mlle. Perle.
E. A. Poe, Le Scabre d'Or.
W. W. Jacobs, Selected Stories.
J. Conrad, The Idiots.
J. S. Keyworth, French for the Traveler.
SPANISH
V. Blasco Ibañez, La Corrida.
W. W. Jacobs, Selected Stories.
T. W. Storm, Mexican.
ITALIAN
M. Bandello, La Novella di Romeo e Giulietta.
W. W. Jacobs, Selected Stories.
J. Conrad, The Idiots.
RUSSIAN
L. N. Tolstoi, Two Tales.
A. S. Pushkin, Three Tales.
DANISH
H. Drachmann, Byron and Vadim.
NORWEGIAN
B. L. Hægeland, The Blue Boy.
GERMAN
FR. Gnitzaeker, Gemischthausen.
W. W. Jacobs, Selected Stories.
J. Conrad, The Idiots.
W. W. Jacobs, Selected Stories.

Other Volumes in Preparation.

N.B.—A Special Prospectus of this Series will be sent to any address on application.

WRITE FOR NEW CLASSIFIED CATALOGUE (22 pp.).

LONDON:
GEORGE G. HARRAP & CO., LTD.
2 & 3. PORTSMOUTH STREET, KINGSWAY, W.C.

MACMILLAN & Co.'s LIST.

LIFE OF
LORD KITCHENER.

By SIR GEORGE ARTHUR, Bt., M.V.O. 3 vols With Portraits and Plans. 8vo. £2 12s. 6d. net.
The Letters of Henry James.
Selected and Edited by PERCY LUBBOCK. With two Portraits and Facsimile. 2 vols. 8vo. 36s. net.

NEW BOOK BY
OWEN WISTER
A Straight Deal: or, The Ancient Grudge.
By OWEN WISTER, Author of "The Pentecost of Calamity." &c. Crown 8vo. 6s. net.

A candid discussion of Anglo-American relations both from the historical and the present-day point of view, and an earnest plea for closer and more friendly relations between the two countries.

Thomas Hardy's Works.
With full gilt backs and gilt tops, cloth 4s. 6d. net; limp leather, 6s. net each. The Wessex Edition, 22 vols., with Preface, Notes, Frontispiece and Map in each vol.; cloth extra. 8vo. 7s. 6d. net each.

MACMILLAN & Co., Ltd., LONDON, W.C.2

MARY RUSSELL MITFORD AND HER SURROUNDINGS.

By CONSTANCE HILL. £1 1s. net.
With numerous illustrations by ELLEN G. HILL, and reproductions from photographs.

A PRISONER IN TURKEY.

By JOHN STILL, author of "Poems in Captivity." 7s. 6d. net.

In this very remarkable book, which is an account of over three years' imprisonment in Turkish hands, at Constantinople and at Afioun Kara Hissar, Mr. Still gives a very fuerul and vivid account of the trials and dangers through which he and his fellow prisoners passed.

SHAKSPERE'S HANDWRITING.

By SIR GEORGE GREENWOOD. 2s. net.
In this book Sir George Greenwood, one of the greatest living authorities on Shakespeare, discusses with his usual force and lucidity the question of the poet's handwriting.

THE SAGA OF THE SEVENTH DIVISION.

By LADY HELEN FORBES. 5s. net.
This poem is a remarkable epic dealing with the heroic deeds of the Seventh Division in 1914. Nothing like it is to be found in all the war literature of the war.

NEW FICTION.

THE WATERS OF STRIFE.

By GEORGE VANE, author of "Closed Lips." "The Lifted Latch." 7s. 6d. net.

JOHN LANE, THE BODLEY HEAD, VIGO STREET. W.1.
Mr. Murray's New Books

Descriptive List of New Books Posted on request.

The Epistles of St. John

A practical exposition similar to Dr. Gore's previous widely read volumes on "The Sermon on the Mount," "The Romans," and "The Ephesians." 6s. net.

Good Conduct

By GEORGE A. BIRMINGHAM. A high diploma among the accepted doctors of mirth has been won by George A. Birmingham. Here his humour finds plentiful expression through the activities of a schoolgirl of impudence and competence. 6s. net.

The Philosophy of Faith; and The Fourth Gospel

By the late Rev. HENRY SCOTT HOLLAND, D.D., Edited by the Rev. CANON WILFRID J. RICHMOND. The book consists of two sections—in the first an attempt is made to give Dr. Holland's thought and teaching as a coherent whole, while in the second is given a collection of his contributions to the study of the Fourth Gospel. 12s. net.

Science and Life

By Professor FREDK. SODDY, F.R.S., University of Oxford. "Professor Soddy is one of the group of famous investigators who have revolutionised chemistry and physics by the experimental study of radioactivity. "We are the Professor's debtor for a most suggestive book."—Morning Post. 2nd Impression. 10s. 6d. net.

By ERNEST WEEKLEY, M.A.
Professor of French University College, Nottingham.

The Romance of Words

"A book of extraordinary interest, everyone interested in words should immediately obtain a copy."—Spectator. Third Edition, 6s. net.

The Romance of Names

"Under Professor Weekley's guidance a study of the origin and significance of surnames becomes full of fascination for the general reader."—Truth. Second Edition, 6s. net.

Surnames

"Mr. Weekley inspires confidence by his scholarly method of handling a subject which has been left, for the most part, to the amateur or the crank."—Spectator. 2nd Edition, 6s. net.

April

The Quarterly Review

Metternich and the Entente Cordiale.
The Contribution of Russia to Learning.
Some Aspects of the Italian Settimento.
Venereal Disease During the War.

The Sermons of a Poet.
The Levant Company and its Rivals.
Women and the Church.
Imperial Migration and the Clash of Races.
The 1st Lord Holland.
Germany, Turkey, Austria, and the Armenian Massacres.
The Jews as a Revolutionary Leaven.
A Strategical Retrospect.
The Economics of the Peace.
The Question of the Volga.
A National Industrial Council.

C. Ernest Fayle.

W. Morton Fulbrook.

London: John Murray, Alabamare Street, W.1
AN OLD LLOYD'S REGISTER, by H. M. Tomilson... 566

POETRY: The Maid of Keinton Mandeville, by Thomas Hardy... 565

The Birth of God, by Aldous Huxley... 567

REVIEWS: Shakespeare Criticism... 568

Marshall von Hindenburg... 570

A Noble Roman... 571

The Vision of Lord Kitchener... 571

MARGINALIA AND OTHER NOTES: Two Books on the Eucharist... 573

Marginalia, by Autolycus... 574

The Mechanics of Elizabethan Playwriting, by W. J. Lawrence... 575

The Britwell Library... 576

SCIENCE: The Scientific Contribution... 577

Societies... 578

Forthcoming Meetings... 578

FINE ARTS: The Two Cabinets, Part II., by Andre LHote... 579

Exhibitions of the Week... 579

The Silver Coinage of Crete... 580

MUSIC: The British Music Society, by Edward J. Dent... 580

The Bach Festival... 581

The Teaching of Music... 581

Concerts... 582

DRAKE: Shakespeare at Stratford... 582

That Human Touch... 583

Politics... 584

Teach... 584

A Reversion to Stereotype... 584

Miss Chaplin's Dances at the Old Vic... 584

CORRESPONDENCE: Lord Acton and Liberty—Shakespeare's Welsh Characters—Edward de Vere and Shakespeare..."The First Folio Poem Initialed "I. M."

FOREIGN LITERATURE: The Pilgrimage of Peace, by G. Lowes Dickinson... 585

Tolstoy and Gorky, by S. Koteliansky... 587

The Good Talker... 589

LIST OF NEW BOOKS... 590-591

THE MAID OF KEINTON MANDEVILLE.

(A tribute to Sir Henry Bishop on the sixty-fifth anniversary of his death: April 30, 1855.)

I hear that maiden still
Of Keinton Mandeville
Singing, in flights that played
As wind-wafts through us all,
Till they made our mood a thrill
To their aery rise and fall,
"Should he upbraid."

Rose-necked, in sky-gray gown,
From a stage in Stower Town
Did she sing, and singing smile
As she blend that dexterous voice
With the ditty of her choice,
And banished our annoy Therewhile.

Such song, such lure, were power
To fledge the heaviest hour
Of him who housed with her:
Who did I never knew
When her spoused estate on-drew,
And her warble flung its woo
In his ear.

Ah, she's an ancient now,
Time-trenched on cheek and brow,
Whom I once heard as a maid
From Keinton Mandeville
Of matchless mien and skill
Sing, with smile and swell and trill,
"Should he upbraid!"

THOMAS HARDY.
AN OLD LLOYD'S REGISTER

WITH the sensation that I had survived into a strange and a hostile era that had nothing to do with me, for its affairs were not mine, I was inside a submarine, during the war, talking to her commander. He was unravelling for me the shining complexity of his "box of tricks," as he called his ship. He was sardonic (there was no doubt he was master of the brute he so lightly villified) and he was blithe, and he illustrated his scientific monologue with stories of his own experiences in the Bight.
These to me were like the bedevilments of those dreams from which we groan to awake, but cannot.
The curious doings of this new age, I thought as I listened to him, would have just the same interest for me as the relics of an extinct race of men, except for the urgent remembrance that one of the monstrous accidents this child knows of might happen now.
That made an acute difference. This was not nightmare, nor ridiculous romance, but actuality. And as I looked at this mocking youngster, I saw he was like the men of that group on the "Queen Mary" who were similarly mocking, for my benefit, but a few weeks before, their expert share in forwarding the work we had given them in this new age; and then where were they? Ships I knew, but not such ships as these, nor such work.

Another officer joined us, an elder man, and said this to him was strange navigation. He was a merchant seaman. He had served his time in sailing ships. I asked him to name some of them, having the feeling that I could get back to the time I knew if I could but hail the ghost, with another survivor from the past, of one of those forgotten ships. "Well," he replied, "there was the 'Cutty Sark.'"

If he had said the "Golden Hind" I should not have been more astonished. In a sense, it was the same thing. The "Cutty Sark" was in the direct line with the Elizabethan ships, but at the end. That era, though it closed so recently, was already as far as a vague memory. The new sea engines had come, and here we were with them, puzzled and embarrassed, having lost our reasonable friends. I told him he had known the "Cutty Sark," and had seen that master of hers—a character who went about Poplar in a Glengarry cap—who gave one of her masts (the nuzzle, I think) a golden rooster, after he had driven her from Sydney Heads to the Channel to break the record—Captain Woodget. His men said it was like living in a glass house. The effect of that casual recolleciton on the submarine officer was distinctly unwarlike. This memory, and not his present work, might have been the real thing. He knew Woodget.
He wanted to know more; ever so much more. He mentioned other ships and masters, to induce me.
I got the idea that he would let his mind, at least, escape into that time, if only I would help him to let it go. But there was that potent and silent enigma about us...

No such escape for him. We have fashioned other ships, and must use them. What we have conjured up compels us to live with it. But when you do not go to sea you may have what ships you like. There is some, but not much interest in the reappearance in the newspapers of the sailing lists; a few of the old names appear again, though new ships bear them.
But late at night, when a westerly wind with rain turns for me a neighbouring yew tree into an invisible surge, then it is the fortune of one who remembers such as the "Cutty Sark" to choose different ships and other times. Why not choose them? They were comely ships, and now their time seems fair. Who would care to remember the power and grey threat of a modern warship, or the exotic luxury of a liner of this new era? Nobody who remembers the graciousness of the clippers, nor the pride and content of the seaman who worked the n. To aid the illusion of the yew, I have one of those books which are not books, a Lloyd's Register of Shipping for 1880, that by some unknown circuitous route found its way from its first owner in Madras to my suburb. It goes very well with the yew, when westerly weather comes to unite them.

I should like to know how that book got to London.
Somewhere in it is the name of the ship which carried it. Anyhow, I think I can make out in it the house-flag of that ship. It was, I believe, one of J. H.
Allan's tek-built craft, a forgotten line—the "Rajah of Cochin," the "Copenhagen," the "Lincelles"— though only just before the war, in the South-West India Dock, I met a stranger, a seaman looking for work, who regretted its disappearance, and the new company-owned steamers; for he said they were good ships, "but more than that," he told me, "Allan was a fine old gentleman who knew his own ships and knew his men." This stranger said you forget a ship now as soon as you are paid off, "and glad to"; and
"you don't ever know who owns her, even if there's a strike. Parsons and old maids and Cardiff sharks, I reckon."

Very likely. But what sharks once were in it have all disappeared from my Register. It belongs to those days when, if you went to New Zealand, you had to go by sailer; when the East India Dock had an arcade of jibbooms and bowsprits, with sometimes a varnished shark's tail terminal—the "Euterpe,"
"Jessie Readman," "Wanganui," "Waima,"
"Waimate," "Opawa," "Margaret Galbraith,
There were others. What is in these names? But how can we tell? There were personal figure-heads, there were shapely forms, each with its own narrative of adventure, there was the undiscovered sea, and there was youth; and these have gone.

It is all very well to say that the names and mere words in this old Register have no more meaning to-day than a railway time-table of the same date.
There are, hardly to be distinguished in some corners of St. Paul's Cathedral from which night never quite goes, certain forlorn regimental colours. Few of us know now who bore them, and where, and why; but imagine the deserved fate of one who would allow a brutal word to disturb their dust. They mean nothing, except that men, in a world where it is easy to lose faith, treasure the few tokens of fidelity, selflessness, courage and enterprise proved in their fellows; and so those old staffs, to which clung faded and dusty rags, in a real sense support the cathedral.
Poplar once was a parish whose name was more familiar in Eastern seas and on the coasts of the Americas, and stood for something greater and more august, than the names of some veritable capital cities. That vista down the East India Dock Road from North Street, past the plane trees which support the cupola of Green’s Chapel on a cloud, to the gateway of the dock which was built for John Company, was what many would remember as essential London who would pass the Mansion House as though it were a dingy and nameless tavern. At the back of that road to-day, and opposite a church which was a chapel of ease to save the crews of the East Indiamen lying off Blackwall the long walk to Stebonhithe Church, is the public library; and within that building are stored, as are the regimental colours in the cathedral, the houseflags of those very ships my Register helps me to remember—the tokens of fidelity and courage, of a service that was native, and a skill in that service which was traditional to the parish; tokens that now are dusty and in their night, understood only by the few who also belong to the past.

There is the houseflag of the “Cutty Sark” and her sister ships, the “Dharwar,” “Blackadder,” “Coldstream”—but one must be careful, and refuse to allow these names to carry one away. There are so many of them. They are all good. Each can conjure up a picture and a memory. They are like the names one reads in spring in a seed-merchant’s catalogue; they call to be written down, to be sung aloud, to be shared with a friend. But I know the quick jealousy of some old sailor, his pride wounded here by an unjustifiable omission of the ship that was the one above all others for him, is bound to be moved by anything less than a complete reprint here of the Register. How, for example, could I give every name in the fleet of the White Star of Aberdeen? Yet was not each ship, with her green hull and white spars, as moving as a lyric? Is there in London River-to-day a ship as beautiful as the old “Thermopylae”? There is not. It is impossible. There was the “Samuel Plimsoll” of that line—now a coal hulk at Gibraltar—which must be named, for she was Captain Simpson’s ship (he was commodore afterwards), the “merry blue-eyed skipper” of Froude’s “Oceana,” but much more than that, a sage and masterful Scot whose talk was worth a long journey to hear.

The houseflag of Messrs. R. & H. Green, in any reference to the ships of Blackwall, should have been mentioned first. There is a sense in which it is right to say that the founder of that firm, at a time when American craft like the Boston clippers of Donald McKay were in a fair way to leave the Red Ensign far astern, declared that Blackwall had to beat those American flyers, and did it. But that was long before the ’80’s, and when steam was still ridiculed by those who could not see it equaling clippers that had logged fourteen knots, or made a day’s run of over 300 miles. Yet some of Green’s ships came down to the end of the era, like the “Highflyer” and the “Melbourne.” The latter was renamed the “Maquarie,” and was one of the last of the clippers to come home to Poplar, and for that reason, and because of her noble proportions, her picture is kept, as a reminder, by many who wish to think of ships and the sea as they were. It is likely that most who live in Poplar now, and see next to its railway station the curious statue of a man and a dog, wonder who on earth Richard Green, Esq., used to be; though there are a few oldsters left still who remember Blackwall when its shipwrights, riggers, sailmakers and caulkers were men of renown and substance, and who can recall, not only Richard Green, but that dog of his, for it knew the road to the dock probably better than most of those who use it to-day. Poplar was the nursery of the Clyde. The flags which Poplar knew well would puzzle London now—Devitt & Moore’s, Money Wigram’s, Dutchie’s, Willis’s, Carmichael’s, Duncan Dunbar’s, Scrutton’s, and Elder’s. But when lately our merchant seamen surprised us with a mastery of their craft and a fortitude which most of us had forgotten were ever ours, what those flags represented, a regard for a tradition as ancient and as rigorous as that of any royal port, was beneath it all.

H. M. TOMLINSON.

THE BIRTH OF GOD

Night is a void about me; I lie alone;
And water drips, like an idiot clicking his tongue,
Senselessly, ceaselessly, endlessly drips
Into the waiting silence, grown
Empty for this small inhuman sound.
My love is gone, my love who is tender and young.
O smooth warm body, O passionate lips!
I have stretched forth hands in the dark and nothing found:
The silence is huge as the sky—I lie alone—
My narrow room, a darkness that knows no bound.

How shall I fill this measureless
Deep void that the taking away
Of a child’s slim beauty has made?
Slender she is and small, but the loneliness
She has left is a night no stars alloy,
And I am cold and afraid.

Long, long ago, cut off from the wolfish pack,
From the warm immediate touch of friends and mate,
Lost and alone, alone in the utter black
Of a forest night, some far-off beast-like man,
Cowed by the cold indifferent hate
Of the Northern silence, crouched in fear,
When through his bleared and suffering mind
A sudden tremor of comfort ran,
And the void was filled by a rushing wind
And he breathed a sense of something friendly and near
And in privation the life of God began.

Love, from your loss shall a god be born to fill
The emptiness, where once you were,
With friendly knowledge and more than a lover’s will
To ease despair?
Shall I feed longing with what it hungers after,
Seeing in earth and sea and air
A lover’s smiles, bearing a lover’s laughter,
Feeling love everywhere?

The night drags on: darkness and silence grow,
And with them my desire has grown,
My bitter need. Alas! I know,
I know that here I lie alone.

ALDOUS HUXLEY.
REVIEWS

SHAKESPEARE CRITICISM

A NEW VARIORUM EDITION OF SHAKESPEARE.—THE LIFE AND DEATH OF KING JOHN. Edited by Horace Howard Furness, Jr., Litt.D. (Lippincott, 25s. net.)

It is an exciting, though exhausting, experience to read a volume of the great modern Variorum Shakespeare from cover to cover. One derives from the exercise a sense of the evolution of Shakespeare criticism which cannot be otherwise obtained; one begins to understand that Pope had his merits as an editor, as indeed a man of genius could hardly fail to have, to appreciation the proxy and pedestrian pains of Theobald, to admire the amassing erudition of Steevens. One sees the phases of the current process by which Shakespeare was elevated at the beginning of the nineteenth century to a sphere wherein no mortal man of genius could breathe. For a dizzy moment every line that he wrote bore the authentic impress of the divine. Effavit deus. In a century, from being largely beneath criticism Shakespeare had passed to a condition where he was almost completely beyond it.

"King John" affords a good instance of the reverential attitude. The play, as is generally known, was based upon a slightly earlier and utterly un-Shakespearian production entitled The Troublesome Raigne of King John. The only character Shakespeare added to those he found ready to his hand was that of James Gurney, who enters with Lady Falconbridge after the scene between the Bastard and his brother, says four words, and departs for ever.

Bast. James Gurney, wilt thou give us leave awhile?

Gur. Good leave, good Philip.

It is obvious that Shakespeare's sole motive in introducing Gurney is to provide an occasion for the Bastard's characteristic, though not to a modern mind quite obvious, jest, based on the fact that Philip was at the time a common name for a sparrow. The Bastard, just dubbed Sir Richard Plantagenet by the King, makes a thoroughly natural jibe at his former name, Philip, to which he had just shown such breezy indifference. The jest could not have been made to Lady Falconbridge without a direct insult to her, which would have been alien to the natural, blunt, and easygoing fondness of the relation which Shakespeare establishes between the Bastard and his mother. So Gurney is quite casually brought in to receive it. But this is not enough for the Shakespeare-drunk Corderidge.

For an instance of Shakespeare's power in minima, I generally quote James Gurney's character in "King John." How individual and comical he is with the four words allowed to his dramatic life!

Assuredly it is not with any intention of diminishing Corderidge's title as a Shakespearian critic that we bring forward this instance. He is the only great critic of Shakespeare; and the quality of his excellence is displayed in one of the other few notes he left on this particular play. In Act III. scene ii. Warburton's emendation of "airy" to "fiery" had in Corderidge's day been received into the text of the Bastard's lines:

Now, by my life, this day grows wondrous hot:
Some airy devil hovers in the sky.

On which Corderidge writes:

I prefer the old text: the word "devil" implies "fiery." You need only to read the line, laying a full and strong emphasis on "devil," to perceive the uselessness and tastelessness of Warburton's alteration.

The test is absolutely convincing—a poet's criticism of poetry. But this Corderidge went astray not once but many times, under the influence of his idolatries of Shakespeare, corroborates the general conclusion that is forced upon any-one who will take the trouble to read a whole volume of the modern "Variorum." There has been much editing, much comment—an intolerable deal of both—but singularly little criticism of Shakespeare. The pendulum has swung violently from nigiling and insensitive textual quibble to that equally distressing exercise of human ingenuity, idealistic encomium, of which there is a typical example in the opening sentence of Mr. Masefield's remarks upon the play: "Like the best Shakespearian tragedies, 'King John' is an intellectual form in which a number of people with obsessions illustrate the idea of treachery." We remember that Mr. Masefield has much better than this to say of Shakespeare in his little book; but we fasten upon this sentence because it is set before us in the "Variorum," and because it too "is an intellectual form in which a literary man with obsessions illustrates his idea of criticism." Genetically, it is a continuation of the bad element in Coleridge's Shakespeare criticism, a continual bias towards transcendentental interpretation of the obvious. To take the origin a phase further back, it is the portentous offspring of the feeble element in German philosophy (a refusal to see the object) after it had been submitted to an idle process of ferment in the flabby part of Coleridge's brain.

"King John" is not in the least what Mr. Masefield, under this dangerous influence, has persuaded himself it is. It is simply the effort of a young man of great genius to rewrite a bad play into a good one. The effort was, on the whole, amazingly successful; that the play is only a good one, instead of a very good one, is not surprising. The miracle is that anything should have been made of "The Troublesome Raigne" at all. The "Variorum" extracts show that, of the many commentators who studied the old play with Shakespeare's version, only Swinburne saw, or had the courage to say, how utterly null the old play really is. To have made Shakespeare's Falconbridge out of the old lay figure, to have created the scenes between Hubert and John, and Hubert and Arthur, out of that decrepit skeleton—that is the work of a commanding poetical genius on the threshold of full mastery of its powers, worthy of all wonder, no doubt, but doubly worthy of close examination.

But "ideas of treachery"! Into what cloud cuckoo land have we been beguiled by Coleridge's laudanum trances? A limbo—of this we are confident—where Shakespeare never set foot at any moment in his life, and where no robust critical intelligence can endure for a moment. We must save ourselves from this insidious disintegration by keeping our eye upon the object, and the object is just a good (not a very good) play. Not an Ibsen, a Hauptmann, a Shaw, or a Masefield play, where the ravages of these "ideas" are certainly perceptible, but merely a Shakespeare play, one of those works of true poetic genius which can only be produced by a mind strong enough to resist every attempt at invasion by the "idea" bacillus.

In considering a Shakespeare play the word "idea" had best be kept out of the argument altogether; but there are two senses in which it might be intelligibly used. You might call the dramatic skeleton Shakespeare's idea of the play. It is the half-mechanical, half-organic factor in the work of poetic creation—the necessary means by which a poet can conveniently explicate and express his manifold aesthetic intuitions. This dramatic skeleton is governed by laws of its own, which were first and most brilliantly formulated by Aristotle in terms that, in essentials, hold good for all time. You may investigate this skeleton, seize, if you can, upon the peculiarity by which it is differentiated from all other skeletons; you may, for instance, that "Othello" is a tragedy of jealousy or "Hamlet" of the inhibition of self-consciousness.
But if your "idea" is to have any substance it must be moulded very closely upon the particular object with which you are dealing; and in the end you will find yourself reduced to the analysis of individual characters.

On the other hand, the word "idea" might be intelligibly used of Shakespeare's whole attitude to the material of his contemplation, the centre of comprehension from which he worked, the aspect under which he viewed the universe of his interest. There is no reason to rest content with Coleridge's application of the epithet "myrrh-minded," which is, at best, an evasion of a vital question. The problem is to see Shakespeare's mind sub specie unitatis. It can be done: there never has been and never will be a human mind which can resist such an inquiry if it is pursued with sufficient perseverance and understanding.

What chiefly stands in the way is that tradition of Shakespearean which Coleridge so powerfully inaugurated, not least by the epithet "myrrh-minded." This method of approach is indicated in a critical comparison of Dante and Shakespeare which recently appeared in these pages.

But of "ideas" in any other senses than these—and in neither of these cases is "idea" the best word for the object of search—let us then as we would of the plague, in criticism of Shakespeare or any other great poet. Poets do not have "ideas"; they have perceptions. They do not have an "idea"; they have comprehension. Their creation is aesthetic, and the working of their mind proceeds from the realization of one aesthetic perception to that of another, more comprehensive if they are to be great poets having within them the principle of poetic growth. There is undoubtedly an organic process in the evolution of a great poet, which you may, for convenience of expression, call logical; but if you forget that the use of the word "logic," in this context, is metaphorical, you are doomed. You can follow out this "logical process" in a poet only by a kindred creative process of aesthetic perception passing into aesthetic comprehension. The hunt for "ideas" will only make that process impossible; it prevents the object from ever making its own impression upon the mind. It has to speak with the language of logic, whereas its use and function in the world is to speak with a language not of logic, but of a process of mind which is as least as sovereign in its own right as the discursive reason.

Away then with "logic" and away with "ideas" in the art of literary criticism; but not, in a foolish and imperceptible reaction, to revive the impressionistic criticism which has sapped the English brain for a generation past. The art of criticism is rigorous; impressions are merely its raw material; the life-blood of its activity is in the process of aesthetic ordnance of impressions.

It is time, however, to return for a moment to Shakespeare, and to observe in one crucial instance the effect of the quest for logic in a single line. In the fine scene where John hints to Hubert at Arthur's murder, he speaks these lines (in the First Folio text):

I had a thing to say, but let it go:
The Sonne is in the heaven, and the proude day,
Attended with the pleasures of the world,
Is all too wanton, and too full of gaudes.
To give me audience: If the midnight bell
Did with his yron tongue, and brazen mouth
Sound on into the drowsy race of night,
II this same were a Churchyard where we stand,
And thou processed with a thousand wrongs:
O God, how many wrongs!

Then, in despight of brended watchfull day,
I would into thy bosom pour my thoughts.

If one had to choose the finest line in this passage, the choice would fall upon

Sound on into the drowsy race of night.

Yet you will have to look hard for it in the modern editions of Shakespeare. At the best you will find it with the mark of corruption:

† Sound on into the drowsy race of night ("Globe");

and you run quite a risk of finding

Sound one into the drowsy race of night ("Oxford").

There are six pages of close-printed comment upon the line in the "Variorum." The only reason, we can see, why it should be the most commented line in "King John" is that it is one of the most beautiful. No one could stand it. Of all the commentators, only one, Miss Porter, whom we name honoris causa, stands by the line with any conviction of its beauty. Every other person either alters it or regrets his inability to alter it.

"How can a bell sound on into a race?" pipe the little editors. What is "the race of night"? What can it mean? How could a race be drowsy? What an awful contradiction in terms! And so, while you and I, and all the other ordinary Shakespeare lovers are peacefully sleeping in our beds, they come along with their little chisels, and chop out the horribly illogical word and pop in a horribly logical one, and we (unless we can afford the "Variorum," which we can't) know nothing whatever about it. We have no redress. If we get out of our beds and creep upon them while they are asleep—never mind—and take out our little chisels and chop off their horribly stupid little heads, we shall be put in prison and Mr. Justice Darling will make a horribly stupid little joke about us. There is only one thing to do. We must make up our minds that we have to combine in our single person the scholar and the amateur; we cannot trust these gentlemen.

And, indeed, they have been up to their little games elsewhere in "King John." They do not like the reply of the citizens of Angiers to the summons of the rival kings:

A greater powre then We denyes all this,
And till it be undoomed, we do Locke
Our former sculpes in our strong-Hart'd gates;
Kings of our feare, until our fears resolvd.
Be by some certaine king, purgd and deposd.

Admirable sense, excellent poetry, But no! We must not have it. Instead we are given "King'd of our fears" ("Globe") or "Kings of ourselves" ("Oxford"). Bad sense, bad poetry.

They do not like Pandalph's speech to France:

France, thou must hold a serpent by the tongue,
A cased lion by the mortal paw,
A fasting tiger by the tooth.
Than keep in peace that hand which thou dost hold.

"Cased," caged, is too much for them. We must have "chaeld," in spite of

If thou wouldst not entomb thyself alive
And case thy reputation in thy tent.

Again, the Folio text of the meeting between the Bastard and Hubert in Act V., when Hubert fails to recognize the Bastard's voice, runs thus:

Unkind remembrance: thou and endless nig'l.
Have done me shame. Brave Soldier, pardon me
That I may see it breaking from the tongue
Should scarce the true acquaintance of mine ear.

This time "endless" is not poetical enough for the editors. Theobald's emendation "eyeless" is received into the text.

One has only to read the brief scene through to realize that Hubert is worried and obsessed by the night that will never end. He is overwrought by his knowledge of news sitting to the night,

Black, fearful, comfortless and horrible, and by his long wandering in search of the Bastard:

Vive, here I wait in the black howl of night
To end you o! o!

Yet the dramatically perfect "endless" has had to make way for the dramatically stupid "eyeless." Is it surprising that we do not trust these gentlemen?

J. M. M.
MARSHAL VON HINDENBURG

Out of My Life. By Marshal von Hindenburg. (Cassell. 31s. 6d. net.)

We think it was Mr. H. G. Wells who remarked that some people seem to be "in character" all their lives. The same thing has been more scientifically expressed in Mr. Trotter's study of what he calls the "stable type"—people comparatively immune from mental conflicts, who early and easily make assumptions, moral, political and what-not, which are henceforth firm and unalterable. This quality of stability seems to be absolutely essential to success in practical pursuits; we expect it in a railway magnate, in a statesman, in a judge and in a soldier. We know that what is common to all these men is a vigour of conviction, a blindness to alternatives, a simplicity of emotional reaction, which artists and other unstable types can seldom compass. There is something impressive about unhesitating belief and action; even when we realize that it testifies not only to energy, but, in many cases, to something very like stupidity, it is easier to despise at a distance than at close quarters. It is true, nevertheless, that the stable type has its limitations—that its limitations, indeed, are essential to its achievements. Human beings, like horses, go straightest when in blinkers. In war-time these limitations become particularly important and desirable. It becomes necessary to one's mental comfort to acquire unshakable beliefs, of what kind is largely indifferent, and numbers of people suffer spiritual agonies in trying to convince themselves that they cannot see round the corner. The man who is genuinely blind to side-turnings then becomes an object of envy to the philosopher, and of admiration to a group; if his blindness is of the kind that the majority possesses he may become a national hero.

In this account of Hindenburg's life we are given an opportunity of studying the characteristics of this type in some detail. The first thing that strikes us is the extraordinary lack of plasticity in the man; combined with this is a doubt whether, as a child, Hindenburg was not quite as extraordinarily plastic. In describing his early education he states that his parents endeavoured to give us the best thing that parents can ever give—a confident belief in our Lord God and a boundless love for our Fatherland and—in whatever regard as the prop and pillar of that Fatherland—our Prussian Royal House.

It seems that such beliefs can be inculcated—certainly Hindenburg has held them unshakably throughout his life. But we wonder, in passing, whether other beliefs could have been as deeply planted. Could Hindenburg have been brought up in an equally convinced Bolshevist? It sounds fantastic, but can we assume that some men are predestined to be fanatically loyal to the Prussian Royal House? We must rather suppose that, as a child, Hindenburg was remarkably plastic. And yet, after a short time, he is granite. Like some kind of jelly, his mental substance "set" early and hard. Henceforth he is deaf to the teachings of experience; he walks assuredly in a clear, simple world; all objects have clear-cut outlines and are either black or white. All shapes which are not elementary and all shades that are intermediate are totally invisible. He is, in fact, a "strong" man. Perhaps the most perplexing of these "confident beliefs," derived from his parents, is the confident belief in "our Lord God." Hindenburg was a soldier, acquainted with battles. He also possessed a generous share of German sentimentality. Yet his confident belief never wavered. Did he ever see, we wonder, that any problem was involved? Have we here, a key to the mysterious stability of these men? Is it possible for the human mind to develop strata, as it were, which are completely unrelated to one another, so that the region of confident belief, for example, never makes contact with "sensation," "perception," and the other elements of the philosopher? It is not enough to say that such beliefs are merely rudimentary. Hindenburg's beliefs were attended with great emotional energy. When his Emperor said something like "Good-morning," to him as a young man, or even only looked at him, he was in ecstasy. His later close acquaintance with the next Emperor does not affect this feeling. It seems to be completely independent of all human attributes in its object, and yet to be excited by the presence of the object. Perhaps, in his dark researches, Sir James Frazer has met with analogous emotional states; doubtless something is "imputed" to the object, whether it be an Emperor or a tree. Unfortunately Hindenburg finds nothing mysterious in his conception of loyalty and gives us no explanation.

When we say that Hindenburg was a loyalist, a patriot, a conventional moralist, and that to the service of these convictions he brought a formidable physical and emotional energy, we really have, with some completeness, produced a formula which describes him. Simple deductions may be made, e.g., that he was very fond of hunting, and gives no sign of being interested in the arts. He dislikes politics chiefly because, so far as we can make out, politics has to take other people's feelings into account. As he says, "A powerful, self-contained State in Bismarck's sense was the world in which I preferred my thoughts to move." It would be truer to say it was the world in which he could not prevent his thoughts moving. As we have said, alternatives do not exist for him. In describing the German Revolution he says: "The Revolution was winning. Let us not waste time on discussing the reasons." He could not discuss the reasons; he would have found the reasons, in all strictness, unassimilable. In the same way the German collapse can teach him nothing. It would still teach him nothing had it been a hundred times as great. In that world in which his thoughts move there can come no rift, no outside light can penetrate its concrete.

I have an unshakable conviction that, as in those days, our historical continuity with our great and glorious past will be preserved or restored where it has been broken.

It is indeed an unshakable conviction; it is independent of evidence or even of his own volition.

I have often been asked the question on what I based my hopes of victory in 1918 when even in the days of 1914-1915 I could only point to my faith in the justice of our Cause and my confidence in our Fatherland and the Army.

In other words, those early acquired confident beliefs in God and Germany. And the third confident belief is just as unshakable as the others. He is speaking of the future: "Then from the tempestuous seas of our national life will once more emerge that rock—the German Imperial House . . . ." And so his world, his only possible world, is once more re-established.

What else Hindenburg has, besides this amazing force of character, it is difficult to discover. In all his military achievements he is inextricably associated with Ludendorff. Hindenburg obviously stands in awe of Ludendorff; his attitude is not that of an equal. But, whichever was the able man, it was a sound instinct that selected Hindenburg as the national hero. Ludendorff was too realistic to play that rôle. He was not strong enough to ignore facts with the superb unconsciousness of a Hindenburg. The German people felt that in all circumstances, of triumph or disaster, Hindenburg, "unshakably convinced," would remain imperturbably the same. And they were justified. When his army and his country collapsed, when the men who had adored him rejected everything he stood for, when his God declared himself against Germany and his countrymen seemed to him a nation of traitors, when, finally, his Emperor abdicated and fled, Hindenburg, unshakably convinced, remained at his post.

J. W. N. S.
A NOBLE ROMAN

Father Maturin. By Maisie Ward. (Longmans. 7s. 6d. net.)

Maturin’s secession, we read in the “Letters” of Canon Bright, is of much less importance than would have attached to an Englishman with a more balanced mind to an emotional, or, at least, a highly sensitive and excitable Celt.” More delicately does Father Herbert Vaughan, who was a colleague of Maturin’s in his Roman Catholic days, writes in the present biography: “There was, perhaps, a certain lack of discipline in his character.” No doubt Father Vaughan knew the story recounted by Miss Maisie Ward of how Maturin, on being asked by a Cardinal Archbishop what he considered the greatest obstacle to the spread of Catholicism in England, replied, “Your Eminence, I should say it was yourself.” If he was able to say such things in the green shady of his Roman Promised Land, we can guess the kind of things he must have said beneath the dry sticks of Anglican prelacy. No wonder the Canons went off at the very name of him!

Basil Maturin was the son of Dr. Maturin of Grange-gorman, who occupied, Miss Ward recalls, “the rare, at that date almost unique position of a Tractarian clergyman in Ireland.” According to George Tyrrell’s autobiography, the “terrible old Doctor” occupied a position even more Athenian than that. Not only, it seems, did he ban Popery and Dissent with the utmost rigour of his school; he also held that “at the first synod of the disestablished Irish Church, when the Prayer Book was expurgated and the Lectionary altered, the whole of that Church had gone into schism, and that he alone was left, a solitary Jeremiah, to weep over the fallen city.” It was not unnatural in these circumstances that his son should seek a Zoar for the parental creed in England, and in 1873 he entered the Cowley community at Oxford.

The “Society of St. John the Evangelist,” to give this brotherhood its official title, had been founded seven years before by the Rev. Richard Menz Benson, in whom a tenacity of purpose as great as Dr. Maturin’s own was united to a cool common-sense and a streak of grim humour. At a moment when the “revival of monasticism” suggested to pulpit-lording ladies an entertaining vision of sandals, cowls and Gothic traceries, he hired two adjoining villas of a peculiarly Victorian dullness in Oxford’s most modern outgrowth, and invited his handful of associates to live the Egyptian desert saints without the décor. The astonishing experiment succeeded, and restored to the Church in England the romance it had lacked since the days of Lantock. A quarter of a century later, when the stern old mystic’s eyes were dim, and his steps in need of support, these lodgings had become the “Mother House” of an order whose missionaries were travelling in four continents, and the tin chapel had given place to a great monastic church which in the severe grandeur of its architecture, the perfection of its psalmody, and the restrained splendour of its worship translates into outward shape the Founder’s mind.

With that mind the susceptible, passionate nature of Basil Maturin can never have been in true harmony. “My dearest Papa,” he writes home in the flush of his postulancy, “I hardly know how to tell you what I am going to write about, or rather to write so as to show you how serious and in earnest I am.” In this excited strain the letters bubbles on to the end. It is engagingly sincere, but—

We look again at Benson’s portrait, and know that the breach is bound to come. Maturin, whether he desires it or not, will work his way from the eternal restraint, the inflexible balance of Cowley into a warmer, more intimate home for his soul. Look beneath the surface of the long vacillation that did not end till 1897, and it appears one protracted struggle between the man who in his silence, his reserve, his dogged toil in a Church that drives, like a ship dismayed, before the gale, embodies the noblest type of Anglican piety, and the man who with his oratorical gifts, his craving for sympathy, his love of frank assurances in religion, already displays the winning charm of Rome.

It was not because he ever regretted his choice, but because of the human failings that beset officialdom (such failings as led to the epigram quoted above), that Father Maturin’s Roman Catholic life had a tinge of sadness. He did not, we gather, quite find his niche, though the blaze of his eloquence proved as seductive in his new Church as in his old. Condemned by his own life—history to be the oracle of intending converts, he would never let them do what he thought right so long as there was a chance that their motives were wrong, and he never spoke or wrote a word that could wound the members of the Church he had renounced. His end was sudden, among the victims of the Lusitania. “Survivors from the ship related,” his biographer tells us, “that they saw him standing on the deck very pale, but perfectly calm, giving absolution to several passengers.” Very pale, but perfectly calm—“a surface weakness and an underlying steadfastness. The death was just an epitome of the life,”

D. L. M.

THE VISION OF LORD KITCHENER

Life of Lord Kitchener. By Sir George Arthur. 5 vols. (Macmillan. 52s. 6d. net.)

Sir George Arthur thinks that it is possible that at the last moment, when the “Hampshire” went down, Lord Kitchener, whose eyes in life had “always strained to pierce the future” was permitted “in God’s good mercy” to see “in the storm and in the darkness, and in the death agony, the Vision of the Eternal.” We admit the possibility and also Sir George Arthur’s right to his opinion upon so important a question. The conjecture occurs upon the one thousand and twenty-seventh page of his book; the previous 1,026 pages deal with all the other moments of Kitchener’s 66 years of life, but no evidence is given that at any moment of those 66 years a Vision of the Eternal was vouchsafed to Kitchener in God’s good mercy. That is where we quarrel with Sir George Arthur and his biography. Biographically, the vision which comes to a great man in his death agony seems to us of no importance; it must remain always a subject of reverent and curious conjecture. What we demand of a biographer and a biography is that they should tell us what was the vision of the great man at some moments of his life which preceded the death agony. But here Sir George, through his three long volumes, gives us no help at all. At the end we know no more about Lord Kitchener’s vision than we did at the beginning. It is possible—if we may be allowed our own eschatological conjectures—that the fact gives satisfaction to the Field-Marshal in the other world, for we learn that during his life “an imperceptible intrusion into his thoughts he could treat with unforgettable severity.”

If the book tells the vision of Kitchener’s vision, it does leave us with a vision of Kitchener. At the beginning of the third volume there is a photograph of a Field-Marshal’s uniform with a man inside it. Possibly this might more accurately be described as the photograph of a pair of Field-Marshal’s boots with two legs inside them, the whole surrounded by a Field-Marshal’s baton, medals, and orders. No philosopher can mistake the real meaning of this photograph: it gives a representation of what Plato would call the Field-Marshalness of a Field-Marshal, or Aristotle the πνεύμα τοῦ Φίλος of a Field-Marshal. Even that is not philosophically accurate, for we have here not a picture of the essence of a Field-Marshal, but rather a representation of what the photographer and his subject thought to be the British public's idea of the vō τῆς ὑποδαίρου of a British Field-Marshal. The truth of this statement will be confirmed by turning to the photograph at the beginning of Vol. II. Here we have a photograph of the uniforms of a General Commander-in-Chief in India and of his Staff, all with men inside them; but in the forefront of the group are two small spaniels, one with a piece of paper in its mouth. The effect of these spaniels is startling; they have defied the photographer and the biographer; they are unconscionably alive, the only human beings in the photograph and the biography.

If the reader will take these two photographs and compare them with any of the statues of British Generals, statesmen, or heroes in the neighbourhood of Whitehall and Piccadilly, he will get further light upon the biographical method of Sir George Arthur. If the photograph is a representation in two dimensions of the British public's idea of what a British General should be, the statues are precisely the same thing in three dimensions. And this biography is again the same thing manufactured out of words, printed ink, and paper. It is possible, of course, that Lord Kitchener really was only what these sumptuous and pompous volumes represent him to have been, a paste-board figure of a strong, silent man whose heart of gold would melt and whose eyes would fill with tears at the appropriate moment. Yet the vision seems to be almost too complete, too like the photograph of the Field-Marshall's uniform, and the statue of Miss Cavell. We read, for instance, that this stern soldier "would often wistfully say: 'I have no home.'" "A power of witty repartee was always latent" (its latency possibly accounts for the fact that no instance of it relieves the seriousness of these thousand pages). "But he had no joy in the double merchant of an impending jest," and when he found himself at "a somewhat improper French light opera," he showed "unmistakable discomfort. He was half puzzled, half dismayed, that any intelligent person should care to see such a piece; interest in the veiled indecencies was as unintelligible to him as the indecencies were themselves intolerable." When the war broke out, it was not only surmised that the Finger of God was writing history in order to "vindicate Divine Justice and Human Right," but also there came the natural conviction that "a great leader [i.e., Lord Kitchener] had been providentially called to the work."

It will be seen from these few quotations that we are here in the region not of realities and human beings, but of essences, biographical and patriotic essences. There is only one instance recorded in these three volumes where it is possible to see a human being inside the Field-Marshall's boots; and that is where Kitchener got very angry when someone looted his table. It is impossible that any human being, outside the world of the penny novelette, could have got himself into the psychological condition of Sir George Arthur's Lord Kitchener, and it is most unfortunate that the biographer should have considered it to be part of his duty to eliminate all the creases and wrinkles which make character, because it is quite probable that Kitchener had a rather interesting character. To attempt a reconstruction of it is now impossible, so effectively has the pumice-stone of the official biography done its work. But even that is not the greatest fault of these three volumes; they contrive somehow or other to make it almost impossible to form a judgment upon Kitchener's objective achievements as a General and an administrator. They leave upon the reader the impression that in Sir George Arthur's opinion Kitchener was, by his achievements, a great man, a great soldier with that "strategic intuition" which always goes with military genius, a great statesman and administrator, and finally a great leader chosen at a great moment by the Finger of God to write history. If we are to accept this estimate, we must do so almost entirely upon the word of the biographer, because his biographical methods usually leave us without the necessary material for forming our own judgment. One instance of this will suffice.

As a political administrator, Kitchener's reputation must depend upon his work in Egypt, and his Five Feddan Law must be the test of his constructive statesmanship. Sir George Arthur devotes two large volumes to Kitchener's activities before the Great War, and it might have been thought that he could have found room for giving us the material for understanding and judging the Five Feddan Law. The whole subject is dismissed in two and a half pages. The reader has to read the whole two and a half pages before he is given any material for understanding what exactly the law was, and he then finds part of the text of it tucked away in a footnote. He is also informed that "Kitchener's reform stood justified, and since his day the Five Feddan Law has brought contentment and prosperity into thousands of humble homes"; but he is given no figures or facts in support of this statement, and he is expected to accept it on the word of Sir George Arthur. But of all the problems which confront the administrator in the East none is more important, or has hitherto proved more insoluble, than that of the indebtedness of the peasantry to the expropriative Five Feddan Law has not escaped severe criticism, and something more than Sir George Arthur's assurance about the "humble homes" is required to meet it.

There is, in fact, no proof that Kitchener was a great statesman. There is considerable proof that he was not a great general. The Sudan campaign, by which he made his reputation, was certainly not a great feat of arms; it revealed no strategic genius, and it showed that at the crucial moment, when confronted with the enemy on the battlefield, Kitchener was afflicted by that fatal indecision which distinguishes the second-rate from the first-rate commander. He was only once, at Paardeberg, in command of a large body of troops against a civilized and well-armed enemy. His operations failed badly, and, though Sir George Arthur defends him manfully, the fact remains that the failure was due to Kitchener's methods and tactics. As a General, he belonged to the school of Fabius Cunctator, which is not a school of genius. His talents were those of the first-class entrepreneur. He worked slowly and liked to work slowly, building up an immense and intricate organization, and, in the best English tradition, assuring himself that the whole and each minutest detail was of the finest quality. It was these characteristics which made his achievements in the Boer War and the Great War possible and remarkable. Only an Englishman, or possibly a German, could have stolidly sat himself down to wire in the Transvaal, or again in 1914 could have sat himself down to create the Kitchener Armies. These are the achievements not of genius, but of a capacity for stubbornly taking pains which is probably more effective than genius.

Sir George Arthur, it will be seen, leaves us with no real vision of either Kitchener or his work. But there is one characteristic which the unreality, the romantic haze, and all the clichés of this biography cannot conceal. Kitchener had a real simplicity and honesty of mind, very rare in the world of politicians and soldiers in which he moved. You can see this in his straightforward, statesmanlike, and unsuccessful efforts, against Lord Milner, to obtain a "just peace" with the Boers in the beginning of 1901; and you can see it in his honest belief that "treason can go no further than for an Indian newspaper to speak of the King-Emperor as drunken, careless, sinful, and tyrannical."

L. W.
ALMS
THE MARBECK INN. By Harold Brighouse. (Odham's, 7s. 6d.)
LIGHT-UP TIME. By Ivor Brown. (R. Cobden-Sanderson, 7s. net.)

No; our case is not really as desperate as it seems to believe. We are standing on the back-door step with an empty bag, ready for anything as you may care to part with, sir; we are not sitting at the window of the dead drawing-room, wondering whether the couple on the opposite pavement is engaged or married or likely to be engaged and married. It is true that we have a lean and hungry look, but, oh, that our sympathetic entertainers would realize it is not to be changed by the crutches and the leavings they are so boundlessly willing to bestow! Nothing will satisfy us but to be invited as guests to the rich banquet—but to feel that our host is, for the wonderful time, our new discovered and yet mysterious friend.

We open novel after novel, we turn page after page, and there are the authors rummaging in dusty cupboards, turning over heaps of discarded garments to find something to fling at us; but our pity for their misguided impulse is always with satisfaction at the sight of so much cheerfulness. Can it be that they are enjoying themselves? We can understand the noble satisfaction derived from the performance of an act of charity, but the confidence, the buoyancy, the assurance which is the keynote of these novels is different and tempts us to cry, “Danger.” It is so fatally easy, in giving away what one does not need, to delude oneself that the gift really, after all, is no mean one—to find as one brings it into the light and dusts it down and hands it over how a surprising freshness and newness. How otherwise are we to account for the “air” with which Mr. Brighouse and Mr. Ivor Brown present their heroes, Sam Branstone, in “The Marbeck Inn” and Peter Penruddock of “Lighting up Time”?

Now Sam Branstone was the son of a railway porter and a strong, silent mother. He lived in a mean street in the city of Manchester. In Chapter I, we are told how, through his saving a boy’s life, the father of the rescued boy gives Sam his first start in life by sending him to the Grammar School. He is ambitious, and his mother is ambitious for him.

You are to picture Anne, with her forty years of a working woman’s life behind her, wrestling with algebra and trigonometry, blazing a trail for Sam to follow. It was heroic, and by some mental freak, successful. Day after day, in the intervals of cooking, cleaning, washing, she studied the text-books which so puzzled him. She had no education in particular, nothing but a general capacity and a monstrous will.

So with his mother’s aid he succeeds at school, and leaves to enter the office of an estate agent.

Meantime, he grew in knowledge of the world, and education came to Sam, not in the cloistered freedom of the Isis, but where in Manchester he went collecting rents. His eye for the main chance had always been on the corner and as on the straight high road.

In course of time Sam falls in love with Ada, “whose intimate clothing was flannelette,” and marries her against his mother’s will. He makes money by scoring off persons, institutions and things, and finally owns a publishing business. The mud of Manchester, we are told, is thick upon him. Enter Ethel, a real woman who determines to save him, to rid him of the mud and to reveal him a sparkling Sam, which she accomplishes by taking him away with her to the Marbeck Inn, sacrificing herself to him, and making him bathe in pools and rivers and tans and all places where water is, that the physical act of cleansing may be unto him a symbol.

She succeeds, but not before there has been a struggle between the lawful wife of Sam and his mother, who reappears upon the scene to wrestle with more complicated algebraic problems. And the end is Marbeck Inn again with the prospect of an infant Samuel. Then there you are. That’s Sammy Branstone for you!” cries Mr. Brighouse, handing us this lifeless figure in a frock coat with a moustache that droops over his mouth. “And there’s Anne. There’s Sam’s mother. There’s a woman for you!” he declares, setting down before us a pair of elastic-sided boots, an umbrella and a black bonnet. But his generosity does not stop at that. He goes on measuring yard upon yard of Manchester goods until—we had rather go empty-handed away than burdened with such a parcel.

Mr. Ivor Brown’s charitable dole takes the form of a theatrical novel. It tells how Peter Penruddock took pity on Mary Maroon, an actress whose success was on the wane, and engaged herself as her advance agent for a tour in the provinces. We have no doubt, of course, that the tour is going to be a remarkable success, owing to the remarkable ingenuity of Peter. There will be occasional setbacks: Monday nights which are “frosty,” little difficulties among the company, occasional displays of the familiar theatrical jealousy, and so on. We are not in the least surprised when a Lord appears on the scene, but we are mildly surprised at his immense importance in the author’s eyes. There is also a Honourable Cynthia who has had a family scrap with her papa and is come to Peter for a job.

“I wasn’t constructed for use. You see, I was educated at a more frightfully expensive school. . . . I believe it cost hundreds to get through the doors.”

“Did you get your money’s worth?”

“I learned comportment,” she said, and, putting her legs against the fireplace, lit another cigarette.

“Not a blue stocking then?”

“No, black milanes. Of course the price is awful, but then the cheap ones ladder straight away.”

Here is a typical example of Mr. Brown’s humour. After “sampling” it the reader will not be surprised to know he makes play with tinned salmon and boarding-house ham and a bottle of stout, and that there is a comic line here and . . .

But enough. Were we the beggars that these authors and their kind suppose us to be, we should not weep and make our moan for what we lack, but for what is ungrudgingly, unblushingly thrust upon us.

K M.

It seems a pity that Mr. Robert Scott’s series of “Hand books of Catholic Faith and Practice” is not more uniform in character. It has contained specimens of learned theology and history in Mr. Prestige’s study of “The Virgin Birth” and Professor Whitney’s admirable little treatise on “The Episcopate and the Reformation,” and of simplified theology and history in Mr. Hartry’s “Catholic or Roman Catholic” and Canon Oliphant’s “Reunion.” Now in “The Eucharistic Sacrifice,” by Dr. Darwell Stone (3s. 6d. net), we have only a course of popular sermons, cleft out with some technical notes, a disappointment which is almost ironical when we reflect that Dr. Stone is the greatest of English experts on all questions of Eucharistic doctrine, practice and history. Assuredly the sermons are excellent, and full of the calm spirituality that makes all Dr. Stone’s devotional utterances a real refreshment to the spirit, but more solid fare than this must be provided if the series is to continue its usefulness.

An agreeable publication on the same subject is “The Sung Eucharist,” by Mr. J. C. H. How, Precentor of Trinity College, Cambridge (Cambridge, Heffer, 2s. net), which provides simple and well-written instructions on Eucharistic doctrine, an analysis of the Liturgy with ceremonial directions, and Marbeck’s musical setting to the Mass. The printing and cover of the little manual are delightful, and it should make its mark among a crowd of competitors.
MARGINALIA

There are some people to whom the most difficult to obey of all the commandments is that which enjoins the utterance of oaths. Theprevailance of folly, its monumentality, unchanging permanence, and its almost invariable triumph over intelligence are phenomena which they cannot contemplate without experiencing a passion of righteous indignation or, at the least, of ill-temper. Sages like Anatole France, who can probe and anatome human stupidity and still remain serenely detached, are rare. These reflections were suggested by a book recently published in New York and entitled "The American Credo." The authors of this work are those enfants terribles of American criticism, Messrs. H. L. Mencken and George Jean Nathan. They have compiled a list of four hundred and eighty-eight articles of faith which form the fundamental Credo of the American people, prefacing them with a very entertaining essay on the national mind:

Truth shifts and changes like a cataract of diamonds; its aspect is never precisely the same at two successive moments. But error flows down the channel of history like some great stream of lava or infinitely lethargic glacier. It is the one relatively fixed thing in a world of chaos.

To look through the articles of the Credo is to realize that there is a good deal of truth in this statement. Such beliefs as the following—not by any means confined to America alone—are probably at least as old as the Great Pyramid:

That if you, woman, about to become a mother, plays the piano every day, her baby will be born a Victor Herbert.

That the accumulation of great wealth always brings with it great unhappiness.

That it is bad luck to kill a spider.

That water rots the hair and thus causes baldness.

That if a bride wears an old garter with her new linen, she will have a happy married life.

That children were much better behaved twenty years ago than they to-day.

And most of the others in the collection, albeit clothed in forms distinctively contemporary and American, are simply variations on notions as immemorial.

Inevitably, as one reads "The American Credo," one is reminded of an abler, a more pitiless and ferocious onslaught on stupidity, I mean Swift's "Complete Collection of Genteel and Ingenious Conversation," according to the most polite mode and method now used at Court and in the Best Companies of England. In three Dialogues, By Simon Wagstaff, Esq." I was inspired after reading Messrs. Mencken and Nathan's work to refresh my memories of this diabolic picture of the social amenities. And what a book it is! There is something almost appalling in the way it goes on and on, a continuous, never-ceasing stream of imbecility. Simon Wagstaff, it will be remembered, spent the best part of forty years in collecting and digesting these gems of polite conversation:

I can faithfully assure the reader that there is not one single witty phrase in the whole Collection which has not received the Stamp and Approbation of at least One Hundred Years, and how much longer it is hard to determine; he may therefore be secure to find them all genuine, sterdem and authentic.

How genuine, sterdem and authentic Mr. Wagstaff's treasures of polite conversation are is proved by the great number of them which have withstood all the ravages of time, and still do as good service to-day as they did in the early seventeen hundreds or in the days of Henry VIII.: "Go, you Girl, and warm some Fresh Cream." "Indeed, Madam, there's none left; for the Cat has eaten it all." "I doubt it was a Cat with Two Legs." "And pray, What News, Mr. Neverout?" "Why, Madam, Queen Elizabeth's dead." (It would be interesting to discover at exactly what date Queen Anne took the place of Queen Elizabeth in this grand old repartee, or who was the monarch referred to when the Virgin Queen was still alive. Aspirants to the degree of B. or D.Litt. might do worse than to take this problem as a subject for a Thesis.)

Some of the choicest phrases have come down in the world since Mr. Wagstaff's day. Thus, Miss Notable's retort to Mr. Neverout, "Go, teach your Gramam to suck Eggs," could only be heard now in the dormitory of a preparatory school. Others have become slightly modified. Mr. Neverout says, "Well, all Things have an End, and a pudden has two." I think we may flatter ourselves that the modern emendation, "except a roly-poly pudding, which has two," is an improvement.

Mr. Wagstaff's second dialogue, wherein he treats of Polite Conversation at meals, contains more phrases that testify to the unbroken continuity of tradition than either of the others. The conversation that centres on the sirlon of beef is worthy to be recorded in its entirety:

Lady Smart. Come, Colonel, handle your Arms. Shall I help you to some Beef?

Colonel. If your Ladyship please; and, pray, don't cut like a Mother-in-law, but send me a large Slice; for I love to lay a good Foundation. Sir, this Noble; tis my Duty. Neverout. Ay; here's cut and come again.

Miss. But, pray; why is it call'd a Sir-loyn?

Lord Smart. Why, you must know that our King James the First couldn't good Eating, being invited to Dinner by one of his Nobles, and seeing a large Loyne of Beef at his Table, he drew out his Sword, and, in a Frivolity, knighted it. Few people know the Secret of this.

How delightful it is to find that we have Mr. Wagstaff's warrant for such gems of wisdom as, "Cheese digests everything except itself," and "If you eat till you're cold, you'll live to grow old!" If they were a hundred years old in his day they are fully three hundred now. Long may they survive! I was sorry, however, to notice that one of the best of Mr. Wagstaff's phrases has been, in the revolution of time, completely lost. Indeed, before I had read Aubrey's "Lives," Lord Sparkish's remark, "Come, box it about; 'twill come to my Father at last," was quite incomprehensible to me. The phrase is taken from a story of Sir Walter Raleigh and his son.

Sir Walter Raleigh, [says Aubrey] being invited to dinner to some great person where his son was to goe with him, he sayd to his son, "Thou art expected to-day at dinner to goe along with me, but thou art an unruly and affronting child and I am ashamed to have such a bear in my company." Mr. Walter humbled himselfe to his father and promised he woulde behave himselfe mighty mannerly. So away they went; and the next day was very much in demand at last halfe dinner time. Then sayde he, "I this morning, not having the feare of God before my eies, but by the instigation of the devil, went . . . ."

At this point Mr. Clark, in his edition, suppresses four lines of Aubrey's text; but one can imagine the sort of thing Master Walter said.

Sir Walter, being strangely surprized and putt out of countenance at so great a table, gives his son a damned blow over the face. His son, as rude as he was, would not strikes his father, but strikes over the face the gentleman that sate next to him and sayd, "Box about; 'twill come to my father anon." 'Tis now a common-proverb.

And so it still deserves to be; how, when and why it became extinct, I have no idea. Here is another good subject for a thesis.

There are but few things in Mr. Wagstaff's dialogue which appear definitely out of date and strange to us, and these superannuations can easily be accounted for. Thus the repeal of the Criminal Laws has made almost incomprehensible the constant references to hangings made by Mr. Wagstaff's personages. The oaths and the occasional mild grossesses have gone out of fashion in mixed polite society. Otherwise their conversation is in all essentials exactly the same as the conversation of the present day. And this is not to be wondered at; for, as a wise man has said:
Speech at the present time retains strong evidence of the survival in it of the functions of bird recognition. The function of conversation is ordinarily regarded as being the exchange of ideas and information. Doubtless it has come to have such a function, but an objective examination of ordinary conversation shows that the actual conveyance of ideas takes up so small a part of it that we would, if we could see the exchange, take it for granted to consist of ideas which are necessarily common to the two speakers and are known to be so by each. Conversation between persons unknown to one another is apt to be rich in the exchange of ideas. In ordinary conversation there is a tendency to exchange ideas which are not common to the two speakers. The exchange of ideas is a common practice in the church and in the schools. But the exchange of ideas is not limited to the church and the schools. The exchange of ideas is a common practice in all human societies. The exchange of ideas is a common practice in all human societies. The exchange of ideas is a common practice in all human societies.

[...]

Autolycus.

THE MECHANICS OF ELIZABETHAN PLAYWRITING.

Not all the flowering of genius in the Elizabethan age, remarkable as that flowering was, suffices to explain the fact that many of the plays written in the three decades between 1580 and 1620, as well as the English stage had the good fortune to produce in the next three centuries. How chanced it that, although dramatic genius was not lacking in seventeenth-century France, neither Corneille, Racine nor Molière ever rose to Shakespearean heights? Don't tell me that more dramatists were drawn to the Elizabethan stage when the plot had become more complex, the characters more intricate, and the language more refined. If the French had the inferior dramatic capacity, Paris would, in the eighteenth century, never have become, what she long remained, the centre of the theatrical world. The real truth of the matter is that in seventeenth-century France the mechanics of the playwright's art hindered, while in Elizabethan England they helped. In large degree the Elizabethan constellation owed its superiority to its political condition. Of that contemporary the Three Unities. No English dramatist was expected to dance his hornpipe in fetters; Jonson essayed the feat, and for a time the spectators marvelled—only to desert him for the normal, nimbler jigging of a Shakespeare or a Haywood. In good sooth, rare and rugged old Ben apart, the Elizabethan dramatist troubled himself little about rules. Generally more absorbed in making lucid narration of a popular story than in moulding a new and shapely plot, he had little to bear in mind beyond the customary cutting of his play into the Horatian five acts. He was precluded from worrying over situations by the curtailing of his plays. The fact that he had no curtain to bring down. Psychology he sometimes outraged at the dictates of the pleasant ending, but on the whole there is a remarkable absence of artificial climaxes in the strictly Elizabethan drama. No setting of scenery gave him pause in the construction of his play. Little more had to be borne in mind beyond the time-lapse of the performance, the three-hour traffic of the stage. An act might consist of as many scenes as one pleased, and a scene might on occasion be of remarkable brevity. The note of the entire scheme was its grateful ductility. The prime appeal was to the imagination. Much of the uniqueness, and not a little of the high poetic quality of the Elizabethan drama is due to the fact that the playwright was compelled to paint in his backgrounds and create his atmosphere with his pen.

Other circumstances, less considered, aided in the building up of a monumental drama. The Elizabethan theatres were occupied by stock companies whose members were little given to chinning and changing, and the professional playwright invariably wrote to order for some particular company with whose qualities he was intimate. (There was no excuse for ignorance on this score, for everywhere he had the freedom of the house.) It is significant that Shakespeare, like Heywood and Will Key, and at certain periods in their career, was a regular writer for such plays. The Elizabethan playwright was expected to write to order for some specific company with whose qualities he was intimate. (There was no excuse for ignorance on this score, for everywhere he had the freedom of the house. It is significant that Shakespeare, like Heywood and Will Key, and at certain periods in their career, was a regular writer for such plays. The Elizabethan playwright was expected to write to order for some specific company with whose qualities he was intimate. (There was no excuse for ignorance on this score, for everywhere he had the freedom of the house.)

"Writings in "The Stratford Town Shakespeare," Mr. Henry Davy maintains that there must have been a preternaturally lean actor in Shakespeare's company for whom he designed Robert Fawcett to play King John. Given is "The Complete Writings of Shakespeare" in "Romeo and Juliet" and "Starveling" in "A Midsummer Night's Dream." To this list I should be inclined to add Hooforners, Slander, and above all, Cissus. Caesar's dwelling on "the leman hungry look" is particularly noticeable."

Under my battlewings, unless a hoarse-voiced hireling had been specially chosen to play the part of the messenger. No physical peculiarity escaped the observation of these old dramatists. Remark the allusions to the long-legginess of Churms in "Willy Beguiled." Why, look you now, says Will Crickit, "if I had been such a great, long, large, job-cocked, losised burden as Master Churms is, I'll warrant you, I should never have got Peg as long as I had lived, for you mark, a wench will never love a man that has all his substance in his legs." And later Leia says:

"Master Churms, are you not well? I must confess I would have chosen you. But that I never should sing it till now; Trust me, I never look'd so low before."

Even writers for the children-companies had particular boys in mind when they designed their characters. There is clear evidence that the younger who played Captain Jenkins in "Northward Hoe," when Dekker and Weisberg's lively comedy was produced by the Paul's Boys, was much smaller than the average. Take the situation in the second act where the Captain asks Doll what sized man she would like for a husband Doll. Of the meanest stature, captain; not a size longer than yourself nor shorter.

Captain. By God, 'tis well said; all your best captains in the Low Countries are no taller as I: but why of my pitch, Mistress Doll?

Doll. Because your smallest arrows fly farthest.

Apart from indications of this order, the fact that the Elizabethan dramatist wrote his parts for specific actors and kept them steadily in mind is substantiated by other evidence. He had a curious habit when writing the dialogue for some of his minor characters of prefacing the speeches, not by the name of the character, but by the name of its prospective exponent. Shakespeare himself adopted the practice, and, as existing MS. prompt copies testify, it survived his period. Why this substitution of the players' names should have been confined to a few minor parts is difficult to determine. The original manuscripts of plays were commonly used, after licensing, as prompt copies, and a manuscript in which all the speeches were prefaced by the actors' names would have been convenient for the prompter. The evidence, however, for the piece-wise application of the principle is indisputable. Thus in the induction to the pre-Shakespearean "Taming of the Shrew," the name of the actor, Sanders, precedes the speeches of the First Player. Shakespeare himself affords no fewer than three examples of the practice. In "2 King Henry IV.," Quarto, 1600, Act V., the officer's speeches are assigned to Sincklo; and in "2 King Henry VI.," in the forest scene as given in the Folio, Sincklo and Humphrey, two identified hirings, figure throughout as the keepers. What is still more remarkable is that both in the Quarto of 1600 and the Folio copy of "Much Ado about Nothing," the names of Cowley and Kemp are substituted before the speeches in Act IV. sc. ii. for that of Verge and Dogberry.

While it seems highly probable that these substitutions were made for the prompter's convenience, there is no reason to believe that they were the work of the prompter. Since the prompt copy was not prepared with any view to later publication, although often put to that purpose, there is no reason why, if wholly transcribed by the prompter, the principle of substitution should not have been applied to all the speeches. That it was confined to a few minor characters whose appearance was infrequent, was probably due to the circumstance that those were precisely the characters least readily identifiable by the prompter with their representatives. No matter how humble the player might be, the prompter was always sure of his name, but he was not always sure of the name of the character he was to play.

Of the influence of the actors on the whole trend of Elizabethan dramaturgy there can be no question. It is obvious that an era of many masterpieces must have been an era of great acting. No dramatist writing for a specific company could have been touched to fine lines unless he had been assured of the capacity of his interpreters. Without Alleyn and Burbage we should have had no Faustus, no Hamlet, no Othello. Doubtless the genius of these two was as paralleled in later times by Betterton, Garrick and Edmund Kean, but, viewed in its entirety, there were circumstances associated with Elizabethan histrionism which constituted it permanently unique. Especially is there reason to marvel over the inspired artistry of the boy-players of women, whose patiently acquired technic rendered it possible for a Juliet, a Rosalind and an Imogen to emerge.

W. J. LAWRENCE.

SIR REGINALD BLOMFIELD will deliver on Wednesday, May 5, in the rooms of the Royal Society, the fifth annual British Academy lecture on aspects of art. He has chosen as his subject "The Tangled Skein: Art in England, 1890 to 1920."

HIGH prices are being paid in America for Oscar Wilde MSS. At a recent sale at the Anderson Galleries, New York, $4,792 was paid for the handwritten manuscript of "The Importance of Being Earnest." The new edition of "The Importance of Being Earnest" with five letters to Lord Alfred Douglas. The total of the sale ($423 lots) was $46,800, over $10,000 at the present rate of exchange.

THE BRITWELL LIBRARY

This books from the Britwell Library to be sold by Messrs. Sotheby during the first week of May, if not of the supreme importance of some items it contains it is without a doubt of the greatest interest both to students of our history in general, and to bibliographers in particular. It may indeed be said that no collection since the days of Heber has contained so many unsuspected treasures as are to be found in the Christie-Miller library.

Monday and Tuesday's sale is devoted to volumes which were collected for their bindings, and it includes no fewer than 464 consecutive lots bound for the famous French historian de Thou or for his third son. The books themselves are, taken as a rule, of no great importance, being for the most part contemporary publications. We do not quite see how a book printed in London in 1641 could be attested with the arms of a man who died in 1617; probably his son continued to use them. One hardly expects a treatise on Natural Philosophy to be published at Dublin on the eve of the Great Rebellion. There are however, a book on cooking by the Pope's cook, a list of the Vatican types, a de Thou binding sold as a duplicate by the British Museum, and eight or nine very rare Spanish books. Among the remaining forty volumes there are some splendid pieces of work, to judge by the reproductions in the illustrated catalogue (price 5s.), including a superb Le Monnier, a Dacier signed binding (only one other known), a Maoli binding, several fine bindings of Hollar's Beggars, a Grolier binding, some Padvan, and a Canevari binding.

The other three days are devoted to sixteenth- and seventeenth-century theology, at a time, one needs reminding, when theology meant current politics. With the books in this catalogue before him, any man could sit down to write a history of politics in England from the fifteenth century to the Civil War. Though they are arranged alphabetically, they fall into distinct classes. The first is of course pre-Reformation devotional works: these include some very rare Wynken de Worde's, a very desirable set of sermons by Bishop Fisher early translations from Erasmus, and a number of Pynson's, Redmans and Berthelots. Next comes a very fine set (almost complete, though scattered over the catalogue) of the books printed by John Hochstraten at Antwerp for Tyndale and his friends from 1528 to 1533 under the pseudonym of Hans Lufft of Marburg. This set is made more valuable by the presence of an extremely rare book printed by Hochstraten under his own name at Malmo, when he had to leave Antwerp. John Gau's "Right Way to the Kingdom of Heaven." This is the only copy known, and ought not to be allowed to leave the country, and it is to be hoped that someone will purchase it for the British Museum. If the description of lot 479 is not in error, we have here one of the Obituaries of a Christian Man." Lot 478 is certainly not the first edition of "The Practise of Prelates." The beginning of the English Reformation is marked by the "Determinations" of the Universities as to Henry's marriage and the "Necessary Doctrin." The Edwardian period is mainly noticeable for the London reprints of Reformation books printed abroad, and the Marian period is very fully represented. With Elizabeth we get John Knox, the Bishops, and Martin Marprelate, the last-named nearly complete, though some of the items are catalogued under Penny. Later still we get a very full set illustrating the origin of the Congregationals.

The collection illustrates some of the difficulties of a cataloguer. There are, for example, two copies of a book by Bishop Cooper printed in 1562. It would seem that Powell the publisher, anticipating a large demand, had the book printed by two men with different standards of spelling. To all intents and purposes the two are identical, but they were obviously meant as one. Again, "The Royal Book" was issued partly by Wynkyn de Worde and partly by Pynson with different colophons only—are they separate editions? Of course a collector would like both. To conclude, there are an Oxford-printed incunable in an Oxford binding which some (who ought to know) have given the approximate date of 1720 endeavouring to teach the colonists of those days "The Reasonableness of Regular Singing, or Singing by Note."
Science

THE SCIENTIFIC CONTRIBUTION

For something like seventy years science has been the dominant intellectual activity of the Western world. During that period the range of its material has greatly increased until now the scientific method is regarded as the method proper to almost any investigation. Philosophy is still a partial exception, but there is a strong tendency to regard such philosophic problems as are not susceptible to the application of the scientific method as being essentially incapable of solution, or else as incorrectly stated. But although the prestige of science is so great, and the general attitude towards it so reverential, there is still much confusion respecting its function and achievement. Its relations to other human interests and activities are not yet clearly defined. The attempts to define them by allotting to science its "sphere" have proved, in the result, to be so ill-judged that it is now considered safer to waive the question of limitations altogether. The question is not settled. Everything is left open but it is not therefore assumed that science contains or will contain all we know or all we need to know. Science is not yet the one object of our contemplation; we have a number of interests which still lead separate lives. The separation is not complete. Science, if not openly, then indirectly, has invaded nearly all of them. The modern musical composition counts Copernicus as well as Beethoven amongst its ancestors. But it is admitted, of course, that we are not usually reminded of astronomy in listening to music; there is a sense in which music, and many other things, are autonomous. But it is interesting to notice that science, to a greater extent than any other pursuit, can be isolated, although its historical direction has been influenced, of course, by social and political accidents. Science has given generously, but has taken comparatively little, and its few borrowings are in process of being handed back with regret as being, after all, unsuitable.

What, then, is the precise nature and extent of the contribution of science to our total stock? Although we do not intend its practical applications by this question, we cannot wholly ignore them. It is impossible completely to separate the "material" and "spiritual" aspects of life, and the sum of the practical applications of science has even profoundly affected much of our abstract thinking. Where it has not originated questions it has at least made them acute, if by no other process than by creating or transforming social conditions. It is easy to trace the ancestry of whole schools of social philosophy to the steam engine and the dynamo, and it is probable that the influence of future applications will be even more extensive. The morality, art and philosophy of, for example, a disease-less world where the average span of human life was two or three times its present value, would certainly differ greatly from our own. We cannot, then, ignore the practical applications of science, although they are not, in themselves, pertinent to our question. But when we turn to consider the direct spiritual value of science we are conscious, at the outset, of some hesitation.

It was a common article of the Victorian scientist's creed that scientific study was, in itself, an "ennobling" and purifying influence. He stressed the complete detachment required, in scientific research, from all prepossession; the man of science was completely candid, completely devoid in fact of the facts. Until one became as a little child it was no use entering a laboratory. We have realized since then that scientific men are human, and have their full share of the unfortunate characteristics proper to that state. But it remains true that the scientific ideal of detachment and the scientific ideal of evidence are higher than the corresponding ideals elsewhere. In spite of the evidence furnished by our newspapers we may, if we are optimists, believe that science is gradually infecting the whole community with its conception of these ideals. If this is indeed the case it must be counted a direct and very important moral gain, as indisputably valuable contribution which may be set over against those somewhat ambiguous practical applications. A third contribution is to be found in the large store of aesthetic objects provided by science. Many of its theories are objects of surpassing beauty. This is particularly true of the mathematical sciences—indeed, there are a number of mathematicians who have felt impelled to write about their science in a kind of prose-poetry—but the almost equally strong of such a science as Geology. We can contemplate schemes which, in their own way, are as all-embracing as that of the "Divina Commedia," and it does not detract from their aesthetic charm to know that they are also true. The processes by which the theories are obtained are often as aesthetically important as the theories themselves. A subtle, elaborate and economical piece of reasoning often affords great aesthetic pleasure, none the less real because comparatively few people enjoy it. The fact that the history of a big scientific investigation, such as the Electro-magnetic Theory or Einstein's Theory of Relativity, is not generally regarded as a poem is due merely to an accident of language and education. But we have to admit that most people are affected by these accidents, and that the aesthetic objects provided by science are not valued by our count almost as few admirers as do the "beauties" of chess. If we may judge from the number of popular books and articles dealing with science, there is some hope, however, that this particular contribution is receiving more attention. The results of such increased attention will not be simple, but if it did more than add fresh aesthetic objects, the contribution would be important.

The fourth contribution of science, both in itself and for its reaction on other interests, is perhaps the most important of all. This contribution is, put briefly, the light thrown by science on man's place in the universe. Every branch of science conspires directly to this end. With some the emphasis is on the universe as distinct from man; others are concerned chiefly with man himself. To the general mind the result has been to make the universe bigger and man smaller, and this is, perhaps, no unfair summary. It is probably difficult, after hearing a duet sung by an astronomer and a psycho-analyst, not to feel depressed. But, such as it is, there can be no doubt that any conception of man's destiny that is to command attention must conceive that destiny as played against the background of the scientific cosmos. Whether the vision be that of a prophet, philosopher or poet, it must accept those postulates. The cosmos revealed by science, both in its direct influence upon the mind and in its almost equally direct influence upon religion, philosophy and the arts, is the most important part of the scientific contribution to our spiritual life. So far as philosophers and artists are concerned, this influence is recognized. It is probably desirable that the influence upon philosophy should increase, but in the case of the artist we are faced with a special problem. Its discussion would be interesting, the more so in view of the fact that artists themselves have contributed very little that is helpful to its elucidation. We think it essential to its solution to remember that the artist, like the scientist, starts with facts. But the system within which the facts are related is entirely different in the two cases. The scientific scheme must, of course, be accepted by the artist en bloc if his work is to be more than a pure fantasy. But this is very different from identifying his own scheme with the scientific scheme. That is to fail signally to perceive the limitations of the scientific contribution. An interesting particular case of this problem is to be found in the question of the right relations of the psychological novelist to the science of psychoanalysis. A scientific investigation is often, as we have said, a work of art, but not necessarily a work of literary art. The scientific contribution is very considerable, but offerings from the older benefactors are still gratefully received.

SOCIETIES

LINNEAN.—April 15.—Dr. A. Smith Woodward, Vice-President, in the chair.

Professor W. Grant Craib was elected a Fellow, and Mr. Ernest W. Swanton an Associate.

Capt. F. Kingdon Ward gave an account of his “Natural History Exploration on the North-East Frontier of Burma,” which was illustrated by a series of lantern-slides. The Hon. Mr. H. L. Bullock, Dr. O. Stapf, and the President contributed additional remarks.

Mr. R. Paulson showed and discussed lantern-slides illustrating definite stages in the sporation of Gonidia within the thallus of the lichen Evernia Pneumati

A. Photographic

Rex Hazzledine

Royal

Society's

find

Pocock

the 1914.

of

S.

"1914.

King's

A

Justinian

Photographic

Rex

Hazzledine

Royal

find

Pocock

the 1914.

King's

A

Justinian

Photographic

Rex

Hazzledine

Royal

find

Pocock

the 1914.

King's

A

Justinian

Photographic

Rex

Hazzledine

Royal

find

Pocock

the 1914.

King's

A

Justinian

Photographic

Rex

Hazzledine

Royal

find

Pocock

the 1914.

King's

A

Justinian

Photographic

Rex

Hazzledine

Royal

find

Pocock

the 1914.

King's

A

Justinian

Photographic

Rex

Hazzledine

Royal

find

Pocock

the 1914.

King's

A

Justinian

Photographic

Rex

Hazzledine

Royal

find

Pocock

the 1914.

King's

A

Justinian

Photographic

Rex

Hazzledine

Royal

find

Pocock

the 1914.

King's

A

Justinian

Photographic

Rex

Hazzledine

Royal

find

Pocock

the 1914.

King's

A

Justinian

Photographic

Rex

Hazzledine

Royal

find

Pocock

the 1914.

King's

A

Justinian

Photographic

Rex

Hazzledine

Royal

find

Pocock

the 1914.

King's

A

Justinian

Photographic

Rex

Hazzledine

Royal

find

Pocock

the 1914.

King's

A

Justinian

Photographic

Rex

Hazzledine

Royal

find

Pocock

the 1914.

King's

A

Justinian

Photographic

Rex

Hazzledine

Royal

find

Pocock

the 1914.

King's

A

Justinian

Photographic

Rex

Hazzledine

Royal

find

Pocock

the 1914.

King's

A

Justinian

Photographic

Rex

Hazzledine

Royal

find

Pocock

the 1914.

King's

A

Justinian

Photographic

Rex

Hazzledine

Royal

find

Pocock

the 1914.

King's

A

Justinian

Photographic

Rex

Hazzledine

Royal

find

Pocock

the 1914.

King's

A

Justinian

Photographic

Rex

Hazzledine

Royal

find

Pocock

the 1914.

King's

A

Justinian

Photographic

Rex

Hazzledine

Royal

find

Pocock

the 1914.

King's

A

Justinian

Photographic

Rex

Hazzledine

Royal

find

Pocock

the 1914.

King's

A

Justinian

Photographic

Rex

Hazzledine

Royal

find

Pocock

the 1914.

King's

A

Justinian

Photographic

Rex

Hazzledine

Royal

find

Pocock

the 1914.

King's

A

Justinian

Photographic

Rex

Hazzledine

Royal

find

Pocock

the 1914.

King's

A

Justinian

Photographic

Rex

Hazzledine

Royal

find

Pocock

the 1914.

King's

A

Justinian

Photographic

Rex

Hazzledine

Royal

find

Pocock

the 1914.

King's

A

Justinian

Photographic

Rex

Hazzledine

Royal

find

Pocock

the 1914.

King's

A

Justinian

Photographic

Rex

Hazzledine

Royal

find

Pocock

the 1914.

King's

A

Justinian

Photographic

Rex

Hazzledine

Royal

find

Pocock

the 1914.

King's

A

Justinian

Photographic

Rex

Hazzledine

Royal

find

Pocock

the 1914.

Fine Arts
THE TWO CUBISMS
II.

The French painter has a total lack of imagination in the general sense of the word. He has no gift for creating in cold blood and without outside assistance even a modest image. The Saints of our cathedral doors are primarily portraits. The image-maker who wished to carve them turned to his neighbour and copied his face; he put his question immediately to nature, but he looked it with love so deep, with application so remarkable, and such a sense of unity, that the model, as it were, was separating itself miraculously from its vulgar blemishes, lightened of its terrestrial attributes, assumed those of a divinity. The idiom of the French artist is as generalized as that of the Italian, but, unlike that of the Italian, the French seeks its elements in the particular. It is not the richer for it; it seems less abundant, but it preserves from its humble origin I know not what fragrance, which, for a French heart, can never be replaced. Look at the "Virgin among the Rocks" at the Louvre or Leonardo's "St. John." If you have passed through the room of the French primitives, if you have looked for long at "L'homme assis verre de vin," the two faces of the Italian master will become intolerable in spite of their ideal beauty, because they are anonymous.

The attitude of the French artist has not varied since the Middle Ages, and it seems to me that his programme ought not to change from what it has been so long in spite of the impressionist renewal. It is this fidelity to the traditions of the race which has led the most patient of the Cubists, perhaps unconsciously, to turn to the external world. Their aim is essentially Cubist; they are always concerned to address themselves to the highest faculties of man, and if possible to uplift to the heavens every healthy understanding. But, in spite of Michael Angelo and Metzinger, it is from their senses that they wish to obtain a type of beauty. The picture remains for them a speculation of the spirit, but this speculation, instead of exercising itself upon pure figures, imagined, can only operate upon figures that arise from an emotion towards nature. It is not the glass or the plate in general which will inspire them, but the novel combination which arises for them out of this glass, that plate, perceived in an unexpected setting, which will modify their shapes and suggest an expressive geometry to the painter. Thus, whilst the pure Cubists start from a concept, the emotional Cubists, whom I long to call Cubist-impressionists, start from a sensation. If the first are idealists, the second are realists in the manner of Cézanne. Like Cézanne, it is by means of meditation on what is given by sensation that they wish to arrive at spirit and order; they desire to follow the counsel of the Master of Aix and "make of impressionism a durable thing like the art of the museums." The formula is good; in it Cézanne has defined painting for a century or two, and perhaps for longer still.

The group of emotional Cubists was not complete in the "Indépendants." De la Fresnaye, Delaunay, Le Fauconnier were not there. But there was Léger with a picture of a Paris street, where the walls, by reason of the animation given them by their covering of many-coloured posters, seemed to move; while the human beings, reduced to the condition of grey silhouettes, are absorbed by the dynamism of modern life. There was Gleizes with his circuses, where the dancers and the clowns radiate movements around them like waves. I have spoken of the plastic dreams of the pure Cubists which they project on to the objects. Here the object, street, circus, bar or harbour, exists before the dreams; it awakes them; it arouses them.

The opposition between the two groups is increased when one compares the quality of the light in their pictures. Just as the lighting of the pure Cubists is artificial and only for the intelligence, the illumination of the works of the second group is like that which envelops and caresses French painting alone. The painter from the le de France combines with vision, gifts of which I spoke a sense of atmosphere unique in the world. The impressionism of Monet, entirely visual, is a monstrous exaggeration of this particular gift. Claude, Watteau, and Corot, though they may construct their canvases like so much architecture, never stop till they have bathed the contours in soft luminous vapours.

Michael Angelo, Leonardo, Zurbaran, El Greco, on one side, Claude, Watteau and Corot on the other. . . . One can only choose between these admirable masters on sentimental grounds. It is not, therefore, to give precedence to state that the pure Cubists are becoming more and more vigorous in defence of their own side; and it is perhaps no treachery on my part, who have always been the apprethence of the work and, to add to the Cubists' definition of a picture the two following amendments:

"A picture is a geometrical construction taking its rise from a sensation, a geometrical construction dissolved in light."

André LHOTE.

EXHIBITIONS OF THE WEEK.

ROYAL SOCIETY OF BRITISH ARTISTS.—Spring Exhibition. ELDAR GALLERY.—Etchings, Woodcuts and Lithographs by French Artists.

PATTERSON & CARFAX.—Paintings by Malcolm Milne.

GREATOREX GALLERIES.—Water-Colours by Harry Morley.

GOUPIL GALLERY.—Paintings by the late Mabel Nicholson.

AGNEW & SONS.—Portraits by Harrington Mann.

CONNELL & SONS.—Etchings and Drypoints by Theodore Roussel.

The catalogue of the R.B.A. informs us that a donor of one hundred guineas to the Society is entitled to a free-admission ticket to the exhibitions for self and friends for life. The price strikes us as excessive for a very doubtful privilege. For the R.B.A. exhibitions are mediocre with a mediocrity that hurts. The pictures are not only mediocre in conception and execution; they are mediocre in intention, mediocre on principle. The men and women who produce these feeble approximations of obvious appearances year after year, glory in a mediocrity which protects them from critical attack.

The Eldar Gallery has resuscitated that forgotten artist Rodolphe Bresdin, whose lithographs and etchings De Banville described as "worlds to study, minute, complicated, enormous . . . detailed even to dementia, and rivalling nature by the infinitely tiny sought even to the atom." As De Banville's words suggest, Bresdin tried to capture nature in an almost incredibly fine mesh. His work is the product of an intense vision which filtered into the devices of organic forms, but missed the rhythm of the main growths, of an intense intelligence driven a little mad by poverty and neglect, and of an intense emotion dissipated in laborious trilling. There is nothing flashy or popular in Bresdin's art; it is impeccable in intention, and it represents the very best he can do. But Bresdin's best is very far from the best of Dürer, by whom he was evidently inspired. To the modern eye these etchings and lithographs seem much ado about next to nothing. Not because they are too intricate, but because the intricacy is not directed and controlled by a major design. The details are as it were parochial, self-sufficient, oblivious of the larger national claims of the picture as a whole. Bresdin's art moves us less than the crudely coloured lithographs of Vuillard, where the symbolic statements of the various forms are all inter-related, and dictated by the central design. Vuillard's prints here, "Terrasse de Café" and "Nature
THE BRITISH MUSIC SOCIETY

T HE objects of the British Music Society, which was founded about a year ago and is holding its first Congress in London next week, may be most conveniently summed up in the single word co-ordination.
It is working for the benefit of British music on much the same lines as the British Drama League is working for the theatre. It must not be supposed that the principal function of the society is to give concerts at which none but British music is performed. In 1911 there was held in London a congress of the now defunct International Musical Society. The London committee, being determined to show its foreign guests that England was just as musical as any other country, arranged a series of several concerts devoted solely to native works. It was, moreover, very properly anxious to be as broad-minded as possible, to avoid all suggestion of being associated with cliques, and to make its concerts representative of all styles and periods.
The result may be imagined. The concerts were intolerably long—and with the exception of the concert of antique music and the chamber concert of the youngest composers—tolerably tedious. The one orchestral work which, as far as I could gather, made a real impression on musicians from abroad, was Parry's Variations in E minor, and in selecting this as the best they certainly showed a very excellent dejudgment. But to many English musicians the interminable procession of native music brought a sense not of pride but of shame. It was a painful if salutary experience. We learned then, if we did not know it before, that if we loved English music, it was our first duty to chaste it.

When the British Music Society was first started,
I approached various musicians of my acquaintance with the suggestion that they should become members of it. I was almost invariably met with the reply: "Yes, no doubt it is a very admirable idea, but tell me frankly—if I join it, what do I get out of it? Will the Society perform my works or publish them for me?" The correct answer, I suppose, would have been for me to assume a serious demeanour and say: "You should join the British Music Society not for your own advantage, but in order to help others." Unfortunately my esprit d'escalier was not ready in time, and I found the question embarrassing.
And indeed I fear that few composers would have found that answer at all persuasive. They have very sound business instincts in most cases.

The British Music Society has shown solid commonsense in concerning itself mainly with other things. British Music means to it a good deal more than pushing the proxilities of Victorian composers before the noses of an unwilling public. It has realized, too, from the start that our musical life is not confined to the London concert-halls.
Its main activities will be very largely provincial. That this was the right policy to adopt has already been shown by the fact that a large number of provincial branches have been started and have set to work with a good deal more energy than London. The International Society in 1911 was able to draw upon plenty of money to spend.
The British Music Society is at present bent upon collecting money rather than spending it. Its concerts therefore are few in number, and the most important feature of its Congress will undoubtedly be its discussions. These are going to be severely practical in character, and the first goes to the root of what is one of the greatest obstacles to musical progress in the whole country. The word "co-ordination" was never more appropriate than in this connection, for if a number of persons are to join in the performance of a piece of music, the first requirement is that they shall all play and sing at the same pitch. London concert-goers hardly realize that the absence of a universal standard pitch is, in the provinces, a very serious difficulty. It is more than twenty-five years since the Philharmonic Society took what was in those days the very decisive and important step of abolishing the old high "concert pitch" and adopting officially the normal pitch which is now the standard of most London concerts. But outside London the average pitch has remained very much where it was before. The reason is entirely economic. It does not cost much to tune an ordinary pianoforte in doubt to Philharmonic pitch, but the expense of standardizing the pitch of every organ throughout the churches, chapels and town halls of the Empire is a much more serious matter, for it involves in many cases drastic alterations, shifting of pipes and to some extent the providing of new ones. The number of organs which stand at the old high pitch is, I believe, not so very great; the trouble is that they stand at all sorts of pitches. When the difference in pitch can be reckoned in tempered semitones all that is necessary is for the organist to transpose his part; but complete anarchy in pitch means that most of the orchestral instruments cannot do more than roughly approximate to playing in tune.

But this more hardened reaction has been not the Church but the Army. The Philharmonic Society might express the pious hope that its excellent example would be universally followed, but military bands throughout the Army went on playing and still play at the old high pitch. The manufacturers of musical instruments have no choice but to conform to this practice. If the War Office had decreed in 1894 that every military band was to play at Philharmonic pitch, there would have been a loud outcry not only from the persons who had to bear the expense of providing a complete set of new instruments, but also from the manufacturers who would have found themselves left with large stocks of the old ones on their hands. Moreover, the second-hand shops would be flooded with the discarded musical instruments, and as the majority of players, amateur and professional, begin their studies on a second-hand instrument which they can buy cheap, there would have been every probability that amateur bands and orchestras in the provinces, and in London too, would have been obliged to continue at the high pitch.

The military question is of enormous importance, for there are innumerable orchestras all over the country which depend on military assistance for their wind instruments at concerts. Apart from such institutions as the Royal Academy, the Royal College of Music and the analogous music schools in the large cities, the Army is the main source from which the vast percentages of our best bandmasters receive their musical education. And the problem which the War Office could not bring itself to face a generation ago has now increased enormously in difficulty, owing partly to the greater demand for orchestral music all over the country and still more to the enormous increase in the cost of musical instruments. If the British Music Society can induce the joint efforts of Mr. Albert Coates and the Director of Kneller Hall to bring forth a solution of this problem, it will have been indeed the salvation of its country's music.

EDWARD J. DENT

THE TEACHING OF MUSIC. By Robert T. White, Mus. Doc. (Constable. 4s. net.)—This little volume should be of assistance to teachers. It does not profess to supplant existing manuals or to elaborate a detailed system of training; it is simply a series of suggestions as to the best methods of teaching music in High Schools, the principles on which the various classes should be graded, and the most profitable way of allocating the time to each respective branch of the subject without encroaching on the general curriculum. The suggestions are of a business-like nature, and so long as teachers do not expect to find in a text-book a substitute for a course of practical training, they can safely be recommended to devote a few hours to the consideration of Dr. White's remarks.

THE BACH FESTIVAL

It is, of course, impossible to pack anything like a representative selection of Bach into four evenings; the Cantatas and the organ works alone (to name no others) could each provide material enough for twice that number of performances, and still leave all but the surface untouched. As regards the actual volume of work done, Dr. Allen did wonders with the time at his disposal, and to criticize his selection would be to search in the grounds of individual preference would serve no useful purpose. One might observe, however, that one of the chief objects of such a festival is to give the public an opportunity of hearing works it would not otherwise hear, and that works habitually found in the ordinary concert-giver's repertory should for this reason be excluded as far as practicable. The first of the four concerts will serve to illustrate this point. The programme as it stood was long—quite long enough to justify an abridgment of the "Adeste Fideles" with which it concluded. But by omitting "My Heart Ever Faithful" and the Concerto for two violins, sufficient time could have been saved to admit of the Cantata being given in its entirety. Similarly on the Monday, the omission of the Choral Fantasia (a selection of its familiarity; we are not here concerned to question its attractiveness as a piece of music) would have made it possible to enlarge the very inadequate selection of the organ works given during the festival.

Turning to the actual performances, one was most struck, perhaps, by the unusual rapidity of the tempi throughout. Up to a point this was a virtue; it lent a touch of brutality that served as a corrective to the rather woolly atmosphere of devotion that is often generated on these high occasions. But on the opening night we must say frankly that Dr. Allen allowed his anti-sentimentalism to run away with his; he set the pace so hot that on two occasions at least the soloists (the particular soloists concerned were Mr. Adams and Mr. Murray Davey) were left floundering helplessly. Mr. Adams had never shaped well to the work, but Mr. Davey's misunderstanding was very regrettable, as he had addressed himself to the task of bruising the serpent's head with the utmost gusto, and would obviously have made a thoroughly efficient job of it if he had been allowed a reasonable time to do it in. The best performance, on the whole, was that of the B minor Mass. Here the tempi were still as a rule on the fast side, but not unduly so, whilst the solo work was on a far higher level than on the first evening. Mr. Gervase Elwes sang more like himself than we have heard him do for some time past, Miss Mann and Miss Lilian Berger showed that the practice of madrigal-singing has developed in them an unusual instinct for clearness of phrasing and flexibility of rhythm, although Miss Mann's voice is of rather too light a character for solo work of this type.

We have purposely kept the choir to the end, because they were the mainstay of the festival. They have improved out of all recognition, and their peculiar strength lies just where it is most seldom found—in the alto, whose tone came through splendidly all the time, without ever becoming obtrusive. But the whole choir did well. Occasionally an entry lacked incisiveness, and the volume of their tone is not such as to get the maximum of effect from numbers like the final chorus and fugue in "Sing Ye to the Lord." But in quality of tone, in discipline, in the art of obtaining effects of contrast and climax by means of subtle dynamic adjustments, they showed themselves worthy of high praise, and nowhere were these qualities more in evidence than where they are most required—in the "Crucifixus" of the Mass. The present Bach Choir and its conductor deserve well of one another.

R. O. M.
CONCERTS

Drama

SHAKESPEARE AT STRATFORD

THE ATHENÆUM

A new Spanish violinist, Mr. Manuel Quiroga, gave a recital on April 14. He commanded a significant technique with a tone-quality that, though only moderate in power, is curiously penetrating. His sudden changes of tempo, especially in a concerto of Mozart, were bewildering, and seemed equally bewildering to Mme. Quiroga, who acted as his not very competent accompanist. In spite of this Mr. Quiroga’s playing was always musically correct, and completely free from mannerisms or false sentimentality. He played the slow movements of Tartini’s “Trillo del Diavolo” and Schumann’s Romance in A with real feeling, while in Granados’ intensely passionate Spanish Dance in E minor he maintained a dignified restraint that made it all the more expressive.

Miss Floræa Woodman, who gave a concert with the Albert Hall orchestra (under the direction of Mr. Landon Ronald) on April 21, is a young lady with a light soprano voice and a beaming smile. How far she is dowered with musical intelligence one could hardly judge, for her programme consisted mainly of light songs and operatic excerpts in which temperamental manifestations would have been out of place. All one can say is that she has been carefully trained, has some instinct for coloratura, and keeps passably (though by no means perfectly) in tune. She had the support of a large and enthusiastic audience, which was not content with rapt silence to Grétry and Rossini, and chattered relentlessly throughout the orchestral pieces. This was unfortunate, as the orchestral items, which included the Overture to “Figaro,” “L’Après-Midi,” and Buttermoot’s “Shropshire Rhapsody,” formed by far the most interesting part of the programme, and first-rate performances were given by Mr. Ronald.

The chief impression carried away by us after hearing Miss Olga Haley’s recital of modern English song, at the Steinway Hall, on April 22, was that of a sensible diminution of our patriotic enthusiasm. It was not Miss Haley’s fault, for though there is no compelling magic about her, she is an intelligent and accomplished singer. And her programme looked interesting enough on paper; it contained most of the contemporary names that have made us what we are (whatever that may be) and several others besides. Also, it contained (as every recital programme should do) some four or five new songs. Yet (if one must be frank) there were not more than three or four at most out of the whole lot that one would ever wish to hear again, whilst the new compositions proved woefully undistinguished both in workmanship and idea. It is still, apparently, a difficult matter to form a satisfactory all-English song programme without calling the Elizabethan and Restoration periods to one’s aid.

As a matter of fact, our own songs usually sound best when there is a foreign mixture with which to contrast them, and this applies equally to foreign songs. It is well for singers to bear this tactical consideration in mind when building up their programmes.

The recital given by Mr. Francis Buckley, at Wigmore Hall, on April 22, was a combination of real singing with music which was on the whole unfamiliar and interesting. Mr. Buckley has a light tenor voice of great range and beauty, with an ease of production which other singers might envy and certainly ought to cultivate. The programme began with two Bach arias with string quartet, and was followed by a group of Brahms songs which few members of the audience had heard before. Nowadays people listen to Brahms for his merits, not for his music. They can make an audience for songs as fresh and as exquisitely sung as these. The English group was not so attractive as it might have been. The exception was Mr. Nicholas Gatty’s “Away, away from men and towns,” a song full of poetry, and one in which the words had really been set to music.

Mr. Albert Coates is as yet hardly known in this country as a composer, and it was interesting to have him represented at the last of the London Chamber Concerts, on April 22, by two short pieces bearing the titles “Angelas” and “Lacrasmia.” They were both reticent and expressive, with something of that thoughtful and introspective quality which is characteristic of the latest works of Liszt. Miss Myra Hess played them with exquisite delicacy.

To enjoy a Shakespeare Festival at Stratford demands a more indomitable resolution of character than that possessed by the shrewd Englishman, who consists of a good many things besides Shakespeare, of hotels and weather and food and fellow-mortals. Moreover these variables have a way of obscuring the constant. Tempers are as much exacerbated by damp and lumpy beds as they are mollified by Shakespeare’s poetry; and the resulting consciousness is not in the least festive. On the contrary.

If we have much to say in praise of the Shakespeare Company which is at present performing in the Memorial Theatre, it is not to be interpreted as an encouragement to any ordinarily fragile member of society to go there. He had far better wait until he can see the plays in comfort. Nothing could be more utterly alien to the genius of Shakespeare than the disciplinary purification of the flesh which is imposed on the Stratford playgoer in the first week of the festival. William himself would not have put up with it for a day. Bard of Avon, indeed! He would elect to be, what he is, the playwright of London; and the sooner the English nation realizes that the only place where a Shakespeare memorial theatre can fitly be is London, the better for everybody except the proprietors of the Stratford hotels.

There are things to see at Stratford: there is the grave and the bust. Better still, there is the exquisite grammar-school where (pace the legalists) Shakespeare was educated. But you do not need a festival in order to see them. A day is enough. Choose a fine one, slip away as quickly as you can; if you require a day of festivity wait for the Mop-fair. The affable familiar ghost of William may very likely be watching the gravy trickle from the spit to the gutter; he will assuredly never be found inside the New Place Museum with its assortment of colossal apocrypha. He might conceivably hover round the red-brick jubilee-style theatre: but his purpose would be arson.

No, if he were to find anywhere in the festival, it would be in the little hall of the coffee tavern where in the morning the actors of the company do that mysterious thing—”a run over for the words.” There he would have had the daily chance to find himself among friends. For whatever we may have subsequently to put forward by way of criticism, the members of Mr. Bridges Adams’ company are keen, and as far removed as Shakespeare himself from being precious. There is a nucleus which, with reasonable support from the public, may restore and strengthen a decent tradition of Shakespeare acting. Let there be two, three, four such companies; and every fair-sized town in England could have a month of Shakespeare every year, and London itself Shakespeare all the year round. We wish to assure Mr. Adams and every actor working with him of one sincere admiration for their common achievement; we leave it to them to decide whether our criticism is as helpful as it is intended to be.

We assume that they have definitely in view the creation of a tradition of Shakespeare acting. It is essential, we think, that the aim should be quite conscious. For consciousness in this matter imposes obligations that may be evaded or ignored if the tradition is allowed to create itself. First, in the matter of the text. The aim should be to give as much actual Shakespeare as is humanly possible. Mr. Adams has already worked heroically to this end. His realistic scenery is as simple as scenery of the kind can be; the shifting of it is less laborious, and involves much less delay than is generally the case. But delay there is still. Precious time is lost; precious illusions are shattered. We believe it is a mistake to assume that the public insists on realistic scenery. If Mr. Adams had been present at the Phoenix Society’s production of "The Fair Maid of the West" a month ago he would have seen how perfect an illusion can be created by a sufficiently adaptable single scene. That method would permit us to have more, if not the whole, of the text. We admit, however, that the whole may still be impossible. Cuts will have to be made. The ghost of the man who spent a good many hours of his life cutting his own and other people’s plays would certainly not object on principle. The question is how to cut.

Mr. Adams and his company were rushed. They had not enough time for rehearsal. It is therefore a little unreasonable to assume that all the omissions which we noticed were deliberate; if, however, most of them were, we should say that there was a tendency to drop out some of the more exquisite poetry. We do not pretend to remember Shakespeare perfectly; but on more than one occasion in listening to a speech we had a queer, uncomfortable sensation of having been deprived of the key-words, of a half-appeal to the imagination having been substituted for a whole. And generally we found that lines of the purer poetry had been dropped. In the "Merchant of Venice" Arragon dropped (besides other things) "the fond multitude".

Which priess not to the interior, but like the martlet
Builds in the weather on the outward wall
Even in the force of wind and darkness. . . .

More remarkable still, in "Richard II." John of Gaunt was allowed to drop, from the speech which every schoolboy has to learn, the lines:

Renowned for their deeds as far from home—
For Christian service and true chivalry—
As is the sepulchre in stubborn Jewry
Of the world’s ransom, blessed Mary’s son.

We could choose many other like examples; we, therefore, incline to believe on examination that Mr. Adams has been engaged in paring rather than cutting Shakespeare. We understand the temptation. To shave off a little here, a little there, induces in a producer the comfortable feeling of giving more of Shakespeare than his fellows. It does, in fact, enable him to give more scenes. But the paring method must be used with very great care. For ourselves, we should prefer a bold and openly-avowed cut. Still, if the paring is so contrived that we are not made unceasingly aware of being deprived of something essential, we have no serious objection to offer. But we insist that he maximum of time must first be gained by a far more ruthless simplification of scenery. Mr. Adams may then cut or pare to get within that maximum; and we suggest he would do well to consult a few of the less pedantic literary critics on the matter. His position is full of responsibility; it would be only reasonable that he should develop a little of it.

How far the actors themselves should be permitted to have a voice in deciding the question of the text depends upon the individual actor. There are actors in the company, one conspicuously, whose opinion on the matter would be well worth having; there are others (very often excellent actors) who obviously can only be made to learn and remember. But we are convinced that the general question needs more consideration in detail than Mr. Adams has yet been able to devote to it.

The question of the text leads directly to that of the conception of the varied characters, for in one case at least the cutting has been done in order to justify a conception of character which is in patent opposition to that which arises from the undecorated text. The question of character, in turn, leads swiftly to the consideration of the more outstanding actors, for an actor of great gifts is beyond the control of any director. Such an actor can set the precise emotional key of his rendering at will, even though he is outwardly obedient to direction. Thus he may contribute as much to the forming of a tradition of Shakespeare-acting as the director himself; he may give more. Beyond a certain point to which keen and obedient competence may attain, the subtleties of interpretation depend upon the amount of insight possessed by the director and the actor. If the actor’s perceptions are more exquisite, he will carry the day, and shape the tradition.

M.

(To be concluded.)

THAT HUMAN TOUCH

KENNINGTON THEATRE.—"Ned Kean of Old Drury." By Arthur Shirley.

THERE is an uninterrupted break in the voice; it lasts through three acts and well on into the third scene of the fourth. The Times declares that Kean’s success was due to "the human touch." A great many things have since been due to its introduction into British art, letters and theatricals. The Morning Post says that the play is based on the "healthy relations of life," and only those who occasionally assume the Morning Post can gather the full aroma of this pronouncement.

Despite these misfortunes and an incomparable array of linguistic clichés, Mr. Saintsbury, at the end of the third act, sweeps his audience off its feet or its seats, or whatever else one is supposed to say an audience is swept off, when an actor manages to disperse the little clots of egocentric insensitiveness and impose a single emotion on his auditors.

Le roman historique. II y a aussi la peinture historique, l’architecture historique, et, à la mi-carême, le costume historique.

The trouble with the catch-in-the-voice stage manner, the raw emotion, the soft music, the highest conceivable virtues, demarked utterly from the antipodal blackness in this play, is not, at bottom, that life isn’t just as raw, or that the emotion didn’t occur; it lies in what is perhaps a misconception of scale, and a misconception of Elizabethan fashions. We repeat that the painted phrase, the "multitudinous seas incarnadine," was to the Elizabethan era what an epigram was to the "nineties." It was a society fashion that spread. Yet Launce does not parley Euphues to his dog.

The transition, or rather the lack of transition, from quoted Shakespeare to the swinging and florid families which Mr. Shirley has put in the mouth of the landlady detracts from the full effect of "Ned Kean." Historic research would indeed have been needed to present the era of "Classic" stage tradition when, possibly, actors tried to talk like Greek Gods, as the eighteenth century did conceive them. In 1813 people may have talked as Mrs. Barbauld wrote, but we somewhat doubt it. To "reproduce" the early days of romanticism and Rousseauism, all that is done in this play is to relapse into slightly demodified manners of speech and of speaking, into eloquence and floridity, and to make them a shade more plausible by choosing, in the first place, an actor of 1813, and, in the second, by presenting him tipsy.

In "Trelawny of the Wells," we had a closer-knit argument for plays and stage presentations which "remind one of someone," i.e., someone living. Mr. Shirley’s people remind one chiefly of people on stages, as the scenery reminds one of hunting prints and of Christmas cards. On the other hand, the piece is well designed to display Mr. Saintsbury’s varied assortment of capacities; one wonders whether he has been born a generation too late, and if he would not have been received as a great actor in the sixties of the last century. He is indubitably an actor of parts, and one can scarcely register an adverse judgment on people while they are being constrained to say "Under the Devonshire daisies" and other phrases of that timbre and donation.

POLITICS

Ambassadors Theatre.—"The Grain of Mustard Seed." By H. M. Harwood.

MR. HARWOOD and his actresses produce a certain atmosphere in the opening scene of his play; Mr. Kerr, Mr. Gordon, Mr. Gill, and Mr. Caine are convincing in their several roles of Rt. Hon. Lord Markham, M.P., election agent, rural individualist, and chauffeur; and there are several dozen good bits and well-turned phrases. The hero ascends from infant's food into politics, and again we find the paraphernalia of a problem play, although Mr. Harwood is almost as chary of coming to grips with the problem as is the gently satirized Lord Markham. The author goes so far as to allow his hero to say something rather vague about decentralized and to indicate finance as the root of the question. Possibly no more technical or incisive modus would be stageable in the present state of the theatre.

As a play of manners, the male part of the piece is entertaining, the leading feminine element raises doubts. The little sermons and disquisitions are damaging.

TOUCH

Haymarket Theatre.—"Mary Rose." By Sir J. M. Barrie.

The human touch at the Kemington is by no means so touching as Sir J. M. Barrie's touch at the Haymarket. Indubitably Mr. Thesiger and Mr. Loraine and Miss Compton, and indeed all the cast, act extremely well, and there is considerable cleverness interspersed in the play, which, on the whole, a fine example of what is wrong with the English stage. In perspective "Ned Keen" appears an earnest if somewhat florid and unsophisticated attempt to present the reality of grief, struggle, poverty; "The Grain of Mustard Seed" leaves a memory of dry, clean humour; "Mary Rose" leaves the feeling that the pudding and soup have been served simultaneously in the same plate. It is an argument for the "classic" belief that the matter of poetic tragedy should not be dished up in sentimental-comedy clothes. Pudding good in its way; soup good in its way; and Sir James quite amusing, only he should leave folk-lore to Mr. Yeats, and tragedy to some writer who has a trace of austerity.

"Nec puella proper sui simpliciatem, ut mamma et babbo, male et patre," wrote an estimable poet in the old days. Sir James will talk baby-talk, and, of course, a great many people like it. A writer, who must be near the great heart of a West-End audience, says the play is "Peter Pan grown up," "Barrie at his best," "and that means great achievement." With the first two statements we agree; the third we must take as an indication of the state of public criterion. Part of the tedium is due to parenthetic construction, but admirers of Sir James will readily pardon this, in return for Mr. Thesiger's acting of Cameron, and for Mr. Forbes', Mary Jerrold's and Mr. Whitby's realization of Victorian atmosphere. It is a "sweet" and "lovely" play, and the effect of the cinema on Georg Kaiser has probably been more salutary than its effect upon Sir James Barrie.

T. J. V.

A REVERSION TO STEREOTYPE

Shaftesbury Theatre.—"The Little Whopper" (Musical Comedy).

OTHER times, not necessarily other manners... The attempted resuscitation of musical comedy proceeds apace, mainly by the labour of Messrs. Grossmith and Laurillard. Had the titles of recent productions been "The Silver Slipper" and "Floradora" instead of "Kissing Time" and "The Little Whopper," we could imagine with no difficulty at all that we were returned to the days, the very palmy days, belonging to Tom B. Davis and George Edwardes, of blissful and apparently irresistible memory. And this is exactly as it ought to be. For, like every other hybrid form of stage development, musical comedy has its distinct audience that, as recent experiments have proved, does not accept any digression or advancement from the afore-mentioned specimen of a previous decade. There is to be the same pretence at a plot which doesn't matter; the same energetic, and often pathetic effort on the part of the several principals to behave as if they enjoyed performing together when their chief motive all the time is to shine separately—gaining a personal advantage over the rest and in their absence by breaking into song on the slightest provocation; the same bright and vociferous choruses that may be contributing usefully to the general bustling effect, but whose individual gestures will not withstand a moment's examination; and, what is perhaps the major distinction of musical comedy, the same tremendous diligence for three hours on the part of everybody to make the comedy as unmusical as might be. If any novelty should chance to intrude upon such a stereotyped entertainment, it is not in the form, but in the byplay of the principal and therefore slightly privileged comedian. "The Little Whopper" is made distinctive by one original feature alone— and one that deservedly distinguishes it. The leading, and, as it happens, the only comedian is a sentimental valet whose secret talent is the writing of songs and the setting of them to music. One of these is introduced at the beginning of the piece in very burlesque fashion, but gradually its nature changes, and by the end of the performance it has become the musical number on which the whole love interest depends. The idea is delightfully introduced and developed by Mr. Davy Burnaby, who makes a droll valet, and with whom the honours of the evening are shared by the very hardworking Miss Lily St. John. If everyone concerned in the production is capable—and of this there is no doubt whatever—especially so are these two latest in the constellation of stars whose centre was the old Gaiety and whose orbit has since extended all round the town.

MISS CHAPLIN'S DANCES AT THE OLD VIC

There was a fine leap through time at the Old Vic on the first Tuesday of its Shakespearian festival. Miss Nellie Chaplin once again revived the old dances which, with a discrimination that is in itself an art, she has selected from the collection of over seven hundred examples published in the seventeenth century by John Playford. The charm of the rendering by the Chaplin Trio and their assistants is not merely historical; there is a direct poetic appeal in nearly every dance, and certainly in the well-chosen and visiably atmospheric music that accompanies them—the appeal, we may add that characterizes the dancing itself. It is indeed rare that our modern dancers can set forth such a long series of beautiful movements with the purpose of showing what they themselves like in them, and yet be able to give an authentic stamp to each of their presentations. That there is a powerful element of personality in simple taste was shown by such amusing and dainty affairs as "The Merry Mocet" and "Kettledrum," and it was interesting to note how since the harmonic sense has outrun the melodic and rhythmic sense in dance music the individualities of dancers have merged until elasticity has become more or less impossible. We cannot doubt, all the same, that were present-day conventionalists to turn their interest in the direction of these pavanes, galliards, and minuets, so rich in scope as they still remain, we should find a swift recovery of the old silken flexibility. We might, in truth, detect such a desirable and much-needed quality often, even as things are, as it is definitely to be found in our unsophisticated, unsnobbish children dancing to the hurdy-gurdy at the pavement edge, if we could take our dancers unaware.

T. M.

Correspondence

LORD ACTON AND LIBERTY

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sir,—The reviewer of Mr. Fisher’s essays states (April 16, p. 510) that “it is difficult . . . . to decide what exactly Lord Acton meant by liberty.” The difficulty is that of turning to p. 3 of “The History of Freedom, and other Essays,” where Lord Acton writes:

By liberty I mean the assurance that every man shall be protected in doing what he believes his duty against the influence of authority and majorities, custom and opinion. The State is competent to assign duties and draw the line between good and evil only in its immediate sphere. Beyond the limits necessary for its well-being, it can only give indirect help to fight the battle of life by promoting the influences which prevail against temptation—religion, education, and the distribution of wealth. In ancient times the State absorbed authorities not its own, and intruded on the domain of personal freedom. In the Middle Ages it possessed too little authority, and suffered others to intrude. Modern States fall habitually into both excesses.

Yours faithfully,

G. E. Fasnacht.

The Hollies, Chayton Bridge, Manchester,
April 17, 1920.

Our reviewer writes: “Lord Acton’s definition of liberty, as set forth by Mr. G. E. Fasnacht, to whom I am much obliged for calling my attention to it, is obscure, but does not advance matters much. It is really a counsel of perfection, since the conscientious objector is to be free to play, but authority is at the same time to hold its own in certain spheres, including the distribution of wealth. Now the distribution of wealth by taxation can obviously act unjustly on individuals. Are they to be ‘protected’ in their resistance? and if so, where is it all to end? Lord Acton was at heart a strong individualist, but, conscious of the complexities of modern life, he shrank from pushing his conclusions to their extremity.”—L. S.

SHAKESPEARE’S WELSH CHARACTERS

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sir,—It is hardly necessary to refer, as does Mr. J. Logie Robertson in his article “Scottish Dialect in Early English Literature” (Athenæum, April 16), to Shakespeare’s Warwickshire home, after all very near Wales, in order to account for his familiarity with Welsh character and Welshmen’s English. There were many Welshmen in London during Elizabeth’s reign: one or two Welsh poets—Mr. Logie Robertson suggests two—may have written in Welsh—spent much time there; and references to Welshmen, even bits of Welsh speech, are not uncommon in the Elizabethan drama. There seem even, if we may judge by names, to have been several Welshmen among the actors of the time. Scottsmen too were numerous after James I.’s accession, but were presumably not so plentiful when Shakespeare was writing “Henry V.”

The point is not perhaps very important: but it is as well not to indulge in fanciful conjectures about Shakespeare’s boyish experiences when the facts can easily be accounted for by less hazardous means.

I am, etc.,

H. Idris Bell.

EDWARD DE VERE AND SHAKESPEARE

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sir,—Will you allow me to correct a misrepresentation of the contents of my work, “Shakespeare Identified,” which appeared in your issue for April 16? On his own admission, he [Mr. Looney] merely recapitulates the negative arguments of the Baconians.

My pages contain no such admission; and no Baconian would, I think, venture to make such a claim upon my anti-Stratfordian arguments. Indeed, several of these arguments cut almost as deeply into the Baconian theory as into the Stratfordian. Others are based upon an orthodox work which had just been published. I give many facts which I have certainly never met with in any Baconian literature, whilst facts which Baconians have previously pointed out, I have analysed and correlated in quite a different way. And in matters of evidence the whole of the point of an argument may depend upon these interpretative processes. The reason advanced for The Athenæum’s attitude to my work I take to be this: because, in the reviewer’s opinion, the Baconians have not proved that Shakespeare did not write the plays, my work was not entitled to be examined and exactly represented, but only to be derided.

It is common knowledge that many well-known men, who are no Baconians, have expressed publicly their disbelief in the orthodox views, and even Stratfordians have felt the weakness of their position, to which they have clung sometimes no doubt, for want of a better hypothesis to replace the old one. Now that a theory has been advanced which opponents have acknowledged generally to be the most plausible alternative yet presented, it is surely not in the best interests of our national literature that such a theory should be cavalierly brushed aside.

J. Thomas Looney.

THE FIRST FOLIO POEM INITIALLLED “I. M.”

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sir,—I beg leave to report in your columns, with regard to the arguable traces of sub-surface signalling in the prefatory matter of the First Folio described by me in the issues of your journal for February 8 and March 5, that I have received communications therefrom from Sir Sidney Lee, Sir J. Gollancz, Dr. W. L. Courtney, and four other well-known Shakespeareans, but no challenge of the coincidences put forward for consideration.

Perhaps, too, you will allow me to seize the opportunity to give particulars of an as yet untold coincidence which quite clearly should be taken into account at the same time.

I have shown, Sir, that there exist in I. M.’s poem traces of signalling both by the word numerical values as such, and also by the digit addition totals or cross sums of the word numerical values. But without question the more important section of the described discoveries has been the digital section, while both sections have been based upon the words and values corresponding to the squares of half a chess-board.

I have hitherto assumed that experiment with the words and values corresponding to the squares of half a chess-board is, on my supposition that sub-surface signalling more or less associated with chess-board mathematics may have been arranged in this poem of chess-board depth placed next before the only Shakespearean play mentioning the game of Chess, sufficiently indicated by the fact that some of the eight lines contain less than eight words. There is very strong supplemental reason for so thinking in the fact that the digit addition total or cross sum of the positional numbers of the squares forming half a chess-board, 1 to 32 is 177—the equivalent of the poet’s publication name William Shakespeare. Further, according to the cipher key 24 is the letter-number code, and one of the two factors in the digital colour-of-square duplication coincidence described by me.

Respectfully yours,

Ravenwood,
45, Sutton Court Road,
Chiswick.
Foreign Literature

THE PILGRIMAGE OF PEACE

At the close of the third century A.D. the Emperor Aurelius Probus remarked: "In a short time we shall not want any more soldiers." On which a contemporary author comments: "No more Roman soldiers! Everywhere the State will rule, everywhere be secure. The world will cease to manufacture armaments and furnish supplies. The ox will be kept at the plough, the horse be bred for peace. There will be no wars, no prisoners, but everywhere peace, everywhere the law and justice of Rome." A century or so later Rome fell to the Goths, and for more than a millennium peace was a precarious episode in a world dedicated, by necessity and by choice, to war.

The causes of that long-drawn catastrophe were specific, and not such as are likely to recur. Overpopulation, climatic change, or other events of which we are imperfectly informed, set armed tribes on the march in search of new homes. One displacing another involved the mass in motion, and the waves of troubous sea beat incessantly on the frontiers of the empire. A breach was made, first here, then there, closed, burst open again, until at last the waters flowed in irresistible. During the long process of settling down that followed freemen were converted into vassals or serfs, heads of tribes into kings, and men pasturing or hunting, and fighting only by the way, into men whose only object and ideal war was. Feudalism took the place of the Roman State; and feudalism meant the consecration of the soldier's life. Warriors were now a professional class; and if there had been no occasions for war they would have had to make them, for otherwise they would have had to create war at all. The brute fact was thus converted into an ideal, and the European spirit inculcated with that romanticism of war from which, even now, we have hardly begun to free ourselves.

At last the feudal anarchy subsided, and the world we know began to emerge. But it was a world not, like the Roman, of one State, but of many. And war now received a new meaning. The mask in which it clothed its savage countenance was not now loyalty, but, first, dynastic interest, then patriotism. The necessity for war had passed, but the bad habit persisted, and where once wandering tribes had sought subsistence and adventure, kings and nations sought territory and power. The memory of the Roman unity, symbolized so long by Emperor and Pope, ceased to haunt even the dreams of men, and the Peace of Westphalia formally affirmed a world of competing States related only by war.

Through all these troubled centuries—looming so large in our perspective, yet, in fact, forming so brief an episode in the life of Man—reason and speculation did not cease, like a lighthouse in a storm, to twinkle and blink upon the tumultuous darkness. In the earlier period it is the Christian Church that handles the problem of war. Primitive Christians had condemned it, and many of them had refused military service. But by becoming an institution in the world, the Church had become its accomplice. War indeed, like slavery, it condemned in principle; for man unfallen did not fight. But with sin came war into the world, and evil though it be, it may be a means to good. After all, like everything else, it is the will of God, and may be regarded as a revelation of His Providence. To Dante, for instance, the history of Rome is one long ordeal by battle, and her victories the proof of the justice of her cause. The view outlives the Middle Ages, and finds in Carlyle and Treitschke its latest, if not its last exponent. The illusion that the cause that triumphs must be just dies hard. But if justice can and does triumph in war, then there must be just wars; and that there are, is an almost universally accepted axiom, down to our own time. It is, indeed, occasionally admitted that each party always thinks its own cause just. "It is the nature of war," says Alberico Gentile, "that each side shall pretend that its cause is just. That is due to the weakness of our human nature. But it is thought that there are objective tests of justice. They are the same as those about which our polemics still turn. A "defensive" war is just. But then, when is a war defensive? For it is seen that an apparently aggressive war may really be "preventive." A further definition therefore is suggested. The proof that a belligerent's cause is just must be supplied by his readiness, before having recourse to arms, to submit the issue to arbitration. The idea is already in Dante: "When it is a question of war all means should first be tried in the way of award, and only in the last resort should the way of battle be tried." In the Middle Ages there was in existence a world-authority that might have taken over the arbitration of all questions of great importance and move to dwell on the cases where Popes have acted as judges between princes. But that recourse was always precarious; and the dissolution of Christendom made impossible.

The idea of a preliminary arbitration indicates, nevertheless, the right road. The problem of war is political, not ethical or religious. Men fight originally not about right or wrong, but about food and drink and women. They begin to steal because it is the only way of getting what they want, and they go on stealing because they prefer it to working. This is the fundamental fact, and it is the duty of all those who fear and abhor feudalism or war to fight, first and foremost, because he lived by fighting, and would lose his position and his livelihood if fighting ceased. On that foundation rested the whole edifice of chivalry. The Crusades were not really wars for religion. The Holy Places merely supplied an excuse for an activity which would have expended itself otherwise in secular wars in Europe. And right down to our own time, behind all the talk and pretence, the real cause and object of war is theft. If any one doubts this let him look through the long series of treaties that have concluded wars for the last three centuries. He will find that they are all concerned with taking away territory from one State and transferring it to another. And he will find no exception in that respect in the treaties that concluded, after a war professing to be nothing but a war for Right.

Is there then no foundation for the idealism that has become associated with war? Not altogether so. For whatever be the object of a war, however grossly material, yet, for any nation, defeat in war will mean, or will seem to mean, a threat to its own national tradition. There is, perhaps, much illusion about this, for, in the things that matter to civilization, the conquered has often defeated the conqueror—as Greece did Rome. Still, this rally to the defence of the national tradition will never seem ignoble. It must be remembered, however, that the nobility is equal in the citizens on both sides, for however the war started, and whoever was technically the aggressor, it will have the same consequences to the defeated. It may be said, then, that whatever the real purpose of a war (and that, we insist, is always loot and power) the citizens fighting it are, to their own minds, always fighting in a holy cause. In one sense they are deceived, in another not. And in no case are they hypocrites. The situation, none the less, and indeed all the more, is terrible, to all save those (surely a diminishing number!) who judge war to be a good thing in itself. There is no way out, except to end the general condition in which one State or another can think it worth while to be an aggressor, and all must, therefore, always fear aggression. What is required to end that is a recognized tribunal to which States first can, next will, last must, submit their disputes, recompense for force being arrested until that tribunal has decided.

There is the key to the problem. And in the long list of thinkers and writers on war and peace one or two stand out in relief who have firmly grasped it. Of these the most interesting included in our author's survey is Emiric de Cruce (born 1590). Like the other "humanists" of his time, he recalls men to their humanity:

Many find their triumph in explaining the mysteries of religion and proving them by irrefragable authority against unbelievers. That is good. But before all things it is necessary to uproot that vice which is the most common of all and the root of the rest, viz., Inhumanity.

Of that inhumanity, war is the crowning example and proof. With unusual perspicacity the author proceeds to analyse its causes and to unravel the tangle of sophistries in which they are disguised. Others, however, have done that, though few so ably. Cruce's originality is in his proposals for the maintenance of peace. He sketches an "assembly" (the very word used in the Covenant of the League of Nations) in which should meet the ambassadors of all the States of the world, not only Christian, but Pagan, China, Persia, Japan, Morocco, and the Great Mogul. This assembly is to be a "sort of permanent council of supervision and pacification." It will decide disputes about precedence and all other subjects, maintain good understanding among the members, anticipate quarrels and adjust them, peaceably if possible, but if not, by force." The last phrase implies a sanction. And it is Cruce's idea that if any of the parties refuses to submit to the decision of the majority, the rest should join with the party that does submit to coerce the recalcitrant member.

The general idea that underlies the Covenant is here clearly expressed, though Cruce would apparently have gone further than the Covenant in the way of coercion. That, however, is a matter of detail. The point is that he saw clearly that the remedy for war must be political, since its causes are political. States, like individuals, will aggress, if they can aggress with impunity. But it is the common interest of them all to put an end to the impunity. At last, after centuries of experience, they have learned that lesson and have formally embodied its teaching in the Covenant of the League of Nations.

From Dr. Lange's admirable survey of a millennium of history and thought a reader may draw, according to his temperament or his mood, encouragement or the reverse. So long, he may say and feel, men have seen the evil of war, discussed its causes, and proposed remedies. And now, look out on Europe! Yes! The mills of God grind slowly; and it is at rare moments that the strong idea coincides with the moment at which its realization is possible. But much has happened during the three centuries that have elapsed since Cruce published his book. In particular, the last century and a half have wrought changes to which there is nothing comparable in the long and vanishing past. Man has discovered science, and by its aid has unified the world materially and economically. The fact is palpable at this moment, just because we have tried to ignore it. All States are perishing because some have tried to destroy others. In this state of the world our political anarchy is a clear anachronism. The moment for the idea has arrived. That is why it has forced its way into life, against all unbelievers. That is why it may be destined to triumph—now, though never before.

G. LOWES DICKINSON.

TOLSTOY AND GORKY

REMINISCENCES OF LEON TOLSTOY. By Maxim Gorky. (Petersburg, Z. J. Grizelban.)

FTER more than two years of Russia's spiritual and intellectual isolation, the first Russian literary work published recently which has reached us in this country is Maxim Gorky's "Reminiscences of Leo Tolstoy."

The book consists mainly of notes and impressions written down by Maxim Gorky during his stay in the Crimea in 1910, whilst Tolstoy was living in the neighbour hood of his first serious illness, and then after the writer's return. Anton Tchehov also at that period lived near by in Yalta. Gorky saw a great deal of Tolstoy, paying him frequent visits, and Tolstoy used to visit Gorky. The book also contains a very long letter of over thirty pages written by Gorky in Italy in 1910, during his banishment, on the occasion of Tolstoy's "leaving his house," and his death. "I publish this letter," Gorky says in the preface, "without correcting a single word in it, just as I wrote it then. Nor do I finish it now; this, somehow, cannot be done."

Perhaps the following passage from his letter will make it clear why Gorky, after Russia's eventful years since Tolstoy's death till the end of 1919, could not finish his letter:

He talked to me many times and a long time: what he lived at Crimea I used often to discuss with him, and he left the subject readily: his books I read attentively and lovingly, so I believe I have the right to say what I think of him, even though it be bold and widely differing from the general attitude to him. I am aware of lesser men and others that there is no man more worthy of the name of genius, more complicated, more contradictory and—more beautiful in everything; yes, yes, in everything. Beautiful in some exceptional sense, wide, not to be grasped by words—there is in him something which can only be laid hold upon, and is to cry out to all and everybody: Look what a wonderful man lives on earth! For he is overwhelmingly, and above all, a man of mankind.

But what always repelled me from him was his stubborn, despotism tendency to turn the life of Count Leo Nikolayevitch Tolstoy into "the saintly life of our blessed father, boyar Leo." You know he long intended to "suffer." To Yevgenii Solovoi, to Sulerzhizky he expressed his regret that he had not achieved it. But he wished to suffer, not simply, not out of a natural desire to test the resilience of his will—but with the obvious and, I repeat, despotic intention of expressing the weight of his religious ideas, of making an example of his teaching, to make his gospel irresistible, to sanctify it in the eyes of men by his suffering and to make them accept it, you understand, to make them. For he knows that that gospel is not sufficiently obvious; in his diary you will, in time to come, find good instances of scepticism, applied by himself to his teaching and his personality. He knows that "Martyrs and sufferers with rare exceptions are but despot and tyrants: he knows everything! And he says: "Were I to suffer for my ideas, they would produce a different impression." This always repelled me from him, for I cannot help feeling in this an attempt to do violence to me, a desire to take hold of my conscience, to blind it with the glow of righteous blood, to put the yoke of dogma on my neck.

He always exalted immortality on the other side, but he liked it better on this side. A writer national in the truest and most universal sense, he bodied forth in his giant soul all the defects of the nation. His most striking teaching of "truth," of "everyday life," the working of passivity,—this is all the unwholesome fermentation of the old Russian blood, poisoned by Mongolian fatalism and, as it were, chemically hardened in the fire of its mistriving creative work, with its indomitable active resistance to the evil of life. What is called "Tolstoy's anachronism" is essentially the expression of our Slav anti-stateism, again a truly national trait, a disposition to discard in a filtered intellectual idiom, in the time. Until this day we have passionately indulged that disposition, as you and everyone are aware. We are aware, but we disperse, and we always on the lines of least resistance; we see that this is pernicious, but cannot and will not further advance the others, for we are nothing but cockroaches, winding our paths and in this kind of time. Until this day we have passionately indulged that disposition, as you and everyone are aware. We are aware, but we disperse, and we always on the lines of least resistance; we see that this is pernicious, but cannot and will not further advance the others, for we are nothing but cockroaches, winding our paths and in this kind of time. Until this day we have passionately indulged that disposition, as you and everyone are aware. We are aware, but we disperse, and we always on the lines of least resistance; we see that this is pernicious, but cannot and will not further advance the others, for we are nothing but cockroaches, winding our paths and in this kind of time.

* An authorized English translation of this book, under the same title, will be published shortly in this country by the Hogarth Press, Richmond.
"He ought" (Tolstoy said) "to have made himself acquainted with the teaching of Confucius or the Buddhists: this would have set him at rest. This is the chief thing for everyone to know. He has not been able to find his beloved wife by throwing a billiard ball on his bald head, and he would move his ears. He felt a great deal, but thought poorly. It is from the Fourierists, from Burschevitch, that he learned to think. And then he hated them all his life long. There was something Jewish in his blood. He was diffident, ambitious, heavy and unhappy. It's strange that he is so much read, I can't make out why. It is painful [to read him] and useless, because all the Tolstoy, Raw Youts, Raskelevs and this—they were not like that, it is all simply clever..."

Gorky gives several instances of Tolstoy's attitude to women.

In my opinion [says G.], Tolstoy regards woman with irrevocable hostility, and he loves to punish her—if she is not a Kitty nor a Natasha Rostovzey, if she is not a creature not sufficiently limited. Is it the hostility of a man who has not succeeded in getting as much of life as he could? Can he not imagine the spirit against the "degrading impulses of the flesh"? But still it is hostility, and as cold as in Anna Karenin.

Gorky records the following words of Tolstoy:

In her body a woman is sincerer than man, but her thoughts are lying. But when she lies, she does not believe herself, and when Rousseau lied, he did believe himself.

Anton Tchekov, Sulerzhizky, Sergeyevitch [Tolstoy's son] and someone else, sitting in the park, spoke of women. Tolstoy listened for a long time in silence, and then suddenly said: "And I will tell the truth about women, when I have one foot in my grave. I will tell it, jump into the coffin, cover myself with the coffin lid—call me then to account!"

And what is Gorky's attitude to Tolstoy?

I do not know if I loved him, but does that matter—love or hatred of him? He always aroused enormous, fantastic sensations and agitations in my soul; even the unpleasant and hostile sensations evoked assumed forms that did not oppress, but as it were exploded the soul, widened it, made it more sensitive and capacious.

In another passage Gorky says:

I, who do not believe in God, look at Tolstoy somehow very warily, somewhat timidly: I look at him and think, "This man is God-like!"

Recording a meeting with Tolstoy in 1900, Gorky says:

I can't express in words what I felt, not thought, at that moment; the wide vastness in my soul and awe, and then all suffused in one happy thought: "I am not an orphan on earth so long as this man lives on it!"

S. KOTELIANSKY.

THE GOOD TALKER IN PRINT

Le Bol de Chine; ou, Divagations sur les Beaux-Arts. Par
Pierre Mille. (Paris, Crès. 3fr. 75.)

There are three main kinds of essays: the literary essay written for all time, the journalistic essay written for the day, and the essay which should never have been written. M. Pierre Mille's "Divagations" belong to the third class, by which I mean that they do not contain anything either from the pen of the talented journalist who created Barnavault and gave us "Nas" Edeline et son épouse" are devoid of interest or merit, but merely that the thought behind them is too fragmentary and tentative to justify transcription to the printed page. They belong more to the sphere of conversation than of literature. The good talker is the man who can throw an idea into the centre of the room and induce the assembled company to play football with it. If he can contrive to kick off with a laugh, so much the better. It is no part of his duty to work out a theory, to analyse or develop an idea. His function is essentially to stimulate. As such he is a boon to society, and he contributes, more perhaps than most of us realize, to the thought of the age. M. Mille is, we imagine, bon causseur of this type, but he is not convincing or more than very mildly entertaining in these printed essays.

W.
List of New Books
Prepared in co-operation with the Library Association.

The method of classification adopted is a series of groups roughly corresponding with the Dewey Decimal System, the sub-classes being increased, for the benefit of librarians and others familiar with the system, by the class-numbers given at the end of each entry. The first numeral in these represents the main class, the second one of the subdivisions, and so on.

Those works in the list which appear most suitable for purchase by Public Library Authorities are marked with an asterisk.

100 PHILOSOPHY.

The "popular" style of this book defeats, to some extent, the author's purpose. We should have liked the exposition to be more clear-cut and reserved. As it is, the reader will have some difficulty in grasping the root ideas of the Freudian theory, although, if he is patient, he will find a good deal of information in this book. But an exposition is not "popular," which says of a number of facts that they demonstrate something "to the nth degree": it is merely irritating.

The author, a relative of Father Maturin, who was drowned in the "Lusitania," has gathered in this book a series of revelations obtained by the planchette in 1901-2, and described as "communications" from her son Charles Gordon Maturin, who had died in 1900 at the age of thirteen. The "communications" are of an intimate, affectionate, and boyish type.

200 RELIGION.

Shillito (Edward).  THE NEW DAYS: words addressed to the soul of the nation. Longmans, 1919. 7½ in. 116 pp. paper, 2/6 n. 204

In thirteen eloquent and thoughtful papers the author deals with the Christian ethic in its relation to war; the value of a good literary style in religious writings; the importance of earnestness and of personality in the preacher; the "burning passion" of many for a reunited Christianity; and other themes.

Stone (Henry John).  TOWARDS SPIRITUAL DEMOCRACY. Swarthmore Press [1920]. 6 in. 73 pp. boards, 2 n. 204

Notwithstanding the failure of organized Christianity to exercise such an influence on men's lives as would have prevented the late terrible war, the author sees many signs of the growth of a real feeling of brotherhood among men. He appeals earnestly for an extension of this feeling, so that the ideal of service to one's fellows and complete freedom in following the dictates of the One Spirit may replace the present system of competition and narrow religious creeds. Without a change of outlook among men, even the League of Nations may not be able to prevent a war more destructive than that just ended.

300 SOCIOLOGY.

Craddock (E. A.).  THE CLASS-ROOM REPUBLIC. Black, 1920. 7½ in. 80 pp. 2/6 n. 371.57

Under the system applied by the writer, a form master at the Northern Polytechnic Day Secondary School, Holloway, the teacher delegates all disciplinary powers to a committee chosen by the boys, who form what he calls "a class-room republic"; thus he has nothing else to do than teach. It is the committee that awards prizes and punishments, and the class sets its own homework. "The teacher will advise, but not command; suggest, but not enforce." By this development of the "free discipline school," which, Mr. Craddock says, works efficiently, the boys develop self-control, and the instruction is far better. He says nothing about the common defect in professional teachers of being unable to impart the knowledge they themselves possess.

Gough (George W.).  HALF PAST TWELVE: dinner-horn studies for the odd half-hours. Methuen [1920]. 8½ in. 85 pp. por. paper. 1/

330.2

The son of a railway servant, Mr. Gough went to Oxford and won first-class honours in Modern History. Understanding the difficulties of working men and women, he throws off the cloak of the professor, and in simple, straightforward language explains the economic problems, and sets forth the old-established principles of the division of labour and the organisation of labour under the capitalist régime.

Among the more notable of the contents of this number are Dr. Arthur Underhill's article dealing with Lord Birkenhead's Law of Property Bill, Mr. Eastwood's paper "Constitutional Rigidity in relation to Empire Federation," and Mr. H. A. Smith's contribution "The Nature of our Constitutional Law." The layman will be interested by Episcopal Divorce" (an article by Mr. C. A. Hershoff Bartlett), and by "Superstitious Uses," by Mr. T. Bourchier-Chilcot.

Owen (Dorothy Tudor) [Mrs. Douglas Truman].  THE CHILD VISION: being a study in mental development and expression ("Publications of the University of Manchester: Educational Series," 9). Manchester, University Press (Longmans), 1920. 8 in. 196 pp. il. index, 6/6 n. 372.6

This very entertaining and instructive work was written as a thesis for the degree of Master of Education. It describes the method and results of teaching children composition—using the word to denote orderly expression. The child naturally thinks in visual images, and this fact suggested to the author her method, which combines sketching and writing. The method seems to us a great improvement in the usual practice of giving stereotyped "subjects," and the results achieved suggest that it is much more effective as a mental discipline.

400 PHILOLOGY.

465

Arresting items in the present number are Mr. Robert Gardner's article "The Siege of Prieuneste"; "The Change from the Ancient to the Modern Greek Accent," by Miss Clara M. Knight; and Mr. Joseph E. Gillet's "The Katharsis-Clause in German Criticism." Less noted is an illustrated paper entitled "Arcus" Mr. G. P. Bidder contends that by the word "arcus" Horace ("Carm." iii. 28, 7) means "bow-drills."

The theme of Professor Tout's lecture is the prevalence during the Middle Ages of every sort of forgery, and the ease with which, up to the most recent times, scholars were deceived by even the clumsiest frauds. After speaking of medieval forgery in general he illustrates the nature of the falsification of medieval documents by telling the story of the "Historia Broadsendis," purporting to be the work of a twelfth-century monk, but actually written in the late fourteenth century, and the "De Situ Britanniae," attributed to the fourteenth-century Richard of Cirencester, but composed by a young man called Bertam in the middle of the eighteenth century.

700 FINE ARTS.

Bosanquet (Bernard).  CROCE'S AESTHETIC: from the "Pro" readings of the British Academy," vol. 9. British Academy (Milford) [1920]. 10 in. 28 pp. paper, 2 n. 701

Croce's identification of intuition and expression, the priority of aesthetic to conceptual thinking, and the general equation of language with intuition and aesthetic with linguistic theory, are subject by Mr. Bosanquet to a destructive critique. The long appendix undertakes to correct Croce's erroneous conception of the "death of art" in Hegel.
Macdonald (George), THE SILVER COINAGE OF CRETE, a metrological note (from the "Proceedings of the British Academy," vol. 9). (For the British Academy) Milford, 1920. 10 in. 30 pp. il. paper, 4/ n. 737

See notice, p. 580.

780 MUSIC.

A second Press of this attractive and stimulating little treatise.

See notice, p. 581.

800 LITERATURE.

A further instalment of "The MSS. of Callimachus' Hymns," by Mr. M. T. Smiley; "The Miracle of the Wine at Dionysos' Advent: on the Lenaea Festival," by Mr. J. Vurthiem; Mr. E. Phillips Barker's "Hieisthron and Eikisthron," and "Classics and Citizenship," by Professor E. V. Wyndham (a temperate defence of serious literature), are the main contents of this number. Mr. J. K. Fotheringham has some interesting astronomical comments on Dr. T. Rice Holmes's note on the Julian Calendar.

Several articles of considerable interest appear in the present number. One of the most notable is Professor Albert Mathiez's on "Un Projet d'Alliance Franco-Britannique en 1790." Another arresting contribution is by Mr. Maurice Lasnon, who in "Le Discours sur les Passions de l'Amour," est-il de Pascal? concludes that the work is Pascal's, and ends the paper with these words: "il est l'unique document qui nous ouvre un jour sur la vie intérieure de Pascal dans la période la plus obscure de son existence."

A full number, containing notable papers by Mr. H. Somerville ("The Economics of Nationalization"), Mr. J. Hogan ("Two Bishops of Killaloe and Irish Freedom"), and others. A native-born Egyptian, Mr. Raphael Nakhlia, writes critically in reference to "The British in Egypt"; and Professor Alfred O'Rahilly deals with "The Democracy of S. Thomas."

POETRY.

Mr. Bethell has a sense of the picturesque; his verses are full of bright colour and contrast—not very suble, perhaps, but cheerful in their sensuous gaudiness, like a design by Bakst. He writes of Greece, of Spain, of London and the country, of the sea, of women; and in all he writes we find tales so picturesque in quality joined with a rare felicity of expression and technique, this picturesque ness would make Mr. Bethell's verses very agreeable reading.

Burrow (C. Kennett), POEMS IN TIME OF WAR; IN TIME OF PEACE. Collins, 1919. 81/2 in. 100 pp. boards, 5/.

Mr. Burrow possesses a sense of rhythm that makes his verse musical without creating music. Their themes are diverse: but whether they are of war or of peace, his treat ment often successfully combines vigour and poignancy. Here and there, perhaps, is a lapse into jingling: That would be well for you, my heart, better than London town, Where all the light is darkness and all the darkness light.

The ache of change and spiritual pain and helplessness is never absent from Mr. Burrow's verse; but his faith is never seriously in doubt. All through we are confident of its eventual triumph:

With eyes new-purged and sane
I saw earth's beauty ministering still
To heal man's ancient pain
And newer agonies of body and will.

One feels that the vision of the war poems is occasionally more than the expression; but in his nature poems Mr. Burrow is inclined to express more than he feels.

A reissue of the volume which Mr. Graves published first in 1916, and which has been for some time out of print. A few slight alterations, including the suppression of two short poems, have been made: otherwise the book remains unchanged.

Raid (N. C.), PUCK'S GARDEN; and other poems. Selwyn & Blount, 1920. 71/2 in. 64 pp., 3/6 n. 821.9

Mr. Raid aims at an organ-voiced splendour, sweetness and richness, but his success is not always equal to his high intentions. It is in these terms that he addresses the nightingale:

Thy luring litany of love, late heard,
Oh magically music-hung bird,
Sounds in my brain like a sweet seraph's moan.

One cannot help feeling that something has gone wrong with the organ.

822.33 SHAKESPEARE.

FICTION.

Albanesi (E. Maria), PATRICIA AND LIFE. Ward & Lock, 1920. 71/2 in. 307 pp., 6/ n.

Madame Albanesi has produced another readable story. Patricia decides that she cannot marry the man who has been chosen for her by her father, and is compelled to leave home, but finds friends in an old schoolfellow and an officer whom she meets in a train. She shows a brave front to life, and has to endure many trials through her callous father and an unscrupulous woman. Her actress-schoolfellow and Dennis Ryan, the wounded airman, are very agreeable characters; and there are good descriptions of various aspects of life during the war. Notwithstanding her troubles, Patricia finds that life is well worth living.

Close (Evelyne), CHERRY ISLE. Grant Richards, 1920. 71/4 in. 245 pp., 7/6 n.

Charles Garston is a tenor who has "succeeded too soon and too easily." He possesses "faultless evening dress," and wears decorations bestowed upon him by "mighty rulers." Anthea Argent has one blue eye, one brown eye, and copper-coloured hair. Also she has a voice, even as Sir Willoughby Patterne had a leg. The two singers marry, but do not agree. Anthea's temper, like her voice, is uncertain; and through most of the book she is an unpleasant person. For a long while she lives only for professional glory, and to be avenged upon her mother's betrayer. The vengeance takes a tragic form. The novel, though readable, has elements of artificiality.

Cole (Sophie), THE CYPRUS TREE. Mills & Boon [1920]. 71/4 in. 244 pp., 7/6 n.

A pleasant novel, in which there is a touch of the supernatural. The title is the name of a sinister little black-letter tome which brings ill-luck upon its successive owners, none of whom, notwithstanding, cares to call it out. Ed. Johns, previously a classical master at one of the great public schools, on his return from the war becomes a collector of rare books, and for a while possesses the volume. He falls in love with and marries Genifer Thorn, whose first husband, supposed to be dead, unexpectedly appears, suffering from shell-shock and complete loss of memory. How the "Cyprian Tree" is destroyed, and other occurrences straighten out the complexities of the story, is told in Miss Cole's facile and attractive manner.

Morris Klaw, the Dream-Detective, is a psychical Sherlock Holmes. He has a flair for Eastern idols and historic jewels, and knows all the uncanny things that have happened to his possessors. The author displays great skill in elaborating the details of each case. The first of them, "The Tragedies in the Greek Room," is a good example of his methods.

Terhune (Albert Payson). | Lad, a Dog. | Dent, 1920. | 7½ in. | 309 pp., 6 n. | 8/3.5 |

According to the author, "nearly all the stories of Lad's life are true"; but there must surely be a great deal of romance in this history of a thoroughbred collie of extraordinary intelligence, in and around New Jersey; for instance, in all that happened to the dog in his thirty-mile run home after getting lost in New York. Though not on a par with "Owd Bob" or "The Call of the Wild," this will be pleasant reading to lovers of animals.

Mrs. Watson has invented a racy and plausible plot for her new novel—the tracking of a thief who stole some country-house jewellery on the occasion of a masked ball, with complications; but she misses her opportunity by using a rather nondescript method throughout her narrative. She does not appear to have asked herself what exactly were her intentions before she began to write. The consequence is that as a story the book fails in interest; as a study of character it lacks conviction; even in such a trivial matter as the use of the vulgarisms incidental to her particular grade of society she is uncertain when and where a suggestion is more potent than a whole page of them. And yet, with a more patient and more certain hand, the delineation of the same set of figures would make good entertainment.

The story opens in the Lake District, where Harry Gardiner, a young hotel-keeper, who is the son of a country parson, but is restless and unstable, in righteous indignation at a remark made by a guest, strikes and kills him. Although a verdict of accidental death is returned at the inquest, Gardiner later on is tried for manslaughter and sent to prison. He is "B 14." How all this is brought about is unfolded in a readable and spirited narrative.

920 BIOGRAPHY.

See review, p. 571.

See review, p. 571.

930-990 HISTORY.

Harris (James Rendel). | The Last of the "Mayflower." | Manchester, University Press (Longmans), 1920. | 9/6 in. | 130 pp., app., 5 n. | 975.22 |

In this publication of the John Rylands Library Dr. Rendel Harris tries to find an answer to the question, What became of the "Mayflower"? The name was a common one for ships in late Tudor and early Stuart times; hence the tracing of the antecedent "Mayflower" has entailed much research. Some ten years after the landing of the Pilgrims (1620), she was employed on a similar service, that of transporting the remainder of the Leyden colony to New Plymouth. Then she is traced in the whale-fishery, and to her last owner and master, Mr. Thomas Webber of Boston. Not long after 1654, the author says, "one is tempted to conjecture that she died in a nautical sense." Most likely she was broken up in Boston, or perhaps in the Thames on her last voyage to London.

---

PANIC IN CILICIA

ARMENIANS forced to fly from their homes to save their lives.

According to the latest direct information the condition of the Armenians has never been worse than in recent months. The Turkish National troops have been committing all possible violence and robbery against the unprotected peoples who live in continual danger of outrage and death.

OUR WORKERS ON THE SPOT PLEAD FOR HELP TO RELIEVE THE TERRIBLE NEED

Our representative at Constantinople writes:

"What the poor Armenians suffered in Marash is heartbreaking. Yesterday we received the news direct from an eyewitness and one who ran with his wife and a baby ten days old day and night in the thick snow and blizzard, for six days they journeyed with hardly enough to eat to keep death away. One could write pages and pages about the experience of these days."

From the Caucasus:

"The cause of the high death-rate was due to the lack of physical resistance by the people, their five years of distress and helplessness, was one of the predominant factors in the medical supplies, underclothing and the necessary foodstuffs for the sick was extremely short. Most of the people were in rags and many had very few of these, the clothes that were given were only a drop in the bucket, as regards the needs of masses."

At Aintab hundreds are dying of hunger daily.

WE IMPOLE YOUR HELP FOR OUR URGENT RELIEF FUND.

THE SOCIETY OF THE FRIENDS OF ARMENIA

And Helpers in the Relief of Distress among Syrians and other Sufferers in the Near East.

47, VICTORIA STREET, WESTMINSTER, LONDON, S.W. 1

DONATIONS WILL BE MOST GRATEFULLY RECEIVED and promptly acknowledged. They should be sent to the Hon. Treasurer, E. Wright Brooks, Esq., "Friends of Armenia."

CHATTO & WINDUS

Have published this Spring

THE SUPERSTITION OF DIVORCE
By G. K. CHESTERTON. "Like most of his work, delightfully amusing and incidentally contains much good sense."—E. S. P. Haynes in The Nation. "Packed full of wit and wisdom... searches to the very roots of society."—Pall Mall Gazette. Cr. 8vo. 5s. net.

LETTERS OF ANTON TCHEHOV
Translated from the Russian by CONSTANCE GARNETT. "His letters, for their full virtue, must be read as life must be lived, unsaid by banisters and from beginning to end."—Walter de la Mare in The Westminster Gazette. With 8 Portraits. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

MRS. WARREN'S DAUGHTER
By SIR HARRY JOHNSTON, Author of "The Gay Dombeys." "As funny and crowded as a Frith picture, but with a quite individual note of sweetness and hospitality to every kind of generous enthusiasm."—Rebecca West in The Daily Herald. "The Johnston method of novel-writing is entrancing."—Liverpool Post. Cr. 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

LEDA
By ALDOUS HUXLEY, Author of "Limbo." "One of the few long successful narrative poems of recent years... contained passages of great strength and beauty."—J. C. Squire of the title-poem in The London Mercury. Small F'cap 4to. 5s. net. Also a Limited Edition of 150 copies signed by the Author and with photogravure frontispiece. 12s. 6d. net.

All the copies of this Special Edition have been subscribed for by the booksellers.

WILLIAM SMITH: POTTER AND FARMER
By GEORGE BOURNE. "A beautiful and sensitive little book. It has the quality of Jefferies at his best."—The London Mercury. With 8 Illustrations. Cr. 8vo. 6s. net.

PRELUDE
By BEVERLEY NICHOLS. "The most interesting study of a boy since 'Sinister Street'!"—The Sunday Times. "By far the best picture of contemporary school life that we have met."—The Challenge. SECOND IMPRESSION. Cr. 8vo. 7s. net.

THE GOLF SWING
By DARYN HAMMOND. An exposition of the Ernest Jones method. With 63 illustrations from specially taken photographs. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6. net.

Shortly

AURELIA
By ROBERT NICHOLS. New poems containing a remarkable sonnet-sequence. Cr. 8vo. 5s. net. Also a Limited Edition of 150 copies, signed by the Author and with photogravure frontispiece. 12s. 6d. net.

PASSENGER
By HELEN DICKS, Author of "Finding," and acclaimed by The Daily Express as "A poet with eyes that see, a heart that understands, and the power of individual and dainty expression." Post 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

THE AMOROUS CHEAT
By BASIL CREIGHTON, Author of "The History of an Attraction," A new novel by a coming writer. Cr. 8vo. 7s. 6s. net.

97 & 99 St. MARTIN'S LANE, LONDON, W.C. 2
Appointments Vacant

EGYPTIAN MINISTRY OF EDUCATION.

APPLICATIONS are invited for VACANT POSTS for ASSISTANT MASTERS to teach English in Egyptian Government Secondary Schools.

Applicants must possess a University Degree with Honours and should have some experience as teachers. A Diploma in Teaching would be a recommendation.

The initial salary is L.Eg. 452 (about £443) a year, rising to L.Eg. 504 (about £517) a year, on the pensionable staff, with temporary war gratuity of L.E 16 a month. An allowance is given for journey to Egypt.

Further particulars may be obtained by letter from G. Elliott, Esq, Egyptian Education Office, 28, Victoria Street, Westminster, London, S.W.1, to whom application should be made not later than May 22nd.

UNIVERSITY OF THE PANJAB (LAHORE).

APPLICATIONS are invited for (1) the CHAIR of ECONOMICS, (2) the CHAIR of HISTORY. Salary Rs. 15,000 per annum (Rs. 2,500 at the rate of 2s. per rupee).—Applications must be received not later than 15th May, 1920, by the undersigned, care of Universities BUREAU, 50, Russell Square, W.C., from whom further particulars may be obtained.

A. C. WOOLNER, Registrar on leave.

UNIVERSITY OF LONDON.—University READERSHIP in ITALIAN tenable at University College. VACANT owing to the appointment of Dr. Edmund Gardner to the Chair of Italian in the University of Manchester. Salary £400 a year. Applications (12 copies) must be received not later than first post on May 23rd, 1920, by the Academic Registrar, University of London, South Kensington, S.W.7, from whom further particulars may be obtained.

MUNICIPAL TECHNICAL COLLEGE,
GUILDHALL, BATH.

TEACHER OF FRENCH required. Man or Woman. Good salary for competent, experienced teacher.—For particulars, apply at once to Principal.

HULL MUNICIPAL TRAINING COLLEGE.

WANTED in September, a WOMAN LECTURER IN GEOGRAPHY.—Particulars may be obtained from the Principal, to whom applications should be sent not later than May 22, 1920.

UNIVERSITY OF BRISTOL.

ASSISTANT LECTURER IN ECONOMICS.

The UNIVERSITY will shortly proceed to appoint an ASSISTANT LECTURER in ECONOMICS to be attached to the Women's division of the Department of Education. Salary £250—£10—£300.

Further particulars may be obtained from the REGISTRAR to whom applications and testimonials should be sent before May 29.

LADY SECRETARY for the intelligence department of a political organisation, experience in indexing, cataloguing, etc., a recommendation.Salary, etc., Box 226, ATHENAEUM ADVERTISEMENT OFFICE, 170, Fleet Street, E.C.4.

Appointments Vacant

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL.

COMPULSORY DAY CONTINUATION SCHOOLS,
APPOINTMENT OF PRINCIPALS.

The Council invites applications from men and women for APPOINTMENT as PRINCIPALS of Compulsory Day Continuation Schools to be established under the Education Act, 1918. Applicants will be required to produce evidence of good general education, recognised academic or technical qualifications, teaching or lecturing experience, and organising ability. Experience in social and welfare work is also desirable.

The inclusive scales of salary are as follows according to size of school—

Grade I. Men £600—£750; women £420—£575.
Grade II. Men £500—£650; women £400—£525.
Grade III. Men £450—£600; women £375—£550.

Applicants in the service of the Council, who may be selected for these appointments and who are receiving salary within the limit of the above scales, will be transferred at salaries not lower than their existing salaries.

Preference will be given in the case of male candidates to those who have served, or attempted to serve, with H.M. Forces.

Apply (enclosing stamped addressed foolscap envelope) to the Education Officer (T.3), London County Council, Education Offices, Victoria Embankment, W.C.2. Form T.3/3 will then be sent, and must be returned by 11 a.m. on May 26, 1920. Canvassing disqualifies.

JAMES BIRD,
Clerk of the London County Council.

COUNTY BOROUGH OF DERBY.

EDUCATION COMMITTEE.

MUNICIPAL SECONDARY SCHOOL FOR BOYS.

WANTED: MATH. & TECHNICAL MASTER. Graduate. Scale £240, rising by £10 per annum to £300, and then by £20. Experience and special qualifications taken into consideration in fixing commencing salary.

Applications should reach the undersigned not later than May 15.

F. C. SMITHARD,
Secretary to the Education Committee.

Education Offices, Becket Street, Derby.
April 26, 1920.

SUNDERLAND EDUCATION COMMITTEE.

BEDE COLLEGIATE GIRLS' SCHOOL.

WANTED in September, MISTRESSES to teach the following subjects—

(1) FRENCH (Residence abroad desirable).
(2) ENGLISH LITERATURE AND LANGUAGE.
(3) MODERN HISTORY.
(4) GYMNASTICS (Lug's Swedish System).

For (1), (2) and (3), an Honours Degree or its equivalent essential. In each case, good Secondary School experience desirable.

Salary according to Grade II. Scale, £175, rising by £10 increments to £300. Not more than ten years approved previous experience may be allowed for in initial salary. Suitable Grade II. Mistresses may be promoted to Grade III. Maximum £300.

Application forms obtainable on sending stamped addressed envelope to the undersigned, to whom they should be returned as quickly as possible.

HERBERT REED,
Chief Education Officer.

Education Offices, 15, John Street, Sunderland.
April 26, 1920.
Art Exhibitions

R.W.S. ROYAL SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER-COLOURS.
174th EXHIBITION NOW OPEN, 10 till 6.
5a, PALL MALL, EAST (near National Gallery).

ETCHINGS BY IAN STRANG
THE CHELSEA GALLERY
by the Town Hall, Chelsea.

LONDON AND THE LAGOONS OF VENICE.
EXHIBITION OF WATER-COLOURS by Bridget Keir.
May 3 to 22, at WALKER'S GALLERIES, 118, New Bond

BURLINGTON GALLERY, 15, GREEN STREET,
LEICESTER SQUARE.
Exhibition of the Art of GERARD VAN VLIET,
J. W. BROOKS and MISS ROBERTINE HERITOT.
Daily 10 to 5.

SPELLS OF RUSSIA.
Paintings by Nicolas Roerich, on view at the Goupil Gallery,
5, Regent Street, S.W.1. 1s. 3d. (with tax). 10—5.30. Sats., 10—1.

Financial

£1,000 to £30,000 available. Immediate introductions
given to highly educated, fully qualified men
seeking Partnerships, Directorships and Employment with Investment.—The OFFICER'S PARTNERSHIP
GUARDIAN, 33, Victoria Street, S.W.1, Call.

Authors’ Agents, etc.

THE AUTHORS' ALLIANCE are prepared to consider and place MSS. for early publication. Literary work of all kinds dealt with by experts who place Authors' interests first.
Twenty years' experience. Please note new address: 93 and 94,
CHANSEY LANE, LONDON, W.C.2.

PROOF READING, INDEXING, RESEARCHES, REVISION
Linguist, good experience.—Mr. F. A. HADLAND, 15, Bellevue
MANSIONS, Forest Hill, S.E.23.

Booksellers & Catalogues

MAY LIST OF PUBLISHERS' REMAINDERS
CONTAINING MANY INTERESTING BOOKS, ALL IN NEW CONDITION, AT GREATLY REDUCED PRICES, NOW READY.
Write also for New List of the most popular
Books on Natural History, Gardening, etc.
WILLIAM GLAISHER, LTD.,

BOOKS AND AUTOGRAPHS,
CATALOGUES FREE.

Typewriting &c.

TYPEWRITING OF EVERY DESCRIPTION carefully and promptly executed at home, 1s. per 1,000 words; carbon copy, 3d. per 1,000 words. Duplicating. Cambridge Local—
Miss NANCY McFARLANE, 11, Palmeira Avenue, Westclife, Essex.
LET us type your MS. 1s. per thousand words. Next, intelligent work. Good paper. Clients' suggestions or requests carefully followed.—LITERARY MANAGER, Oxford Bureau, 3, Cross hall Street, Liverpool.

Miscellaneous

EXCELLENT BANK PAPER for Pen or Typewriter. Sample
Room, 480 sheets, 9 by 8; 4s. 6d.; three at 4s. 3d.; six at 4s.
Post Free. Cream Laid, Envelopes, Cards, Samples on application.—ALFRED ERICKSON & CO., 2, Tudor Street, E.C.4.

Educational

ELOCUTION, TUTION AND PUBLIC RECITALS GIVEN.
DOUGLAS STEVENS, A.L.A.M.
"Mr. Douglas Stevens shows a good deal of technical skill, has an easy manner, good gesture and a pleasing lack of affectation."—The Times.
Terms and particulars from
New Oxford Street, W.1.
Tel. Museum 1783.

Appointments Wanted

YOUNG LADY, well-educated, good qualifications and experience requires post as SECRETARY (literary or scientific work preferred) or as LIBRARIAN.—Box, G., ATHENÆUM ADVERTISEMENT OFFICE, 170, Fleet Street, E.C.4.

YOUNG MAN (23), well-educated, well-read, fluent French and German; typewriting; desires SECRETARIAT APPOINT-MENT, whole or part-time.—Box 773, ATHENÆUM Advertisement

Sales by Auction

PRINTED BOOKS.
Messes. SOTHEBY, WILKINSON & HODGE
WILL SELL BY AUCTION, at their Large Galleries, 34 and 35
New Bond Street, W.1, on Thursday, May 20, and following day at 1 o'clock precisely,
PRINTED BOOKS,
comprising the property of T. Francis Howell, Esq., the property of the late Charles Fairfax Murray, Esq., and other properties, and including First editions of English Authors of the nineteenth century; Productions of the Kemsavage, Eragny, Dun Emer, Cuala, Doves, Essex House and other modern private presses;
Early Printed Books; Books on the Fine Arts; An extensive collection of bookplates, etc.
May be viewed two days prior. Catalogues may be had.

To Let

TO LET, Bloomsbury District, First Floor, two large rooms as Offices, suitable for Literary or Scholastic Society. Women staff preferred. State requirements and write for particulars.—
Box 564, ATHENÆUM ADVERTISEMENT OFFICE, 170, Fleet Street, E.C.4.

Charities

BOOKSELLERS' PROVIDENT INSTITUTION.
A Registered Friendly Society founded in the year 1837 for the assistance of members and their widows and children when
in necessitous circumstances.
Patron: HER MAJESTY QUEEN ALEXANDRA.
President: CHARLES JAMES LONGMAN, Esq.
An Annual Subscription of One Guinea, or a Donation of Ten Guineas, entitles the donor to Honorary Membership with the privilege, in case of General Meeting, of voting and the request of Twenty Guineas constitutes the executor an Honorary Member
for life, with power to vote.
Subscriptions or Donations will be thankfully received by the Secretary, Mr. WILLIAM POUltIEN, Stationers' Hall Court, London,
E.C.4, who will gladly furnish any further particulars that may be desired.

MARRIED LOVE

A New Contribution to the Solution of Sex Difficulties

By MArIE STOPES, D.Sc., Ph.D.

"Clear, thoughtful, penetrating.
. . . Our advice is for women to read it, and for men to read it."—English
Review.
"An extremely sensible little book.
. . . Really needed as a public ad viser."—Lancet.

AT ALL BOOKSELLERS, 6/- NET
G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS, LTD.
24, BEDFORD ST., STRAND, LONDON, W.C.2

Scale for Small Advertisements.

APPOINTMENTS, VACANT & WANTED, SALES BY AUCTION, TYPEWRITING & MISCELLANEOUS
1/- per line.
HARRAP'S LATEST BOOKS

JUST READY

THE REAL WEALTH OF NATIONS

or, a New Civilization and its Economic Foundations

By JOHN S. HECCHT.

Fellow of the Royal Economic Society.

352 pages, 6s. 6d. net. With Full Index. A book for the thoughtful employer and employee. The application of some of the principles of Economic Science such as is outlined will remove the causes of industrial unrest, and should convince the workers of the value to themselves of maximum production. Prospectus will be sent on application.

STYLES OF CONTEMPORARY POETS

By Mary Stevens. A new and enlarged edition. Crown 8vo. 400 pages, 7s. 6d. net. Antique Yapp, 17s. 6d. net.

The first edition of this work has now been out of print for two years. The new edition contains chapters on Thomas Hardy, John Drinkwater, Michael Field, J. C. Squire, W. H. Yeats, and Contemporary Women Poets.

AN ANTHOLOGY OF RECENT POETRY

Selected by E. D. WINTERS. Crown 8vo, 12s. pages, 8s. 6d. net.

This selection contains only the work of poets of to-day, and is thoroughly representative of their best work. More than fifty poets are included.

MEDIEVAL EUROPE

Vol. 10 in the "Great Nations" Series

By Lyss Tsuchkrom, Ph.D. With 24 Maps and Plans, and 32 Plates. Demy 8vo, 640 pages, 15s. 6d. net.

HARRAP'S BILINGUAL SERIES

1s. 6d. net.

General Editor—J. E. MANSON.

Modern Language Reader for the student who wishes to enlarge his vocabulary through reading. Each book consists of a carefully selected story, or other suitable material, with translation on opposite pages and a few notes.

Published, or in the Press.

FRANCE.

A. DAUDET, Lettres de mon Moulin. F. G. STERNER, Genrebuchmani.

M. DE SATELLE, La Novella di Romeo. W. W. JACOBS, Selected Stories.

E. A. PAUL, Le Scarabée d'Or. W. W. JACOBS, Selected Stories.

J. S. KEYWORTH, French for the Traveller.

SPANISH.

V. BLASCO IBANEZ, La Corrida. H. DRAKHOVSKY, Byron i Valled.

GERMAN.

T. W. SRMTR, Immerwährend.

A SPECIAL PROSPECTUS of this Series will be sent to any address on application.

WRITE FOR NEW CLASSIFIED CATALOGUE (1920).

LONDON:

GEORGE G. HARRAP & CO., LTD.

Directors: George G. Harrap and G. Oliver Anderson.

2 & 3, PORTSMOUTH STREET, KINGSWAY, W.C.

COLLINS

48, PALL MALL, S.W. 1.

LUCAS MALET'S

NEW NOVEL

THE TALL VILLA

MYSTERY AND IMAGINATION

Now Ready.

Also

Katharine Tynan's

DENYS THE DREAMER

A charming Irish Tale.

Other New Novels.

PANDORA'S YOUNG MEN

Frederick Watson.

"A great wit . . . a brilliant and scintillating satire . . . delicious caricatures . . . the liveliest spirit of farce."—Daily Telegraph.

THE BOOK OF YOUTH

Margaret Skelton.

"Margaret Skelton is a novelist of considerable possibilities, and this book in itself is a considerable achievement."—Times.

PATRICK SHAW-STEWART

by Ronald Knox. 8s. net

A delightful volume of letters and other material concerning one of the most brilliant of the young Oxford scholars, who were killed in the war. A friend and contemporary of Charles Lister and the Grenfell brothers.

SONGS FROM A YOUNG MAN'S LAND.

By Sir Clive Phillippo-Wolley.

Cr. 8vo.

Canadian Verse. 6s. net.
EINSTEIN’S GREAT BOOK

RELATIVITY: The Special and the General Theory of. By Albert Einstein, Professor of Physics in the University of Berlin. Translated by ROBERT W. LAWSON, Sheffield University. Crown 8vo. 5s. net. [In preparation]

In this book which is written for the average reader Prof. Einstein explains his famous theory of Relativity which has so excited the scientific world. It is intended primarily for those readers who, though interested in the trend of modern theory, are not conversant with the mathematical analysis used in theoretical physics. The Theory of Gravitation, which Einstein derives from his general theory of Relativity clears away many of the defects of the older theory. It has already explained results of Astronomical observation which have long been a stumbling block. It has stimulated thought and marks the commencement of a new Era in natural and scientific and philosophical research.

General Literature

THE LURE OF THE MAP. By W. P. James. Frap. 8vo. 5s. net.

THE EVANGELICAL REVIVAL. By S. Baring-Gould. Demy 8vo. 16s. net.

SCALA MUNDI. By Arthur Chandler, Lord Bishop of Bloemfontein. Author of “Ara Coeli.” Crown 8vo. 4s. 6d. net.

A HANDBOOK TO THE SEPTUAGINT. By Richard R. Otley. Crown 8vo. 8s. net.

GREEK TRAGEDY. By Gilbert Norwood, M.A., Professor of Greek in the University College, Cardiff. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

THE CONFESSIONS OF JACOB BOEHME. Compiled and edited by W. Scott Palmer. With an Introduction by Evelyn Underhill. Frap. 8vo. 5s. net.

Sport, Travel, etc.

A BOOK OF THE SEVERN. By A. G. Bradley. With 16 Illustrations in colour by R. H. Buxton. Demy 8vo. 15s. net.

LANCASHIRE. By F. H. Cheetham, F.S.A. With Illustrations and maps. [The Little Guides.] Small Pott 8vo. 6s. net.

Philosophy, Economics, Politics, etc.

CHAOΣ AND ORDER IN INDUSTRY. By G. D. H. Cole, M.A. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

SOCIAL ECONOMICS. By J. Harry Jones, M.A., Professor of Economics in the University of Leeds. Crown 8vo. 6s. net.

ECONOMICS. By James Cunnison, M.A., Lecturer in Social Economics in the University of Glasgow. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

NATIONALITY. By Sydney Herbert. Assistant Lecturer in International Politics, University College of Wales, Aberystwyth. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

THE PSYCHOLOGY OF PERSUASION. By William Macpherson, M.A., Inspector of Schools to the City of Bradford Education Committee. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

Scientific and Technical

THE MAMMARY APPARATUS OF THE MAMMALIA in the Light of Ontogenesis and Phylogenesis. By Ernst Bressau, M.D., late Professor at the University of Strasburg. With 47 Illustrations. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

METHUEN'S POPULAR NOVELS

JOHN BULL, JUNIOR. F. Wren Child

FIREBRAND TREVISON. Charles A. Seltzer

THE ARGUS PHEASANT. John C. Beecham

THE CODE OF THE MOUNTAINS. Charles Neville Buck

METHUEN & CO., LTD., 36, ESSEX STREET, LONDON, W.C.2.
THE CONDITION OF ENGLISH LITERATURE

Undoubtedly, English literature is suffering from a reaction after the war. Where literature should be most alive, there is one most aware of a general lassitude; this lassitude is manifest, in the work of our writers under forty years of age, in two distinct and complementary forms. On the one hand we have a deliberately exaggerated expression of what the French used to call _aquerobonisme_, a literature based not merely on the conscious diagnosis of a malady of perception and will—if it were, it would at least be symptomatic of constitutional strength—but on a sickly combination of timorous, half-hearted analysis, and of pleasure in the surrender to inhibition. It might be mistaken to stress the perennial insistence of immaturity upon its own uniqueness, because the discovery that true artistic individuality comes only after an arduous effort to discipline a merely personal otherness may often be long delayed. But the tinge of complacency in the indulgence of immediate sensation at the present day is too apparent to be neglected.

On the other hand, we have, principally in poetry, a curious phenomenon which we may call "right-mindedness." It too, we imagine, is in the main the outcome of a war-reaction; for the lassitude of which the former literary tendency is a direct expression has been the common lot of all sensitive minds, _l'ennui commun à toute personne bien née_. "Right-mindedness" is, fundamentally, a clumsy method of exorcising the devil that walketh at noon-day; it is the attempt to combat an insidious disease by assuming the outward behaviour of a man in health. Now if this literary habit, of which we discovered alarming evidences in "Georgian Poetry," were a deliberate and conscious convention, it too would be a sign of health. For two reasons. Not only is it essential that the artist should remain conscious up to the extreme point where consciousness is no longer possible, and the mechanism of an artistic convention aids him in this; but the careful practice of a deliberate convention would sooner or later involve the general recognition of the fact that it is an indispensable part of the highest artistic achievement. That is completely forgotten nowadays, and by the right-minded most of all. Since these affect a kind of _bergerie_, nothing could be better fitted to stiffen their backbone than an examination of the pastoral convention from Theocritus to Milton. But that is impossible for them, and, as a matter of fact, the "right-minded" tendency sways indeterminately between a reflection of the pastoral convention and a reflection of the romantic return to nature.

The real cause of its indeterminateness is that its impulse is negative. "Right-minded" literature is the expression of a turning-away from something "whose nature it has not paused to examine towards something it has not the capacity to conceive. It embraces nature, without knowing what nature is; it upholds the banner of the tradition, without looking to see what the tradition is, or whether a tradition can be truly said to exist at all. The result is, for the most part, a curious literature of unconscious _pæstiches_: it is like and yet unlike the poetry which the public remembers. Hence its uncommon popularity, and the disconcerting fact that the verse of three or four of these sincere but unimportant poets is more widely read than the work of Dr. Bridges or even of Mr. Hardy.

At ordinary times we might have a reasonable hope that such a condition of things, in which the literary work of the younger generation is divided... into two equally false tendencies, would be only a passing phase, for, if the times were ordinary, neither of them would have taken any real hold of the public. The writer would have been left to fight the battle of his own development alone. But the conditions are not ordinary. Various disturbing factors enter in. To name but two of them, there is a false sense of loyalty and a false sense of responsibility.

The young literary world is divided into two camps: the right-minded and the wrong-headed, the comprehensibles and the incomprehensibles, the top-dogs and the under-dogs. There are a few with a foot in both camps, and one or two in neither, but the general division holds, and a vigorous, if not altogether obvious warfare is carried on. It is a disastrous contest; it has none of the invigorating quality of a struggle between the old and the young, or of the struggle between one deliberate literary theory and another. It is like the social struggle, an internecine feud between the haves and the have-nots.

Since neither side professes allegiance to any literary principle, the loyalty that unites its members is purely partisan and negative. Thus the free production and discussion of literature is impeded, and, by the accident of circumstance, what might have been venial errors of partisanship are exaggerated by a false sense of responsibility into serious offences against literature. Never have so many young literary men had greatness thrust upon them as during the war; never has the immaturity of genuine, but unformed talent been so popular. It was not their fault. They were young, they were naive, they were credulous; they had had real experience of war, and they told what they could of the truth about it at a time when their elders were lying. They had every excuse for considering themselves creatures of genius, when their genius was so vehemently vouched for by people who ought to have known better. How should they know that they had barely begun the real work of literature? How should they know that most reviewers and most editors were as foolish and ill-educated as themselves? But not even the knowledge that the process was inevitable can reconcile us to the humiliating spectacle of these young great men delivering themselves of preposterous opinions with a slightly uncertain air of omniscience; and the spectacle is humiliating, whether we regard it as an exhibition how talent may be self-corrupted, or as indication of the contempt into which criticism has fallen.

A great many of our young men of letters have become public men at a stage of their development when they should have been employing all their energies in the repair of their interrupted education. We doubt whether there has ever been a generation of men of letters so startlingly uneducated as this, so little interested in the study of the great writers before them, so content to handle the English language as though it had been created de novo in the middle of the nineteenth century. The reason for this must be sought primarily; no doubt, in the war, which has inflicted upon so many the loss of five years in the most vital period of their intellectual development; but the tendency to jettison the burden of the past was discernible before the war.

Impatience of structure and thought, contempt for technique, the exaltation of sensational immediacy—all these were characteristic of young English literature before the war began; the war, by snapping the thin threads of tradition that remained, by setting literary apprentices in the position of literary masters, has hastened the process of disintegration.

It is easier to believe that the process must be checked than to see where or how. The general atmosphere of hostility and suspicion is inimical to a revival of criticism; yet this is the only way of salvation, the only means by which the fatal struggle between the haves and the have-nots can be converted into that most salutary of all encounters, a reasoned conflict between literary principles. If a critical protagonist from each side could be induced to state a positive case for work of the kind which he affected to admire and emulate, if it could be tacitly agreed that, however mistakenly, both sides were in pursuit of the same end, the advancement of English literature, and that insinuation and boycott are the weapons of a world morally inferior to that of literature, the atmosphere would be cleared of the miasma of bitterness which now obscures every critical issue of importance. As it is, we have chaos and anarchy and a lamentable waste of the best energies in capturing the popular suffrage.

J. M. S.

SPRING SICKNESS
The starlings clustered on the trees
Are gurgling in the rain;
From garden beds the white snow slips,
Leaving them bare again.
When shines the sun upon the earth,
And spring is everywhere;
Like Paradise, the apple trees
Are fresh and scent the air.
The spring will come to this gray town,
That stretches to the brink
Of rivers where the trees grow green
And almonds flush with pink.
A wish is mine, so fierce and vain,
A sudden wish to run
Where thrushes sing, where near the hedge
Are celandines in the sun.

Joan Arden.

CHINESE POND
Chinese pond is quick with leeches:
From its island knoll of beeches
Peers the temple, standing yet,
Heaped with dead leaves, all alone.
Mildew dims the lacquered panels
Where the channelling insect channels;
Blood-red dragons pine and fret
Who glare so grimly thereupon.
Mother-pearl and pink shells once
In formal geometrons
Counterchanged the inner wall:
Frieze and hangings, both are gone.
Knavish robin reconnoiters,
Unabashed the woodmouse loiters,
Brown owls hoot at shadow-fall,
Death-watch ticks and beetles drone.

Edmund Blunden.
REVIEW

THE OBJECTS

By NILE AND TIGERS. By Sir Wallis Budge, Keeper of the Egyptian and Assyrian Antiquities, British Museum. 2 vols. (Murray, 68s. net.)

THE objects lay quiet for thousands of years, many of them in tombs where love or superstition had placed them. When they were golden they sometimes tempted thieves; brick, stone, marble—when they were of these materials they built houses; when they contained animal matter or lime they were broken up to fertilize the fields; now and then they served as amulets. But they did not work on the general imagination of the living; or disturb sober Governments, until the fifteenth century after Christ. It was then that Italy began to take an interest in "the antique." "I go to awake the dead," cried Cyriae of Ancona; and an evocation began which seemed tremendous to contemporaries. The objects—mainly statues—were routed out of the earth, treated with acids and equipped with fig-leaves and tin petticoats; they were trundled about to meet one another, until they formed collections, which collections were presently dispersed through death or defeat, and the trundling recommenced. In the eighteenth century Egyptian objects also weighed in—not heavily at first, but Napoleon's expedition drew attention to them; and then the pace quickened. In the nineteenth century the soil was scratched all over the globe, rivers were dammed, rocks chopped, natives tortured, hooks were let down into the sea. What had happened? Partly an increase in science and taste, but also the arrival of a purchaser, wealthier than cardinals and quite unscrupulous—the modern European nation. After the Treaty of Vienna every progressive Government felt it a duty to amass old objects, and to exhibit a fraction of them in a building called a Museum, which was occasionally open free. "National possessions" they were now called, and it was important that they should outnumber the objects possessed by other nations, and should be genuine old objects, and not copies, which looked the same, but were said to be discrètable. Some of the Governments—for example, the French and the Italian—were happily placed, for they inherited objects from the connoisseurship of the past; others, like the German and our own, had less; while poor Uncle Sam started by having none, and Turkey relegated all to the will of Allah. The various Governments passed laws restricting exportation, and instructed their custom officials accordingly; and they also hired experts to buy for them and to intrigue against other experts. But an example will make the situation clearer. Let us follow the fortunes of B.M. 10470, or the "Papyrus of Ani." Ani lived at Thebes about one thousand and five hundred years before the birth of Christ. He was chancellor to Pharaoh and overseer of the royal granaries at Abydos, and, like all ancient Egyptians, he was troubled by the certainties of death. There was nothing vague in that river beneath the Nile, over whose twelve reaches Ani would have to make the voyage to the palace of Osiris. Its course was only too clear: there were myriads of details in it, and woe upon him if he forgot one! for he would be expelled from the god's boat and be damned. Everything spoke in that world of the under-waters. Even the lintel of the palace of Osiris said, "Who am I?" and the bolts, "Who are we?" The four Apses at the prows of the boat were vocal, and it was necessary to address them in precisely the following words: "... Let me pass through the secret doors of the Other World. Let cakes and ale be given to me as to the Spirits, and let me go in and come out from Rastan," so that they might reply: "Come, for we have done away thy wickedness and put away thy sin, and we have destroyed all the evil which pertained to thee on earth. Thou shalt enter Rastan and pass through the secret doors of the Other World. Cakes and ale shall be given unto thee. . . ." Ani could not hope to address the apos with accuracy. His memory was but human; so, buying a strip of papyrus eighty feet long, he had it inscribed with all he would have to say, and it was placed in a square niche in the north wall of his tomb, and was tied with a cord of papyrus and fastened by a clay seal. No apes and lintels would trouble him now, for his "Book of the Dead" would undertake every dialogue, and having reached the palace he would himself become Osiris, Osiris-Ani, an immortal.

The papyrus lay in the dust for centuries, and during the flux of time that we call history, not seeing the sunlight until 1886 A.D. It was then discovered by some natives. Egypt was still a nation, and had so far advanced as to have a Museum at Cairo and a Director, M. Grebaud. Britain had become a nation with a Museum in Bloomsbury, and had sent her Mr. (now her Sir Wallis) Budge to take what he could from Egypt. It was to Sir Wallis that the natives turned, because he paid more than M. Grebaud, although they risked imprisonment and torture. Going by night with them to the tomb, he broke the clay seal, and was "amazed at the beauty and freshness of the colours of the human figures and animals, which, in the dim light of the candles and the heated air of the tomb, seemed to be alive." From that moment Ani was dumb. His voice, his "Book of the Dead," was taken, and he can no longer reply to questions in the Under World. Sir Wallis put his find into a tin box, and hid it in a house whose walls abutted on the garden of a hotel at Luxor. M. Grebaud sailed in pursuit, but his boat stuck. However, he sent on a messenger, who told Sir Wallis that he was arrested on the charge of illegally acquiring antiquities, and then asked for bakhshish. "We gave him good bakhshish, and then began to question him." As a result, the native dealers gave a feast to all the policemen and soldiers in Luxor, and an atmosphere of good-fellowship was created. The house containing the Papyri of Ani and Osiris had not been sealed by the police, pending M. Grebaud's arrival; guards were posted on its roof, and sentries at its door. The dealers invited the sentries to drink cognac or to take a stroll, but they refused. However, the manager of the hotel was more sympathetic, and his gardeners dug by night through the abutting wall into the house, so that Sir Wallis could remove all the antiquities—though he left a coffin which belonged to the British military authorities, in the hope that it would make bad blood between them and M. Grebaud. Next day the Papyrus reached Cairo, and was smuggled across the Ksar el Nil bridge as the personal luggage of two British officers, to whom Sir Wallis related his trouble. The officers loved doing the Egyptian Government. Even more helpful was Major Hepper, R.E., met in the Mess; Major Hepper thus expressed himself: "I think I can help you, and I will. As you have bought these things, which you say are so valuable for the British Museum, and they are to be paid for with public money, they are clearly the property of the British Government." He then placed the Papyri of Ani in a case which was labelled in sequence with some Government property, and took it, in his military capacity, to England, where he gave it to the British Museum. It may not be on exhibit, but we have it, which is what matters. It would be humiliating to think it was on exhibit at Cairo.

The above yarn, and many another, are told by the author in the jolliest way. He has something of the Renaissance desperado about him, and one can well imagine him "collecting" for Simondon Malatesta or Isabella d’Este with the assistance of a poignard. He enjoys being cruel to M. Grébaut, whose honesty and simplicity he despises; he enjoys pushing a young Turkish official into the waters of the Tigris. He has written a most delightful book, from which one could quote for hours, and yet he leaves an impression of vulgarity at the close. The vulgarity is not personal. It emanates from the system that tolerates the abuses, Tariffs, taxation, and snobbery of the Museum business come out strongly beneath this tale of derring-do. Our “national possessions” are not accessible, nor do we insist that they should be; for our pride in them is merely competitive. Nor do such fractions as are accessible stimulate our sense of beauty or of religion: as far as Museums breed anything it is a gibberish familiarity with labels. Yet to stock their locked cellars these expeditions and intrigues go on, and elderly gentlemen are set to pick one another’s pockets beneath tropic skies. It is fine if you think the modern nation is, without qualification, fine; but if you have the least doubts of your colossal, a disgust will creep over you and you will wish that the elderly gentlemen were employed more honestly. After all, what is the use of old objects? They breathe their dead words into too dead an ear. It was different in the Renaissance, which did get some stimulus. It was important that the Laocoön should be found. But the discovery of the Hermes of Praxiteles and the loss of the sculptures of Sargon II. are equally meaningless to the modern world. Our age is industrial, and it is also musical, and one or two nice things; but its interest in the past is mainly faked.

Sir Wallis’s own interest is no doubt genuine; he is certainly interested in his fellow-men, and there are moments when one feels him the ideal Oriental traveller. He is accompanying buggering “over behind me in Baghdad a little gift in the bosom made blind the eyes”; and yet he can treat the Oriental respectfully. On one occasion he was entertained by some thieves:

“My difficulty of the previous day repeated itself, and not a man, old or young, would accept a gift from me: when I pressed them each said it would be a shame; and the shékhs refused even tobacco. Just as we were going to mount the shékhs came up to me and said, “Knowest thou how to write?” I said, “Yes.” “Then,” said he, “take thy pen and write in thy book this: ‘I and my camels lodged in the house of Sulmán ibn Khidr, shék of the place, and when I rose he took me at daybreak; of all my possessions I had lost nothing except the service of Sulmán ibn Khidr.” When I had rendered his words to the best of my ability I took out my knife and began to cut the leaf out of the book and then weeping that he was to lose the paper added his&gt;&lt;div data-ctm="f5 0 2500 2500">of his honesty towards his guests. But he stopped me saying, “Cut not, cut not; keep the writing and thou shalt remember Sulmán.” Then I realized that all he wanted was that I should not forget the most opportune service which he had rendered me, and that he had treated me as a friend and wished to be remembered as a friend.

Indeed, Sir Wallis makes friends all over the East, who appear when most he needs them, and turn his career into an unending triumph. In practice it was probably a tussled compromise, like most careers, but he does not tell us so; and when he does come a crash (as in the Rassam libel case) he carries it off with a swagger. Of his adventures on rafts and in caves: of the old man who said Hâ until he dislocated the traffic of Mosul; of the lady in the same city whose garment was unwound by a dog; of the stewponds of Abraham and Potiphar’s wife; of the Nile boatmen who grounded, and cultivated melons upon the mud until the river rose again; of the parrot that cried, “Darn the minor Prophets!” —of these and of other treasures the book is inexhaustible mine; while the archaeologist will find in it a convenient résumé of the excavations in Mesopotamia, together with much other information. Despite its formlessness, it is the most fascinating travel book that has appeared for years, for Sir Wallis has not only learning and vitality, but the sense of fun and the sense of beauty.

The afternoon was bright, and the view one of the finest I have ever seen. The buildings of the city stood out clear with their domes and minarets, and the setting sun painted the stonework a blood-red hue... The city was surrounded with living green, and lay like a great green fan on the living desert which hemmed it in. The sight of it thus made it easy to understand why the writers and poets have raved about Damascus and called it the “garden of the East,” the “spot where beauty passeth the night and taketh its rest,” “the region the stones of which are pearls, the earth amethysts, and the air avertless.” Within the waters and its green fields and gardens and its flowering trees, was the Earthly Paradise. And Muhammed the Prophet, who stood on Mount Kasyrun one evening and gazed over the city for a long time, declared not to go down the mountain until he had seen its delights should spoil his enjoyment of the Paradise of God in Heaven.

Of the Missions recounted, by far the most thrilling is the third (r88-9), in which Sir Wallis, accompanied by a Mr. N. White, sails from Constantinople to Alexandretta and thence goes overland to Mosul. The position of the British Museum was different in Mesopotamia from what it was in Egypt: the injured rather than the injurious party, it was trying to stop the leakage of objects from sites that the Turk had discovered and was able to excavate. Sir Wallis’s adventures were tremendous, and his description of the caravan which slowly accreted round himself and Mr. N. White, and was finally robbed by the murderous Shammar, is a masterpiece of cumulative effect. Mr. N. White is also a masterpiece. Though nothing definite is told us about that young gentleman, one knows him through and through. He was the son of our ambassador at Constantinople, who obliged Sir Wallis to take him as the price of his diplomatic assistance. Handsome, clever and generous, but utterly selfish, he came as near as a human agent may to thwarting the British Museum. Sometimes he hurt his knee, sometimes he strayed with Turkish officers, and at one time with masses of petitioners from the neighboring villages and wished Sir Wallis to take them to Europe. He tried to break loose in India, but was brought as far as Egypt, where his father’s agent met him and put him on a boat which sailed, not to Constantinople, as he expected, but to Manitoba! Mr. N. White must have been a great drag on Sir Wallis, and perhaps for that reason our hearts go out to him. For, delightful as these volumes are, they lack one quality: they fail to enlist our sympathies with the author—the touch of the fillister in him prevents it. It is fun when he pushes the Turk into the Tigris, but it would have been funnier had he fallen in himself. We part from him with admiration, but without tenderness, and with an increased determination to rob the British Museum. “The Keeper of the Egyptian Antiquities is understood to be entirely prostrated as a consequence of the daring theft of the celebrated Papyrus of Ani.” Would that one was in a position to write such a sentence and to post it to M. Grébaut for his use in the Under World!

E. M. F.

“The Government Inspector.”

We much regret that in an article containing a criticism of this play which appeared on page 553 of our issue of April 23 certain words were used which might be construed as imputing to Miss Mary Grey want of ability in her profession of an actress. We deeply regret that any such words were allowed to appear in our columns. The article in question was received at a time when the Editor was away from town, and it was inadvertently passed by one of the Assistant Editors. Had the Editor himself been in charge at the time, the words in question would never have been passed. We unreservedly withdraw the said words, and beg to offer our sincere apologies to Miss Mary Grey for having printed and published them,
SPEECH AND EDUCATION

The Philosophy of Speech. By George Willis. (Allen & Unwin, 7s. 6d. net.)

Mr. Willis's book is not so much a connected system of philosophy as a series of thoughts on various subjects connected with the faculty of speech. Beginning with a discussion of the origins of speech (he adheres to the "bow-wow" theory and gives one or two suggestive examples of the way in which it is possible to escape from the poulty yard to which Max Miller eternally doomed the omnivores), he goes on to show the connection of the history of speech with the history of thought; he devotes a chapter to metaphor, another to the question of spelling and spelling reform, others to grammar and correct speech, and a final section to speech and education. One does not always agree with Mr. Willis, but one can never find him anything but very entertaining and stimulating. Within the limits of this short review it is impossible to discuss adequately all the subjects with which he deals. We shall confine ourselves, then, to a few comments on Mr. Willis's last chapter. "Speech and Education"—in many ways the most suggestive in the book.

An uneducated person [says Mr. Willis] is known by his speech, or rather by his want of speech, by the narrowness of his range of expression and comprehension. The reason of this deficiency is not hard to discover. Two-thirds of English words are borrowed from the Latin. Therefore, in order to understand the English language of to-day, it is necessary to have some knowledge of the elements of Latin. It is this knowledge which our Public Schools confer and which our national schools do not.

A knowledge of the derivation of a word of foreign origin enables us to attach a definite, sensible image to it: It is utterly impossible to apprehend the ideas which these words [c.e., crude, coruscating, evolution] convey without the mediation of some sensible image; once a word becomes disconnected with its sensible image it becomes useless, a mere encumbrance to the language, a piece of dropical vertig, a pitfall for the careless thinker, a cloak for sham learning, pseudo-science, and all manner of imposture.

The profound truth of this statement is proved every day by a thousand illiterate journalists. The remedy, then, according to Mr. Willis, lies in the universal teaching of Latin. But the Public School master must not begrudge too soon Mr. Willis is entirely opposed to the methods and aims of the teaching of Latin at the Public Schools. To whip grammar and syntax into the young, to try to make them write correctly in a foreign idiom, seems to him ludicrous. Latin is valuable to us only for its vocabulary, and he would have the child taught as little grammar and syntax as possible. Hence the authors the child must read should not be of the Augustan period, should not write a language that is even copper Latin. They should be medieval writers, whose vocabulary is Latin, and whose grammar is wholly English or French or Italian or German, or whatever their native language happens to be. A useful reading-book is the "Gesta Romanorum," with its limpidly simple syntax and its often quite amusing stories.

There is undoubtedly much to be said for Mr. Willis's suggestion. It would be easy to find among medieval writers plenty of works in prose and verse which should be a great deal less boring than Cicero, less incomprehensible alien than Horace. There is much pleasant reading, for example, in Guido delle Colonne's "Troy Book," the syntax of which is even less Latin than that of the "Gesta Romanorum"; while the Christian hymns of St. Bernard's school, of Adam of St. Victor and the rest, which often combine the highest poetical merit with easily comprehensible language and metre, would serve admirably as the basis of a child's poetical education. It would be very interesting to see how Mr. Willis's scheme worked out in practice.

IRISH PHILOSOPHY

A Short History of Celtic Philosophy. By Herbert Moore Pim. (Dundalk, W. Tempest; London, T. N. Foulis, 7s. 6d.)

A STUDENT of Irish writings in the vernacular knows that, with the exception of a few late fragmentary versions of scholastic texts, there is no formal philosophical composition in Gaelic. He is, therefore, tempted to generalize, and to declare that the Irish of mediæval and pre-mediæval times were not philosophically minded. But here he must reckon with Mr. Pim. Mr. Pim claims very reasonably that the "world-dignity" of a people is greatly enhanced by its original work in philosophy. "Think," he cries, "of Greece and Rome without their philosophers!" For our part, we find it very easy to think of Rome, at all events, without its philosophers. But it is certain that to have adventured boldly in speculative thought is no small addition to the credentials of a nation. It is Mr. Pim's task to prove that the Irish have produced a sufficient body of original philosophy to justify this claim.

He supports his thesis partly by reference to actual philosophical writing immediately recognizable as such, partly by a drastic use of the method of allegorical interpretation. Of formal philosophers he assigns four to the Celts: Johannes Scottus Erigena, Duns Scotus, Berkeley and Hutchinson. On this list it may be remarked that Erigena was inebriated, as his name implies, an Irishman; Duns Scotus is a mysterious person of whose origin little is known, but it is extremely doubtful that he was born in Ireland; and neither Berkeley nor Hutchinson would have admitted for a moment that they were Celts. The one philosopher of whose Celtic (or rather Irish) origin we can be absolutely assured is Johannes Scottus. His position in the history of mediæval philosophy is a considerable one; and he is a legitimate glory of the Irish people.

The philosophy of Johannes Scottus is commonly affiliated to Neo-Platonism. Mr. Pim agrees that his system "resembled to a large extent the doctrine of the Neo-Platonists." But he would have us believe that he "derived much of his pantheism from the mass of thought by which he was surrounded in Ireland." The chief aim of this book is to prove that such a "mass of thought" existed. We cannot say that we think that the case has been made out. Mr. Pim's method is simple. Plato we know, used myths to illustrate his philosophical doctrines. Now the old Irish legendary tales, says Mr. Pim, are just such myths, and the doctrines of the idealistic philosophy which they were composed to illustrate may be extracted from them by ingenious manipulation. The doctrines thus revealed are the "mass of thought" from which Johannes Scottus derived his philosophy.

The dangers of this method are obvious. The texts from which the doctrines are to be extracted are of various date and authorship. Though a considerable number of them have been published, there exists as yet no agreed arrangement and valuation of them. For instance, it is not yet clear how much they owe to the background of dark-age Latin tradition which was in the mind of their redactors. On p. 30 of this book Mr. Pim speaks as though he thought that the doctrine of the creation of the first man from the four elements was a part of Celtic mythology. It is in fact a general mediæval theme deriving in all probability from the Book of Enoch.

There is one main conclusion to be drawn from all this: that, until the early history of Irish literature has been investigated on normal lines, speculations of this kind are not very profitable, and can lead to no certain conclusions.

R. F.
INDIAN NATIONALITY

Indian Nationality. By R. N. Gilchrist. (Longmans. 7s. 6d. net.)

EVEN those who have only been able during these recent years to follow what is happening in India at a distance of several thousand miles can appreciate to some extent the speed with which history is there in the making. It would have been incredible ten years ago that in 1920 not only would the beginnings of a system of self-government be actually set up in that country, but the Anglo-Indian official world openly profess its readiness to go on from to-day relinquishing by progressive stages the administration to Indian hands. Those perhaps who see deepest into what is happening do not waste the changes exactly with light-hearted jubilation, as if India were now bound automatically to enter upon splendid days; they see no certainty of success, but they do see a great opportunity from which good or evil may come according to the way it is dealt with by the multitude of human personalities upon whose action and interaction the issue depends. They see the difficulties to be overcome. Anyone ignorant of them can learn about some, at any rate, from Professor Gilchrist's little book on "Indian Nationality."

The idea of "India," as a national unity, calling for the devotion of the individual, is, as Professor Gilchrist makes clear, the outcome of quite recent conditions. It is a consequence of the whole of the peninsula having been brought under British supremacy. If British rule had been limited to a single Indian country, say Bengal, we should probably have had a nationalism for which Bengal, not India, was the nation, the motherland. Even to-day the idea of India is active only in the minority whose education has extended their imagination beyond the bounds of their immediate environment. It has, of course, long been recognized by Indians that there is a culture characteristic of India as a whole, just as Europeans recognize that there is a distinctive European culture; but that cultural unity has no more implied a single nation in the political sense in India than it has done in Europe. Professor Gilchrist sets forth the difficulties in the way of constituting India a single nation—its divisions of language and religion and caste; yet he is hopeful, in spite of all, that the idea inspiring present-day Indian Nationalism—India one nation—will be realized in actual fact in the days to come. But he holds that this can only be a federal unity, in which the diversities of language and tradition and government continue. We may agree with him not only that this will be so, but that it is good that it should be so. Such an India would be one much more rich in interest and life than an India in which centralization suppressed variety. No doubt if India were ever left to battle for itself amid a world of strong rival nations, it might seem necessary to Indians to subordinate every other consideration to that of efficiency secured by rigorous centralization. But it would mean the crushing out of much that might be gracious and pleasant in a life allowed, according to the diversities of race and region and history, to go its own way. And one hopes that the future world will be a more peaceful world, in which the peoples of India will have leisure to think of other things than efficiency in combat.

The spirit of Professor Gilchrist's book, in which the happenings of the present are looked at from the standpoint of the sedate historian, remote from the passions and animosities of the day, is highly commendable. It would be good for many inflamed minds to look at the facts, if only by a momentary detachment, in the same calm, comprehensive way. And there is one thing which may strike an English reader as cheering when, with Professor Gilchrist, he surveys, in its large historical outlines, the process by which an Indian nationality has been so far developed under the British raj—it is when looked at in its large outlines that the British raj, he may find, presents the most favourable aspect. The ugly things which have appeared in it from time to time—an Amritsar massacre, for instance—affect painfully enough those who stand so close to the structure that anything unsightly in the details of it may for the time being fill their field of vision. If we stand a little distance off and look at the structure as a whole, we do seem to see the progressive shaping and strengthening of the Indian peoples for one great Indian nation go forward through the century and a half during which our countrymen have had the control. Where there has been friction and bitterness it has been due to the blustering contact between individuals of a particular temperament and other individuals, and that is a kind of bitterness which happily may pass as the individuals who have caused it and felt it pass off the scene. On the other hand, an Englishman may cling to the hope that when British rule is looked back upon by a future generation of Indians, the population of India surveyed as a whole, the epithet "beneficent" will still remain attached to it.

The criticism that may be made of Professor Gilchrist's book is not that its presentation of things is untrue, but that it too often reminds one of Charles Lamb's description of the Scotchman: "Persons of this nation are particularly fond of affirming a truth, which nobody doubts. They do not so properly affirm as announce it. They do indeed appear to have such a love of truth (as if, like virtue, it were valuable for itself) that all truth becomes equally valuable, whether the proposition that contains it be new or old, disputed or such as is impossible to become a subject of disputation." Is Professor Gilchrist only being true to national type when he writes such a sentence as "The creation and maintenance of a system of rights require the recognition, either explicit or implicit, of rights; in other words, the notion of citizenship must underlie the state"? This is not to say that the book does not contain a number of interesting facts and observations worth making. If they were concentrated and the truisms and repetitions cut out, the book might perhaps be considerably reduced in size, but it would gain in effectiveness.

Sir Verney Lovett, in his "History of the Indian Nationalist Movement," gives a narrative of recent events from the point of view of one who has been practically concerned in the administration of India. As might be expected, his book is mainly concerned to demonstrate the reality of the subversive agitation which compelled repressive measures on the part of the Government. What, however, is perhaps most remarkable in the book is the fact that at the present day a man like Sir Verney Lovett, recognized as the chief of the school of political thought which is one towards which it is natural and right that Indians should strive. There are passages which seem to show that Sir Verney is really aware that at the root of the whole Nationalist Movement is the desire for personal dignity. To find oneself a member of a subject race in one's own land cannot but be a personal humiliation. Had Europeans come into India who treated the Indians as social and political equals, it is quite possible that no Nationalist Movement would ever have come into being. The individual Indian might have felt his personal dignity secured to him, as the member of a society of modern European culture, just as the men of Western Asia in Hellenistic and Roman times felt themselves Greeks. When, on the other hand, the individual Indian found his position in European society one of unchangeable inferiority, it was natural that he should seek to rescue his dignity as a man by raising and glorifying, against the assumption of the West, that society of which he was born a member. In order that he might feel proud to be an Indian, he had to recreate an India which should hold as honourable a place among modern nations as the India of the past held among the then existing peoples of the earth.

E. B.

WILLIAM JOHN COURTHOPE

The Country Towns; And Other Poems. By the late William John Courthope, C.B. with a Memoir by A. O. Prickard. (Oxford: University Press. 2s. 6d. net.)

W. J. Courthope, 1842-1917. By J. W. Mackail. ("Proceedings of the British Academy.") (Milford. Is. 6d. net.)

Felix opportunitate moris is a well-known, if a somewhat oblique congratulation. There is no obliquity in posthumously congratulating anybody who has escaped a biography of the kind too frequently accorded of late to persons of some notoriety by others who do not possess the very rare gifts for the purpose, yet who, at the same time, has received appropriate and proportionate tributes such as these two memoir-essays by Mr. Mackail and Mr. Prickard. The two papers have acquired additional value from the conclusion or division of labour between their authors—Mr. Prickard's dealing most with the life, Mr. Mackail's (as becomes an Academic obituary) with the work; but there is no absolute wall of partition, and the two are complementary rather than merely cumulative.

There is no doubt that a sufficiently enterprising and industrious member of the class that adds a new terror to death might easily have made a volume—perhaps even two, for such things have been done—out of Mr. Courthope. He had to the full that Public School and University education on which almost any required amount can be built. He had a long and successful official career. He occupied one of the most individual (perhaps the most individual of all) academic posts in the three kingdoms—the Oxford Professorship of Poetry. And after in youth doing original work of not a little brilliance, he betook himself to criticism, with the result—and not the only one—of accomplishing the most elaborate history of his professorial subject in English that has yet been composed. Nor was this, in Christopher North's sarcastic phrase on himself and Jeffrey, mere porter's work.

Whether Mr. Courthope's critical position was one fully worked out; whether it was entirely intelligible to others, or even quite completely commanded by himself, may be a question, and more than one question. That it was deliberately taken, and was one by no means merely prepared for him by predecessors, is quite certain.

Mr. Prickard has pointed out that something of this critical attitude was more than foreshadowed in the Prize Essay on "The Genius of Spenser" so long ago as 1868. Neither then nor afterwards did Mr. Courthope do justice to Spenser; but he did, in a certain sense, justice to himself by announcing his critical position, or one side of it, clearly enough. As Mr. Prickard puts it, this was the axiom, or at least the theory, that "the greatest poets have shown themselves to be such by the harmonious blending of two or more opposite tendencies forced on them by the conditions of time and national history." He thought that this "test" could be satisfactorily applied to Chaucer, Milton and Pope; that Spenser failed under it. It would be quite out of place here to argue over the correctness of these applications or the reality and sufficiency of the "test" itself, though the present writer would have no objection to doing so. But it is obvious that a critic who lays down such a test, or set of tests—for it will of course be seen that "the conditions of time and national history" complicate enormously, while they also restrict, the "harmonious blending of opposite tendencies"—indicates very clearly, though from some points of view rather fatally, his own limitations. He will not approach his subject with the question—at once as simple as individuality, and as wide as the universe—"Does this strike me as poetry?" following it up with "How?" and "Why?" if he thinks proper. He will constantly have his eye on his tests, and will have to satisfy himself first that there are the opposite tendencies, then that they are harmonized, then that this or that condition, etc., before he "passes" the poet. And this is practically what Mr. Courthope did in the abundant and sometimes distinguished critical exercises of his remaining half-century. His principles led him sometimes into what at any rate seemed to others, even when they agreed with him politically, unfortunate confusions of politics and literature; into, as it again seemed to others, undue "dumping" of social and historical matter on the ground of pure letters; sometimes perhaps even into actual literary heresy of the worst kind, as in his depreciation of Lyric. But at all events it and his other "Neoclassic" beliefs gave him a definite standpoint of his own, and one from which not valueless correcting sights could be given than taken.

In his own early original work something of this "harmony of opposites" might perhaps be seen when compared with this criticism. It is a long time since the present writer saw "Ludibria Luncy," which appears never to have been reprinted. But his impression of it is more favourable than either of the commentators before us seems to have formed—whether from personal judgment or from contemporary opinion, especially Conington's, is not quite clear. The "Paradise of Birds" which followed was, and has remained, an admitted success. But official duties and the additional occupation of editing Pope after Elwin, and writing his own extensive "History," not to mention some minor things seem to have dried up his vein for verse except very occasionally. Some of the occasional exceptions have been deservedly collected in this little volume. The earliest and by far the best thing in the book, "An Evening in Sussex," in very graceful octosyllables, dates from 1868. It stands between two other poems ("The Country Town" [Lewes] and "Hop-Picking") on the same county, which thus possessed two contrasted Laureates at the same time in Mr. Courthope and Mr. Kipling. Both, though one is in Spenserian and the other in heroic couplets, reflect that strong preference for eighteenth-century poetry which marked Mr. Courthope's later days. "The Chancellor's Garden" is also in Spenserians, but attempts the original style. There are two war poems—for 1900 and 1914 respectively; and two excellent stanzas on the theme "Labantur Annii," with as excellent translations into Greek and Latin by the late Professor Butcher. Last but one comes verses on the "Lac D'Oie," which may be either Mr. Courthope's or Mr. Paul Willerl's. From internal evidence the present writer would not assign them to the former. However this may be, the book is decidedly welcome, for the text as well as for the memoir. You cannot reasonably ask of a critic that he shall write poetry of the highest class; and he is quite entitled to write, or at least publish, none at all. But it may be demanded of him that he shall not write, or at any rate shall not publish, bad poetry; and it is a sort of not too flaunting feather in his cap that he shows himself able to write poetry in this or that degree good. It rounds off that character, "a scholar and a gentleman," which Mr. Courthope's other work amply vindicates for him, and which, in yet other ways, Mr. Prickard and Mr. Mackail fitly commemorate, and not a few of his contemporaries and acquaintances will gladly counter sign.

George Saintsbury.
A GREAT INVENTOR

The Life and Work of Sir Hiram S. Maxim. By P. F. Motteley. (Lane. 7s. 6d. net.)

The list of patents obtained by Sir Hiram Maxim fills eleven and a half pages of small print. They cover just fifty years, the first being granted in August, 1860, and the last in August, 1916, and they range from an “Improvement in guns for firing” to “Improvements relating to the conversion of heavy hydrocarbons into lighter hydrocarbons.” A comprehensive account of such a career would obviously be unreadable; Mr. Motteley has wisely chosen to present us with a few sample inventions in order to illustrate the characteristics of Sir Hiram’s mind. He has naturally chosen those relating to machine guns, powders, explosives and so on, for Sir Hiram’s fame is indubitably bound up, in the popular mind, with the great advance in the means of destruction which formed part of the general progress of the last fifty years.

The first great leap forward was, of course, the Maxim gun. Sir Hiram had long puzzled over the problem of utilizing the recoil of a gun and making it do useful work, and finally he hit on a device whereby the recoil could be made to load and fire the gun automatically. No hand-worked gun could compete with it. In the German competitive trials the little Maxim gun shot off its 333 cartridges in half-a-minute and mortised a large hole through the very centre of the bull’s-eye. The Emperor placed his hand on the Maxim gun and said, “That is the gun; there is no other.” It was indeed a notable improvement, as the Soudan campaign showed. With the Gardener guns, which frequently became jammed, the British soldiers could not always stop the rush of the savage Soudanese swordsmen, and the advance of civilization in Egypt was thereby hampered. With the Maxim gun the advance was assured.

Sir Hiram next turned his attention to powders and high explosives. His insight was remarkable and his work in this connection of the greatest importance. Although not the first to do so, he independently invented a picric acid explosive, an explosive which can shatter a strong steel shell into fine dust. This magnificent substance is, however, somewhat recalcitrant, and for that reason its practical application in blowing up ships is unfortunately limited. Nevertheless, as an important constant, it is found in thirty-one explosives listed in the “British Service Dictionary of Explosives.”

In the course of his experiments Sir Hiram had been led to ponder over the cause of erosion in large guns. It occurred to him that it was due to the gas passing the driving band at the instant of firing. He at once thought of a remedy. “If the passage of the gas be opposed by a semi-plastic substance which is momentarily put under a pressure considerably higher than the pressures of the powder gases, erosion will be prevented and the life of a gun increased ten to twenty times.” Canet, in Paris, was convinced by Sir Hiram’s reasoning, but went on to say that it would never be adopted as “there is no country where those who have any say in the matter are not interested either directly or indirectly in the production of guns, or of steel for making guns.” Sir Hiram’s subsequent attempts to have his invention tested in this country convinced him that Canet was right. It is an interesting sidelight on the difficulties with which progress, even so popular a form of progress, has to contend.

Apart from his inventions, Sir Hiram Maxim does not exist in Mr. Motteley’s pages. He is presented to us, by omission, as a man wholly absorbed in mechanical and chemical devices. Perhaps this is, essentially, a just picture. We cannot imagine Sir Hiram taking any very wide view of his activities. His reaction to a mechanism was independent of the purpose of the mechanism; it was simple and instantaneous; he wanted to understand it and make it work better. It was a mere accident of circumstance, of the fact that he was born into a modern civilized community, that directed his inexhaustible energy and ingenuity to perfecting the means of destroying life.

AN AMATEUR PSYCHOLOGIST

The Broken Barrier. By the Rev. A. V. Magee. (Skeffington. 4s. net.)

From an author who sets out “to investigate seriously some psychical problems and to show . . . that the Church has means of communicating [with the dead] more certain than the séance,” the public is justified in asking some knowledge of the canons of evidence, some proof of independent study of the question, and, at least, some knowledge of the work of the present century on such questions as trance-mediumship. Not one of these conditions is fulfilled in Mr. Magee’s work. We find a story of an anonymous professor and medium, narrated by an unnamed letter-writer to an unnamed recipient, put forward as a case for: which neither animal magnetism (explained as electrical in its nature) nor lying spirits nor the subliminal self will account. It has not occurred to the author to cross-question his witness, nor to make inquiries into the facts for himself, or even into the medium’s reputation; yet these are precautions that no serious investigator would dream of omitting.

A resolution to avoid barren scepticism and blind credulity is no excuse for writing that “it is a well-known fact that in spirit control the medium takes on the likeness of the controlling spirit,” and following it up with the dictum that the case of Mrs. Piper does not “command assent.” The author’s references to the Piper case reveal his ignorance of what has been written on it during the last twenty years, and his theory of the case—lying spirits—does not even explain the most elementary facts. In her trances the hand of Mrs. Piper wrote scripts purporting to be the work of deceased human beings; the facts detailed in them were unknown to the normal Mrs. Piper, and were grouped in a manner to suggest to friends of the deceased that the consciousness of the latter still survived. But where it has been a question of reading a sealed letter, written by a deceased person, the knowledge was obtained by mediums whose failures have been unbroken by a solitary success. If the author’s lying spirits can ransack the minds of the dead and put forward a colourable representation of a supposed communicator, there is no reason to suppose that the contents of a sealed letter would be beyond their reach. Even if this were not so, there is no assignable ground for the actions of the supposed lying spirits; nor yet does the form of the communications suggest that their activity is involved.

Not only is the author’s judgment seriously at fault in the Piper case, but he shows no signs of having so much as glanced at anything besides the twenty-year-old book by M. Sage, which was not, even as a new work, a wholly satisfying popularization of the earlier Piper reports; he knows neither the reports themselves at first hand nor the discussions of them by Mrs. Sidgwick and other writers. His second chapter contains some vague talk about the powers of the subliminal; but it has not occurred to him to suggest that much of the confusion and positive error in trance communications may be due to the interaction of the medium’s subliminal with the communicating intelligence; yet it is a far more probable hypothesis than lying spirits. Mr. Magee’s total ignorance of method, wedded to almost total ignorance of facts and neglect of the work of experts, does not make for edification.
GERMANY AND THE FRENCH REVOLUTION

EARLY in this excellent book Mr. Gooch quotes Wordsworth’s famous lines:

“Bliss was it in that dawn to be alive,
But to be young was very heaven.”

Youth is not a necessity for sympathy with revolutionary movements, since Campe, the Brunswick pedagogue, was advanced in years when he went to France, and wrote ecstatically: “Is it really true that I am in Paris; that the Newtonian Greeks and Romans whom I have among us for only a few weeks ago, are Frenchmen’?” But it is just as well to be young when thrones are tottering, because then the discovery that the glittering thing which takes their place is not wholly gold can be endured, or even ignored. The great Germans who ruled the world of letters when the Bastille fell were mostly middle-aged, with the “Aufflärung” and the “Sturm und Drang” behind them. So when to the fall of the Bastille there succeeded the September massacres, and to the September massacres, the executions of the King and Queen, they inevitably took refuge in conservatism. Friedrich Schlegel went some distance along the road of reform before he side-slipped into the classics, and that wonderful old man, Kant, actually drifted towards democracy; “my whole being shudders,” said he, “when I think of servitude.” But most of them were content with the benevolent despotism they knew, even if they could not altogether have blinked the fact that in many cases the despotism vastly exceeded the benevolence. “We must make citizens,” wrote Schiller, “before we present them with a constitution.”

Revolutions indeed, unless, like the Risorgimento, they are but lightly touched by civil bloodshed, seldom bear close scrutiny. If we compare the experiences of Pead, Garibaldi’s Englishman, and those other Englishmen who George Meredith commemorated in “Vittoria,” with the Germans in France, as described by Mr. Gooch in some chapters of “England’s Historical Involvement,” we are at once struck by the melancholy contrast. We get, for instance, the charming Georg Forster racing off to Paris with wild hope in his heart, only to break that heart. Adam Lux offered himself in his despair a willing victim to the minis of Charlotte Corday. And then there is Anacharsis Cloots, a man of extreme views, but then there is the bloodthirsty bufoon that Carlyle imagined him to be, who died on the scaffold with a smile on his lips, claiming the grim privilege to be the last of the batch to mount it. The infamous ex-monk Schneider perambulated Alsace, on the other hand, with a portable guillotine. No, the Revolution, as viewed at close quarters, was not nice, nor was its appearance on German soil agreeable, and yet, with their swagger and competition for food in the market-places, had already given France a bad name. The soldiers of Cunliffe, who followed them, fraternized with citizens who donned the tricolour, but soon displayed all the vices of an army of occupation, more especially as their currency assumed the form of depreciated assignats. “Liberté, égalité ou la mort!” wrote a disillusioned Bonn patriot, “the only change needed in this formula is the substitution of ‘et’ for ‘ou. And yet it is remarkable how reluctantly the various Governments entered upon the war. How those who could find a decent excuse declared themselves neutral, and how they all grasped at the first pretext of peace. The Duke of Brunswick, the commander-in-chief, was French at heart, and had actually flirted with a proposal that he should lead the French troops, when it seemed as if the war might be confined to France and Austria. His notorious manifesto with its extravagance of phrase was merely the modern journalist’s equivalent of “good copy.”

The fondness of the French for abstract ideas was, in any case, antipathetic to the German temperament, which, in the eighteenth century at any rate, adhered vigorously to the concrete. “We have no Paris,” Brandsen complained, “no city, no common goal.” There was no centre of light, that is, whence the gospel of the rights of man could irradiate the land, and, as Brandsen went on to remark, if the Mainzer stirred, the Hessian moved against him. Particularism inevitably bound down the Germans to local and partial reforms, and in States like Baden and Saxe-Weimar, and in Bavaria, when Montgelas was at the elbow of a well-intentioned Elector, the result was a contented, if supine population. For people who had so far been impressed by the excesses in France not unnaturally produced a diversion from the splendid generalities of Rousseau to the definite doctrine of Burke. English models had long been popular in the North, notably in the Free City of Hamburg, where corporate life pulsed strongly and where trade pointed steadily westwards. They received a general circulation through Burke’s “Reflections,” one of the most cogent treatises that have ever issued from the press. Much of its reasoning reads nowadays, no doubt, like pure reactionary hysteria, and we are inclined to forget that it had any constructive side at all. But here again the nearness of the French Revolution and its contagious possibilities have to be remembered. “Burke’s Reflections,” Jacobi wrote to Heyne, “will delight you beyond words;” it was to Burke that Niebuhr directed his pupils for political principles, holding that the constitutional monarchy, as settled by the Whigs in 1688, had saved England. We who remember the baseness of Bolingbroke and the corruption of the Pelhams, Bute and North may sometimes doubt, with Lecky, if the prize was worth the price, but to disturbed German minds the Revolution of 1688 seemed, and rightly, a safer guide than that of 1759.

Down to the close of the first Revolutionary war, the point at which Mr. Gooch’s admirable book practically ends, the moral influence of the French Revolution on Germany, though by no means negligible, was far from vital. Pitt’s agents, Heathcote and the rest of them, believed the situation in France was warming with Jacobite agitation, but that the Masons and Illuminati would take effective alliance with them. Three last picturesque episodes seem to have got on the nerves of the British Government with the full awesome force that secret societies can exercise upon respectable officials. But Pitt was ill served throughout the crisis except by Lord Malmesbury and one or two more; in Paris, for instance, there was Miles, whom Lord Rosebery has severely but correctly dubbed an old fool. In reality, despite alarmist reports, the waters of that formless thing that was Germany were but slightly ruffled, and darkness still brooded on the face of the deep. Later on, when Napoleon imported the principles of the French Revolution into Germany to serve his own purposes, it was a very different matter, as Sir Lecky indicates in some chapters that are in the nature of an epilogue. If elaborated, they would make another book as good as this one, and it is to be hoped that he will write it at his leisure.

A small grumble to end with. As Mr. Gooch’s chapters are long and full of detail that would have been improved by the equipment of analytical “contents.” The index, too, is on the meagre side.

L. S.

The Y.M.C.A. Haywood Room has been transferred to Mansfield House, 89, Barking Road, as an East-End Literacy Centre, dealing library, sale of books, pictures and models, poetry and drama readings, classes. It will be re-opened on Tuesday next, at 3 p.m., by Mr. Albert Mansbridge, chairman of the World Association for Adult Education.
MRS. HUMPHRY WARD'S LAST NOVEL

Harvest. By Mrs. Humphry Ward. (Collins. 7s. 6d.)

I f we attempt to analyse the feeling of respect with which we regard the large body of conscientious work produced by Mrs. Humphry Ward, we find that it springs from the fact that the angel who handed her the pen was never other than the "sister daughter of the voice of God." She recognized the problems with which her generation was faced; she felt it was her duty so to state, to explain those problems that men and women who were thrown into confusion at the thought of strange ideas and theories escaping from their cages and running loose in society should be comforted and calmed by the spectacle of many a noble man, many a gracious lady bringing them to heel, teaching them to bear harness and to carry them up heights too steep for the pedestrian, too narrow for the easy carriage.

In her early novels and in those of her prime we are never for a page unconscious of the deliberate task which she has set herself; the plot, the story, is the least important thing. What is important is the messages that her characters have to deliver; she sees herself, we fancy, as the person at the great house, receiving these messages and translating them to the eager, inquiring crowd about the gates, and then—returning to the library. For who can imagine Mrs. Humphry Ward away from that decorous apartment, that discreet and dignified room with its heavy doors shutting out the unmeasured tones of existence, its high windows letting in the pale light of the English country? Here she interviewed Life, polished and agreeable Life with an intellectual brow, an easy carriage, thoughtful eyes; ardent, rebellious Life, Diana in a plumed hat ready to die for the Cause; timid, underfed Life, coughing behind a thread glove; and honest, stupid Life, twisting a cap, grinning and pulling a forelock. The light gleams upon the books and upon the table with its paper and pens. One by one, or so many of them together in a prearranged order, the figures enter, yield the information they are expected to yield and depart, or are, more properly, removed, conducted, seen off the premises, with a quiet firm sentence or two.

But the inaudible and noiseless foot of Time passed and repassed, and the problems which had seemed to her so worth the solving seemed to dissolve, and with them her intense intellectual efforts. With the disappearance of the rich difficulties came the unbaring of the plot. She seemed to see how weak it was, how scarcely it held, and her later books rely upon the story. They are failures for this reason. She had no idea of what happened to those people when they had left the library; her imagination was poor—her sympathy did not extend beyond a kind of professional sympathetic interest.

The modern world came streaming through the library, making all sorts of strange demands, ceaseless, careless, changing even as she watched it. And the spectacle of the no longer youthful, of the woman tired and unlagging, trying to keep pace with the mood of the moment, is not without pathos.

She cannot be judged by "Harvest." It is a plain mystery novel; it bears the impress of her desire to emerge from the library and to walk in the cornfields—in the new land which is war-time England. But she is unhappy in such surroundings and her serenity is gone.

K. M.

A MEMORIAL exhibition of the work of Camille Pissarro, the famous French Impressionist painter, who died in 1903, will be opened next Wednesday at the Leicester Galleries, Leicester Square. The collection will contain some of the artist's best-known pictures and a representative gathering of his drawings and etchings.

PRESSSED FLOWERS

A Lost Love. By Ashford Owen. (Murray. 3s. 6d.)

This little book was first published in 1854. In the monograph which precedes it we are told by the author how she was not above the age of twenty-four when she wrote it, and how it brought her famous friends and fame. Browning, Tennyson and Swinburne she kindled; as to the Carlyles, she gives us not only a glimpse of them "at home"—was ever a couple more special even?—but a view of Carlyle, alone, in the South of France, standing, as it were, in flowery fields, in the shadow of lemon trees, and shaking his fist at the bare mountains—"those starved pantiers." If "A Lost Love" had been a gentle carrying on of the monograph, if it had been permitted us to go on turning over the author's album, listening to her account of where the spring of holly was pulled, and who was by when she gathered the aster, we should have found it more beguiling than the formal, rather dark little novel which kind hands have brought into the light again.

It is pleasant to think of the grave young girl choosing a pen, and having found a pen to her liking, sitting down in her grave young way, and steeled herself for the great morning when the hero, brilliant and flashing creature, asks his affianced bride whether she will make up her mind to call him by his Christian name; it is pleasant, but the pleasure is a trifle pale. We read of the uncomfortable house where George Sandon lived and made brown-holland covers for her nagging aunt, and went on a visit to a house where she met the most perfect man who ever took a young girl down to dinner; we read of how she ran away to London and was found by that same young man outside a pastrycook's, where she had been for a glass of water, and of how he carried her to his mother's house, where she begged most pitifully to be allowed to go to Brighton before she swooned away. And while we follow the course of their loves we realize that "it is not to be." The charmer whose letter has never reached James Erskine reappears, and Georgy makes the supreme renunciation. We are not spared her pining away and dying, leaving James Erskine's only present to her to his little daughter; we are not spared the child's running up to her papa to show the bright thing and his: touching the fair curls while memories . . . memories . . .

These are pressed flowers: the fashion for them is no more. They are not to be laughed at or condemned, but we have too little time to languish over them. Nevertheless, now and again, when Miss Ashford Owen forgot how somnolent a thing it is to be a writer and to know all there is to know about Love and Death, she gives us a delicious little scene, as when Constance Everett runs up and down the passage in her ravishing little nightcap.

K. M.

"Il Convegno: Rivista di Letteratura e di Tutte le Arte." (Milan, Via Canova 25, 3 lire), seems likely to be one of the best of the many reviews which have appeared in Italy since the war. The second number contains not a few stanzas in its programme. Time will show whether it means to continue on these lines or to settle down with a regular stock company. There are characteristic contributions from Panzini and Linati, while Eugenio Levi writes interestingly on the small part played by the real poor in literature. Professor Donadoni puts up a sound defence of Pascoli's poetry against Croce, who has recently returned to the attack with an article on "Pallco Uccello" in La Critica. The title "Il Filosofia e il Francescano" indicates the point of view. Of special interest is Prezolini's plain-spoken review of post-war literature in Italy. Though the output has doubled, he considers that the quality has deteriorated, while the outlook has not changed. There are notes on literature, art and music.
MARGINALIA

A

ONG the discourses of the Abbé Jérôme Coignard I remember a noble dissertation about tables. Common and, in the cheaper restaurants, frequently unclean as the table may be, it is yet a respectable and a noble piece of furniture. It supports the nourishment by which man lives both in the body and in the soul; it supports his food and his books. It is the symbol of the most delicate carnal pleasure as well as of the most satisfying pleasure of the mind. For me, being, by necessity rather than by choice, a person of frugal and abstemious habits, the table is above all a symbol of studiousness. When my table groans it is beneath the weight of high thinking, not of high living. Even when high thinking begins to pall, when the assaults of the demon, charged with the propagation of the deadly sin of greed, become irresistible—even then my orgies are mostly imaginative, and it is still to a book that I must have recourse.

This book, which has been my stay and comfort in many a melancholy hour, is "The Closet of Sir Kenelm Digby, Knight, Opened," a work that seems to have made its first appearance in 1669, a few years after its author's death, and of which the most readily accessible edition is the excellent reprint issued by Mr. Lee Warner, for the Medici Society, in 1910. Sir Kenelm Digby is one of those unbelievable characters to whom one returns with never-failing delight and infinite surprise. The existence, in a dull, mechanical, orderly universe of these fantastic creatures is one of the things that make one proud of being a member of the human species and proud of belonging, in particular, to that nation which has probably produced more eccentrics than any other of the tribes of man. I do not propose in this article to tell the story of Digby's adventures, spiritual or otherwise; his memoirs (which, by the way, badly need reprinting) deserve an article to themselves; his scientific theories and experiments another. In this place I shall speak only of that curious by-product of his restless activity, the cookery book which has come down to us under the title of "The Closet Opened."

It is in the pages of this work that I go feasting when the delights of high thinking grow stale. One feeds better with Digby than with Mrs. Beeton or any other of his successors. From no modern cookery book can one derive that sense of lavishness, of sumptuous prodigality, which makes itself felt in every one of Digby's receipts. I open the book at random and discover how one must make a White Pot. "Take three quarts of cream," the receipt begins (let it be six, I say; there must be no stinting), "and put into it the yolks of twelve eggs." Digby's lordly appetite makes nothing of a couple of capons, eight or ten pounds of beef and three gallons of bouillon for a single dish. And when the whole concoction is on the boil he likes to throw in a quart or two of white wine and perhaps a gallon of cream.

He is, as one might have expected from his interest in medicine, an expert in herbal matters. For one receipt we are bidden to "take Rue, Agrimony, Wormwood, Celadine, Sage, Balm, Mugwort, Dragons, Pinpermel, Marvold, Fetherfew, Burnet, Sorrel and Elicampane-roots scraped and sliced small. Scions, Wood-betony, Brown-Mayweed, Mints, Avence, Tormentil, Cardius benedictus and Rosemary as much as of anything else, and Angelica if you will." He includes even tulips among his edible herbs. Here is a very seasonable receipt which I should like to see made use of:

"In the Spring (about the beginning of May) the flower-leaves of Tulips do fall away and there remains within them the end of the stalk, which in time will turn to seed. Take that seedy end, (very tender) and pick from it the little green-scarious about it, and cut it into short pieces, and boil them and dress them as you would do Peas; and they will taste like Peas and be very savoury."

The frequency with which our earlier literature makes mention of possets renders interesting the following exciting receipt for the concoction of one of these forgotten drinks:

"Take half a pint of Sack, and as much Rhineish wine, sweeten them to your taste with Sugar. Beat ten yolks of Eggs, and eight of whites exceeding well, first taking out the Coocks-tread, and if you like the skins of the yolks; sweeten these also and pour them to the wine, and add a stick of cinnamon bruised, set this upon a Chafing-dish to heat strongly, but not to boil; but it must begin to thicken. In the mean time boil for a quarter of an hour three pints of cream seasoned duly with Sugar and some Cinnamon in it. Then take it off from boiling, but let it stand near the fire, that it may continue scalding hot while the wine is heating. When both are as scalding hot as they can be without boiling, pour the Cream into the wine from as high as you can. When all is in, set it upon the fire to stew for one or two hours (if you can hold it) on the top of it the juicest of a quarter part of a Limon; and if you will, you may stew Powder of Cinnamon and Sugar, or Ambergrease upon it."

There can be no doubt that anyone accustomed to drinking possets would turn up his nose at the most elaborate of American drinks. And what constitutions they must have had! Receipts like these encourage one to believe what one had hitherto supposed to be a mere vulgar error—that we are but weaklings compared with our fathers. "Thiers was the giant age before the flood."

But Digby's speciality was metheglin or mead (he appears to use the two terms indifferently, though it is said that a distinction was once drawn between them). The first hundred pages of his book are filled with receipts for making honey drinks. He evidently took the greatest pains to procure the best from all quarters. A correspondent writes and tells him how metheglin is made in Liège. From "Master Webbe, who maketh the King's Meathe," he gets an excellent formula. My Lady Hungerford's white metheglin is exceedingly praised; the Countess of Bulingbrooke furnishes a receipt; Sir Thomas Gower's metheglin for health is described, and several pages are filled by "my own considerations for making of meathe." Lady Stuart has a metheglin for the colick and stone, Lord Hollis an excellent Hydromel, the Countess of Newport is an expert on cherry wine. . . .

One has a pleasing vision of Sir Kenelm Digby, note-book in hand, wandering round the kitchens of all the great houses where he spent his week-ends. An enormous, Herculean figure, curly and floridly handsome like some Greek god of the worst period, one sees him cross-questioning the cook and the butler, copying out extracts from the kitchen books, sipping critically the home-brewed drinks, taking and giving advice on the fermenting of cider, the pickling of capons, the making of "marmulate." From the bailiff's wife he will learn that the best way to cram chickens is to "stone a pound of Raisins of the Sun, and beat them in a Mortar to Pulp; pour a quart of Milk upon them and let them soak all night. In the next morning stir them well together, and put them so many Crumbs of Grated stale white bread as to bring it to a soft paste, work all well together and lay it in the trough before the chickens (which must not be above six in a pot, and keep it very clean) and let a candle be by them all night. The delight of this meat will make them eat continually: and they will be so fat (when they are but of the bigness of a Blackbird) that they will not be able to stand, but lie down upon their bellies to eat."

Some day, when I possess a landed estate, with cows and hens working overtime to produce the requisite quantity of cream and eggs, I shall put Digby's principles into practice. I will drink posset, I will eat white pot and freely Portland's mince pies. It is useless to pretend that one can derive as much pleasure from the printed score as from music actually performed. To-day I content myself with the score, I feast in the imagination alone; but a time will come, a time will come . . .

AUTOLYCUS.
NOTES FROM IRELAND

Dublin, April 30, 1920.

It is significant of the break with the Angloized literary tradition of the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries that the Irish writers of that period have simply not existed for the readers and writers of modern Irish literature. When the Irish Theatre was the subject of general discussion in the foreign press, it rarely failed to excite the ire of the subject with references to Goldsmith and Sheridan as proofs of the existence of a national talent for dramatic writing. Yet, for the first time in its history, the Irish Theatre has this week produced an eighteenth-century comedy by an Irishman, to wit, Goldsmith’s “Good-natur’d Man.” It is nearly thirty years since this play has been seen on any Irish stage, but the more popular “She Stoops to Conquer,” as well as the Sheridan comedies, have been less neglected, owing chiefly to the visits of English repertory companies, and, on the whole, our interest in the building up of a national literature and drama during the last thirty years has not extended to the forerunners of Anglo-Irish literature. The charm and success of this revival of Goldsmith show that we have players, and a public, which can appreciate the pleasant humour of those artificial but living comedies. Now that Mr. Lennox Robinson’s thoughts have turned in that direction he might well consider the revival of other plays of the period, A faultless example of a writer’s ability to produce plays many years ago to produce a play which, although older than “The Good-natur’d Man,” has a definite contemporary appeal which is not shared by either Goldsmith’s or Sheridan’s work. I refer to Charles Macklin’s “The True-Born Irishman,” produced at the Theatre Royal, Dublin, in 1762. This comedy is actually a Sinn Fein document, having for its leading motive, and the source of all its humour, the absurdities of the pseudo-English Irish, the type known in this country as “West Britons.” Long before Maria Edgeworth conceived the Lady Clonbrony of “The Absentee,” Macklin described the wife of the patriotic Murrogh O’Dogherty, a lady whose speech is felt for every Irishman as her sedulous apiing of all things English. If the Abbey Theatre will revive this play there would be an ideal combination of actuality and history, both literary and social. The great weakness of the Irish Theatre has been its too exclusive pre-occupation with peasant plays. If it will not enlarge its repertory by the performance of translated European drama, then it should rescue our literary ancestors from the oblivion to which we in particular have apparently consigned them.

There has always been room for a difference of opinion amongst authors and publishers as to how far the circulation of a book is assisted or impeded by favourable or unfavourable reviews. In the controversy between John Horne Tooke and the founders of the anti-Calvinist movement in the English Bible, the connection the English of Goldsmith is paradoxical, and may serve as an epilogue to what I wrote here, a few weeks ago, concerning the failure of certain classes of English publications to reach the Irish public. With some notable exceptions, the best of our current books have been well received by the English press, but, alas! there does not appear to be any corresponding demand from the public. The London bookshops make a show of precisely the same type of Irish literature as their Dublin colleagues of English. When the reviewers have been praising some new Irish author, I have looked in vain for any sign of the work in question in the places where one would expect to find it. To judge by the circulation and the publicity given to some books, nobody in England wants anything more novel or substantial than the traditional romance of some Wild Irish Girl, or the adventures of another charming, careless, devil-may-care young Irishman. It is not often that an Irish book of real merit reaches the English press, but the readers of these friendly critics are not situated from their allegiance to the false gods. In a word, the difference between the two cases, as I have seen them, is that Irish publishers reach the English press, but not the English public. In many cases the English publisher reaches neither the press nor the public in Ireland.

When Dympna O’Connor has written in her weekly column that affecting relic known in myth and story as the emblem of the Press. The arrival of Sir Nevil Macready in Ireland has added one more to our Irish varieties of human experience. The new Commander-in-Chief has established an Information Bureau, whose function he defines as the dissemination of official reports of military information. To a gathering of journalists he deprecated the intention to colour the truth in any way. All he desired was that the newspapers should receive an ungarbled account of any event in which the military were implicated. He reminded them of one paper in particular, in which he complained, a recent incident had been distorted. The representative of this journal pointed out immediately that his paper had printed in full the official version of the affair. Whereupon Sir Nevil Macready directed his complaint against the paper’s comments to the official report. It was not the practice of criticism which he desired, it was to encourage, it was an ever-pressing, perfectly legitimate comment, even if it could be proved to be based upon error. Yet this Information Bureau dispenses the wish to influence the press in arriving at judgments favourable to the present régime! Obviously, as the reviewer of von Hindenburg’s memoirs in last week’s ATHENEUM showed there is no use in attempting to maintain a military mind which is, to say the least, disconcerting to the more sophisticated intelligence of the mere civilian.

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL NOTES

The following are some of the books recently added to the Library of the British Museum: Maphesus Veginus, De morte Astyanacitis, Robertus de Fano and Bernardinus de Bergamo, London, 1490. The copy now at our disposal is the only book printed at Baghi. In excellent condition.—Joannes Bifius, Miraculorum B.V.M. carmen, epigrammata [Eucharius Silber], Rome, 1484.—Guarinus Veronensis, Regulae grammatices carminibus differentialibus: J. Bif [Milan, c. 1490]. All is well with this in a bibliography, extending over several leaves, of the MS. and printed works of Bifius, a contemporary Latin poet. This appears to be the first compilation of its kind ever printed.—Guido de Cauliaco, Le Guidon en francois, Jean de Vingle, Lyons, 1488. A French translation of the Churigura,” with woodcut illustrations.—The Kalendar der Comptes, of the Shyppars, Antony, Vercar, Paris, 1503. A Scots translation of the Kalendar des bergers,” with a number of fine woodcuts. The only perfect copy known appears to be that in the Bibliothèque Nationale; the present copy contains 52 leaves out of 96.—Didacus Deza, Quaestiones super primo libro Sententiarum [Seville, c. 1515].—Arnaldus Albertinus, Tractatus de secreto, Franciscus Romanus, Valencia, 1584.—Antonio de Guevera, Epistolae familiares, Juan de Villaquiran, Valladolid, 1545, 1546. Two parts.—Juan Boscan Almogaver, Obras de Boscán y algunas de Garciasso de la Vega, En casa de S. Martínez, Valladolid, por I. M. da Terranova y J. de Llarcay, Medina del Campo, 1555.—Pedro Mexia, Sila de varia lectio, Herederos de Lobo de Menide, Leon de Francia [ibid.], 1570. An additional volume, with a preface and a few statements of the editors, has been preserved. Two parts.—Eucharius Silber, Tractatus cum quibusdam notas Antonii Augustini, Philippus Mey, Tarraconae, 1582. Six parts.—Florae for Latin spekeynge selected oute of Terence, compiled by Nicholas Udall, Thomas Berthelet, London, 1503. An early edition.—Sir Thomas Eliot, Bibliotheca Eliotae, Thomas Berthelet, London, 1545. The True Historie of the late and lamentable adventures of Don Sebastian King of Portugall, Simon Stafford and James Shaw, London, 1602.—Jose Teixeira, A Continuation of the lamentable adventures of Don Sebastian King of Portugale, James Shaw, London, 1603.—Disertatio brevis qua demonstratur quantum periculum imminent Augustinis suis. [London, 1545].—A man of letters, and a materialist. Discourse prosing what great danger will hang over our heads of England, etc. [London?], 1626. A translation of the preceding, by S.R. Edmund Wingate, The Use of the Rule of Proportion, M. F. for P. Stephens, London, 1645. The author’s own translation from his French original, written during the reign of Henry IV. Two parts.—William Congreve, The Mourning Bride, Jacob Tonson, London, 1697.—Colomella, Les douze livres des choses rustiques traductus by Claude Coteret, Jacques Kerver Paris, 1555. Ferdinandus de Enzinas, Magnorum exponibilibum rimmonum cum commentario Ferdinandi de Enzinas Mullerium [de Brocar], Compitii [Alcala], 1523.—Luís de Granada, Memorial de la vida christiana, Damian Barges en casa de Jayme Cendrat, Barcelona, 1588.—Relacion de suceso sucedido a la Armada de su Magestad desde que entraron Canales de Inglaterra, Cosme de Lara, Seville, 1588.
Science

THE PROBLEMS OF PLANT DISTRIBUTION

THE GEOGRAPHY OF PLANTS. By M. F. Hardy, D.Sc. (Oxford, Clarendon Press, 7s. 6d. net.)

PLANT Geography is not only an interesting subject in itself, but by its numerous ramifications comes into relation with many of the important interests of human beings. Its preliminary concerns are with the horizontal and vertical distribution of plants on the surface of the globe and with the relations of the factors, climatic, topographical or biologic, which control these differential arrangements. Plants occur seldom in pure groupings, but generally in mixed formations or associations. It is the plant geographer's duty to disentangle, in such associations, the relations of the plants with each other and also with the other environmental features, such as light, water-supply, and the animal kingdom. When these are solved it remains to discover how the plants in question gain access to the areas that interest us. It may be said in general terms either that they are the results of successful "invasions" from other areas, or that they have been formed anew in that area. This problem then not only compels us to a consideration of the methods of plant-dispersal and their relative efficiency—dispersal being an essential preliminary to invasion—and of the conditions necessary for successful invasions, but even raises the more important question of the evolution of new forms. It was this latter aspect that made Darwin refer to the science as "that grand subject, that almost keystone of the laws of creation, geographical distribution."

In comparatively recent years the devastation by volcanic eruption of the island of Krakatoa has given us an unrivalled opportunity of studying the dispersal problem. Nine years after the catastrophe 137 different kinds of plants were collected in a few hours, and the vegetation was so dense in some parts of the island as to be almost impenetrable. These results are surprising when it is known that the nearest small island, from which restocking could have taken place, is 12 miles distant, and that Java and Sumatra, the largest near land areas, are separated from Krakatoa by a 25-mile stretch of water. It had been customary, before these observations, to explain a marked similarity between the plants in two or more areas separated by a wide expanse of water by postulating a former land connection between the areas. Darwin had always been against this attitude and had protested "against sinking imaginary continents in a quite reckless manner." Krakatoa and the laborious investigations of Guppy have shown that he was correct and that the efficacy of dispersal-means had been under-estimated.

Invasions of individual plants are known to be at times more than successful in areas more normal than that of Krakatoa; for example, the American water-plantain was at one time a pest in our English canals; the water hyacinth to-day presents an economic problem by filling up South American rivers which are the main traffic thoroughfares; a great part of Brazil is covered by an alien and undesirable cactus. The introduction of a fungal pest may result in a loss of several millions a year or may even entirely destroy an industry, as in the case of coffee-cultivation in Ceylon. A consideration of the latter cases has led recently to the establishment of Plant Quarantine regulations in the United States and in some of our colonies.

It is of course well known that the facts of distribution, and more especially the limited range of some forms on islands and mountain tops, set Darwin thinking on the question of the mutability of living organisms—thinking which took final shape in the "Origin of Species." Similar considerations have more recently led to the "Age and Area" hypothesis, set forth so ably by Dr. Willis, a theory which in some of its implications challenges the efficiency of natural selection in the formation of new species and offers a new solution to the problem of the limited range of some plants. It does not, however, touch such peculiarities as the existence of Arctic types on the tops of widely separated European mountains, but not on the intervening country. Forbes' explanation of such plants as the relics of a former widely and continuously spread flora, which retreated up the mountains on the climate becoming warmer, and a replacement in the valleys of such plants by others more fitted to the changed conditions, still holds.

The distribution of plants, especially those of economic importance, but also of those not directly useful, has a profound influence on the character, occupations and mode of life of the people in their neighbourhood; and it is obvious that their presence has an important modifying influence on the vegetation. For example, the thoughtless deforestation of areas may render neighbouring lands quite useless, by altering the water-supply, by causing the removal of soil by sudden torrents or by a combination of such activities. A consideration of such results indicates the necessity not only of the reforestation of the damaged areas, but also of planting woods in areas not formerly occupied by them. Other useful extensions of the subject are reached through hints of the economic possibilities of hitherto unexploited areas; through the study of soils and climates in their relation to plant life, of the possibilities of aclimatization and of the occurrence of "indicator" plants.

Dr. Hardy's volume considers the continents in turn, studying the climatic and other factors, and their effects on the character of the vegetation and on the distribution of the plant associations, and connects these phenomena with the life and occupations of the people, dealing with each new problem separately, as it presents itself. He makes no attempt to deal in a broad and general way with the fundamental problems of the subject—the relation of the plant to its environment, the spread of species, the factors involved in successful or unsuccessful invasions, aclimatization and adaptability in general. An attempt to treat the subject from a more general standpoint would have given a better idea of its more modern aspects and would have added immensely to the value of the book, as would also an inversion of the order by a detailed preliminary consideration of Europe and more especially of England. Against this it may be said that Europe more than any other continent has been modified by man. But man is a part of nature; he may complicate the picture, but he belongs to it, and after all it is presumably in England that most of the readers of this work will have to look for examples of the activities there discussed.

Considering the limitations which the author has imposed upon his subject, it must be said that his work is a reliable and well-illustrated description of the vegetation of the land surfaces of the world.

E. M. C.

SOCIETIES

EGYPT EXPLORATION.—April 29.—Professor T. Eric Peet delivered a lecture on "Recreation in Ancient Egypt." Man has been a hunter from the earliest times; in fact, as he was dependent upon his skill in this direction for his daily food and clothing, primitive man became an expert in many forms of sport. In Egypt we have exceptional opportunities for studying this subject, for the paintings on the walls of the tombs contain many illustrations of hunting, fishing, and catching birds. Here we see the wealthy Egyptian, accompanied by his retainers and dogs, shooting the wild animals which abounded in the neighbourhool; or going forth in his frail papyrus canoe, armed with a boomerang with which to bring down the wild geese and other birds of the marsh; or spearing the fish which were apparently extremely plentiful.

Having briefly discussed the question of sports, the lecturer turned his attention to the games of these ancient Egyptians, and in this connection it must be said that the most primitive form of gaming-table yet discovered is a mud gaming-table which was found in a pre-dynastic tomb, and which could not have been more ancient than 3600 B.C. and may be considerably earlier. Games played with pieces occur in the tombs, and in some cases were found in good preservation in tombs. The lecturer illustrated one of the finest of these by means of slides, and described the attempts which have been made to reconstruct the game, and asserting that it would have been a great fun if a method could be found of presenting it in a way that it would seem to have resembled some of the modern games.

In the interval between the games Mr. Read, Mr. W. B. Worthington, Dr. W. H. Maw, Mr. C. L. Morgan, Mr. Bash Mott; other members of Council, Mr. E. A. S. Bell, Dr. C. C. Chatterter, Col. R. E. B. Crompton, Mr. M. Descom, Sir Archibald Denny, Sir W. H. Elliot, Sir Robert Gore, Mr. W. W. L. Crowther-Beynon, Sir R. A. Hadfield, Sir Brodie H. Henderson, Mr. E. P. Hill, Mr. C. W. Humphreys, Mr. Summers Hunter, Mr. H. G. Kelley, Mr. G. H. Kirkpatrick, Mr. J. M. Marshburn, Mr. H. H. G. Mitchell, Vice-Admiral Sir H. J. Oran, Mr. F. Palmer, Capt. H. Riall Saxby, Sir J. F. C. Snaith, Mr. W. A. P. Tait, Mr. A. M. Tippett, Mr. E. F. C. Trench, Professor W. H. Warren, and Sir A. F. Yarrow.

SOCIETY OF ANTIQUARIES.—April 23, St. George’s Day.—Annual Meeting.—Sir Hercules Read, President, in the chair.

The customary elections of officers and Council for the ensuing year were held, and the following were elected:—President, Sir C. Hercules Read; Treasurer, William Minet; Director, Sir Edward W. Brabrook; Secretary, C. R. Peers, Members of Council, Sir W. Martin Conway, Dr. Crowther-Beynon, H. R. H. Wall, W. J. Hemp, A. F. Hill, C. H. Jenkinson, Sir Matthew I. Joyce, C. L. Kingsford, Lieut.-Col. G. G. Croft Lyons; Professor J. L. Myres, Lord Northbourne, Professor E. Prior, J. E. Pritchard, H. W. Sanders, Major G. T. Harley Thomas, R. Campbell Thompson and W. H. Aymer Vallance.

The President delivered his Anniversary Address, taking for his subject 'Archaeology after War.'

It was not true saying that those who lived through great events found it hard to maintain a true perspective; it was difficult for an individual to see a great catastrophe in its true relation to himself, and this inversion of values led to the importance of great things being missed. The danger was, in the future, that things would happen in themselves, might be looked upon as the sole object of existence. For example, expansion of trade was a great end, but it was not the sole end. Here one might learn from our late enemies. During the forty years before the war their trade had increased to a greater extent than that of any other nation, but along with this the wealth of the country had furnished and endowed museums, learned societies and technical institutes; Germany had the largest ethnographical collections in the world before she had a single colony and had exploited the arts of the whole world, and all in the space of forty years.

With the resettlement after the war, the territories formerly under Turkish rule would give great opportunities for organized archaeological research, and the necessity of England's taking a foremost part in such research, especially as many of the countries concerned would be under a League of Nations, had been recognized by the formation of an Archæological Joint Committee of the chief learned bodies concerned. This committee had reviewed the conditions, and had drawn up a code of archaeological laws which it was hoped would serve as a model for the rest of Europe. Thus a solid foundation had been laid. But the need of funds was pressing: it was as necessary to endow archaeological research as purely scientific research, although the immediate good was perhaps not so conspicuous. The prospect of the next thirty years was not bright.

The present antiquities law in Egypt was a case in point, and even now that Egypt was a protectorate there was little prospect of a change, while a proposal that the Government should subsidize a British Institute of Archaeology had been bitterly rejected. The result of this indifference was that the archaeological riches of that country were finding their way to foreign rather than to British museums.

Another aspect of the same subject was to be seen in the tendency for our colonies and dependencies to pass laws prohibiting the export of objects of art from them. At first this might appear a matter for congratulation, but a little consideration showed that the reverse was the case. It was true that the local museums, where there were such, benefited to a certain extent; but it was equally true that British art and civilization were surreptitiously in spite of the law, and it would be foreign museums, and not British, that would be benefited. Learning was the loser by this policy; students would no longer be able to travel all over the world in pursuit of their studies, and the comparative study of antiquities, which could only be carried out where collections were centralized, would be a matter of great difficulty. Again, much money was being spent on education, and it is curious that it was at last being realized that education did not stop at the age of fifteen or thereabouts, but was continued throughout life. This being so, it was of paramount importance that museums should be recognized as an essential part of the educational machinery of the country, and not regarded as a by-product.

Lastly, there was the danger that the material improvement in the conditions of life might lead to material success being regarded as the supreme good in itself; and that humanity was not needed. Here again our late enemies could teach us much. The war had shown to what ends German materialism could lead; it was for Englishmen to see that a similar result did not follow in this country.

FORTHCOMING MEETINGS

Fri. 7. King’s College, 4.—"Christian Art: The Byzantine World, Iconography and Ornament," Professor P. Deamer.

King’s College, 5.30.—"Bergson’s Concept of Mind: Energy: Consciousness and Unconsciousness," Professor H. Wildon Carr.

University College, 5.30.—"Roman Religion," Lecture I., Mr. Norman Baynes.

Philological, 8.—Annual Meeting.

Sat. 8. Royal Institution, 3.—"The Private Character of Queen Elizabeth," Lecture II., Dr. F. Chamberlin.

Viking (University of London, South Kensington), 3.—Taper by Professor Herbert Wright.

King’s College, 5.30.—"Outlines of Greek History from the Sixth Century to the Nineteenth Century," Lecture II., Professor A. J. Toynbee.

King’s College, 5.30.—"Portuguese Literature and the European Revolution," Professor George Young.

Aristotelian, 8.—Discussion on Bergson’s "Mind-Energy."

Society of Arts, 8.—"The Decoration and Architecture of Robert Adam and Sir John Soane, 1758-1857," Lecture II., Mr. A. T. Bolton. (Cantor Lecture.)

Surveyors’ Institution, 8.—"Rent Problems," Mr. R. A. A. Symonds.

Bedford College, 4.30.—"The English Lyric before Chaucer," Lecture II., Professor Carleton Brown.

King’s College, 5.30.—"Kant’s "Aesthetic Theory," Lecture II., Professor H. Wildon Carr.

Zoological, 5.30.—"Fauna of Western Australia: I. Further Contributions to the Study of the Onychophora," Dr. W. J. Dakin; "Chilicothereidae from Baluchistan," Mr. C. Forster-Cooper; "Notes on Marine Wood-boring Animals: I. The Shipworms (T Errorinae)," Dr. W. J. Lydekker.

Royal Anthropological Institute, 8.15.—"Buddhism in the Pacific," Mr. Sir Henry Howorth.

School of Oriental Studies, Finsbury Circus, 5.—"The Scripts of Ancient Mesopotamia and their Decipherment: the Origin of our Alphabet," Mr. R. Campbell Thompson.

Thurs. 13. Royal Institution, 3.—"Welsh and Irish Folk-Song," Mr. A. P. Graves.

Royal, 4.—Election of Fellows: Demonstration of the Apparent "Growth" of Plants (and Inanimate Materials) and of "Aparent Contractions," Mr. A. D. Waller; Paper "On the 'Renal Portal' System (Renal Venous Meshwork) and Kidney Excration in Vertebrata," W. N. F. Woodland.
Fine Arts

THE ROYAL ACADEMY

The Royal Academy, we are told, repeatedly, is the home of traditions. It is no part of its functions to encourage experiment, to mirror the response of our artists to the creative impulses of the moment. Its business as a national institution is simply to stand still, and to ignore any progressive development until it has become a tradition. We do not agree with this interpretation of the duties of the Academy, we should prefer to think of it as an educational power, a humanizing force. But it is no use sighing for the impossible. We must accept the Academy at its own valuation—of the home of traditions. We may examine the present exhibition in the belief that, whatever may happen in the future, at the end of the day, the main attractions handed on to us by those whose pictures line the walls, and determine, as far as in us lies, if any of them are worth preserving in their present form.

The Grand Manner.

Sir Joshua Reynolds used to urge his students to attempt somnolence in the great manner of the Italian High Renaissance and Baroque painters. He refrained from any complicated heriocics in his own practice, because he was a prudent man and knew his limitations. He contended himself with a grasp of the Baroque double curve and the rudiments of Venetian impasto. But his Discourses set up the emulation of the Italian masters among all the members of the official functions of English Academic painters. Three pictures in the present exhibition respond to this ideal, Mr. Charles Shannon's "The Childhood of Bacchus" (1853), Mr. Glynn Philpot's "The Coast of Britain" (145) and Mr. Richard Jack's "Love tints the Shepherd's Reed" (123). Of these the first is something of a technical tour de force. Mr. Shannon's attempts to reproduce the texture and general appearance of Titian's pictures are well known. He has already devoted many years of his life to this singular ambition. This year he can congratulate himself on having come a step nearer his goal. A visitor passing rapidly through Gallery 111. might be pardoned for imagining that "The Childhood of Bacchus" had strayed from Trafalgar Square. Considered as a decoration executed in a prescribed medium, the picture is a success. The arrangement is well balanced and sufficiently complex—the impasto is handled with intelligence, and the color glows with Venetian splendour. When we look a little closer we note the general weakness of technique, the unrealized drapery, the absence of virility in the approach. But perhaps we have no right to peer too closely at this comparatively early stage in our village Titian's career. His forerunner lived and painted five score years. Mr. Shannon may achieve his heart's desire in 1870 or thereabouts. Mr. Glynn Philpot's work is harder to keep the sacred flame alive. He imagines, evidently, that he has the great manner in his pocket. "The Coast of Britain" is a mere underpainting such as some forgotten pupil of Carracci might have knocked off in two afternoons and abandoned without regret as a failure. The dish prepared by Mr. Richard Jack from the familiar recipe is extremely unpalatable, because Mr. Jack is a crude and slipshod chef. His ingredients are wretched in quality, badly blended and insipidly cooked. "Love tints the Shepherd's Reed" is conceived and executed in the spirit of a Fleet Street artist instructed to illustrate the word "Arcady." Pre-Raphaelitism.

Somewhere in the middle of the last century the Victorian Pre-Raphaelites, championed by Ruskin, drew the Academicians' attention to the Italian painting which preceded the grand manner of the Baroque. The early Italian masters they thought them capable and ugly, and the pictures painted by their English admirers eccentric and crude. But Ruskin made Pre-Raphaelitism a tradition, and the Academy submitted. It accepted Millais, and Millais returned the compliment by accepting the Academy and above all Pre-Raphaelitism. Pre-Raphaelitism does not know would have had no further trouble in the matter: that it could now safely accept pictures which looked like Millais' pictures and call them Pre-Raphaelite, and this it proceeded to do. Unfortunately, the trouble started all over again with Burne-Jones, and the Academy had to accept a second bastard Pre-Raphaelitism in the shape of pictures figu-ring a leading lady with a facial resemblance to Burne-Jones' favourite Botticelli model. Meanwhile the original Pre-Raphaelite movement ran a meteoric course outside, and finally fell to earth in the New English Style, composed of pseudo-naif, kept alive by forcible feeding from the Slade School. All three aspects of the moribund tradition can be seen at Burlington House. The Millais variety appears in the Wardour Street tableaux vivants concocted by Mr. Cadogan Cowper, Miss Fortescue Brickdale, Mr. Oswald Moser and Mr. J. W. Miller. It is dragged to the depths in Mr. Cowper's "Anis-al-Jilis" (148), but it is relatively inoffensive in his quaint, pseudo-naif portrait group of four doll-like children (592) with which he nearly scores a minor success. Other manifestations are Mr. Denis Eden's minutely painted Bowl of Lemons (418) and Mr. F. H. S. Shepherd's Old Countryman and his Wife (322), which is the only personal and intelligent adaptation of the lot. The Burne-Jones ladies seem, happily, to be dying out. But they still linger, distinctly Titianized in Mr. Charles Shannon's second picture "The Wise and Foolish Virgins" (87). The N.E.A.C. reflection, a somewhat gentle and deceptitious god, shuffles back a little final rump of the tradition of the Slade School in the pictures of Mr. Harry Morley, who is capable of better things.

Portraiture.

There are three traditions of English portraiture favored by the Academy. The first and oldest is that favored by Mr. J. J. Shannon, who draws from the long list of portrait manufacturers from Van Dyck to Lawrence who replied successively to the persistent demand of the English nobility and gentry for portraits to form handsome decorations in the hall and remind their descendants that they were persons of race and quality. The English upper classes have always demanded of the portrait painter the perpetuation not so much of themselves as of their type. The great success of Reynolds was due to his happy ability to graft a flattering suggestion of the individual on to the hierarchic representation of the type. As a result of his success the English upper classes narrowed their demands and commissioned artists more specifically to provide them with portraits in the manner of Reynolds. In the hands of Mr. Shannon the tradition is prettily threadbare, almost ready for the dustbin. The second English portrait tradition was founded in the nineteenth century to meet the demands of the new opulent bourgeoisie. This was the school of the Victorian cartoonists, whose work is in the mirror and decided that it was too cool. But this time the commission was for an exact replica of the picture in the mirror. The painter was not to intrude anything from his own vision or obscure the issue by any prejudices in favour of decoration. Thus arose the fetich of the seeking likeness, which speaks indeed, and says this modern longing to be distinct and not to be seen as a sitter. Mr. Ralph Peacock, who paints very smoothly, and Sir William Orpen, who paints with ingenious slickness, are now the most conspicuous repositories of this tradition, for which our old friend Sir John Everett Millais, in his last phase as P.R.A., is once again responsible. Of the numerous rival likeness-makers the most professionally proficient (as proficient perhaps as Sir William himself) is Mr. Walter Russell, a new Associate and sometime Slade School instructor, whose methods as exemplified in "Mr. Minney" (136) should delight the most satisfied of the neo-opulent Georgian patrons. Lastly, we have that portrait tradition founded by Mr. Sargent, who cut out the other two with a formula of his own contrivance, in much the same way that Kaeurn cut across the Reynolds tradition before him. The influence of Mr. Sargent's virtuosity is not as paramount now as it was some years ago, when a succession of flashily painted gentleman in riding breeches followed his portrait of Lord Hildes-ley as Master of the Foxhounds. The multitude of white-haired ladies in black dresses and pearls, seated by Louis XVI. tables, aped his portrait of Mrs. Wertheimer, but his influence persists. It can be seen in the work of Messrs. Esme and Barke, and its sparkle isimitated in the ginger ale of Mr. F. H. S. Shepherd. (Burlington Magazine, November 1919, p. 352). Mr. Sargent's vintage may possibly mature, but the ginger-ale substitute is assuredly destined to fizzle out quite soon.

R. H. W. (To be continued.)
IN THE NATIONAL GALLERY

SUBSCRIBERS to the National Art-Collectors Fund and other patrons of the National Gallery responded in large numbers, on April 28, to the Director’s invitation to a private view of the new arrangement of the Dome Octagon and adjacent galleries which have been subsequently opened to the public.

The large Italian altarpieces and early Florentine and Umbrian works exhibited in the reconstructed system which, we suppose, the only one possible while many of the rooms remain unavailable. If we accept the principle of the decorative system the present arrangement of the reopened galleries must be accounted a great success. The general effect is sumptuous and impressive. Mr. Holmes has continued his admirable treatment of the arches and columns, and washed them with stone-coloured distemper, which is less insistent than the white of the first gallery and a better background in consequence. The light tone contrasts with the dark perpendiculars and doorways, and accentuates the architectural proportions, which, in this part of the Gallery, are reasonable and not without dignity. At the same time it increases the light on the pictures.

And what marvellous pictures they are! Cleaned, and ‘conditioned’ (a delicate process at once discreetly and courageously executed), they radiate light, warmth and colour. Even the minor works and works of the second water have the coherence and cohesion of the great altarpieces. The large altarpieces, for example, by Francia, Grandi, Cima and Signorelli respectively, are all four relatively uninspired, but what a magnificent decoration they make for the Dome Octagon! In the same way the Ansidei altarpiece, which has shed a coat of brown dirt, shines forth serene and luminous from a well-adepted background of damask; and the sweet faint blues in the Pintoricchio and Signorellian frescos are admirably supported by the buff background stretched across the grey in Gallery III. And then the exquisite examples of Crivelli, Marziale and Cosimo Tura, the Mantegnas, the intriguing Masaccio with its strange and subtle colour, the gentle sweetness of Benozzo Gozzoli, and the pale aloofness of the early Venetian Madonnas which come to us from the Lindsay and Layard bequests!

There are two new features among the works exhibited. The first is the central panel of the Quaratesi polyptych by Gentile da Fabriano, lent by the King. The Quaratesi Family altarpiece (of which other panels are in the Uffizi) was painted by Gentile in 1425. It was one of his latest works, and it is finer and simpler in style than the famous “Adoration of the Magi” in the Florence Academy. Few early Italian masters made more personal progress than Gentile appears to have done, and we are fortunate in seeing him here at the height of his powers. He was not a great master like Simone Martini, but he was undoubtedly a very intelligent and receptive man who was able to evolve a combination of Venetian, Siennese and Florentine influences and to become himself the first influence emanating from Umbria. The second feature is the reconstructed Pesellino altarpiece. It is built round the “Trinity” (727) which some critics formerly ascribed to the same pupil of Pesellino who painted the Dresden “Madonna Enthroned.” The Gallery has now secured the two angels which belong to the top corners (one from the Brown bequest and the other by purchase from Lord Somers, through the Temple West Fund) and the group of SS. James the Great and Simon Stock which, though anonymous, is so aptly introduced into the “Trinity,” the last an important fragment bought by Prince Albert in 1846 and now lent by the King. Thus reconstituted, the work can, it seems, be definitely identified as the altarpiece commissioned in 1455 for S. Trinità, Pistoia, commenced by Pesellino, and finished after his death by Filippo Lippi in 1459. We cannot resist the impression that this picture has been over-conditioned. But we are unwilling to stress the point, because, first, we recognize that the reconstruction of several fragments in varying degrees of preservation is much more difficult and may justify more drastic action than the cleaning of a single panel, and, secondly, because we are not in any favour to the panel as a whole, and not particularly practised by Mr. Holmes. Vasari in writing of this altarpiece mentions figures of SS. Zeno and Jacopo. Possibly, the Gallery knows the whereabouts of this missing group, and will eventually be able to secure it and complete the reconstruction.

R. H. W.
Music

THE SURVIVAL OF GLUCK

GLUCK'S "Orpheus" was revived at the Surrey Opera last Friday. Among the audience was Dame Clara Butt, who is to make her appearance in the same opera at Covent Garden. The performance did not show the Surrey company at its best. Further rehearsals were badly needed, and what was still more badly needed was a central directive idea, a determination to face the problem of Gluck's operas and solve it definitely in one way or another. "Orpheus" is not very often put on the stage, but it is put on sufficiently often for an opera-producer to imagine that there is a stock way of doing it which needs no further discussion or reconsideration. At the Surrey the only striking innovation was the removal of the entire orchestra to a place behind the scenes. This was a great gain in so far as it prevented the band from drowning the voices, and also softened down to some extent the roughness of the playing; but there were many moments as, for instance, in the operas contrasted in the ballet of Furies, when one could willingly have forgiven the roughness for the sake of a little more vivacity.

It seems that "Orpheus" is an opera which has somehow attained a sort of deification, to question which is rank blasphemy. Gluck, we are told, was the first composer who realized the dramatic possibilities of opera. He refused to pander to the vanities of singers; he broke through the stupid conventions of the old Italian operatic system, and never wrote a note that was not expressive and truthful. It must be admitted that even in our own day a Gluck opera presents much that is genuinely beautiful and impressive; but it is impossible to get away from the fact that in all his operas there are long stretches of dullness. The musical style is awkward and clumsy; it is even liable to collapse hopelessly just at the most crucial moments.

Gluck, as everybody knows, was a German by birth, who began his career as a moderately successful composer of conventional Italian operas. He did better with a series of French comic operas composed for the Viennese Court, but his real contribution to operatic history is "Orpheus" which he composed in 1762 at the age of forty-four. To the same period belong "Alceste" (1767) and "Paride ed Elena" (1769); then follows a further period of operas composed for Paris, beginning with "Iphigénie en Aulide" (1774) and ending with "Iphigénie en Tauride" (1779). It is from Paris, more than anywhere else, that Gluck's great reputation comes. He was fortunate enough to become the object of a prolonged literary controversy; and though he probably owed a good part of his Parisian success to the fact that being a German he was protected by Marie Antoinette, he became to be accepted as the champion of serious French music against the frivolities and vanities of the Italians. Gluck's operas contrasted with the Italians on the one hand and with Rameau on the other. The appearance of the Italian comic operas at Paris in 1752 had already given a shock to the pedestal of Rameau. They stood for the natural easy gaiety of common humanity against the pompous artificialities of Rameau's mythology. Gluck presented classical mythology in a new aspect. He had something at least of the naturalness of the Italians, and he had none of the traditions of the century of Louis XIV. His classical operas are not the conventional court intrigues and gallantries disguised under Latin or Greek names, but honest attempts to present the heroes and heroines of antiquity as living and feeling persons. Only in the ballets, more especially in the obligatory chaconnes, does he conform to the ritual of the Académie.

In the next century the high priests of the cult of Gluck were Berlioz and Wagner. For them Gluck represented not a new conception of opera, poignant and almost painful in its intensity of dramatic expression, but rather an austere monument of antique virtue. Rameau and Piccini were long dead and forgotten; the contrast lay with Rossini and Meyerbeer. Merely by his choice of subjects, if by nothing else, Gluck seemed to lift the opera on to a nobler and loftier plane. Opera has at almost all times been dominated mainly by musicians whose first consideration was worldly success. Among these we must place not only Meyerbeer, who finds few admirers in these days, but also such men as Cavalli, Alessandro Scarlatti, Handel, Mozart, Rossini and Verdi. Pure idealists such as Beethoven and Boito have left but little mark on the history of opera. Wagner and Verdi owed much to them, but not directly to their experiments in opera. It was not "Fidelio" and "Meistersinger" that influenced them, but rather Beethoven as a symphonist and Boito as a man of letters. Gluck, rightly or wrongly, has always been credited with being an idealist. His clumsiness of technique was not likely to damage him in the eyes of such men as Beethoven and Wagner, who were concerned with more abstract matters, and much more natural, to contrast Gluck with Mozart rather than with Meyerbeer and Rossini. The nineteenth century never fully appreciated Mozart. The idealism of the romantics found the magnificent manner of "Idomeneo" and "La Clemenza di Tito" formal and tedious, while "Figaro" and "Così fan tutte" were regarded as frivolous and even possibly immoral.

At the present day it is Mozart whom we have set up on a pedestal as the embodiment of classic perfection. We are no longer afraid of the eighteenth century; we are almost inclined to exaggerate its merits. There is even a disposition to admire Mozart not for that individuality of genius which makes him immortal, but because he seems to present his own century in its most quintessentially charming conventions. Mozart could never have composed "Idomeneo," perhaps not even "The Magic Flute," had he not had Gluck to precede him; but there is nothing which Gluck could do that Mozart could not do better. Gluck for us is a magnificent ruin; we contemplate him as we do some ancient Greek statue, admiring all the more reverently because its colour has been washed off, its arms mutilated and its nose chipped. When his music really appeals to us, it is not in those dramatic moments when he "tried to forget that he was a musician," but in those when he failed to do so. What all of us love best are his ballet scenes, such as the vision of the Elysian fields in "Orpheus" and the innumerable little "pantomimes" and marches which are scattered over his operas. They are not so much in idea, but not at all French in execution; their actual music is Italian melody seen through a German temperament. That is the combination which has given us Handel, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven—a good part of the world's greatest music. His recitatives are mostly unbearable. He abolished the harpsichord and the quick dramatic rattle of the old recitativo secco only to make the strings do what the harpsichord could do much better, while the voice slowed down its declamation to the tedious pace of oratorio. With his aria it is a toss-up. He is never quite certain whether he means to be conventional and musical, or declamatory and expressive. His melodic invention is almost always poor compared with that of Handel or Mozart. If he succeeds, it seems to be by sheer fluke. So much of his vocal writing is bald and commonplace, that the rare moments of real lyrical or dramatic power stand out with startling vividness.

Yet we must not forget that he wrote in an age of real singers. "Orpheus" has suffered in later years from two causes. The title part, composed for a castrato, is now sung by a woman. The age of Berlioz was the age that discovered the contralto as the ideal voice of mothers and of angels. It was bad enough for Orpheus to lose his sex in the eighteenth century, but it was worse still when the nineteenth gave him back the wrong one. And from the Mendelssohnian angels comes the habit of slowing down the recitative still further and then destroying the cantabile of the arias by a would-be "expressive" style of singing. It is just because Gluck’s melody is so poor that it requires to be sung with an almost exaggerated sense of pure vocal beauty. It is not by his arguments that Orpheus convinces Hell, but by his music. His famous lute, it need hardly be said, is no more than a mere symbol for the art of music, and the art of music is primarily the art of song. This principle once accepted, there is no more need to disguise the formalism of Gluck’s phraseology. It is part of the idiom of his day, and therefore, if he is a good artist, part of his means of expression. And we then see that the formalism of the arias is balanced by that of the dances. Of recent years the ballets have been interpreted by bare-footed females draped in art shades who drifted across the stage trying to look like designs by Burne-Jones or Puvis de Chavannes. It was all very well for the nymphs and happy spirits; but what about the demons and furies? The more realistically they were put on the stage the more futile and incompetent Gluck’s scales in semiquavers sounded. The only thing to do is to start from the most difficult ballets, formalize the furies, and thence formalize the whole after the convention of the eighteenth century. Therein lies the solution of the Gluck problem—for the further time removes us from him, the more clear it becomes that Gluck, for all his revolutionary ideas, is after all an eighteenth-century composer.

EDWARD J. DENT.

CONCERTS

Mr. Arthur Bliss’ new Quintet, which he played with the Philharmonic Quartet at his concert on April 27, is a very heterogeneous mixture of styles. Mr. Bliss has learned something, it is clear, from Debussy, Delius, Elgar, Ravel, Stravinsky and Vaughan Williams, and some day he will weld the results of his various musical experiences into a style of his own. What is really individual and compelling in his quintet is its colour, and the melody line is highly reminiscent, but it has no clichés, no padding, no empty rhetoric; it is always vital and expressive, often genuinely noble and beautiful. It completely avoids those characteristic English vices, pompousness and sentimentality, and it is full of delightful and original colour-effects. Its only grave faults are its awkwardness of style and its looseness of structure. The other attractions of the concert were a moderately interesting Divertimento of Mozart and a new work of Stravinsky entitled "Rag-time"—a very labourous piece of facettiousness.

An American baritone, Mr. Cecil Fanning, presented an oddly mixed programme at his recital on April 27, repeated on April 29. He makes very skillful use of a magnificent voice as far as the technique of singing is concerned, but his interpretations, especially of folk-songs, are very much lacking in distinction and even in refinement. Another American singer, Miss Ethel Brown-Prestiss, also gave a concert on April 29. She appears to possess no marked individuality, though gifted with a pleasant, well-trained voice.

Mr. Alexander Cohen, who gave a sonata recital on April 24 with Mr. Anderson Tyrer, is a violinist of some accomplishment and a distinctly emotional style of interpretation. He played a Poem Sonata by Catoire which contained a few musical phrases and a few musical ideas, as well as giving a rather sentimental performance of César Franck’s Sonata. Mr. Anderson Tyrer is a rather careless player, though no doubt musical, and the ensemble was far from perfect. However, they made up for many deficiencies by a sight-seeing tour of the new sonata by Elgar, which they both seemed to understand much better than anything which preceded it.

MUSICAL NOTES FROM PARIS

Although the big orchestral societies—Colonne, Pasdeloup, Lamoureux and Conservatoire—have now all brought their seasons to an end until October next, there will be no slackening in the flood of miscellaneous concert-giving until the middle of May.

Early in May we are to receive the visit of the New York Symphony Orchestra, under Walter Damrosch, who will give three concerts in the Opera-House. Paris still has no proper concert-hall fit for orchestral music.

On May 8 the Diaghilev Ballet returns once more to the Opéra, where it will alternate with the regular repertory performed several times a week, including some Fergolese-Stravinsky productions which, on account of the piquancy of the combination, should not be devoid of interest. The management have also decided to give "Parade" (Jean Cocteau and Erik Satie) in spite of the unreasonable hostility with which it was greeted here on its first production. In the last three years, however, much water has flowed under the bridges of the Seine, and it is not as easy now to shock, or even startle, as it was in days when values were more inflexible than they are to-day. In the meantime Satie’s latest work, "Socrate," has been something of a revelation even to his admirers. The composer has written a very passionate ballet, "Socrate," "Phaedra," and "Phedre" (in the translation of M. Victor Cousin) for two female voices and piano, and both as regards the treatment of the melodic line and the restrained nobility of the conception as a whole the work must be considered a very memorable achievement. It is in no way dramatic; it is pure and simple; but the simplicity of its style, which is a polyphonic character, and the smooth sense of classic continuity which it evokes are admirably adapted to the Platonic text. There are no high lights, no "purple passages," no exaggerations (just as all these things are absent from the original); and the wonderful description in the "Phedre" of the dreams of Socrates is not only superb, but often seems enhanced by the restraint and justness of its musical setting.

In the words of M. Henry Prounières ("Revue Musicale," April, 1920), one of the most able and distinguished musicologists of to-day, "long after the Trévèles Flasques, the Valse-country forme Dédiées and the Tristes Veux have been forgotten, ‘Socrate’ will still be sung as a classic"; and the same writer comments on the rare phenomenon of an artist producing his masterpiece when over the age of fifty. Rare, yes, but not unique, as Verdi and Titan attest. None the less, M. Satie is universally looked upon as one of the jewels of our time.

The concert given by the "Association Chorale de Paris" on April 20 contained some interesting first auditions—notably M. Florent Schmitt’s "Danse des Devasadiss" for voice and orchestra. The poem is a piece of Oriental imagery by Jean Lahor, the spirit of which has been most happily and effectively seized by the composer. M. Inghelbrecht’s "Le Cantique des Créatures" (St. Francis of Assisi), which was also performed, contains some massive choral effects, and is technically accomplished if not perhaps strikingly original or inspired.

The "Ecole Normale de Musique de Paris," which was started in October last, is making excellent headway, and is supplying a want which was very badly felt. It is open to students of all ages and nationalities without previous examination, its teaching staff consists of practically all the most distinguished living French musicians, and it provides a complete musical education for a moderate inclusive fee. Above all, it provides exceptional opportunities for foreign students who, owing to the greater exclusiveness of the "Conservatoire," would otherwise be obliged to go to Germany, as they have done in the past.

The School announces a special course of advanced instruction during the month of June, when lessons in interpretation by Messrs. Wunderly, Devadasis and Cousin) will be given, visits to the principal museums will be arranged, and pupils will be taken to various appearances at the Opéra and Opéra-Comique. This course is open to foreign students, who will be admitted either as performers or as listeners. The address of the School is: 61, rue Jaffrouf Paris (17); and the Director, M. A. Mangeot.

R. H. M.
Drama

SHAKESPEARE AT STRATFORD

II.

Of the actors in the Stratford company, Mr. Murray Carrington is in a class by himself. We hold to this opinion in spite of the fact that his performances were very unequal. As Richard II, he was all but perfect; as Benedick in "Much Ado," he was admirable; as Shylock he was almost detestable. May Heaven have mercy on the soul of that one of our critical colleagues who declared that Mr. Carrington's Benedick showed signs of fatigue after the strain of "his superb Shylock." He will have a great deal to answer for if Mr. Carrington takes him seriously.

We will try to diagnose the case of Mr. Carrington. He feels at home in the more delicate subtleties of character; he wears the exquisite complaisance of Benedick as a gallant's glove. The tinge of freakishness in the man's humanity is as natural to him as an easy gesture. "Much Ado" with Mr. Carrington for Benedick ripples as it should with wise laughter. His Richard was a continual delight; not a point was missed, not a point was made. (For an actor to make points is as bad as to miss them.) Act and irresolution alike came from one living centre. He made the unhappy king as real to his audience as Shakespeare had made him to himself. For a moment I believed that

Not at all the water in the rude rough sea
Can wash the balm from an appointed king.

But Shylock is not a subtle character. Shakespeare never meant him to be one; and he meant much less that he should be a tragic character. We doubt whether Mr. Carrington could ever play the part as the simple melodramatic element in a tragic-comedy that it is; at all events, it is not obviously his part. By trying to get subtlety in it he ruined it. He imported the stupid Ghetto realism that M. Moscovitch has made fashionable. He said "Tank God" and "By buddies," because it made what is to him a dull character more interesting. Mr. Carrington really has a mind well above this claptrap Yiddishness; and he knows, as well as we do, that Shakespeare would have written "Tank God!" if he had wanted it that way. He may possibly not be aware that by making Shylock a realistic figure the key of the play is hopelessly put out. To play tragi-comedy as tragedy is almost as bad as setting a High Mass in rag-time. It is to play to the gallery. It may do well enough for Shakespeare in Yiddish, just as Bohemia may have no coastline when the "Winter's Tale" is played in Prague. But in England we ought really to have got beyond the point where Shylock is taken seriously at all. He is just an Elizabethan bopey-man, vamped up out of old Marlowe. Only if he is treated as such will the trial-scene and the closing act of the play be freed from the preening cattiness and the outlandish which now, thanks to Mr. Tree and M. Moscovitch, have infected them. Here we are in imminent danger of a definitely false tradition. Shylock is a part which should be given to the most melodramatic actor in a company with the instruction that he should speak English and let himself go.

In another point also the "Merchant of Venice" has been distorted, either by following the Court Theatre production or in obedience to an older tradition. Arragon is turned into comic relief; himself made "the blinking idiot" whose portrait he is given. Within a year or two, if this goes on, they will put a pocket-mirror in his casket. By the text, Arragon is a perfectly sensible man. Apparently this falsification is based on a misunderstanding of Portia's

Oh, these deliberate fools; when they do choose
They have the wisdom by their wit to lose.

In the first place it applies to Morocco just as much as to Arragon. In the second the emphasis is on "deliberate," not on "fools." They hesitate and are lost; whereas Bassanio goes straight to the mark. Arragon's speech is merely not foolish, but very wise. The necessary transformation is, however, effected by omitting not only the lines we mentioned in our previous article, but also

Oh, that estates, degrees and offices
Were not derived corruptly...

No one, much less the director of the Stratford company, has the right to treat Shakespeare so.

Mr. Edmund Willard played Petruchio in "The Taming of the Shrew." Bolingbroke in "Richard II." Bassanio, and Posthumus in "Cymbeline." His Petruchio and Bolingbroke were excellent. He is possessed of a splendid voice which gave full scope to Bolingbroke's rhetoric. If he had been Shylock and Mr. Carrington Bassanio it would have been an exchange of mutual advantage. Mr. Willard can do things in the way of straightforward "acting" and enunciation of which Mr. Carrington is incapable; Mr. Carrington has an emotional compass more delicate than Mr. Willard's. Together they are a splendid foundation for the company.

The company is further blessed in an excellent comedian. Mr. Stanley Lathbury as Lancelot Gobbo, as Grumio, as Cloten was something more than good. He gave one the unusual sense of knowing by instinct or study what an Elizabethan fool really was and being it. We could not help regretting that he was not Dogberry instead of Don John in "Much Ado." Considering what he made of Grumio, we believe we should have had a more generous share of the quintessence of absurdity squeezed out of Dogberry by him.

Other excellent performances were those of Mr. George Cooke as York in "Richard II.," and Baptista in the "Shrew." Mr. Harvey Adams—a workmanlike actor of great promise—as Gratiano; Mr. Oswald Roberts, Mr. Mark Stanley, Mr. Earle Grey, and Mr. C. G. Carson—all of whom are likely to improve steadily under good training. But in the case of the New Shakespeare Company we feel it particularly invincible to omit a single name; we have the rare and exhilarating feeling that the members form a unity.

Miss Ethel Warwick and Miss Phyllis Relph divided the leading women's parts. Miss Warwick was Beatrice and Katherina; Miss Relph, Portia and Imogen. Undoubtedly Beatrice and Katherina were better realized than Portia and Imogen; but a comparison on such a basis is unprofitable. We like Miss Warwick's methods better; she conveys a robust sense of personality. Miss Relph is a little too much inclined to droop and languish for our taste. On the other hand, Miss Warwick is almost the victim of her own peculiar intonation. If Miss Relph would infuse a little more of the masculine, the spontaneous into her conception of a Shakespeare heroine—after all, none of them is "feminine" in the modern sense of that terrible word—and Miss Warwick would keep firm control of her voice production, they also will make a firm foundation. Miss Gwen Richardson, a promising player of minor parts, should also be on her guard against the devastations of femininity.

On the whole, it may fairly be said that the actors are excellent material. In the last resort, everything depends upon Mr. Bridges Adams. We have a good deal of faith in him; and if he will take our well-meant advice to study the text of Shakespeare, and for itself, again and again, if he will bear in mind that he is not so much the recipient as the creator of a tradition, we have little doubt that he will succeed in the difficult and fascinating task to which he has been appointed.
IN PRAISE OF THE OLD VICTORIANS

THE OLD VIC.—"Henry IV., Part I."

SINCE the "Old Vic" enterprise was started there has been nothing but praise for the management and the players. They have earned it, every word, But isn't it time now to praise the audience a little, too? The performance of "Henry IV., Part I." on Monday night was not at all bad, but it was certainly not remarkable. Now the audience at the "Old Vic" is distinctly remarkable. Might we then (just for once) face about from the stage, and speak straight to the house? If we might, we should like to say something like this:

Ladies and gentlemen, you have earned our thanks, not as the Roman Consul earned his Senate's thanks, because in tragic circumstances he did not despair of the Republic, but because in tragic circumstances you have kept us from despairing of our Republic of the Theatre. No doubt any one who passed with attentive eyes through your streets, and marked the quickening sense of life in them, the peculiarly exhilarating bustle of them, the essentially English beauty of your girls and the essentially English joviality of your men, should have guessed at once that no audience could understand Shakespeare as well as you. But we had a foolish fear that you might be bored. Now we know better. We realize that Falstaff was created for appreciation, and had you yet--and had you subtle Falstaff on Monday, how much more you would have appreciated him!—and that the serious scenes were written for serious listeners, like yourselves. We perceive the grossness of our mis-judgment.

Perhaps, if you were not so good-natured, you would have something to say in return. You might remind us that the Globe and the Swan, and the other houses for which Shakespeare designed his plays, stood, if not precisely in your neighbourhood, at any rate in neighbourhoods akin to yours. You might say that you, and all the rest of unspoiled England, had always found Shakespeare quite enough good. You never asked Davenant and Tate and Gibe to start rewriting him as soon as he was in his grave. You never asked gentlemen from Holland to spend thousands on gauds, and show you tableaux of paste-board figures to make him really interesting. You never wanted that, any more than you wanted your circus taken away to Berlin, your native-made pantomime turned into a Parisian revue, and your music-hall, which you had fostered into so rare an art, converted into a dumping ground for all that America finds it impossible to be amused by. You might even add, once you were worked up, that you had instructed Dickens to paint your portraits, and had only put up with Garvice out of politeness. "What use is it," we seem to hear you cry, "for us to provide the materials, the stage, and the handsome and national type of drama and literature, if we are to be for ever set aside in favour of the great twin-deities, 'The Public' and 'What the Public Wants'—beings we have never set eyes on, monsters whose reported judgments we profoundly distrust?"

Alas! You never actually utter your mind like this. You are too good-natured. You take what is given you (as you do in politics) and make the best of it. Yet it sometimes you were to protest, what a boon it would be!

Ladies and gentlemen, why are you so d—d good-natured?

D. L. M.

His Majesty the King has approved the award of the Geographical Society's Royal Medals as follows:

The Founder's Medal to Mr. H. St. John B. Philby, C.I.E., for his two journeys in South Central Arabia, 1917 and 1918.

The Patron's Medal to Professor Jovan Cvijic, Rector of the University of Belgrade, for distinguished studies of the geography of the Balkan Peninsula.

"HAMLET" IN ITS ENTIRETY

MR. CHARLES WARBURTON'S portrayal of Hamlet is his finest achievement, and the support accorded him by the rest of the company made it his completest; but there was something incomplete, all the same, about the "Hamlet" on which, by the Old Vic's bounty, our faculties were feasted these recent Saturday afternoons. Not that anticipation was thwarted thereby: Reared in an age of digested substances of nutriment, intellectual as well as physical; of stage-presents calling into play the actor's artistry less than his cunning, we can hardly hope, despite the implication of the playbill, that our bite shall be on the bare granite of Shakespeare's words. Current notions of scenery must be sternly relegated to their warrantable place before we can make more than pretence of the ideal, which is only incidentally the complete, "Hamlet." Our actors' memories must come of mentality, not of mechanism. And, most of all, if there be any handicap which proves insurmountable, our requirement is that whatever failings of omission are made shall be the result of a principle, not of prejudice. The principle (applied to the play itself) is that Fortinbras and the whole of the talk concerning him shall be the first to go—this in face of Coleridge's eulogy of Horatio's memory. The prejudice (as charged against the Old Vic production) is that of prudery, and its fear lest the reputation of Ophelia shall not come respectably through the ordeal of the second verse in that "pretty sad simple bawdry," as Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch has phrased it, of Saint Valentine's day. It did not seem to occur to anyone that Miss Florence Saunders would in consequence give us an Ophelia who is a mere doll, even though proper emphasis were laid on the sublime unselfishness of the maid's concern for Hamlet, and forgetfulness of self, after his disavowal of love for her—which it was, and with real emotional power. The stainless woman, the fundamental attitude of Shakespeare to her sex, revealed in the contrast of a girl cruelly stripped by madness of all her natural defences and unconsciously become a tragic echo of the surrounding coarseness—these we were not permitted to see.

T. M.

Correspondence

SHAKESPEARE'S WELSH CHARACTERS

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sir,—The following note, which appeared in a Chester paper last January, may be of some interest in connection with Mr. Logie Robertson's article (Athenæum, April 16) and Mr. Idris Bell's letter (Athenæum, April 30). The note refers to a MS. of 689 folios, written in Welsh by Ellis Griffith, "a soldier of Caiais," and now deposited, with other Mostyn MSS., in the National Library of Wales.

In the last volume of the Flintshire Historical Society's journal, a reference is made to this MS. by the Rev. Meredith J. Hughes, B. Lit., Vicar of Prestatyn, wherein he identifies Shakespeare's "Griffith" in his play of "King Henry VIII.,” Act IV., scene ii.; and as this may prove of interest to those of your readers who are students of the drama and of history, and to others, I venture, as editor of the Flintshire Society, to send it to you as follows:

"MS. 158 is a remarkable volume, devoted chiefly to the history of Henry VIII., and his time. The author, Ellis Griffith, describes himself as a 'soldier of Caiais,' and in one of the B.M. MSS. he is said to have been a native 'Gronnawd Ucha, ymhilyw Llan Hasapyn.' We may, therefore, claim him as a Flintshire man, and his history, when completed, was sent to a friend living at Gwyasy, in the same parish. That the work is of great historical value is beyond question, but so far it remains a sealed book; but the future historian of the period cannot afford to ignore its contents. The style, too, is simple, direct, and graphic, and there are abundant evidences of an earnest and sincere desire to obtain exact information from reliable sources without passion or prejudice. His account of the rising in Essex exemplifies the detachment of a true historian in dealing with material obtained directly from contemporaneous sources. The narrative of Wolsey's embassy to France in 1527 is full of the inimitable touch of a trained eye-witness. The Cardinal, he says, spent about twenty days in preparation for his journey, and on the eve of his departure he sent out word that all should be ready with their horses to ride with him at X of the clock on the morrow," and the historian adds, "an oldish gentleman among them answered: ‘Ha, sirs, you can dine at your leisure and be there in good time enough to see him mount his horse, because he will not start till the planet Jupiter enters the house of Venus. This takes place between two and three of the clock, an hour to which he and his astrologers have been looking forward for three months past, under the belief that whatever a man undertakes and begins at this time will prosper better and better.’" Wolsey's belief in premonitions and signs was a curious feature of his character. It is interesting to compare Elis Griffith's observations quoted above with Henry VIII.,' Act IV., scene i., where 'Griffith' describes to Queen Katherine the death of Wolsey:-

'Where eagerly his sickness pursu’d him still, and three nights after this, about the hour of eight, which he himself foretold should be his last, full of repentance.

'After my death I wish no other herald, no other speaker of my living actions, to keep mine honour from corruption, but such an honest chronicler as Griffith.—Ibid.

'Elis Griffith observes: 'At this time I was intimate with Master Philip's servants, who had all come from Wales, and who showed me many of the talks the Queen had many a time with their master and mistress in Spanish, a language which the men understood and spoke fluently, especially David and Robert, who had been born at Llangollen.' Philip, mentioned above, was a Spaniard and one of the Queen's sewers, and his wife was a sort of doctor to the Queen, as well as a cook in her chamber, and she was ordered by the manner of Spain. But who was the 'Griffith' of Shakespeare? Chronology, at least, permits his identification with Elis Griffith. The Weaver of Lavenham, 'a little man, wizened and ill-fermed,' who led the revolters in the Essex rising, made an admirable speech before the Cardinal in the Star Chamber, 'in which I, Elis Griffith, was then and there present'...

'and after a long process the Cardinal said that 'The King would pay for their board and lodging in prison, and the keeper thereof was ordered to give four-score pieces and ten of silver to every one of them, and to set them free to go back to their country.' Thus Elis Griffith, the historian—Shakespeare's Griffith:

'This Cardinal

Lotty and sour to them that lov’d him not;

But to those men that sought him, sweet as summer.

As in bestowing, madam,

He was most princely.'

I venture to think the Vicar makes out a strong case for the identification of our Flintshire historian, Elis Griffith, with the 'Griffith' of Shakespeare. I am, etc.,

H. T.

DRAYTON'S "BATTLE OF AGINCOURT"

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Dear Sir,—The following point in prosody may be of interest.

I have always understood (following two or three books on the subject) that Drayton's 'Ballad of Agincourt' should be read thus:

Fair stood the wind for France, etc.

The other day, however, glancing through the poem, it struck me that it would go infinitely better thus:

Fair stood the wind for France, and so on, always,—two 'beats' in the line, no matter whether they come on important or unimportant, accented or unaccented, words. This gives, to my mind, an infinitely more spirited effect, something after the style of Hoggs's Löck the door, Lériston, Lion of Liddesdale.

The difference corresponds to the difference in music, between "two-eight" and "six-eight", time, and I shall be glad if some of your readers, learned in such matters, would give their opinion.

Yours faithfully,

A. R. C.

P.S.—Perhaps I have stumbled on an old controversy, or which has been settled long since. In such case, I can only plead that I write as a "babe" in such matters.

THE MECHANICS OF PLAYWRITING

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sir,—Mr. W. J. Lawrence's interesting article on "The Mechanics of Elizabethan Playwriting" (April 30) gives examples of how the Elizabethan playwrights stamped characters with physical denotations of the original actors. Certain parallels from Molière may interest some readers. Two occur in 'L'Avare'. At the end of the side-splitting third scene of the first act Harpagon says of the departing La Flèche: 'Voilà un pendard de valet qui m'incommode fort, et je ne me plais point à voir ce chien de bouteux-là.' The valet's part was played by Molière's fame brother-in-law, Louis Bejard. Again, in the fifth scene of Act II. Harpagon remarks that he has no serious ailments: 'Il n'y a que ma fluxion, qui me prend de temps en temps.' The intriguing Frosine replies: 'Cela n'est rien. Votre fluxion ne vous sied point mal, et vous avez grâce à tousser.' Here of course Molière makes fun of his own malady, which caused his death a few years later.

Yours truly,

O. E.

May 1, 1920.

JOANNES STRADANUS "VESPUCCI LANDING IN AMERICA"

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sir,—In reply to Mr. Landseer Lucas's question in your issue of April 9, a reproduction of this drawing, "circa 1580," is given in Guirard's "First Four Voyages of Amerigo Vespucci," 1893, the small stock of which is now, I believe, in the hands of Messrs. Henry Stevens, Son & Stiles, of Great Russell Street, W.C. It is also reproduced in the "Connoisseur" of September, 1919, p. 41, with some notes by Mr. W. A. Baillie-Grohman. A much earlier view—probably based on first-hand information—was lost 57 in the Phillips sale of June last, and is reproduced in the illustrated copies of the sale catalogue.

Yours very truly,

W. ROBERTS.

"THE GAMUT OF THE POETS"

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sir,—Esteeming it an honour even to have my effusion noticed by you, I am sure you will pardon me for writing to say that line 3 in your quotation (Athenæum, April 29, p. 558) should read:

So, these words do but trip their sense towards, &c.

Yours, etc.,

VERITAS.

THE VASARI SOCIETY

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Dear Sir,—The Committee of the Vasari Society has now decided to resume the publication of its annual portfolios of reproductions (from drawings by Old Masters. Subscriptions for 1920 (Part I. of the New Series) are due on May 1. Members should either send me their subscriptions by cheque, or fill up a form that I may register the subscription and forward it to the banker named therein. Delay in forwarding subscriptions may mean that copies will not be available, as only a limited edition is printed.

I am, etc.,

Yours faithfully,

A. M. HIND,

British Museum, W.C.I.

Hon. Secretary.

We have received from the Oxford University Press a copy of the second (1920) edition of the General Catalogue. It is a model of all that a publisher's catalogue should be, and, owing to the number and high quality of the books issued by the Oxford Press, a valuable work of reference. This edition contains the interesting announcement that further work on the "Dictionary of National Biography," which was presented to the University by the family of the founder, the late G. M. Smith, has been placed under the direction of Mr. H. W. C. Davis.
Foreign Literature

THE POETRY OF FRANZ WERFEL

GEBNEN AUS DEN DREI REICHERN: AUSGEBWHLTE GEDICHTE.

By Franz Werfel. (Leipsic, Kurt Wolff. 2 M. 50.)

EINANDER: ODEN, LIEDER, GESTALTEN. By Franz Werfel.

Third Edition. (Leipsic, Kurt Wolff. 5 M.)

Among the younger German poets of the present day, Franz Werfel has a good claim to be considered as he who has best fulfilled the promise of his early work. When, aged twenty-one, in the year 1911, he published the volume of poems entitled "Der Weltfreund," of which, it is interesting to note, a third edition has recently been issued, discerning critics, although noting the influence of Whitman, nevertheless perceived an originality of thought and a confident technique, both in vers libre and in regular stanzas, which, they anticipated, would carry the young writer far in a poetical career. Two years later the forecast was held to be justified by the poems contained in the volume "Wir sind." The influence of Whitman, both on the poet's philosophy and his poetical method, was still noticeable, but the confidence and essential originality of the first volume were even more marked. "Wir sind" was followed in 1915 by the collection entitled "Einander," which has also reached its third edition, and this has just been followed by the series of poems called "Der Gerichtstag." Representative selections from all four books are given in the first volume under review, which also contains certain poems not yet issued separately.

The very first lines of Werfel's anthology give the keynote to his work:

Mein einziger Wunsch ist Dir, o Mensch, verwandt zu sein!

Bist Du Neger, Akrobat, oder rufst du noch in tiefer Mutterthat, Klingt Dein Mäzenenlied über den Hof, lenkest Du Dein Floss in Abendschein, Bist Du Soldat, oder Aviatiiker voll Ausdauer und Mut.

It is an echo, at least in substance, of Whitman's "Life's involv'd and varied pageant,

All the forms and shows, all the workmen at their work,

All the seamen and the landmen, all the masters with their slaves,

All the hapless, silent lovers,

All the prisoners in the prisons, all the righteous and the wicked,

All the joyous, all the sorrowing, all the living, all the dying.

Wolfe stands absolutely opposed to the symbolist and romantic schools of poetry; he is the opposite extreme to such poets as Stefan George, Rainer Maria Rilke, Hugo von Hofmannsthal. He has no sympathy with the undertone in much of their poetry of odi profunum vulgus et arceo. On the contrary, it is for him a direct poetic inspiration to have held communication with his fellow-beings:

Herz frohlocke!

Eine gute Tat habe ich getan.

Nun bin ich nicht mehr einsam.

Ein Mensch lebt,

Es lebt ein Mensch,

Dem die Augen sich fechten,

Denkt er an mich.

(From "Der Weltfreund."")

In "Wir sind" this kind of Unanimimos was carried further. The fine "Lebenslied" it contains is a triumphant assertion of the impossibility of the poet's, of anyone's, dissociating himself from the rest of humanity. Everywhere there can be found the "Anmut des Menschen lichen, all-enduring and all-uniting; hatred must yield to \"ein erdbewusstes Leben.\" In some of the poems of this volume this creed is given a dramatic expression, as in the poem on the widow by the bed of her son:

Mein Leben ist ein Sichergassen

In Dein gerundetes Lecht,

Im leidenden Ueberfließen

Erfüll ich die weltliche Pflicht.

Bald bin ich nichts als Dein Lachen

Nichts als Deines Mandes Gebot

Lass mich Deinen Schlauf bewachen,

Mein Kind, dein Daseins Tod.

It is evident that Werfel is not a mere poet of "joy in living," not a mere singer of the open air. He has given imaginative expression to human sympathy—in the literal and etymological sense of the word; the interdependence of mankind is become with him the very stuff of his poetry; it is almost a religion, as is shown in the poem "Veni creator Spiritus" from the volume "Einander":

Komm heiliger Geist, Du schöpferisch!

Den Marmor unserer Form zerblich!

*Dass nicht dein Maenner krank und hart

Den Brunnen dieser Welt instarrt,

Dass wir gemeinsam und nach oben

Wie Flammen meiander toben!*

The two principal criticisms levelled against Werfel are, first, that he has forced his art into the service of an essentially non-artistic doctrine; he has made his poetry a platform for the preaching of "human solidarity"—in the current banal phrase. The second charge is that, equally with the symbolist school, he opposes, he is un-national, his poems only a translation into the German tongue of foreign ideas and a foreign technique. It is recalled,—although what influence his racial antecedents have had on his poetry beyond a certain debt to the phrasology of the Old Testament is not stated or in evidence,—that he was born at Prague of Jewish parents, and certain Berlin literary journalists have played with the title "The Jewish Schiller." The reader of a representative selection from Werfel's work, and above all of the volume "Der Gerichtstag," his latest, will be hard put to it to explain the origin of these criticisms, and it would, perhaps, be better not to puzzle his head with them, but for the fact that they are plausibly urged in certain German reviews. Without venturing on a discussion as to the object of poetry or nationalism in art, the critic will have no difficulty in acknowledging the vigour and the artistic sanity of Werfel's work, and, especially in some of the poems of the latest collection—"Die heilige Elisabeth," for example—a beauty of image and word. There is no contemporary German poet, at least of Franz Werfel's generation, who has better fulfilled his promise than he; and he promises better than almost all even yet, for he is only thirty and his writing has shown continuous development.

LETTERS FROM PARIS

II. THE CENTENARY OF LAMARTINE'S "MÉDIATIONS POÉTIQUES"*

An anecdote that I have been unable to trace to its source, but which is reported by a most trustworthy authority—Mr. W. C. Brownell, in his "Victorian Prose Masters"—has it that Matthew Arnold, remarking once to Sainte-Beuve that he could not consider Lamartine a poet of much importance, elicited from him the following reply:

"He was important to me." The answer is perfectly apposite, and part of its value lies in the aptness with which it states the most baffling of the problems which confront the critic of literature: the frequent opposition between the national and the universal, or—to put the case in terms still susceptible of being measured—the European importance of a great writer, and the ensuing divergence of the two estimates. To take an example already familiar to our readers, probably not one among the French critics of note who have written since Ronsard was rediscovered by Sainte-Beuve in 1828 would have found himself able to converse in the judgment passed upon him in The Athenæum of September 19, 1819, and yet, to a mind which strives—ambitious and vain endeavour!—to preserve, at least in literature, a European outlook, the judgment appears not to be wide of the mark. A century has just expired since the first publication of Lamartine's "Méditations Poétiques," and the date affords a favourable pretext to try to unravel some of the possible implications of Sainte-Beuve's curt reply.

On March 13, 1820, a thin, oblong volume, without author's name, was issued "au dépôt de la librairie Grecque-Latine-Allemande, Rue de Seine No. 12," under the title of "Méditations Poétiques." I am the happy possessor of one of the few surviving copies, and the poems are printed here by a "Avertissement de l'Éditeur," in which I find the following sentence:

Le nom de "Méditations" qu'a donné à ces différents morceaux en indiquant parfaitement la nature et le caractère; ces œuvres épandent tendres et méloédiques des sentimens et des pensées d'une âme qui se abandonne à ses vagues inspirations. Quelques uns s'élèvent à des sujets d'une grande hauteur; d'autres ne sont, pour ainsi dire, que des soupirs de l'âme.

Two soupirs of the soul: perhaps when he wrote these simple words M. Ernest Genoude did not attach much importance to them. But whether they are placed, they sound almost apologetic, and yet they touch on the very essence of what is finest in Lamartine's work, of what secures to it its unassailable position in the sanctum of French poetry.

In some of the articles written about the centenary, great and undue stress was laid on Talleyrand's verdict contained in a note addressed to the Princesse de Taloum, who had sent him the book on the day of its publication: "Il ne se pas prophète; je ne puis pas vous dire ce que sentait le poète, mais mon impression est que les lecteurs.

Il y a là un homme." The word of Talleyrand is nothing more than a textual repetition of the word of Napoleon to Goethe at Erlangen: "Vous êtes un homme, M. Goethe.

Napoleon has been overpraised; yet in Goethe's case it is undoubtedly apocryphal. The interesting fact is how, applied to Lamartine, it is almost ideally misplaced—so that it points the way towards the direction where the truth lies. "L'homme n'est ni ange, ni bête, et le malheur veut que qui veut faire l'ange, fait la bête." Pascal's proposition may be always true of man; it was, in fact, true, in a way, of Lamartine himself, of whom Paul Bourget penetrates, and remarks, "qu'il y avait en lui comme une fatale angélique"—yet it is not always the case of the incalculable genius that sometimes chooses to elect an abode in man's defective organism. There have been in most literatures a few, a very few, men whose genius cannot be characterized otherwise than as angelic; the human mind seems always to experience the greatest difficulty in recognizing this angelic character in genius, and when it does recognize it, it has an invariable tendency to discount it as all weakness, without perceiving the subtle quality, the fineness of the strength that lies behind. Everybody today would admit that the well-known phrase by which Matthew Arnold concludes his essay on Shelley, "In poetry, no less than in life, he is a beautiful and ineffectual angel beating in the void his luminous wings in vain, retains but the strictly limited value of a telling mot d'expansion." Arnold had been careful to discriminate between what belongs to the man, and what to the genius residing in the man, the mistake would have been avoided. If Shelley's genius might be repeated what Joubert said of Plato—that one always hears the rustle of his wings: his genius soars far above Lamartine's, and that is precisely why a Lamartine with a Shelley has no use for a Lamartine; but it is not a little significant that Matthew Arnold should have misconceived them both, and it shows how his doctrine of a "Criticism of Life" as indispensable to all great poetry developed in his mind a certain bias against the higher forms of pure lyric expression. Now in French literature Lamartine represents the nearest approach we have had—the nearest approach possibly in the language—to that and that more than anything else is the reason why Lamartine was why he continues to be important to us. Between the two poets one could discover not a few points of contact:

An aerial music runs all through the best work of Lamartine. The words are disembodied, dematerialized, and the process is not one which can be traced in each word taken separately, but resides rather in an undefinable element of fluidity, on which the whole poem is carried. He makes us almost forget that he uses the language of a musical instrument—the true sense lies in the sound, in the unbroken, unchaltered flow of the melody. Lamartine is the great melodist of French poetry; his is not the "fall-throated ease" of Keats' "Nightingale," but rather the "wandering water ever whispering" of Rossetti's poem.

Talking the other day with the père Stoll among the living French poets, as I was discussing with him the subject of the music which I feel in each Lamartine's finest verse, he made the following remark: "Il n'est rien de si beau en poésie que l'impondérabilité, mais il faut que ce soit une impondérabilité obtenue par un certain poids; ou l'impondérabilité de Lamartine est due à l'impondérabilité même. There is a great deal of truth in this view, and the poet to whom I am referring has himself achieved the triumph of such "impondérabilité obtenue par les poids," yet to deny the quality altogether to Lamartine would be to go much too far. In the very poem from which I have already quoted, I come upon this passage:

Mais déjà l'ombre plus épaisse
Tombe et creuse les vases murs,
Le bord s'éclaire, le brou de cesse,
Le silence occupe les airs, with its incomparable last line, in which a vapour floats over and enwraps the majestic central weight of the verb occupé.

Yet there is no doubt that by far the most frequent triumphs of Lamartine's verse are purely imponderable triumphs, and this pure imponderability must, after all, not be so easy to attain, as it has never been quite recaptured, except in brief snatches by Verlaine—and without that ample flow of song which, in Lamartine's best work, gives one almost a sense of irresponsibility. Verlaine nevertheless, as happens too often in literature, proved himself one of the most influential among Lamartine's critics. "L'Événement," in 1869 his first volume of verse, "Poèmes Saturniens," in the letter in which he acknowledged his debt towards the author of "Joseph Delorme," he aimed a shaft at Lamartine. To the last honouring of the critic—who, more perhaps than any other, was endowed with that rare attribute, an intellectual conscience—Sainte-Beuve, severely rebuked him, pointing out to the young aspirant that no man who had not lived at the time could quite realize what liberation the "Méditations Poétiques" brought to those who were entering the literary life in 1820.

However great—monumental and immaterial at the same time—will always remain such poems as "Le Lac" or "Le Vallon," yet the purely Lamartine essence is perhaps best to be caught in certain oblong-syllabic cadences, in which is felt that heaving of the soul to which "L'Avertissement de l'Éditeur" alludes—such cadences as the opening of the "Souvenir," with its luminous and poignant wistfulness:

En vain le jour succède au jour,
Il gisent sans lasser de trace;
Dans mon cœur, un amour mort,
O dernier souffle de l'amour!

Or, best of all, the unsurpassed close of "Le Golfe de Baya":

Ainsi tout change, ainsi tout passe;
Ainsi non-mêmes nous passons,
Hélas! sans baisser plus de trace
Que cette barque où nous glissions
Sur cette mer où tout s'efface.

CHARLES DU BOS.
List of New Books

Prepared in co-operation with the Library Association.

The method of classification adopted is a series of groups roughly corresponding with the Dewey Decimal System, the sub-classes being indicated, for the benefit of librarians and others familiar with the system, by the class-numbers given at the end of each entry. The first number in these represents the main class, the second one of the subdivisions, and so on.

Those works in the List which appear most suitable for purchase by Public Library Authorities are marked with an asterisk.

100 PHILOSOPHY.

Collins (Mabel), The Locked Room: a true story of experiences in spiritualism. Theosophical Publishing House, 1920. 7½ in. 176 pp. paper, 2/6. 133.9

Miss Collins grafts upon a jejune and improbable plot a series of incidents attributed to possession by the devil. The claim that the story is true is not in accordance with the facts.

Magee (John Arthur Victor), The Broken Barrier, Skeffington [1920]. 8 in. 127 pp., 4/6. 133.9

See review, p. 604.

Pim (Herbert Moore), A Short History of Celtic Philosophy. Notes by Professor Eoin MacNeill. Dundalk, W. Tempest (T. N. Foulis), 1920. 7½ in. 120 pp., 7/6. 199

See review, p. 601.

200 RELIGION.

This impressive volume, written by a number of scholars, is essentially learned prolegomena to the study of the Acts of the Apostles. It is divided into three main sections, each of which has its subdivisions. The three sections are (1) The Jewish World; (2) The Gentile World; (3) Primitive Christianity. The essays are attractively written, and are not mere technicalities but is necessary. A second volume, dealing with the literary phenomena of Acts, and a third, on the exegesis of the text, are promised.

The Bowyer Bible, which has found its way, on loan, to the Bolton Public Library, is probably the most portentous piece of "Gentrizerizing" in the world. Containing between six and seven thousand engravings and filling forty-five volumes, it represents thirty years' industrious collecting. In his pamphlet Mr. Sparte tells the history of this strange book and of the man who made it—Robert Bowyer (1758-1834), the miniature painter.

300 SOCIOLOGY.

The Order of Woodcraft Chivalry admits boys and girls, men and women, to membership, each applicant being required to know the meaning and aim of the Order, which may be stated simply as willingness and ability to do things for yourself, together with things for others. Emblems, legends, badges, etc., are elaborately set forth.

Drysdale (Bessie Ingman), Labour Troubles and Birth-Control. Heinemann, 1920. 7 in. 96 pp., 3/6. 312

Birth-control, keeping the family within the bounds of decent existence, is, according to the author, the remedy for most of our social ills. Practised by the educated classes during the last forty years, it has proved itself the very keystone of civilization. Yet the poorer classes have kept in ignorance of this cure for poverty, and continue to multiply beyond the possibilities of employment and subsistence, bringing forth fruit for hospitals, prisons, lunatic asylums, and brothels. Were the agencies now at work helping to remedy the miserable results united in the effort to prevent the cause, degrading poverty in ten or twenty years would cease to exist.

Handbook of Local Government for England and Wales; prepared for the use of Councillors, with special sections on matters of immediate importance, housing, town-planning, milk-supply, etc. Labour Party (Allen & Unwin), 1920. 8 in. 270 pp. apps. bibliog. 5/6. 352.042 Unoubtedly, it is the first substantial and complete preparation of this handbook was made," the object being to provide information for the Labour Councillors elected in large numbers in November, 1919; hence many defects, which should be removed in the second edition promised. There is no index; there are no page-references even to the table of administrative powers and duties that might have been used as a table of contents; and the directory of Trade Councils and Labour Parties is not up to date. Still the book is a useful compendium, especially on the more material side of municipal activities. Rural Councils are comparatively neglected, and there appears to be no mention of the powers recently granted to County Councils to establish and to carry out library services. A source of policy is indicated for the administering of the Education Act of 1918.

Phillips (Walter Alison), The Confederation of Europe: a study of the European alliance 1813-1825 as an experiment in the international organization of peace. Longmans, 1920. 9 in. 338 pp. index, 12/6. 341.1

In preparing a new edition of the treatise that first appeared in 1914, Professor Phillips came to the conclusion that, in spite of the immense changes due to the war, nothing has happened, or is likely to happen, that would deprive of its value the history of the attempt made a century ago to set up an international organization for the maintenance of peace. He has therefore merely restated the lessons he drew from that history in the light of what has since happened; he has modified the introductory section, and rewritten the conclusion. He has no mercy for the shallow and uninformed idealism of the pacifist movement, as he observed it in a visit to the United States, and makes an earnest appeal to the relevant facts of history.
The Social Question is discussed as a problem of economics, of human rights, and of spiritual life. "The most powerful driving force in the world of labour is a system of thought." The working man is revolting by the idea of selling his labour to an employer as one does goods in the market. He is fighting for "the rights of men in their entirety." Hence "Socialism will prove no more for the body social, but only a quack remedy, perhaps even a fatal one, unless men's hearts and minds learn, at least instinctively, to recognize the necessity for a threefold organization of the body social."

The economic ideas of Liberals and Socialists, particularly Marxism, are vigorously attacked by M. Valois, whose "new political economy" is a fresh statement of the system of personalization of the results of labour, based on scientific knowledge, it is claimed, of actual conditions.

500 NATURAL SCIENCE.

Kenealy (Arabella). Feminism and Sex-Extinction. Fisher Unwin [1920]. 9 in. 229 pp. 8/6. 287.5 Dr. Kenealy has elaborated the truth that men and women inherit the characteristics of both sexes into an extreme doctrine which she uses as a weapon to attack feminism and the "unwomanly woman." She heads a chapter, "One side of the body is male, the other side is female"; and the next, "Masculine mothers produce emasculated sons by misappropriating the life-potential of male offspring." Feminist doctrine and practice are disastrous to human faculty and progress. She is in dread of the "impending subjection of man," because it will be a calamity for woman as well as for man. A book touching on so many cognate topics and illustrated by so many facts and statistics ought to possess an index.

800 LITERATURE.

A jeu d'esprit, with a serious sub-intention, developing ironically the ancient dictum that all men are fools. La Rochefoucauld said: "La plus subtile folie se fait de la plus subtile sagesse." M. Bloch rejoins: "La plus subtile sagesse ne se fait qu'à la connaissance de la plus subtile folie."

Professor Firth's identification of persons, countries, parties, and incidents in "Gulliver" with actualities of the author's time, of which a report appeared in The Athenaeum (Dec. 19, 1919), are interesting and convincing.

Fleure (Svend). Grim: The Story of a Pike ("Gyldendal Books"). Gyldendal, 13, York Street, W.C.2, 1920. 8 in. 163 pp. 6/6 n. 839.838

Grim is an omnivorous female pike, five feet long and fifty pounds in weight, and enjoying a semi-legendary reputation. After bawling for years the efforts of experienced fishermen, she meets her end through the instrumentality of a small boy, who is himself nearly killed in the process, and becomes forthwith the hero of the countryside. Grim's life-history from the egg upwards is narrated in detail and with much spirit, the author making a conscientious endeavour to place himself at his heroine's point of view. The net result, however, is unpleasant, especially when viewed in connection with bygone dinners upon individuals of Grim's species. The scene is apparently laid in Scandinavia, but the natural objects introduced are for the most part familiar.

A conspectus of all the medieval and modern non-French literatures of Europe, America, and Asia, giving a condensed account of authors, lists of their works, and the gist of all that merit particular attention, together with critical and historical works to be consulted. The compiler claims that the book meets a public need, since it gives universal literature at a glance.

These articles, reprinted apparently from sundry magazines, suffer in their book-form from the disadvantage of an eye-fatiguing type. The title essay deals in pleasant fashion with the author's preference for an atlas to any other kind of book, a preference which it is not quite easy to take seriously. Dissertations follow in the same strain on "local colour," medieval pilgrims, mountaineering, and the literature of travel generally. There is, besides, a chapter on novels, which seems to have no connection with the rest and proceeds on conventional lines of criticism.

POETRY.

Cook (H. Caldwell). Littleman's Book of Courtesy. Dent, 1920. 7½ in. 57 pp. il. 3/6 n. 821.9

In this volume Mr. Cook has turned the laws of "puéril et honnête" behaviour into rhyme. The affectations of an antique manner which abound in the verse are at times a little irritating, but on the whole the book is readable and the injunctions it offers unimpeachably sound. Mr. C. E. Brock has contributed a number of illustrations.

Mr. Coomaraswamy writes in English and French, and one gets the impression that he is not perfectly at home in either language. "New England Words" and "Body and Soul" are essays in Georgianness. "Béneste de ma Belle" is a not very successful attempt to write in the antique style of Guillaume Apollinaire's "Sous le pont Mirabeau coule la Seine."

See review, p. 609.

De Candole (Alec). Poems. Cambridge, Univ. Press, 1920. 8½ in. 86 pp. por. 4.6 n. 821.9

Like Sorley a Marlborough boy, and killed, like Sorley, in the flower of adolescence, Alec de Candole possessed a measure of Sorley's poetical talent, but more calmly reflective, less strange and disquieting, as well as less remarkable, less original than was Sorley's genius. The following sonnet, written to Rupert Brooke's memory: "They say there's a high, windless world and strange Out of the wash of days and temporal tide," is a good example of de Candole's poetry:

They say: and yet to me the human gleam Of chequered life, and many-coloured love, Are nobler than the eternal things above, Wherever sad and weary mortals dwell.

The white eternity that must remain Calm 'mid creation's rack, unchanged in change, Less sweet, less bitter is, less nobly strange Than hectic joy, and love, and hate, and pain.

And he who fixed this wild and varied flush Of infinite colour in human life, left cold Blank death should see us all submit.

We know not when nor how (as some great blush May mangle many sounds), in one vast white Where yet each hue is shining as of old.

Mature in thought, technically accomplished, it stands on the very border-line that separates the best verse from insubstantial poetry.
910.4

821.9

Mr. Hernung celebrates the heroism of the young guard in the picturesque colloquialism of Newbolt and Kipling.

811.5

Mr. Johnson is a very personal poet. He loves to personify abstract qualities, such as Fancy, Memory, Hope and the like. With their copious sprinkling of capital letters his pages have a rich eighteenth-century appearance. He likes to refer to the great poetical names of the past; and in such a phrase as:

O death! when I remember not
Such moments, may my current run,
Alph-like, to thy oblivion.

he makes a graceful allusion to accepted poetical masterpieces. Many of his poems are occasional in character, and in these he displays his happiest inspiration. He has the professional after-dinner speaker's talent for saying the right, the tactful thing about any person or event. Mr. Johnson would make an excellent Laureate.

Miriam's father was discarded by his wealthy mother because he married an actress, who, however, died soon after the child's birth. Miriam is brought up as a member of a touring company, but after her father's death her grandmother relents and Miriam goes to live with her. She is, however, frequently in conflict with her new surroundings, and the book contains many good passages contrasting theatrical and artistic views of life with those of conventional society. Miriam is an attractive character and has the courage of her convictions.

The Republic of "San Haytidor" is the background of this vivid romance dealing with an island which the chief villain of the piece describes as "my poor misruled country, now governed by those who are unworthy of her honourable traditions." The riffraff get up a revolution, create an army with more officers than privates, and behave generally in an absurd manner. The story is both amusing and exciting.

910 GEOGRAPHY, TOPOGRAPHY, ANTIQUITIES.

916.2
See review, p. 589.
Important.

The Publisher will be glad to hear from readers of "The Athenæum" who experience any difficulty in obtaining copies. All communications sent to 170, Fleet Street, E.C., will receive immediate attention.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Inland</th>
<th>Foreign</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>£1 8s. 2d. per annum</td>
<td>£1 10s. per annum</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>post free</td>
<td>post free</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Shorter periods in proportion.

Subscriptions should be sent to The Publisher, "The Athenæum," 170, Fleet Street, E.C.A.

---

The best Labour Saving Appliance is the Human Brain

If you apply your brain to every item of household management, however trivial, you will in the course of a year save many pounds. Do you, for instance, when cooking on a gas stove invariably turn out the gas when you no longer require the heat, or do you draw aside the pot from mere force of habit?

May we send you a small pamphlet on "Thrift" in the use of gas which will help you to save odd pence daily in these days when every penny counts?

We do not sell gas or gas appliances; we exist to advise the public how to get the best service from the gas and the gas appliances which they use, and we are supported by the chief gas undertakings in the British Empire. If you will write to us about any difficulty we will put our expert service at your disposal free of charge or obligation.

THE BRITISH COMMERCIAL GAS ASSOCIATION

47 Victoria Street, Westminster, S.W. 1
Two Sisters

By RALPH HAROLD BRETHERTON, Author of "The Mill." 7s. 6d.

"The quiet, confident ease of Mr. Bretherton's style may possibly seem a little old-fashioned to the advocates of feverish realism: but it is the manner which has gone to the making of many excellent novels in the past, and it has added one more to their number in 'Two Sisters.'... A very true and trenchant story which ought to enjoy an honourable success."—Daily Telegraph.

B. 14
By R. K. WEEKES.
7s. 6d.

"'One of the finest and cleverest novels issued since the opening of the war, a brilliant novel to be read and re-read, and there are passages which will live.'—Aberdeen Free Press.

'Able and vigorous study in melodrama,... Story never flags,... Characters are curiously real..."—Times.

Danny
By ALFRED OLLIVANT.
7s. 6d.

"The delicate tuning and restrained feeling... distinctive of this completely re-written edition... will be appreciated by numerous readers."—Athenaeum.

The Philosophy of Speech

By GEORGE WILLIS. 7s. 6d.

"A most entertaining, provoking and challenging treatise on the nature, philosophy and first beginnings of human speech..."—Bookman.

Lines of Life
By H. W. NEVINSON.
3s. 6d.

"A strong and sure technique, and behind every line is the revelation of his powerful and arresting personality."—Daily Chronicle.

Primal Airs
By J. A. M. ALCOCK.
3s.

"His views on the life of to-day and yesterday are as fearlessly outspoken as his lines are stirring."—Aberdeen Journal.

More Translations from Heine
By P. G. L. WEBB.
3s. 6d.

"We welcome a further instalment of these skilful verse renderings."—Times.

Flashes of London

By CHARLES INGE. 6s.

"Here we see the living drama of London, the pageantry of its streets, its myriad scenes and phases caught with an alert mind and a fine sympathy."—Daily Chronicle. "Amusingly fresh and well written."—Liverpool Courier.

A Nation's Heritage
By Canon H. D. RAWNSLEY. 8 Illustrations. 6s.

"Deals with various buildings and beauty spots saved to the nation by the National Trust for Places of Historical Interest,... A book to read and to keep."—Court Journal.

Henry III.
A Drama by JAMES F. WAIGHT.
2s. 6d.

"... We welcome his undertaking of a new trilogy of historical dramas in blank verse."—Times.

National Education in India
By L. J. PATRAI.
6s.

A critical, constructive essay on the kind of education needed in India. (Just out.)

Psycho-Analysis:

"A clear exposition of Freud's theories."—Times

Library of Philosophy

Divine Personality and Human Life
Part II. of "God and Personality"
By CLEMENT C. J. WEBB, M.A. 10s. 6d. (Just out.)

The Case for Nationalisation
By A. EMIL DAVIES, L.C.C. 4s. 6d. and 2s. 6d.

"A full and moving account of Nationalisation... honest and careful treatment of the problem... We strongly recommend it to all thoughtful citizens..."—Star. "... Inspired throughout with a profound sympathy for the just claims of Labour, as well as a zeal for the interests of the community."—New Statesman.

The World After the War
By CHARLES RODEN and DOROTHY FRANCES BUXTON. 7s. 6d.

"A remarkable, moving, and arresting book to be read by every citizen of this country..."—Common Sense.

Arrows of Desire
By Prof. J. S. MACKENZIE.
10s. 6d.

"A charming book... the whole subject is delightfully treated."—Education.

The Quintessence of Bernard Shaw.
By H. C. DUFFIN.
7s. 6d.

The Agamemnon of AESCHYLUS.
Translated into English Verse, with Introduction and Notes, by GILBERT MURRAY, D.C.L., LL.D. 3s. 6d. and 2s.

Forthcoming Publications

Ruskin House, 40 Museum Street, London. W.C. 1

Printed and Published for the Proprietors of THE ATHENAEUM by BRITISH PERIODICALS, Ltd., 170, Fleet Street, E.C. 4.
From S.P.C.K. List.

ERASMUS AND LUTHER: THEIR ATTITUDE TO TOLERATION.
By the Rev. ROBERT H. MURRAY, Litt.D., H. Blake Scholar in History, Trinity College, Dublin. 2s. 6d. net.
The Times Literary Supplement says: "A fine piece of historical study."

THE WORCESTER LEBER ALBUS. Glimpses of Life in a Great Benedictine Monastery in the Fourteenth Century.
By the Rev. JAMES M. WILSON, D.D., Canon and Vice Dean, 3s. 6d. net.
A new and most interesting document for our knowledge of English medieval history.

THE DELIGHTFUL JOYS OF HEAVEN.
By ALICE EVELYN PEACOCK, M.B.E. 6s. 6d. net.

THE FIVE LAMBETH CONFERENCES.
1867, 1878, 1888, 1897 and 1908. Compiled under the direction of the Most Reverend RANDALL T. DAVIDSON, D.D., Archbishop of Canterbury. 12s. 6d. net.
Indispensable to all who want to understand the Conference of 1908.

THE PASSING OF THE POOR.
By M. E. BLYTH. 3s. 6d. net.
A vivid description of a state of Society which will, it is hoped, soon be of historical interest only.

THE DEVOTIONS OF BISHOP ANDREWS.
Vol. I. Translated by JOHN HENRY NEWMAN. With an Introduction by H. B. SWETE, D.D., F.B.A. 3s. 6d. net.
Vol. II. Translated by JOHN MASON NEALE. 3s. 6d. net.

The Story of the English Towns.
With Maps, Plans, and Illustrations. 4s. net.

PETERBOROUGH.
By K. and R. E. ROBERTS.

PLYMOUTH.
By ARTHUR L. SALMON.
A timely publication in view of the "Mayflower" celebrations.

Translations of Christian Literature.

DIONYSIUS THE AREOPAGITE. On the Divine Names and the Mystical Theology.
By the late C. E. ROLT. 7s. 6d. net.
This famous writer is the fount of Christian mysticism.

THE LIBRARY OF PHOTIUS.
Vol. I. To A.D. 313. Edited by B. J. KIDD, D.D. 7s. 6d. net.

ST. IRENEUS. THE DEMONSTRATION OF THE APOSTOLIC PREACHING.
Translated from the Armenian with Introduction and Notes by J. ARMITAGE ROBISON, D.D., Dean of Wells. 7s. 6d. net.
The first English edition of this recently discovered book, which shows how the Church of the Second Century presented Christianity.

DOCUMENTS ILLUSTRATIVE OF THE HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.
Vol. I. To A.D. 313. Edited by B. J. KIDD, D.D. 7s. 6d. net.
This will be in future an indispensable companion for Students of Church History.

Texts for Students.

12. SELECTIONS FROM THE "HISTORIA RERUM ANGLICARUM" OF WILLIAM OF NEWBURGH. 1s. 3d. net.
15. THE CODE OF HAMMURABI. By PERCY HANDCOCK, M.A. 1s. net.
16. SELECTIONS FROM THE TELL EL-AMARNA LETTERS. By PERCY HANDCOCK, M.A. 4d. net.
17. SELECT PASSAGES ILLUSTRATING COMMERCIAL AND DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS BETWEEN ENGLAND AND RUSSIA. By A. WEINER, M.A., F.R.Hist.S. 1s. 6d. net.

SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING CHRISTIAN KNOWLEDGE.
Central Office only: 6, ST. MARTIN'S PLACE, LONDON, W.C.2.
Bookshops: 64, NEW BOND STREET, LONDON, W.1; 43, QUEEN VICTORIA STREET, LONDON, E.C.4.
And all Booksellers. Lists post free.
Appointments Vacant

BOROUGH OF NELSON.
MUNICIPAL SCHOOL OF ART.

THE EDUCATION COMMITTEE invite APPLICATIONS from fully-qualified persons for the POSITION of ART MASTER, a commencing salary of £350 to £400 per annum, according to experience and qualifications. Duties to commence in August next.

Particulars of duties may be had on application to Mr. James Skinner, Organising Secretary, Education Office, Nelson.

Applications stating age, qualifications and experience, together with not more than three testimonials, must be sent to the Organising Secretary on or before the 22nd instant.

Canvassing is prohibited and will be a disqualification.

J. H. BALDWIN,
Town Clerk.

LEEDS SCHOOL OF ART.

WANTED, immediately, an ASSISTANT ART MASTER, full time, qualified to give instruction to disabled ex-service men in training, and to take part in the general work of the School. Salary according to qualifications and experience but not less than £250. Further particulars as to duties, etc., may be had from the Headmaster. Forms of application, which should be returned as soon as possible, may be obtained from the undersigned.

JAMES GRAHAM,
Director of Education.

Education Offices, Leeds.

UNIVERSITY OF LONDON.
GOLDSMITHS’ COLLEGE.

TRAINING DEPARTMENT.

APPLICATIONS are invited for the POST OF LECTURER in GEOGRAPHY (man). Commencing salary, £300 to £350 according to experience, rising to £425, with further possibilities under certain conditions. Last day for applications, May 26. For further particulars apply to the Warden, Goldsmiths’ College, New Cross, S.E.14.

UNIVERSITY OF BRISTOL.

ASSISTANT LECTURER IN EDUCATION.

The UNIVERSITY will shortly proceed to appoint an ASSISTANT LECTURER in EDUCATION to be attached to the Women’s division of the Department of Education. Salary £250—£100—£300.

Further particulars may be obtained from the Registrar to whom applications and testimonials should be sent before May 29.

LEEDS UNIVERSITY.

DEPARTMENT OF ENGLISH LANGUAGE AND LITERATURE.

READERSHIP IN ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

The Council of the University will shortly proceed to the APPOINTMENT of a READER in ENGLISH LANGUAGE, whose duties will also include instruction in the history of Early and Medieval English Literature. Salary £600 a year.

Full particulars of the appointment may be obtained from the Secretary or from Professor G. S. Gordon at the University, Leeds. May 6, 1920.

COUNTY BOROUGH OF STOKE-ON-TRENT EDUCATION COMMITTEE.

THE above Committee invite APPLICATIONS for the POST OF PHYSICAL TRAINING ORGANISER (man) for the County Borough. Commencing salary £300 per annum. Forms of application, which should be returned, duly filled up, not later than May 22, 1920, may be obtained on receipt of stamped, addressed, foolscap envelope from:

DR. W. LUDFORD FREEMAN,
Director of Education.

Education Offices, Town Hall, Hanley, Stoke-on-Trent.
May 6, 1920.

NEWTON-IN-MAKERFIELD PUBLIC LIBRARY.

APPLICATIONS are invited for the POSITION OF LIBRARIAN.

Salary, including war bonus, £250 per annum. Candidates must have had practical experience, and hold certificates qualifying them as Fellows or members of the Library Association.

Applications, stating age and qualifications and whether military or naval service was rendered during the war, accompanied by copies of not more than three recent testimonials, and endorsed “Librarian,” to be delivered not later than May 29th instant to the CLERK TO THE COUNCIL, Town Hall, Earlestown (Lancs.).
THE COMPLETE OPERA BOOK
By GUSTAV KOBE. With One Hundred Portraits and Scenes from the Opera. The stories of the Operas, together with four hundred of the leading airs and motives in musical notation. svo. Cloth extra. 25s. net.

MAN TO MAN
By JOHN LEITCH. The solution of the Labour Problem as worked out by the author for twenty large Companies. With an Introduction by the Right Hon. GEORGE N. BARNES, M.P.; and Forwarded by SIR ROBERT HADFIELD, Bart., F.R.S. Crown svo. Cloth extra. 7s. 6d. net.
How he has completely done away with strikes, secured from 30 per cent. to 300 per cent. more work from the workers, bigger pay for labour and bigger profits for capital, and changed the whole relation between employer and employed.

A SHORT HISTORY OF THE ITALIAN PEOPLE
By JANET PERNOSO TREVELYAN. svo, with 24 Illustrations and 6 Maps. 25s. net.
An informing, well-proportioned and vivid picture of the Italian people from the century preceding the barbarian invasions to the close of 1876, which marks the making of modern Italy. The author has added an epilogue continuing the narrative to the close of the Great War.

OLD SEED ON NEW GROUND
By REV. The Hon. JAMES ADDERLEY. With 12 Cartoons by LOW. Crown svo, cloth extra. Probable price 7s. 6d. net. Ready shortly. The author takes the "Old Seed" of the Prophet of Nazareth and dews to sow it in modern language on the ground of the modern world.

SANDS & CO.
MR. COLEMAN GENT. A Romance of the Days of Charles II. By Enid Dinins. Author of "Mystics All." Cr. svo. price 7s. 6d. net.

JOAN OF ARC: Soldier and Saint. By I. A. Taylor, with 8 Illustrations by W. Graham Robertson. Cr. svo, price 6s. net.

London: 15, King Street, Covent Garden.

FOR LOVERS OF THE LANGUAGE "English"
6d. Monthly. 7/6 Annually. Specimen Free.

121-5, Charing Cross Road, London, W.C.2 and W. H. Smith and Sons' Bookstalls.

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS, Ltd.

A 20th CENTURY BOOK for 20th CENTURY NEEDS
To many of the Scriptures are sealed Books, although to-day there is more need than ever for a thorough and intelligent reading of them. People are constantly saying that "in the rush and bustle of life, the language of the year 1611 is out of harmony with the needs of the present day."
Do you know, and will you make it known, that the New Testament is translated into the modern English in everyday use?

THE TWENTIETH CENTURY NEW TESTAMENT
A translation into Modern English, from the Original Greek (Westcott and Hort's text).
This translation is a great success both in England and America, and that it is meeting a real need is proved by the fact that many thousands of copies are being sold yearly.

WILL YOU USE IT? WILL YOU RECOMMEND IT TO OTHERS?
In response to a large demand a POCKET EDITION has been prepared and is NOW READY.
Printed on thin paper, cloth boards. Price 3s. 6d. net.

PRICES OF EDITIONS:
Popular Edition. Crown svo, cloth boards .... 2s. 6d. net.
Ordinary Edition. Large svo, cloth boards .... 3s. 6d. net.
Ordinary Edition. Large svo, leather, gilt top ..... 6s. 0d. net.
Presentation Edition. On India paper, green call, gilt top; in box .... 7s. 6d. net.
Large Type Edition. Royal svo, green cloth boards .... 5s. 0d. net.
Pocket Edition. Thin paper, cloth boards .... 3s. 6d. net.
Postage extra in all cases.

May be obtained from all booksellers, or direct from

SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION

JOURNAL OF THE INSTITUTE OF ACTUARIES.
No. 273.—April 1920.—Price 5s.

CONTENTS.
The Reversionary (or Prospective) and Collective Methods of Valuing Widows' Funds, with some Notes on the Valuation of the Church of Ireland Widows' and Orphans' Fund. By Charles E. Howell, M.A., LL.D., Secretary at the Dublin Office of the Standard Life Assurance Company; abstract of the Discussion on the preceding.
A New Method of Valuing Policies in Groups. By H. L. Trachtenberg, B.A., A.I.A., Actuarial Assistant in the Statistical Department of the Medical Research Committee.
Valuation of Redeemable Securities with allowance for Tax. Unemployment Insurance Bill.
An elementary demonstration of Stirling's approximate formula for the value of factorial n. Review. Correspondence.
The Institute of Actuaries. Obituary.

THERE'S A FRESH POETIC VEIN IN POEMS FROM BEYOND
Any Bookseller :: Any Library.
MR. T. FISHER UNWIN'S BOOKS.

PORTRAITS OF THE "EIGHTIES"

By HORACE G. HUTCHINSON. Illustrated. 16/- net.

Mr. Hutchinson's vivid sketches of some of the principal actors in the affairs and general life of this country in the Victorian 'Eighties provide informing as well as excellent entertainment.

GEORGE TYRRELL'S LETTERS

Edited by M. D. PETRE. Cloth. 16/- net.

"These letters reveal a fresh character of the man—sincere and open, humorous, loyal to friends, compassionate to human frailties, wise in counsel."—The Sunday Times.

A HISTORY OF MODERN COLLOQUIAL ENGLISH

By HENRY CECIL WYLD. 21/- net.

"In his encyclopedic history Mr. Cecil Wyld admits that there is a certain amount of dry detail through which his readers must pass—a wilderness in which they must wander on their weary way to the promised land. But in this inevitable wilderness there is a succession of oases in which it is a perfect delight to linger for rest and refreshment, so happy as well as pertinent are Mr. Wyld's illustrative selections of prose and poetry."—Tush.

FEMINISM AND SEX EXTINCTION

By Dr. ARABELLA KENEALY. Cloth. 8/6 net.

"Miss Keenly has mastered a formidable array of facts tending to prove that the key to human perfection lies in the accentuation of set differences, physical and mental."—Saturday Review.

ABOUT IT AND ABOUT

By D. WILLOUGHBY. Cloth. 12/6 net.

"These essays contain more wisdom on the subject of current affairs than many leading articles, sermons, and speeches of the professionally wise."—The Daily News.

THE PEOPLES SIDE OF THE CASE.

AMRITSAR: AND OUR DUTY TO INDIA

By B. S. HORMAN, Editor of "The Bombay Chronicle." 6/- net.

The author writes with unique intimate knowledge of the origin and causes of events concerning which the public have little knowledge.

COLLECTED FRUITS OF OCCULT TEACHING

By A. P. SINNETT. 15/- net (2nd Imp.).

THE CANADIANS IN FRANCE

By CAPT. HARWOOD STEELE, M.C., late Headquarters Staff, 2nd Canadian Division. With Maps. Cloth. 21/- net.

This is the first complete record of the achievements of the Canadian divisions to be published.

A PAWN IN PAWN

By HILDRA M. SHARP, Author of "The Stars in their Courses." 7/- net (2nd Imp.).

"The Westminster Gazette says: "'A Pawn in Pawn' is likely to be one of the most persistently popular books of the season. . . . Scarcely any reader will want to lay the book down before it is finished, and we congratulate Miss Sharp on the success of her attempt to rival the best sellers on their own ground.'"

A STRIKING NEW 'FIRST' NOVEL.

MADELINE OF THE DESERT

By ARTHUR WIGGALL. 7/- net.

Send for a prospectus of "The Story of the Nations" series.

CHAPMAN AND HALL'S LATEST SPRING BOOKS.

THE LIGHT HEART: An Icelandic Saga.

By MAURICE HEWLETT. 6s. net.

"A bold experiment, but one that has turned out a highly successful achievement... a fine story."—Daily Chronicle. "Mr. Hewlett is remarkably successful."—Observer. "The heroic, racy story of Thordur."—Morning Post. "Gay life and loyal death."—Westminster Gazette. "The emotions are of the simplest... It is through such links and comparisons that one must divine the character of these Icelandic heroes... There shines through it a spirit that is high and beautiful."—Times.

By CHRISTOPHER MORLEY. 7s. 6d. net.

This book has had an immense success in America, and Messrs. Chapman & Hall have decided that it will be equally popular here. It has the Burke touch, whimsical and romantic, a most fascinating heroine, and a very unexpected dénouement.

FREETHINKERS OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

BY JANET E. COURTNEY, O.B.E. 12s. 6d. net.

This book has received many columns of carefully considered criticism and appreciation. The Westminster Gazette found it: "A quiet, well documented, and agreeably written series of studies, fulfilling a very definite object." Country Life said it was: "A book eminently worth reading." Sidney Dark, in John o'London's weekly, maintains that here "The story of Victorian scepticism is admirably told... with knowledge and sympathy." There can be little doubt that to lovers of serious literature Mrs. Courtney's book is one of the most important of the Spring season.

PROBLEMS OF POPULATION & PARENTHOOD.

25s. net.

Being the Second Report and the Chief Evidence taken by the National Birth-rate Commission, 1918-19. This book contains the evidence of the following distinguished persons—Miss Stanbury, Mr. Cotman, Miss Toothman, Mrs. Bramwell Booth, Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, Dr. Marie Stopes, Sir H. Rider Haggard, Mr. Harold Cox, and Mr. W. L. George.

THE RELEASE OF THE SOUL.

By GILBERT CANNAN. 5s. net.

Being a sequel to "The Anatomy of Society." This book completes, on the spiritual side, the study of existing social conditions begun by Mr. Gilbert Cannan in "The Anatomy of Society." It is sympathetic and constructive, and offers an intellectual solace for the disturbances of the present time.

REPUTATIONS.

By DOUGLAS GOLDRING. 7s. 6d. net.

A lively book of literary criticism, the temper and spirit of which are sufficiently revealed by the title. Dr. Goldring is a scholar. The Guardian, in its review of Modern Fiction, "This Sunday Times, 1918, and many will eagerly try to discover his identity. There is, in addition, a great deal of personal matter, and many anecdotes of the men with whom Mr. Douglas Goldring was associated in the days when he sub-edited The Spectator under Mr. Ford Madox Hueffer.

ACTE: A LOVE SEQUENCE, And Other Poems.

By MAY EARLE, Author of "Juanita of Castile," and "Cosmo, Venucci, Singer." Crown 8vo. 5/- net.

CHAPMAN & HALL, LTD., 11, Henrietta Street, W.C.2.
THE SAINTS OF MAY

BROWSING is a habit sternly reproved by severe persons who take life and literature seriously. In spite, however, of the disapproval of these estimable people, I maintain that it is an admirable habit, indispensable for a proper literary education. By browsing the mind acquires an immense amount of useless and delightful information, and it is one of the great objects of education to reveal to us the true worth of the things which are valueless from a worldly and monetary point of view: our instructors, from the dame school onwards, see to it that we grasp the importance of all those kinds of learning which will help us to make our way in the world; and the more completely they are successful in this the more satisfied they are with the excellence of our education. Few of them can see that the bowl of flowers in the centre of the table is as essential as the round of beef at the end. Body and soul can be kept together by a series of variants on the theme of sausages and mashed, served on slabs of fossilized brawn at a Lyons restaurant, more securely, perhaps, than by continually feeding with Postlethwaite on the vision of a sunflower in a blue vase in the centre of a white tablecloth; but the soul that never even misses the sunflower will become more hopelessly attenuated than the body that sans the sausage. This is so far recognized that most dietetic practitioners recommend, and indeed enforce, brief periods for gazing upon sunflowers—the varieties chosen being usually the "Shakespeare," "Scott," and "Tennyson's" types and their hybrids, and the specimens preferably dried and furnished with diagrams and annotations. But the making of daisy-chains, cowslip-balls or bunches culled haphazard from a score of hedgerows is carefully discouraged as a waste of time. And Time is Money. So the poor browser is rebuked in his youth as an idler, and in his old age as a trifler; but if he has the root of the matter in him, he goes serenely on his way, browsing surreptitiously in his youth, and unashamedly in his old age.

Moreover, browsing is a science as well as an art. To begin with, the perfect browser should stand up to his book; or if he sit, it should be upon the library steps, or on the edge of a table, or the arm of a chair, or upon the floor; to settle down in a chair is to degenerate almost inevitably into a mere reader. Further, the books to be browsed upon are not the masterpieces of literature—save that these may be browsed over retrospectively, when they are already familiar; no one, for instance, would browse on Meredith, and the effect on a Philistine of attempting to browse on Browning has been admirably described by Mr. Birrell. In this connection one of the many pleasures of the habit may be remarked upon. If, as we are only too frequently assured, a thing of beauty is a joy for ever, a thing of ugliness may certainly be a joy for the moment, and the delight of a really bad book can only be savoured by browsing—to read it solidly would be to convert the delight into torture. But apart from bad books—someone once wrote a pleasant essay on "The Hundred Worst Books," which I make periodical vain attempts to trace—and great books, there is an abundant field for the browser, and if any one work more than another calls for his attention it is the "Acta Sancorom." and great determination would be required. It would be a foolish and a suicidal thing to attempt to plough one's way through that weary waste of miracles and moralizing; but to skim over it is another matter, and an occasional dip below the surface will yield strange prey, worth seizing. Take, for instance, the seven volumes devoted to the Saints of May. I doubt if any other month has a greater claim to the attention of Englishmen. True, April has its St. George, and December St. Thomas of Canterbury; but May can show Augustine, Apostle of the English, on the 28th; Dunstan, who not only tweaked the Devil's nose, but also, as our history-text-books delight to tell us, founded the long line of ecclesiastical statesmen; Lanfranc, on the 28th—no unworthy successor of Dunstan; and John of Beverley, who performed the remarkable feat of taking his M.A. at Oxford in the year 720. Then there are three stars of learning of the first magnitude: Alcuin, the glory of York Grammar School, though he did consider Virgil a most immoral man; Aldhelm of Sherborne; and, on the 27th, the Venerable Bede. Nor is royalty unrepresented; for here are Queen Ethelgifu, who founded Shaftesbury, and King Ethelbert, over whose body the first stone church of Hereford was raised; as well as the semi-saints, Etheldred of Mercia and that poor thing, Henry VI. Lower by birth, but equally exalted after death, were Godric, the hermit of Finchale, round whose fire the snakes used to sit and warm themselves "et quos potenter sonos congratulationis emittebam," and Simon Stok, who lived in a hollow tree-trunk (whence his name) until the Carmelites came to England, when he joined them, became General of the Order, and, long after his death, had a shrine set up in his honour at Botzen in Tyrol.

The Scottish and Irish saints are too much even for the Bollandist Fathers, who are content merely to record their names, except in a few cases such as Comgall, who founded Bangor, the mother of a hundred monasteries, or Buriena, who emigrated to Cornwall; but Wales is represented by St. Asaph—whose recent promotion to the Archbishopric of Wales must have made St. David and Gerald de Barri write in their graves with indignation—and to some extent by St. German, who not only tied his stole round a dragon's neck and drowned it ignominiously, like an unwanted kitten, in a cistern, but also aided the Welsh to crush Pelagian heretics and Pictish invaders. St. Constantine the Great, whose day is May 21, though he was born in Britain, belongs to Rome, and may rank side by side with the great Pope, Gregory VII.

Another great figure this month is Athanasius of Alexandria, whose person seems to have been divided and his substance confounded, for while his body found eventual repose in Venice, one of his heads was in Spain and another at Tours. In the same way St. Juvenal of Narni had two bodies, one at "Fossani," near Meyran, and another at Narni. Of the two, that at Narni was rather more genuine, but that of Fossani was the more interesting, owing to the manner of its discovery. It seems that this body was stolen by a French canon, who died at Meyran. The canon and the stolen saint were buried together, and both alike were forgotten until a certain

Catherine, sole daughter of the King of England, was possessed by a demon, who declared that he could be expelled only by "Juvenaluccius." Such a saint being unknown, she was sent out to Rome, where at least fragments of most saints were kept, to look for him; and, staying a night in Meyran, could not be persuaded to enter the church of St. Mary-in-the-Fields, but, being dragged in, began at one spot to call upon St. Juvenal. Men at once set to work to dig at this spot, and two coffins were found, full of bones. The first bones tried were those of the canon, and produced no effect; but upon the application of the saint's bones to the princess the demon was expelled and vanished through the vault of the church, leaving a hole which was shown for centuries afterwards. Now the date assigned to this curious story appears to be 1229—at which time the King of England, Henry III., was still unmarried; but, oddly enough, Henry did have a daughter Catherine (born 1253), who was beautiful, but mute and wanting in intellect—a form of misfortune commonly ascribed to demonical possession. That she should have been sent on a pilgrimage to Rome before her death in 1257 is conceivable, though the fact does not appear to be recorded elsewhere; but if so, it is to be feared that the expulsion of the demon did more harm to the church than it did good to the child, for Matthew Paris certainly implies that she remained muta et inutilis to the day of her death. While, therefore, it is open to the devotees of St. Juvenal to maintain that the story is correct in every point but the small matter of date, it is also open to sceptics to say, as the Bollandist Fathers said with pained surprise when they discovered "The Four Sons of Aymon" inscribed in a Neapolitan martyrology—"Veremur ne ex fabulosis narrationibus desumpti."

L. F. SALZMAN.

Poetry

THE HIGHER SENSUALISM

Queen Circe the farmer's wife at the Fair
Met three sailor-men stumping there

Who came from the parrot-plumed sea, Ye-o-Ho!
And each his own trumpet began to blow:

"'We come,'" said they, "'from the Indian seas
All bright as a parrot's feathers, and these"

Break on gold sands of the perfumed isles
Where the fruit is soft as a siren's smiles

And the sun is black as a Nubian,
We have sung the beard of the King of Spain,

And have caught this gaudy queer-plumed boy—
(An angel, he calls himself) for a toy."

* * * *

The Angel sighed: "Please, ma'am, if you'll spare
Me a trumpet, the angels will come to the Fair,

For even an angel must have his fling,
And ride on the roundabout, in the swing!"

She gave him a trumpet, but never a flare
Reached the angels from Midsommer Fair,
May 14, 1920

THE ATHENÆUM

631

REVIEWS

THE GOLDEN PEAK

Sakuntala. By Kalidasa. A Version for the English Stage by Das Gupta and Laurence Binyon, with an Introduction by Rabindranath Tagore. (Macmillan. 7s. 6d. net.)

WHEN reading contemporary literature we seek for the august and the eternal—vainly enough, no doubt, still we seek for them to compensate for their absence from contemporary life. But when we read the Classics, the august and eternal are taken for granted, and we seek instead for the pathos and the jokes of which contemporary life is so full. Perhaps it is an ignoble quest, but one always feels so grateful to the Classic when it is not as classical as it might have been. Concessions like the Fifteenth Idyll of Theocritus or "Amis and Amiles" go straight to the heart. We recognize our passing sensations in them, and, endorsing these, they seem to endorse something else: the continuity of passing sensations. It is really a great moment when one can say to a classic, "Oh, but how pretty!" or "Oh, but what fun!

We used to lavish such exclamations before "Sakuntala." A Sanskrit drama of the sixth century, connected by legend with the semi-mythical kingdom of Ujjain, it seemed an unlikely home for jokes and sentimentality. Yet we found them there, or thought we found them, and were filled with delight, so that one reader at all events, while waiting for his train at Ujjain railway station, has wandered off in a vague search for Kanwa's hermitage. This story of a Lost Ring was (one felt) the story of Brünnhilde and Siegfried transferred to the atmosphere of "A Midsummer Night's Dream." It was august, but it was also humorous, enchanted, gracious. Even in the last scene, where we left the lower earth behind, we did not leave fun, and Sakuntala's small boy seemed to have a very nice time on the Golden Peak, feasing a little lion and some ladies. But—if the present version be correct—we must sit up straighter and mind our P's and Q's. "Sakuntala" is not to be a classic that one can treat intimately, and connect with one's daily life. The small boy continues to have a nice time, but he has it sub specie aeternitatis, and not as you or I might. He dwells on the Golden Peak of austerity and penances, and teases the ladies there in no colloquial strains; "he absorbs," in the solemn words of Mr. Tagore, "all the lives of the trees, creepers, flowers and foliage" that surround him, and is consequently more lively than you and I will ever be, but scarcely with our liveliness.

Accenting the serious aspect of the play, Mr. Binyon has produced a beautiful translation, but a translation in the grand manner, which indicates rather than conveys gaiety. This defect (if it is one) was mitigated in the dramatic performances last year by the presence of actors and scenery, but in cold print it comes out unrelieved. Moreover, Mr. Binyon has rejected, for theatrical reasons, one notable device which must have animated the original Sanskrit—the constant change from prose to poetry; he relies mainly on blank verse, and a tendency to remoteness is the result. With him, however, seriousness is only implicit; it is explicit with Mr. Tagore, whose essay on the "Inner Meaning" of "Sakuntala" gives great pause to all frivolous adventurers among masterpieces.

It is the temperament of Mr. Tagore to believe that an inner meaning is necessarily more important than an outer: "Gitanjali" and all his best poetry cluster round this assumption. He mistrusts surfaces, arguing, logically enough, that they are superficial, and he loses no time in attacking the large and brightly coloured surface of "Sakuntala." Like a wasp on a plum, he sinks almost immediately out of sight. What he seeks is not the bloom of appearances, but the metaphysical nectar that lies beneath them. He finds it in abundance, and no doubt justifiably, for an Indian play is likely to contain metaphysics, and of a kind that an Indian critic will appreciate. But there is one great objection to his borrowings: they undermine the play's constitution and destroy its merry and voluptuous outlines. It is never the same play again. He seems so didactic and elderly, blind not only to the human charm of the play, but to the element of fairy that figures so largely in its plot. And his standards of conduct are so prim that he can regard the lovely First Act as fundamentally a deabuch of lust: "the earthiness of the fall of Sakuntala" is the phrase he permits himself. King Dushyanta is likewise earthy, the proof of it being found not so much in his conduct as in the following lyric:

   Bee, O Bee, that eagerly Roamest after honey new,
   Thee the mango blossom drew,
   Thee it held with honey-kiss—
   Now it is the lotus holds thee
   Lost in bliss.
   Is the mango all forgot
   For that new flower that enfolds thee,
   Quite forgot?

One supposed that it was just a song sung "off" by a lady of the court, and having thanked Mr. Binyon for his charming rendering was about to pass on. But there is deep meaning in it, according to Mr. Tagore. It is an allusion to the "royal sin" and to the amorous and consequently treacherous character of Dushyanta, and it prepares us for the approaching rejection of Sakuntala—a rejection that we had hitherto ascribed to the incitements of an offended hermit. Thus in every scene there is a moral meaning, latent or manifest, the particular Where'er we walk, some universal law or other fans the shade, agitating the humblest flower and the tallest tree, and converting the final act from the union of lovers into the abstract apotheosis of love. We are hidden by Mr. Tagore to look up at love, as at a balloon, and to note that it has risen as high as can be humanly expected, and has reached the Golden Peak where "the beneficent tie of home life" and "the liberty of the soul" are harmonized, and where "a human boy plays with lion cubs and the hermit spirit is reconciled with the spirit of the householder." All this may be true, yet was it for this that Dushyanta ascended the car of Indra? He was young, and did not Kalidasa understand youth? Mr. Tagore has never understood it, despite much earnest attention, and perhaps that is why his interpretations are so depressing. He is scholarly, philosophic, humane, he is sensitive where the invisible is concerned, he writes no single sentence that one dare contradict; but he invariably forces the background into the foreground, and vice versa, until the heavy hand of a schoolmaster seems to tear the jasmine tendrils and to startle the deer. Of course, he may be right—he knows the Sanskrit and we do not. But if he is right, "Sakuntala" is not the play we hoped. It must join the ranks of the minatory masterpieces, and its sweet connections with our daily lives be severed.

E. M. F.

Owing to the condition of the exchange, it is practically impossible for the Universities of Central Europe to obtain British or American books on literature, philosophy, science, etc. A ten-shilling book costs more than £9 in Germany and more than £30 in Austria. It has, therefore, been decided to form an Anglo-American University Library for Central Europe, for the purpose of exchanging public libraries. Mr. B. M. Headicar, Librarian of the London School of Economics, will act as secretary of the library, and sympathizers—who should be many, considering the importance of the work—are asked to communicate with him.

THE ATHENÆUM

May 14, 1920

CANNED HISTORY

Holland.—Question of the Scheldt.—Neutrality of Belgium.

If Conversation Sharp was alive to-day, he would rejoice in the little green handbook which issued with the same zeal of the Foreign Office and under the able editorship of Mr. G. W. Prothero, to be number, all told, some 160. He would sally forth to dinner; his faithful partner Boddington would put a neat leading question, and out would come the erudition. Such talk is apt to be oppressive; but at least it is preferable to golf stories or fishing stories, or the appalling legal shop that starts with, "The judge took my point." The Foreign Office, however, has in its eye people of a more practical kind than the smoking-room oracle. Among those for whose learning these handbooks have been written are "publicists generally," and soon we may expect bright little allusions to the Christian-Coalition party in Holland, or von Jagow's speech on Belgian neutrality of April 29, 1914. Historical students, too, are expected to profit by the labours of Mr. Prothero's trained, and for the most part unremunerated, assistants. That means, it is to be feared, that they will swallow the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries out of the little volumes, while the meritorious works of Stanhope, Lecky and Walpole lie neglected. Still cram-books are a necessary evil, and these are good cram-books.

The series was prepared, it appears, for the information of the British Delegates to the Peace Conference. Somewhere, therefore, in its course we shall presumably encounter a small treatise that might have enlightened Mr. Lloyd George as to the precise geographical and political significance of Tecklenburg. But if he could envisage nothing better than a large fit for heroes would inevitably find little to his taste a literary diet which resolves itself into good, honest bully beef. The handbooks clearly address themselves to the ordinary taxpaying citizen, to the man in the street who has succeeded Palmerston's man on the omnibus; and the present instalment (Nos. 25, 28 and 29) conducts him not to the shores of Bohemia, as imagined by Shakespeare and possibly by Mr. Lloyd George, but to the neighbouring coast of Holland and Belgium, or, as they were formerly called, the Low Countries. For the earlier annals of the Burgundian Netherlands he is referred to No. 26, "Belgium," which will tell him, no doubt, all about the good old Jockey-Entry and the noble, good old Burgundian Entry and the noble, good old Leopold Entry. Starting, however, with the revolt of the Netherlands in the sixteenth century, he can read right on down to the resignation of the Heemskerk Ministry in 1913. A good deal of it tastes like meat extract of Motley, but the condensation is not without a flavour of its own. The writer is especially to be congratulated on the precision with which he conveys information on points for which encyclopaedias are often hunted through in vain.

The literature on the Scheldt would fill a good many library shelves, but under Mr. Prothero's editorship it is compressed within twenty pages. Since feeling still shoulders between Holland and Belgium about such delicate matters as the sovereignty over the Western Scheldt, their dispassionate discussion is of obvious value. In the handbook on Belgian Neutrality there sounds the note of controversy, almost of passion. The Germans, we are told, have interpreted the statements of the learned Belgian lawyer E. Nys "so as to support a theory that he would probably be the first to repudiate." A neutrality that gives an invading army a right of way is certainly a worthless form of defence, and it will be remembered that Herr Bethmann-Hollweg swept Schulte and his like aside with the frank confession that the Germans had broken international law.
The New Germany. By George Young. (Constable. 8s. net.)

Mr. George Young (we are sorry to have to say it) is unworthy of citizenship in a modern democracy.

The first words of his book condemn him. "When in January, 1919, I resigned my commission and made my way out to Berlin . . . . I had," he writes, "two purposes. One was to find out . . . . Good Heavens! What, we ask in blushing haste, was the other? It sounds incredible, but it was" "to find out" again. Shall a man then, just because he is sincere and intelligent, and has a knack of picturesque writing, be allowed to go about "finding out" things for himself in this utterly reckless way? One would suppose we were some race of savages without any newspapers. Mr. Young will, of course, try to defend himself by the plea that he is after all a newspaper man. He will blame us for omitting to quote his express statement that he went out to Berlin "as correspondent." Surely this only makes it worse. Had there been many correspondents like Mr. Young we might easily have been robbed of the fruits of Versailles.

Yet curiosity subsists, even in democracies. Mr. Young, we fear, traded on that rude instinct. When a man has actually been there"—hob-nobbed with Noske and Lenin in his military warder in the greenroom of the Weimar Theatre, marched into Potsdam side by side with prim little General Mäcker, saved the Brunswick Soviet from being blown up by its own supporters, stood by the Lüttwitz Volunteers while they bombarded the Lichtenberg insurgents, and then strolled across the line of fire to see how "Spartacus" was enjoying it—when a man has done all this, we can't help being rather interested in his story. And so long as we bear in mind that it is much easier to form a sane judgment on these matters in the calm of a London newspaper office, it may not do us very much harm to read Mr. Young.

He seems somehow on his travels to have formed his own peculiar vision of the German people. For our own part we fancied we knew all there was to be known about the Hun. He has been sketched for us—a grinning ape beneath a Pickelhaube. Yet, when Mr. Young is watching the Berlin demonstrations against the Peace Terms in the spring of 1919, this is how he talks:

"Look at that group, mostly elderly men and women of the middle class, thin and threadbare with the look given by hardship and hunger that once in Germany one saw only in paintings of the Middle Ages—daydreaming but not without devotional fervour. So they shuffle along round a placard inscribed "Wilson's Forty Points," as their ancestors shuffled in procession for Luther's theses. Unhappily Wilson did not succeed in nailing his theses to the portals of the Quai d'Orsay."

"Is it possible then that they are, after all, human beings, these Germans? What an ugly thought! For if they are human beings, how are we going to face this account of a children's hospital? Everywhere swollen bellies and shrivelled limbs—children of three that had nothing actually wrong with them, but couldn't yet stand, children with "English sickness," as rickets is called . . . . the most of them lying silent or wailing feebly . . . . "English sickness"—that barbs sticks. Can we shake it off somehow? Shall we remember that the patient throng shuffling after Wilson's theses was itself not long before nailing its own theses to the "Iron Hindenburg"? Shall we recall that if there is not a "German sickness" among English children, it is not for want of trying on the part of the U-boat captains? If we do that, we can seize ourselves with the thought of "Retribution."

We can echo our author's own musings as he returns from the Lichtenberg fighting:

"And so, in the twilight, back the way we came, wondering at the working of moral laws that have now subjected Berlin to a self-induced punishment of bombardments and bombings worse than any of those inflicted on other cities. That is highly satisfactory. We only wish Mr. Young had not added:

"Firing heavy artillery at crowded tenement houses, even with reduced charges and plentiful blank, means a butcher's bill of several thousands, mostly women and children."

Not content with stripping Bellona of her pretty, glittering armour, he must, it seems, tear the judicial folds from Nemesis, and show her, not merely lame, but altogether misspahen:

"Now that these trumpery tinsel tyrants, the Kaiser and his court officials, have retired to scribble and squeak and shuffle over dirty linen—a Valhalla of washerwomen—the men of the real Spartan breed, who carried the German arms from conquest to conquest until the catastrophe was complete, are working hard to redeem their country, not by rout and revolution. The workmen called them mercenaries and murderers, but it was absurd to accuse fine young men who looked like Balliol, with a leaven of Blues and Blues, of selling themselves for eight shillings a day and extra rations. These Spartans and their ideals will be heard of again unless Germany is given a square deal and a fair field."

On the one hand Spartans, and on the other Spartacus! A pretty mess you seem to have made of it, Nemesis! It's enough to make people agree with King Herod Agrippa. "The Treaties," says Mr. Young, "have for a time Bolshevised Eastern Europe, Balkanised Central Europe and Bottomlevised Western Europe." We can only say that it might have been put more graciously.

Mr. Young, whose adventures show that he is afraid of very little, is not afraid to offer advice. Germany has got to be pilled together, if only for the very indemnity's sake. Her salvation cannot come from men like the rotund, churlish, effete Nordhehden, who looks like Winston Churchill turned Papal Legate, nor from the nerveless National Assembly, whose choice of Weimar for its seat is as if a vanquished England were to "place a victorious and Victorian America by transferring Parliament to the Shakespeare Theatre at Stratford-on-Avon." The external remedy is "Treaty Revision," and the internal remedy is "the Soviet." A good many people who would welcome the first may shrink from the second. Mr. Young's contention, however, is that the Soviet system makes revolution not inevitable but unnecessary. He argues the point with the utmost ingenuity. We might study his case, but we think it best to refrain. Why should people have an excuse for not reading his book?

That Friend of Mine: A Memoir of Margarette McArthur. By Josephine Kellett. (Swarthmore Press. 7s. 6d. net.)—Miss Margarette McArthur died on active service at Etaples in February, 1919. Her letters, which form the bulk of this volume, were never intended for publication; they are therefore sincere as well as beautiful. Prior to the war she wrote long, characteristic descriptions of her school life and of her journeys to Canada and Germany, a good part of which concerns natural scenery. The latter half of the book covers her war work in France under the Army Educational Scheme, and includes a description of an enemy air-raid, which is valuable as an uncensored revelation of terror. Miss McArthur's prose here is vividly vigorous, and in her later development generally possessed something of the same quality: had she lived it might have helped towards the accomplishment of a noteworthy prose style. It is perhaps unfortunate that the letters show her life only in a more or less objective light. Her personality was obviously so healthy and charming that to have been acquainted with her mental and spiritual attitude towards the inner problems with which she must have been confronted would be a privilege, though there is no indication throughout that she was so confronted. She retains an equanimity in face of the European tragedy that leads her into picturing the war as a series of pathetic incidents, as merely one of many dark places to be courageous about and to accept with conventional faith. We see in her, continually against our will, the less rare type of woman turned out by a system of feminine education equivalent to that of the public schools and the universities.
THE ATHENÆUM

MAY 14, 1920

VICTORIAN HEROES

FREE-THINKERS OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY. By Janet E. Courtney. (Chapman & Hall. 12s. 6d. net.)

It is strange that the Victorians should take so much killing. We have advanced a good deal beyond them—so far beyond them that we do not need to abuse them; we treat them with kindly contempt. And yet, whenever our attention is again directed to them, as by this book of Mrs. Courtney’s, we are aware of an odd misgiving. Even Mr. Lytton Strachey’s “Eminent Victorians” did not quite free us from this feeling. We saw how absurd the Victorians were, but we became aware of an element in them that the laughter had not killed. Somehow a just estimate must contain both respect and contempt.

Mrs. Courtney’s book suggests the kind of estimate this might be. In the first place we are conscious of the peculiar odour of the Victorian morality. The Victorians would never frankly admit that they were merely humanly selfish, for example, but always justified their conduct by appeal to some divinely established order of things. It is for this reason that nothing about the Victorians is more disagreeable than their righteous indignation. At the present time, while our conduct has not improved, we are more frank about our own moral shortcomings. On the other hand, the Victorians often displayed an energy and courage in defending their convictions, even when these were only translations of their interests, which extorts the respect of a comparatively debilitated generation. The fact that their virtues and defects spring from the same root is the cause of our mixed emotion when contemplating the Victorians. For their moral fervour was also the source of their courage. Somehow they took their morality seriously; every Victorian saw not only that it was desirable that the cause he advocated should prevail, but that the highest moral considerations made it imperative that it should. They had the courage which seems inseparable from aggressive righteousness.

We find this courage, and that of all the other great Victorian figures, in many of Mrs. Courtney’s champions, although in two of them, Frederick Denison Maurice and Matthew Arnold, the courage is relatively inconspicuous—compared, that is, with that of a man like Charles Bradlaugh. Bradlaugh himself is, of course, an epitome of the Victorian virtues; he had great courage, independence and tenacity of purpose. He was, like Huxley, a great fighter, and, again like Huxley, it is obvious that he enjoyed fighting; but both men were Victorian also in the sense that they recognized no motive, even in their gayest and most unprovoked combats, other than their obedience to their conception of public duty. All these men, in a way impossible to-day, conceived themselves as public figures. They were conscious of their responsibilities. Abstractions, such as public honour, public morality, were the very breath of their nostrils. Self-indulgence of any kind was unknown to them; whatever they did was done with a single eye on the public welfare. Hence their energy, their courage in attack and defence, and hence also their complacency and absurdity. For we know that their conception of themselves was untrue, that it is, indeed, impossible for men to be like that. They saw themselves as figures in an official biography. But their very absurdity was also their strength, and led to their undeniable achievements. We cannot imitate them, and we would not if we could, but there are illogical moments when we could almost envy them.

In her essay on Harriet Martineau, Mrs. Courtney confesses that the works of that remarkable woman are no longer read. The remark would apply to all her figures, with the exceptions of Arnold and Huxley, and even with Arnold we imagine there are now few who read “Literature and Dogma.” The reason for this is part of our general difficulty in estimating the contribution of these men.

Their victory, which we have inherited, is so complete that we can scarcely realize that it followed a hard and genuine fight. Their strong waves were the milk of our infancy. But Mrs. Courtney, in showing us the genesis of Victorian, also shows us how considerable the achievement was that we placidly take for granted. The historical perspective is necessary, and the fact that it is necessary shows how local and temporary were most of the Victorian problems. Even the greatest of the Victorians said little that is pertinent to our own time. We cannot quote from them as we can quote from earlier writers. The Victorian age is more remote from us as the Augustan, and Swift is more alive to-day than is any one of Mrs. Courtney’s figures.

J. W. N. S.

THE LATE W. D. HOWELLS

THE DEATH OF MR. WILLIAM DEAN HOWELLS, the doyen of American men of letters, at the age of 88, follows closely upon the publication of a book which has again made him prominent in the minds of English readers. Nothing could give a clearer or more sympathetically critical estimate of his personality and character than the many letters addressed to him on questions of literary importance by Henry James, Howells, and other great men of letters. Henry James, the first American writer to be universally admired in England, and his writings, facile, polished, and of an equable excellence, amounting to little less than a hundred volumes, are the expression of this conviction. His novels deal exclusively with American life, though doubtless he would be held by many to have been concerned chiefly with the superficies of it. His pleasant, easy-flowing narratives had a period of great popularity here in England about a generation ago, and rows of the handy little volumes can still be found in the placid backwaters of country-house libraries. Subsequently, however, it was as editor of the Atlantic Monthly and Harper’s Magazine that he was chiefly remembered in England. His editorial columns were devoted to criticism of the causerie kind which had a considerable appeal on both sides of the Atlantic. But in criticism, as in fiction, he was distinguished by suavity rather than penetration. In consequence of this he holds a higher place in American literature than in English. His very devotion to the idea of an American national literature eminently fitted him to uphold the tradition of the common language during a period in which there were incessant danger of invasion by dialect and slang. His known convictions as a literary nationalist, whereby he was definitely distinguished from his more famous friend and contemporary, Henry James, lent persuasiveness to his judgments.

THE COINAGE OF NERO

THE COINAGE OF NERO. By Edward A. Sydenham. 4 plates. (Skrp & Son. 21s. net.)

Mommsen once complained that the study of Roman coins had been left to the dealers. Mr. Sydenham’s book is a reprint of articles which appeared in a periodical which, in origin a handicraft journal, has been transformed into an important organ of higher kind; and the sort of influence which Mommsen deplored has not affected the work, which does credit to publisher as well as author. The difficulty of controlling proofs printed in France may be held to account for a certain lack of finish in the setting forth of the matter. Mr. Sydenham has not only given a full and detailed description of all known Roman and of many of the Greek, coins of Nero, but has attempted with some success a scientific classification. His introduction covers the ground well, and makes some new points; notably he shows that from Nero’s accession to the reform of the currency in 63 the Senate issued the gold and silver inscribed with the name of the emperor. His account of the reform also marks an advance on previous writers. Monographs like this are cordially to be encouraged, as the best way of making the evidence of coins accessible to historians.
THE POETIC DRAMA

CINNAMON AND ANGELICA: A PLAY. By John Middleton Murry. (Colデン-Sanderson. 3s. 6d. net.)

The impotence of contemporary drama is a commonplace rule of cultured pessimism. A conviction of dramatic enthusiasts recently revealed, that on the one hand there are plenty of writers who could compose good plays if anyone would stage them, and that on the other hand there are a dozen producers ready to snap up a good play if they could find one. Poetic dramas are not infrequently printed; we have abandoned the speculation of why they are so dull. But Mr. Murry is an interesting case—interesting enough to revive once more the whole discussion; for he is a writer who might be, or might in a happier age have been (according to our hopeful pessimistic humours), a poetic dramatist. He has virtues which are his own, and vices which are general. It is therefore a real pleasure, an exceptional pleasure, to have a patient like Mr. Murry extended on the operating table: we need our sharpest instruments, and steadiest nerves, if we are to do him justice.

Two possibilities we may exclude at once. A poetic drama may be simply bad, in which case the cause of its failure will not be worth further examination. Or it may be poetry which should have been cast in some form which is not dramatic. Plays of this sort are written at times when drama is decaying, but when no other form is at hand: Browning wrote dull plays, but invented the dramatic model through a poetic dramatist. When the poetic drama has wholly disappeared, when it is, as at the present time, a lost art, this mistake is less frequently made. The natural evolution, for us, would be to proceed, in the direction indicated by Browning; to distil the dramatic essences, if we can, and infuse them into another, more liquid. The poet who now applies himself to the drama (I exclude, of course, those who are competent for nothing) will be one with a strong and (we may even say) philosophic conviction in favour of this form. He will be a very conscious poet, with an historical imagination; it is the consciousness, the construction of the possible meaning, the possible value in feeling which a triumph that poetic drama might have for the sensitivities of the most sensitive contemporary, that has moved him. This poet will be a complex person: he is impelled both by a desire to give form to something in his mind, and by a desire that a certain desirable emotional state should be produced. He is troubled and hampered by the complexity of conscious motives which lay claim to his attention. Such, we believe, is Mr. Murry.

The composition of a poetic drama is in fact the most difficult, the most exhausting task that a poet can set himself, and—this is the heart of the matter—it is infinitely more difficult for a poet of to-day than it was for a poet of no greater talent three hundred years ago. It is more difficult than it was for Shakespeare. Nor could Mr. Murry, for instance, content himself to plunge into Tudor literature and produce a "Death's Jest Book" or a "Duke of Gandua." He is too keenly aware of his precise place in time to care to perform any, however lovely, literary exercise. He wishes to do the difficult thing. It is interesting to consider why it is so difficult, and how far the difficulties disperse, and how far they direct, Mr. Murry's energies.

The difficulty is very baldly stated, as it has been stated so many times before, by saying that there is no audience. It will not do, of course, to leave the matter there. There is, "waiting" for poetry on the stage, a quite sufficient number of persons to fill a playhouse: there are even a few willing to subside the performance of any play of the mildest promise; there is enough effort on the part of both writers and the possible patrons and audiences.

But what is needed is not sympathy or encouragement or appreciation—we need not assume that the best of the Athenian or the Elizabethan drama was appreciated by its audiences, relatively to the second-best—but a kind of unconscious co-operation. The ideal condition is that under which everything, except what only the individual genius can supply, is provided for the poet. A framework is provided. We do not mean "plot"; a poet may incorporate, adapt, or invent as he prefers or as occasion suggests. But a dramatic poet needs to have some kind of dramatic form given to him as the condition of his time, a form which in itself is neither good nor bad—but which permits an artist to fashion it into a work of art. And by a "kind of dramatic form" one means almost the temper of the age (not the caprice of a few intellectuals), a predisposition, a habit, on the part of the public, to respond in a predictable way, however crudely, to certain stimuli. A very little knowledge of Athenian, or Elizabethian drama acquaints us with commonplaces, as Fate in the former, or Death-and-Worms in the latter, which turn up again and again, and which we presume by their familiarity always evoked the proper response. Commonplaces they were, but capable of indefinite refinement.

Consider now the position of Mr. Murry, a position which we may seriously call Prometheus. He has to supply his own framework, his own myth, he must do without the commonplaces which so stoutly supported even Eschylus and Shakespeare. He must stand quite alone: which means that he must, if he can, write poetry (not merely good blank verse) at every moment. The strain of such an enterprise is probably responsible for inequalities which occasionally disfigure the more relaxed passages of the play:

... new-fangled tin artillery. ... Garlic tried to load

The patent off on me. ...

may be appropriate speech for the rough soldier, but it is not appropriate that the same person should a few lines later remark of himself that to myself I seem a wanton child. ...

This is not a blemish due to haste or carelessness. It is due to a concentration on the central interest, the focal moment of the piece, which has distracted the author's attention. There is enough evidence that Mr. Murry has studied blank verse with great care, and where he is excited he is also attentive to detail. But he is not held down by the necessity of entertaining an audience cruder than himself; the emotional structure is the only structure. In a dramatic structure the minor emotions, or the emotions of the minor characters, are related to the major emotions through the action. "Cinnamon and Angelica" is deficient in dramatic structure—although the emotions (the major emotions) are dramatic.

The labour and danger do not end here. The poetic drama cannot avoid all audience. In the middle of a rowdy seventeenth-century playhouse pit the thought of Shakespeare, the feeling and the slumbering personal experience of Shakespeare moved solitary and unsounded; solitary and free as the thought of Spinoza in his study of Montaigne in his tower. But Mr. Murry cannot escape an audience—comparatively small and comparatively cultivated—which has dramatic habits, but desires to share, to destroy his solitude. We may suspect that Mr. Murry is aware of this audience, and that he instinctively protects himself from its intrusion by the titles which he gives his characters:

I thought I heard the spinning of the wheel Of Destiny, and this is what she span: Such close-knit intertexture of two hearts ... That even the hungry Fates must hold their shears From so divine a pattern.
The adjective "hungry" may be questioned as irrelevant to the figure; but it is a fine passage. And I quote it to ask why the author should place such language in the mouths of personages to whom he gives names like Cinnamon, Angelica, Caraway, and Vanilla Bean. The key of the music is a lovers' melancholy with many under- and over-tones; the third act is pitched at that intensity at which language strives to become silence, and the end is definitely tragic. Why these grocery names? It is a movement of protest against the cultivated audience. Whoever is acutely sensitive of the pressure of this intruder will have his own grimace or bufferony, to avoid sentiment or to decorate sentiment so that it will no longer appear personal, but at most—safely fashionable. This concealment is a "give-away"; but we cannot say that Mr. Murry has given himself away either, for his "close-knit intertexture" is a maze of such subitized and elusive feelings as will hardly be threadied by any but those whom he would be willing to admit.

T. S. E.

ST. FRANCIS AND THE FRANCISCANS

ASSISI: IMPRESSIONS OF HALF A CENTURY. By Sir William B. Richmond, K.C.B. (Macmillan. 42s. net.)

JACOPONE DA TODI, POET AND MYSTIC, 1228-1306. By Evelyn Underhill. (Dent. 16s. net.)

The revival of Franciscan studies, and the creation of a wide public interested in the men who surrounded and followed the founder of the order, date from the publication at the end of 1893 of M. Paul Sabatier's "Vie de S. Francois d'Assise." It did not, it is true, "discover" (to use the current jargon) St. Francis, but he emphasized the man in the saint, and taught us to see him too. It is then with a pleasant shock that we find on opening Sir William's book that the Rossetti group were interested in Assisi thirty years before, that we are turned back to William Davies's "Pilgrimage of the Tiber" to find that he had lived a year in the little Umbrian city, and that it was his advice and his loan of a copy of the "Fioriotti" which sent young Mr. Richmond there in 1867, when Assisi was much in the state that Goethe found it on his hurried visit. In his turn he spent a year there, and there his eldest son was born; he visited the neighbouring hill-cities and villages, fraternized with the country folk, returned again and again, and even spent a month in the Carceri in 1904, living with the frari on the broken victuals they had begged at the doors of Assisi and elsewhere. The book is intensely personal, racy of the travelled Englishman who knows how to get the best of the places he lives in, full of his personal likes and dislikes, and not to be missed. On the artistic (detractable word!) qualities of the illustrations one hesitates to write in these columns, but if the fact of having seen most of the fine pictures of Europe and of knowing and loving the places represented qualifies one to speak to the general public as one man to another, these reproductions of Sir William's work may be recommended not only as splendid specimens of colour-printing, but as representing the Umbrian landscapes and atmosphere at their best and most characteristic, and recalling the frame of mind in which they were first seen.

Miss Underhill's hero is of another kind altogether. Jacopone da Todi was a Franciscan of the days when the order had done its useful work for the world, a convert of advanced middle age, of that class which, having more or less exhausted the pleasures of secular life, finds in religion a new source of pleasure. All that is known of his life could be told on one of Miss Underhill's pages, and all that is reasonably inferred on another couple. The rest of the book is devoted to a study of the mechanism of mysticism as exemplified in his verse, and to a "there or thereabouts" version of a selection from them. That Jacopone was a poet there can be no doubt, though there seems little reason for attributing to him the "Stabat Mater," which is rather out of his range; his verse is marked by a native force of speech, an erotic fire of a passion turned from earth to heaven by age and circumstance, a simplicity of purpose which has attracted to him sympathy and imitation through the centuries. As a mystic, he belongs to that class whose Faculty of expression and copiousness of language raise considerable doubt as to the reality behind it. A human soul absorbed by the immanence of the Divine Spirit, one thinks, have little thought or time to spare for jotting down its impressions. St. Teresa and St. Catherine we can believe in, but the long roll of writers from St. Hildegard to the German mystics leave us cold; we frankly do not credit them with more than a lively imagination. If we turn to Jacopone by way of escape we find his spiritual pride, arrogance and disobedience to his chosen superiors as the fruits of his religious experiences, until in his old age he settles down into that anarchic attitude to which has always made mysticism suspect in the eyes of the Church. From the point of view of everything that human society at its best values to-day, he was an ignorant and an enemy.

We have said that by his time Franciscanism had done its work in the world: that was to restore Christendom to the belief in Christianity which its leaders had almost destroyed. But it may be questioned whether it has not, on the whole, done more harm to the world than good. By the end of the thirteenth century its evangelical mission was dead—altogether at its centre, almost at its outposts. It is hardly disputable that any influence which tends to withdraw from a people a well-marked element of its population is harmful. The extreme popularity of the mendicant orders bereft Italy of the romantic element (to use a somewhat inexact term) of its people, and put a stamp on its national character which still marks it. Similar movements have left their mark on other nations. Portugal has never recovered from the colonizing efforts of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries; France still feels the effects of the Huguenot exile; Germany of to-day has no great liberty-loving class because of the wholesale emigration to America which followed each successive war. A few of the abbeys in England have lost much of the more enterprising and valuable stocks of workers to America in the same way. All these movements have had their temporary advantages, but they have left their mark deeply on the nations which suffered them.

We perceive we have got far away from Sir William Richmond and Miss Underhill. Either of them, we imagine, would feel, physically, very uncomfortable if shut up in a third-class carriage with St. Francis for a thirty-hour run. Fortunately that is impossible, and they, and we, can concentrate our minds on other aspects of the saint's humanity. We have already spoken our mind on Sir William's book: Miss Underhill has a fine flow of language, a nice choice of adjectives, and a thorough, if somewhat indiscriminating, knowledge of the literature of her subject (we refer to her reliance on the judgment of Professor Tamassia). Altogether her book is well done in its way, and it is not the slightest use wishing, as we do, that it had been done in another.

R. S.
A MODERN REACTIONARY

Prejudices: First Series, By H. L. Mencken. (New York, Knopf. $2.)
A Book of Burlesques. By H. L. Mencken. (New York, Knopf. $2.)
Heliconian, By H. L. Mencken and G. J. Nathan. (New York, Knopf.)

It is impossible to exceed the stay of the usual touring lecturer in the United States without making the acquaintance (either in the flesh or in print) of Mr. H. L. Mencken, for he is the most original, and is rapidly becoming the most important, critic in America. As in the case of the other creators of modern American literature, he has nothing in common with the academic models—the pale, professorial shadows of English critics, whose efforts are usually treated over here with the condensation they deserve. Mr. Mencken is vigorous, irreverent, violent and barbaric. The college pundits amongst his countrymen shudder at his name, and his prose may possibly strike the English purist as "vulgar." He is the author of a learned and diverting tome entitled "The American Language," his only book to be well received by the academically-minded, and he himself certainly possesses an amazing style. After a youthful indiscretion in verse, published in his native town and stronghold, Baltimore, he produced his first book, which was also the first study of Mr. Bernard Shaw by an American. This was followed in 1908 by a volume on Nietzsche, also the first Nietzschean criticism from an American, and now a standard work in the United States.

Mr. Mencken showed himself an admirer and disciple of "old Friedrich," as he usually calls him. Armed with the Nietzschean doctrine, he has crossed tirelessly against its most complete antithesis, the conventional dogmas of American thought and the conventional lies of American life. His first till was with the wealthy Socialist, Mr. Robert Rives La Monte, who invited this journalistic "wage-slave" to join the ranks of the proletarians. By letter the two engaged in debate, and the correspondence was published as "Men versus The Man." Although he always refers disparagingly to the book, it is typical of his attitude, it is vastly entertaining, and it contains the germ of the method and style which have made Mr. Mencken famous in the ten years since it was published. The role of the two men are exactly the reverse of what we should expect: the writer of a debate to have the place. The Socialist is conservative, conventional and uninspired in his feeble arguments. His opponent is iconoclastic, daring and brilliant. It is as if the celebrated discussion between Mr. Shaw and Mr. Mallock had resulted in the latter writing "Socialism and Superior Brains."

With this foundation of Nietzscheism and anti-Socialism Mr. Mencken turned to literary criticism, where he has examined the masterpieces of the past and the ideals of the present in the world of American letters. A great deal of this writing has appeared in the monthly article on literature which is a visible part of his joint editorship of the Smart Set. Those who have seen only the emasculated edition, designed for export, of this magazine cannot conceive it as it appears in New York, with the contributions of the editors, for Mr. George Jean Nathan's article on the drama is a worthy companion to Mr. Mencken's literary criticism. These two editorial features have never failed to arouse the American public. Both have the same Rabelaisian delight in the roll and swing of words of strange coinage, the same gusto in the smashing of shams, a ruthless impatience with polite conventions, an ungrudging pleasure in the discovery of good work. It is in these pages and in novels published in volumes that Mr. Mencken's indefatigable and ever-pugnent criticism has made him known all over the United States. The two volumes, "A Book of Prefaces" and "Prejudices:

First Series," now contain the quintessence of Menckenism. The former contains four essays, whose subjects are Joseph Conrad, Theodore Dreiser, James Huneker and Puritanism as a Literary Force.

A be the scourge of puritanism Mr. Mencken is at his best. He has flayed the ubiquitous back of what he has called "the libriuomo of virtue," the "moral expert," the "professional smuthound," with a vigour corresponding to the power of the oppressive force which he has challenged. In "A Book of Prefaces" there is a remarkable analysis and indictment of the philistine prudery and barbarity of America. Mr. Mencken traces the effects of this influence on the literature of his country, noting its power to boycott, devitalize and suppress every artistic manifestation which has seemed to threaten the omniscience and omnipotence of Primitive Methodism. To glance through the intellectual and literary history of America with him is to understand the forces which have conspired to make him Whitman and Poe objects of suspicion, and to find upon the English-speaking world an uninterrupted and unique supply of drizzling sentimentality. From literature Mr. Mencken turns to the general field of puritan endeavour: the Comstock Postal Act, establishing an uncontrolled moral tyranny; the Mann Act, which has branded as "white-slavers" men whose sole offence has been to travel from one State into another in the company of an unmarried woman; the Webb Act, which made possible the last great triumph of the "malignant moralists," the imposition of prohibition. Those who are curious as to the methods employed by American uplifters and the incredible results of their unnatural activities will find what they need in Mr. Mencken's essay. Moral endeavour has been organized on business lines, and is conducted by paid experts. Thus the process is described:

Religion lost all its old contemplative and esoteric character, and became a frankly worldly enterprise, a thing of balance sheets and ponderable profits, heavily capitalised and astutely manned. There was no longer any room for the spiritual type of leader, with his white choler and his interminable fortitudes. He was displaced by a brisk gentleman in a "business suit" who looked, talked and thought like a seller of Mexican mine stock. Scheme after scheme for the swift evangelization of the nation was launched. The V. M. C. A. swelled to the proportions of a Standard Oil Company, a United States Steel Corporation. Its huge buildings began to rise in every city; it developed a swarm of specialists in new fantastic moral and social sciences; it produced the same gargantuan talent which managed the railroads.

Down to our own day this justification of pious endeavour has gone on. When the mechanism of the moral crusade is understood in this country, we may cease to wonder at its triumphs or to be misled by them.

Mr. Mencken's "Prejudices" is a book which fully deserves the welcome which it received in the pages of The Athenæum (November 28, 1910, p. 1273). It is not only an excellent guide to contemporary American literature, but it is the most irresistible of all the author's works. It contains a chapter on "The Late Mr. Wells" which every reader of "Joan and Peter" will enjoy. It neatly sums up Mr. Bernard Shaw's talent for "stating the obvious in terms of the scandalous." Above all, it examines a large number of literary reputations which are accepted abroad as at least representative of the best America can produce. There is the chapter cruelly entitled "Six Members of the Institute," in which Messrs. Robert W. Chambers, Hamlin Garland, Henry Sydvor Harrison, William Allen White, Ernest Poole, and Clayton Hamilton are dissected by their candid countrymen. Of Mr. Harrison he writes:

Find me a second-rate American in any of the arts and I'll find you his master and prototype among the third, fourth or fifth-rate Englishmen. In the present case the model is obviously W. J. Locke. But between master and disciple there is a great gap. Locke's grotesque and often extremely amusing characters... are missing; in place of them there are heroic cripplings, silent lovers, maudlin war veterans, and angelic grandans of the old-time Sunday-school books.

As for Mr. White, his affecting and successful masterpiece, "In the Heart of a Fool," is described as being "aimed deliberately and with the utmost accuracy at the delicate gizzard of the small-town yokel, the small-town yokel male, the horrible end-product of fifty years of Christian Endeavour, the little red school-house, and the direct primary." Then Mr. Mencken proceeds to summarize the story until as the curtain falls the whole scene is bathed in luminiferous ether, and the professor breaks into "Onward, Christian Soldiers," on the cabinet-organ, and there is a happy, comfortable sobbing, and an upward rolling of eyes, and a vast blowing of noses. In brief, the finish of a Chautauqua lecture on "The Grand Future of America, or the Glory of Service." In brief, slobber.

It is evident from various signs that we shall be asked in the near future to salute the genius of Professor Dr. Thorstein Veblen, the latest idol of the intellectual marketplace of American Radicalism. The chapter on Dr. Veblen in "Prejudices" may be usefully recommended to all who might be tempted to take a plunge into the depths of verbosity which have been sounded by the author of "The Theory of the Leisure Class." One's venerable American review has been extinguished by the sheer weight of Dr. Veblen's prose, whose style Mr. Mencken describes as "a relentless disease, a sort of progressive intellectual diabetes." In order to do justice to the subject and his critical lengthy quotations from both would be necessary. Dr. Veblen is a product of conditions which no other American has so well diagnosed as Mr. Mencken, although he has not elected to do so in tomes like "The Higher Learning in America," where the process of Veblenization has buried a mass of important material beneath a rubble of words. Between the ignorant populace and the ignorant plutocracy there is little save an indistinct herd of intellectual emnuchs, chiefly professors.

To the absence of an aristocracy of culture, and the substitution of the vaunting middle-class, Mr. Mencken traces most of the evils and absurdities which he has so brilliantly analysed and exposed.

It is amusing to observe the reactions of the American to the stimulus of Mr. Mencken's innumerable goads. Those who rejoiced at his exegoration of popular humbugs are pained by his reverence and devastating attack on the Veblen cult. The plutocrats who dimly suspect the presence of economic treason in the tortuous pages of Dr. Veblen might applaud, if they were not deterred by the political heresies of Mr. Mencken himself. As for the professors, whom he pursues with savage joy, they have taken refuge in the theory that their tormentor is an emissary of the Wilhelmsstrasse, in proof of which they pick out the Teutonic phrases with which his polyglot vocabulary is bedecked, and hint darkly at his shameless dalliance with Nietzsche. They ignore the immense good-humour and wit of their opponent, whose works of a purely amusing, non-controversial character alone are sufficient to make him a welcome relief from the surfeit of machine-made fun to which the public on both sides of the Atlantic is exposed. Mr. Mencken's "Book of Burlesques," and the play "Heliogabalus," which he has just published in collaboration with Mr. George Jean Nathan, might well be substituted for certain threadbare importations of American humour, to which English publishers have vowed a pathetic fidelity.

E. A. BOYD.

The Times is informed that General Sir Arthur William Currie, who formerly commanded the Canadian Corps in France, has been appointed Principal of McGill University, in succession to Sir Auckland Geddes.

SOCRATES IN THE STUDIO OF PARRHASIOS

The Powers of the Air. By T. Sturge Moore. (Grant Richards. 6s. net.)

WHEN Smikros, the little fellow who decorates vases, saw the new work Parrhasios had conceived, he was delighted beyond measure. But his imagination being quickened by rapture, he conceived an improvement, and with mop and paint splashed a sketch of it upon the studio-floor: thus, thus and thus should float the limbs of Orithya, caught away on the flight of ravishing Boreas. Parrhasios looked, frowned, but saw, and so fulfilled the immediate purpose of Smikros' impudence. And when the picture, "The Powers of the Air," stood finished in the house of Parrhasios, Smikros was among the sightseers, and claimed his own: no less than that below the group should be written: "The attitude of this figure was given to Parrhasios by Smikros, the painter of vases." It was resolved that the little man's claim against the great man should be judged by Socrates.

These preliminary events are related by Milo, the reader of Parrhasios; from his concealed vantage-point (for Parrhasios gladly listens to him, but the deformed body must remain hidden) he observes the coming and going, the grouping, the movement of persons and ideas within the studio walls. Through his eyes we witness the subsequent scenes, in which take part Parrhasios' beautiful Dionc, Kallias a merchant, Socrates, Aristodes (by some called Plato), whom Socrates is luring from poetry to philosophy, and Smikros again, in tragic disorder, having dreadfully burned his precious skillful hands at the oven where the vases are baked.

We pass now to the latter part of the book (if we may divide it according to a certain dramatic quality of presentation which it possesses), from the statement of beautiful reality to a discussion of the reality of beauty. Socrates, who is not possessed by beauty, as the poet or the painter, nor an interpretation of it, as Dionc, nor deluded to believe that it can be possessed, as Kallias may be—Socrates, who moves aware of it, yet detached from it, leads his companions to a point where his conclusions are visible:

The beauty we see and the wisdom we hear may be neither copy nor translation of the divine, but a distinct thing, sometimes covered by its flow, like weeds in a stream or foliage in the breeze. . . .

And I accuse poets and artists of fixating attention on the leaves or the weed, whereas it is the flow which bends them that is divine; their movement is only an occasional index to a greater, purer, freer life.

Nemesis, the pure goddess, holds sway in this clearer region, as her alluring sister Aphrodite, "who destroys as fast as she brings forth, and will treat no one thing as more admirable than another," controls the grosser element. These two are beauty, and to the artist both goddesses are manifest and desirable; but one is subject to change, while the beauty of the other is unalterable and creates a permanent ecstasy.

It is admissible, perhaps, to regard this as the central theme of "The Powers of the Air," though it is not the only one. We cannot attempt to discuss it even briefly here, but must content ourselves with welcoming this contribution to idealism, and recording our appreciation of the form in which it is given us. The narrative medium of the theme is not merely decorative; it is an atmosphere that envelops and penetrates. Perhaps this atmosphere is Grecian; we will not be bold to affirm or deny. But we believe that a related contemporary of Parrhasios and his friends would sniff it with something of reminiscent satisfaction.

F. W. S.
MR. MACKENZIE'S TREAT

THE VANITY GIRL. By Compton Mackenzie. (Cassell, 8s, 6d. net.)

W e will not deny that we have had our doubts before.
      We have imagined that too many pastries went in at the door and too much conversation came out of the window: but with "The Vanity Girl" there can scarcely be more than one mind about the matter—
Mr. Compton Mackenzie has set the pot boiling and invited all the flappers in the United Kingdom to tea. It is not so easy at any time to make the pot boil, even when the author is content with a delicate crackle or two, a handful of sparks, a jet of quick flame—and the whole ending in half-a-dozen bubbles and a plume of waving steam. But here's a great "wessel" filled with heavy cream and slow-melting chocolate slabs, and here's, while they slowly dissolve, such a spread of pastry and general jamminess and stickiness that 'tis a sight, as Betsy might declare, "to make the Evings themselves look down!" Nothing is missing; we hardly dare think how those mock appetites will be gorged, or of what Mr. Mackenzie, with his talent extraordinary for producing chocolate-pot boilers, will have left to put upon the table the next time.

It was our fortune some time ago to overhear the following conversation:

"Is that a new one, dear?"
"Well, yes, dear, I suppose it is."
"How far have you got, dear?"
"Chapter twenty-seven."
"Make room, dear; let's read the synopsis."
"Oh, that's not new, dear. That's just the same as usual."

The heroine of Mr. Mackenzie's novel is too beautiful for words—hair, teeth, ankles, figure, style—all are perfect. Her mother is meek, her father is horrid; she is the eldest of a family of nine, and they live in the wilds—Oh, those wilds—of West Kensington. We are told that Norah is clever, but she is not real enough to be clever; perhaps she has a little maid—Pert, Syl,—call her what you will, who is willing to do the answering back, and the getting on. Her friend Lily's mother—who has "a complexion like a field of clover seen from a passing train" and "a countenance like a tinned pineapple"—dies, so Lily is free to go on the stage with Norah. On page 54 Lily and Norah, whose stage name is Dorothy Lonsdale, find themselves in the train from Manchester to Birmingham, and Sylvia Scarlett is in the same carriage with them. Oh, what a surprise for Mr. Mackenzie's readers! However, it is Dorothy's book this time, and not Sylvia's. Soon, beautifully soon, they arrive at Oxford, and there is the tall young man "whose most immediately conspicuous feature was a pair of white flannel trousers down the seams of which ran stripes of vivid blue; but when he was introduced to Dorothy as Lord Clarehavern she forgot about his trousers in the more vivid blue of his name." We are given almost four whole pages of Debrett to blow our excitement into flame, and then Dorothy goes back to London and makes a new friend, Olive, and the two share a flat in Half-Moon Street which is provided for them by a very great man of high rank, who does not make love to them, but likes to have a little simple girlish gaiety to turn to when he gets tired of ... Buckingham Palace. And then Clarehavern returns, and Olive puts into Dorothy's head the amazing notion that he might marry her. "But why not?" thought Dorothy in her nighth "He's independent ... Countess of Clarehavern," she murmured. "The title took away her breath ... and it seemed as if the very traffic of Piccadilly paused in the presence of a solemn mystery."

Of course, after the usual trouble, she marries him, and is in no time the idol of his family, of the ancient villagers, retainers, and the M.F.H. We have a sample of every kind of delicious triumph a young girl from West Kensington could dream of, to Tony in pink silk pyjamas and Dorothy "in a deshabille of peach bloom," and for background the dark panelled walls. The coming of the child provides a very orgy of emotion, even to ... The grace and beauty with which she expressed her stage (compared with most feminine), was that of a seedling daffodil beside a farrowing sow." And then the confinement, and the child is born dead, and the husband turns gambler and gives up the cards for horses, and loses all, and she has a miscarriage, and he goes to the war and is killed, and she finds herself with child again, and this time all is well, and she marries the man who had always loved her and had purchased Clarehaven from her husband ... In whatever contempt Mr. Mackenzie may hold his public—how is it possible that he should dare to invite them to partake of such sickly food? We should not waste space upon so pretentious and stupid a book were it not that we have believed in his gifts and desire to protest that he should so betray them.

K. M.

A WOMAN'S BOOK

THE BOOK OF YOUTH. By Margaret Skelton. (Collins, 7s. 6d. net.)

"THE BOOK OF YOUTH" is one of those novels which appear from time to time and set the critic wondering what it is in its essential quality that makes him feel so impatient on the one hand and so anxious to deal gently with it on the other. We are impatient with its sentimentality, its quaint, impossible views of the relationships between man and woman, and its determination that through woman only the wicked world will be saved. We find very hard to bear this trick of simplifying everything, not by making clear, but by faintly blurring—not by taking away, but by adding to. And is it easy to tolerate the author's love for her heroine,—that soft boundless love which sees everything about her glorious, and almost makes us feel that no one woman should ever see another woman cry. We have remarked, in these novels, that the hero is never over-strong. He is an artist, in most cases—a poet, a musician, a painter—and he is pale, with "grieving eyes," easily pleased, easily hurt—a child. We would put our hand upon our heart and swear that he has a tragic, humorous mouth.

For all that, it is difficult to remain cold before the author's enthusiasm for her book, these are her people; she is having, as it were, so much the time of her life in describing it all that our withers are wrung at the thought of saying a too-unkind word. If "The Book of Youth" had been half as short; if Miss Margaret Skelton had been content with lakes instead of seas, and storms that threatened rather than broke; if Monica had possessed more of a sense of humour and less of a bubbling laugh—why, then it would not have been "The Book of Youth." Many thoughts, great and small, are stalking through the land. We are informed by the cultivated minds of our day that this is no time for artists. Unless a man is willing to sell his soul he will never have the wherewithal to feed and clothe his poor body. We are told also that we are on the eve of a literary renaissance. True, no star has been seen in the sky, but the roads are thronged with shepherds. This is the moment of attention. There never has been such a curious hour, when to-day is not there was yesterday—there may be to-morrow, but we are assured that is as much as any man dare say.

But Miss Margaret Skelton and her sister writers will go on producing longer and longer books of their kind, with many a serious chapter in them about sex and social evils, and slumland, and "the storm that broke over Europe," for ever and ever.

K. M.
MARGINALIA

I SPENT a day in Kew Gardens last week. The azaleas were out, the rhododendrons not yet over, the green of the grass was almost painfully bright, as though illumined from within. There were chiff-chaffs and at least one cuckoo, whose notes detached themselves from the multitudinous seething of bird-song which filled the air. Walking under the thin-sown trees, I reflected that it was more than two years since I had last been in those gardens. And from the fact itself I passed to its inner significance and began to reflect on that peculiar form of idleness, known in this Pelmanized world as “useful occupation,” or “business,” which causes us all to neglect our better interests in the search of the most dubious and chimerical of immediate advantages. Leave the mind empty, make no noise, and there will come into it, like shy birds, many strange thoughts. But to most of us the task of keeping quiet is an intolerable one and the end of this quiescence—the huring down of the birds—undesirable of attainment. We prefer to walk about twirling all manner of rattle, shouting, chattering, laughing, waving our arms in an incessant and futile activity. These are the processes known as useful occupation and business, and it may be added that they are perfectly efficacious in scaring the birds. It is only on the rarest occasions, as when, for instance, one makes a solitary visit to Kew, that one so much as catches a glimpse of the Creator. But that glimpse is enough to make us ask so many awkward questions, that in sheer self-defence one has to take the next train home to seek security among the familiar rattle and scarecrows.

Being a professional literary man, I turned for distraction from disquieting thought to the affairs of my own trade, busying myself to remember what poets had best described the type of garden I had just been visiting; dreaming of the curious little essay that might be written on the relations between poetry and the landscape garden. I thought at once of that loveliest garden in all poetry, the dream-garden which Chaucer painted in the “Parliament of Fowls.” It is simply Kew intensified, endowed with the quality of dream. Passing through the gate of the garden, this is what the poet sees:

For over all, where I mine eyen cast,
Weren trees clad with leaves that aye shall last,
Each in his kind, with colors fresh and green
As emerald, that joy was for to seen.
The builder oak, and eke the hardy ash,
The pillar elm, the collar unto careyne,
The box pipe tree, hone to whippes lash,
The salling fir, the cypress death to pleyne,
The shooter yew, the asp for shaftes pleyne,
The olive of peace, and eke the drunken vine,
The victor palm, the laurer to devyne.
A garden saw I full of blossomed bowis,
Upon a river, in a grene mede,
There as sweetnesse evermore is bowe,
With flouris white, blew, yellow and rede,
And colde well streames nothing dede,
And swimming full of small fishes lighte,
With finnes red and scalés silver brighte.
On every bough the briddes heard I sing,
With voice of angel in her armory,
That busied her briddes forth to bring;
The little conies to her play gunne he; And further abouten I gan espie
The dreadful roe, the bock, the hart and kind,
Squirrels and beasts small of gentle kind.

In “The Book of the Duchess” there is an almost equally delicious description of a park-like forest, in the glades on which there were so many flowers that it was as though the earth envye would

To be gayer than the heaven;
To have no flouris swiché seven,
As in the welkin starrés be.
It had forgot the paverete

That winter, through his colde morrows,
Had made it suffer;
And his sorrow
All was forgotten, and that was seen;
For all the wood was waxen green;
Sweetness of dew had made it wax...
And every tree, by his self
Fro other, wol ten feet or twelv,
So greaté trees, so huge of strength,
Of forty, fifty fathom length,
Cherne, without bow or stick,
With croppes broad, and eke as thick.
They were not an inch asunder,
That it was shadow overall under,
And many squirrells that sate
Full high upon the trees and ate,
And in his mouth boxe and beets.

Once one has begun quoting Chaucer it is very difficult to stop. But now that we have seen our Kew in poetry we must be content. Chaucer’s description of his ideal garden had, as far as I am aware, no influence upon the practical art of the gardener. But the fancy of a later poet was to have a profound influence on the horticulture of a whole century. Milton’s description of Paradise was the ideal at which all the great landscape gardeners of the eighteenth century, the creators of many of the finest and most characteristically English parks, consciously aimed. Blenheim is the materialization, so far as our climate will permit, of that rich description in the fourth book of “Paradise Lost.” In “Les Jardins,” written at the close of the eighteenth century, the Abbé Delille gave complete poetical expression to the whole theory of landscape gardening, as it had been practised for the preceding eighty years or so:

Loin don ces froids jardins, colifichet champêtre,
Insidies réduits, dont l’insipide maître
Vous vaute, en s’admirent, ses arbres bien peignés;
Ses petits sashirs verts bien bons soignés;
Son plan bien symétrique, où jamais solitaire,
Chaque allée a sa sœur, chaque berceu son frère.

Delille preaches naturalness in gardening, by which he means that the paths must be curly and not straight, that ha-has must take the place of walls, that artificial waters should not be surrounded by stone edgings. The creators of the “jardin anglais” employed pictorial instead of architectural composition. The eighteenth-century landscape gardens were more “natural” than the geometrical gardens of an earlier period, to exactly the same extent as a picture is more “natural” than a house.

The most elaborate and luscious landscape garden in literature is surely that described by Edgar Allan Poe in his “Domain of Arnhelm.” To compose the perfect details of nature into an equally perfect whole was Poe’s dream, and in “The Domain of Arnhelm” he invents a multi-millionaire poet who realizes the idea. As you approached the domain you found that “the thought of nature still remained, but her character seemed to have undergone modification; there was a weird symmetry, a thrilling uniformity, a wizard propriety in these her works.” Poe can trust himself to describe only the approach to Arnhelm: the domain itself, as it bursts upon the view, can only be hinted at in these emupriled exclamations:

There is a gush of entrancing melody; there is an oppressive sense of strange sweet odour; there is a dream-like intermingling to the eye of tall, slender, Eastern trees, bosky shrubries, flocks of golden and crimson birds, lily-fringed lakes, meadows of violets, tulips, poppies, hyacinths and tuberoses, long intertangled lines of silver streamlets, and upspringing confusedly from amid all, a mass of semi-Gothic, semi-Saracenic architecture [it sounds distressingly like the Meadow Buildings of Christ Church], sustaining itself by miracle in mid-air; glittering in the red sunlight with a hundred orios, minarets and pinacles; and seeming the phantom handiwork conjointly, of the sylphs, of the fairies, of the genii, and of the gnomes.

AUTOLYCUS.
Science

EINSTEIN’S PROBLEM

THE FOUNDATIONS OF EINSTEIN’S THEORY OF GRAVITATION. By Edwin Freundlich (Cambridge, University Press. 6s. net.)

SPACE AND TIME IN CONTEMPORARY PHYSICS: AN INTRODUCTION TO THE THEORY OF RELATIVITY AND GRAVITATION. By Moritz Schlick. (Oxford, Clarendon Press. 6s. 6d. net.)

THE conception and working out of the Generalized Principle of Relativity is probably the greatest intellectual feat of which we have an historical record. Its sheer originality, indeed, much more than its mathematical form, has been the chief hindrance to its general intelligibility. It has been necessary to live with the theory for some time, to acustom the mind gradually to radically new ways of thinking, before Einstein’s investigations could be followed with any real sense of intimate understanding. Only gradually has it been possible to view this whole new domain from a centre, as it were, to seize a point of departure from which the whole theory can be explored, and from which the primary and secondary aspects of the theory can be seen in their right perspective. The two German accounts now before us, for the English translation of which we are indebted to that enthusiast, Mr. H. L. Brose, do, each of them in its own way, place the reader at such a centre. Each of them enables the reader to understand the nature of the problem that presented itself to Einstein. This is all that the average reader can hope to know about the question, and it is all, we believe, that he wishes to know. For rightly to understand Einstein’s problem is to enter what Professor Schlick calls the “thought-world” of the theory of relativity. The actual expression of the conceptions of that thought-world in mathematical language cannot be made intelligible except to mathematicians, and, important as this expression of the theory is to the scientific man, the ordinary reader is probably willing to credit Einstein with having solved his problem. What such a reader demands, more or less justifiably, is to have the problem made clear to him.

Without attempting an impossible condensation, we may describe the central point of view as presented by each of these writers. We are accustomed to accept the relativity of motion when it is a question of uniform motions in a straight line. We are willing to grant the physicist that, in a smoothly travelling train, it would be impossible to say whether we, or the landscape outside, were “really” moving. So far as the limited experiments we could perform are concerned, all our results would be just as consistent with a moving landscape and a motionless train as with a motionless landscape and a moving train. Now Einstein’s Restricted Principle of Relativity (1905) amounts to saying that by no conceivable experiments, optical, mechanical or other, could we decide whether we or the landscape were moving. If we set about discovering the laws of nature in our train we should discover precisely the same laws as a party of men working in a field outside the train. If we watched their proceedings, however, we should discover that their clocks were wrong, and that they described events as happening at the same time which seemed to us to happen at different times. In more exact words, Einstein’s first principle asserts the complete equivalence of two systems of co-ordinates which are in uniform rectilinear motion with respect to one another, and in order to establish it he found it necessary to modify our notions of time and space. A particular modification he effected was to show that time does not enter into physical phenomena in a way which essentially differentiates it from space. The three dimensions of space and the one dimension of time together constitute a four-dimensional continuum, and the way we choose to separate time from space is essentially arbitrary. This made things simpler so far as it went, but it must be noticed that the four-dimensional continuum was still Euclidean, that is to say, straight lines were still what we mean by straight lines, and rigid bodies were not supposed to change their shape simply because they were moved about.

These naïve assumptions, however, were not destined to endure. In our moving train there would, in normal circumstances, come a time when we should know definitely that we were in motion. For, in any real train, there would come a time when it would either slow up or go faster. In the first case we should experience a tendency to move forward and in the second to fall backward. Neither of these phenomena, we should feel confident, could be explained by eccentricities of motion on the part of the landscape. In other words, we are confident that while uniform motions may be relative, accelerated motions are absolute. On this we should be in agreement with Newton. Let us consider Newton’s problem. Is it the same thing to say that the heavens rotate round the earth as to say that the earth rotates on its axis? Considered as pure motion, they are the same things. But one reason why we believe the earth rotates is because it bulges at the equator. Spinning bodies have a tendency to bulge in the middle. Suppose that we were not spinning, but that their surroundings rotated round them. Would they bulge in the middle? Newton made an experiment with a rotating pail of water. When the pail rotated too slowly for the friction of its inside surface to communicate its motion to the water, the surface of the water remained level. When the pail rotated more quickly and communicated its motion to the water, the water rose at the sides. These phenomena testify to the existence of a field of force—centrifugal force, as it is called. Rotating bodies develop a field of centrifugal force. Now Newton believed that these forces would manifest themselves whether other bodies were present or not, i.e., rotation is a case of absolute motion. He could explain the presence of centrifugal forces by the fact that matter possesses inertia, that familiar property of matter whereby it persists in a state of rest or of uniform motion unless disturbed by some force. Each particle of the rotating body, therefore, has a tendency to persist in the motion it has at any instant, i.e., to fly off at a tangent to its circular path. This tendency reveals itself as centrifugal force. Now the inertia that a piece of matter possesses depends upon a characteristic of the body called its mass. A piece of matter has an inertial mass. Newton conceived this inertial mass to be entirely independent of the neighbourhood and motions of other bodies. He postulated its existence in a body existing alone in space. But we know of no such body.

Moreover, by observations of the movements of a body in a known gravitational field we can deduce a further characteristic of the latter called the gravitational mass. Now Einstein considers that it is a very striking fact that the gravitational and inertial mass of a body are identical. This fact suggested to him that there must be some relation between inertia and gravitation. How is an inertial effect to be distinguished from a gravitational effect? To the old physicists this was easy enough. They could speak of an “isolated” body and assert that it would manifest inertia. But it is part of Einstein’s merit that he sticks to experience. No isolated body being known, he prefers not to found laws on the supposed behaviour of such a body. No body known to us exists except surrounded by other moving bodies. Gravitational effects are attributed to the presence of these other bodies, why not inertial effects? But to admit this we must admit that the centrifugal forces of a rotating body are due to the presence of the rest of the Universe. Einstein makes this assumption. We may ascribe the centrifugal forces to inertia or to the gravitation of the surrounding bodies—it comes to the same thing. If the earth were isolated it could not be said to rotate and it could not be flattened at the poles. Hence the presence of other bodies is essential to the existence of inertial effects, i.e., to the detection of accelerations. Hence accelerations are relative and we have the complete relativity of all motions.

But if all motions are relative, then physical laws should be expressible in a form which is not affected by such motions. We have already seen that, in his Restricted Principle, Einstein succeeded in expressing the laws of physics in a form independent of a uniform motion in a straight line, i.e., the laws retained their form when referred to either of two systems of co-ordinates having any uniform motion in a straight line with respect to one another. But if all motions are relative, then the laws of physics must be expressible in a form which is entirely independent of any particular system of co-ordinates. Now we have seen that the restricted principle was compatible, as it were, with a Euclidean four-dimensional continuum. It is not obvious that the measure relations inherent in such a space will permit of physical laws being expressed so as to satisfy the general principle of relativity.

As a matter of fact, Euclidean space does not permit of such a description, nor will the theory of accelerated axes of co-ordinates; that is, since Einstein asserts that inertial and gravitational effects cannot be distinguished from one another, it will not allow the existence of gravitational fields. Hence a Euclidean space will not permit a description of the phenomena with which we are most concerned—of phenomena within the solar system, for example. It is still adequate, however, to the measurement of phenomena which take place at a very great distance from matter. The gravitational fields which exist in Nature do, in fact, condition the space and time continuum in which we locate phenomena. What we observe are phenomena presented by moving bodies. From these phenomena we disentangle a space and a time. This space and time have no objective existence. Gravitation, space and time are inextricably entangled "in reality," Einstein's problem was to determine the metrical properties of this trinity.

We may envisage Einstein's problem from a somewhat different point of view by pondering Riemann's remark that the metric determining conditions of a space such as we have been considering must be found "outside it, in binding forces which act upon it." This is so because the number of dimensions in a continuum and the fact that it is continuous do not, in themselves, furnish sufficient conditions completely to determine its metrical properties. What Einstein has done is to identify Riemann's "binding forces" with gravitation. His point of view is, in reality, extraordinarily simple. He asks himself, Why do bodies move as they do? The old mechanics talked about inertia and "forces"—gravitational forces. But Einstein does not understand what these "forces" mean. Does one body command another to come closer? He insists that the motions must be "natural," and not brought about by incomprehensible forces. Now we regard uniform motion in a straight line as "natural." We invent no "forces" to explain it. And so it is natural—in a Euclidean space. But observed motions are never of this kind. Very well, say Einstein, they are still "natural," but our space cannot be Euclidean. In fact, neither Euclidean nor non-Euclidean; what it is depends on the gravitational fields present, and since bodies are in motion these fields are always varying. (By "space" here we refer, of course, to the four-dimensional space-time continuum.)

What, then, is the "natural" motion of a body launched into this Einstein space? It moves in the "straight line" appropriate to the space. This is not, of course, a Euclidean straight line, but it is a line which enjoys equivalent properties in its own space. The planet Mercury moves, quite naturally, in such a line, and, as is well known, this line agrees with Mercury's observed path, whereas the path deduced from the assumption of a Euclidean space and "forces" was inconsistent with the observed motions. Similarly, the path of a ray of light in Einstein's space cannot be the same as in a Euclidean space. No apparatus of "attractions" is involved. Light is not "attracted" by the sun when it passes near it. It merely keeps "straight on" through the space as modified by the sun's gravitational field. As we know, this prediction also was verified.

The reader who finds the present exposition obscure may be referred to either of the books above—Professor Schlick's book, in particular, may be read by those who are entirely without a mathematical education. They will find much else—Einstein's speculations on the finite character of space, for instance—and will be enabled to form a conception of the unprecedented revolution in thought implied in the general principle of relativity.

S.

SOCIETIES

ROYAL.—April 22—Sir J. J. Thomson, President, in the chair.
The following papers were read: Reports on the Pressure Waves Set up by Surface Explosions by F. H. Newhall.

SOCIETY OF ANTIQUARIES.—April 29.—Sir Hercules Read, President, in the chair.—Col. J. B. P. Karshale read a paper on Silchester and its amenities to the pre-Roman civilization of Gaul.

Certain phases of Celtic influence were to be found at Silchester, and it was possible to recover the original layout of the settlement before it was modified by the street-plans and road-system of the Romans. Originally, it consisted of a polygon enclosed by two lines of entrenchments; and a boundary at a distance of about 2,900 yards, found as a broad road or track, marked the limits of the settlement's territory and jurisdiction. Its situation at the junction of three trade routes marked its importance as a trade centre, and the long earthwork to the north compelled traders to use the defined route past the town on their journeys to the coast.

The analogy to what was known of Gaulish settlements in France and Italy was alluded to. In the known area of Gaulish influence in Europe the polygon outline could be found, as well as the surrounding territory which had survived in France as the Jurasburg. Caesar laid stress on the transit dues paid by merchants as the source of revenue of a Gaulish civitas. It could be demonstrated that at Silchester the Gallic lónica of about 2,420 yards was the basis of the measure of the radius from the centre to the outer limit of the territory, and in the northern barrier bank could be recognized the machinery for collection of transit dues.

The excavation of Silchester by Hilditch enabled the date of the earliest occupation of that site to be fixed in the latter half of the first century B.C. The first settlements on the British coast were indicated at Chichester (Regnum) and Old Shoreham (Portus Adurni), both of which showed a polygon plan corresponding closely with Silchester. At Chichester a territory surrounding the town walls existed well into the Middle Ages, and "customs-banks" existed across the northern road of approach. From Chichester and Horsham, the Gauls occupied Silchester, as a centre commanding the trade route of the upper Thames Valley, and extended themselves to Bath, where was another polygon-shaped settlement.

At Canterbury, too, were remarkable points of similarity to Silchester, pointing to a similar Gaulish settlement at the same period. In Domesday it was stated that the King's peace extended for 1 league, 3 perches and 3 feet from the walls, practically the same measure as at Silchester and to the farm called Milestone Farm, on the Dover road, at this distance from the walls. Further, the survival of Gaulish transit dues could be traced from the Domesday record of the right of the churches of the Holy Trinity and St. Austin to collect custom dues from foreign merchants at the entrance to the city.
FORTHCOMING MEETINGS

Fri. 14. King’s College, 4.—"Christian Art: Basils in East and West," Professor P. Deaunier.
King’s College, 5.—"Religion and Morality Distinguished," Professor C. C. J. Webb.
King’s College, 5.30.—"Hegelian’s Concept of Mind, Emotion, Perception and Memory," Professor H. Wildon Carr.
King’s College, 5.30.—"Ecclesiastical Music: Welsh Folk-Songs and Carols," Dr. Mary Davies.
University College, 5.30.—"Roman Religion," Lecture II., Mr. Norman Baynes.
Malacological, 6.
School of Oriental Studies, Finsbury Circus, 6.—"The Development of Modern Educational Institutions in India," Lecture II., Dr. S. Ahmad Khan.
Royal Institution, 9.—"Sidethal on the Evolution of Man," Professor Karl Pearson.

Sat. 15. Royal Institution, 3.—"A Philosophical Synthesis as proposed by Auguste Comte," Dr. Frederic Harrison.

Mon. 17. King’s College, 5.30.—"Outlines of Greek History from the Sixth Century to the Nineteenth Century," Lecture III., Professor A. J. Toynbee.
King’s College, 5.30.—"The Portuguese Language," Professor George Young.
University College, 5.30.—"The British Museum Library," Mr. Arundell Easdale.
Royal Institute of British Architects, 8.—"Two Great Railway Stations of New York," Mr. B. J. Lubschez.
Society of Arts, 8.—"The Decoration and Architecture of Robert Adam and Sir John Soane, 1758-1837," Lecture III., Mr. A. B. Holmsley, (Cantor Lecturer).
Royal Geographical, 8.30.—"The Valleys of Kham," Capt. F. Kingdon Ward.

Bedford College, 4.30.—"The English Lyric before Chaucer," Lecture III., Professor Carleton Brown.
King’s College, 5.30.—"Kant’s Aesthetic Theory," Lecture III., Professor H. Wildon Carr.
Royal Statistical, 5.15.
University College, 5.30.—"Emile Verhaeren," M. E. Cannamaza.

Royal Microscopical, 8.

Thurs. 20. University College, 2.30.—"Recent Discoveries," Professor W. M. Flinders Petrie.
Royal Institution, 3.—"Welsh and Irish Folk-Song," Mr. A. P. Graves.
Royal, 4.30.—"Some Notes on Krypton and Neon," Professor J. N. Collie.
Royal Society of Arts (Indian Section), 4.30.—"Readers and Reading in India," Lord Curzon of Headcorn.
University College, 5.30.—"Greek Science and Modern Science: a Comparison and Contrast," Lecture III., Dr. G. Ganger.
University College, 5.30.—"Geoffrey Parini," Lecture I., Professor Cippico.
School of Oriental Studies, Finsbury Circus, 6.—"The Development of Modern Educational Institutions in India," Lecture III., Dr. S. Ahmad Khan.
tugging at some unpicked idea. Worry! worry! worry! Here is a crowd of old laggers still lingering and sniffing over " the blue period." A vast concourse is scattered about the spot where the nigger's head fell; and of these the strongest have carried off scraps for themselves, which they assimilate at leisure, lying apart; while round the trunk of Cubism is a veritable sea of swaying, struggling, ravenous creatures. The howling is terrific. But Picasso, himself, is already far away, elaborating an idea that came to him one day as he contemplated a drawing by Ingres.

And, besides being extraordinarily inventive, Picasso is what they call "an intellectual artist." Those who suppose that an intellectual artist is one who spends his time on his head mistake. Milton and Mantegna were intellectual artists: it may be doubted whether Caravaggio and Rostand were artists at all. An intellectual artist is one who feels first—a peculiar state of emotion being the point of departure for all works of art—and goes on to think. Obviously, Picasso has a passionate sense of the significance of form; also, he can stand away from his passion and consider it; apparently in this detached mood it is that he works. In art the motive power is heat always; some drive their engines by means of boiling emotion, others by the incandescence of intellectual passion. These go forward by intense concentration on the problem; those swing with breathless precision from feeling to feeling. Sophocles, Massaccio and Bach are intellectually in this sense, while Shakespeare, Correggio and Mozart trust their sensibility almost as a bird trusts its instinct. The artist who tested the head rather than the heart could criticize its own methods; and if Mozart could not write a tune wrong, that was not because he had first tested his idea at every point, but because he was Mozart. Yet no one ever thought of going to a swallow for lessons in aviation; or, rather, Dædalus did, and we all know what came of it.

That is my point. I do not presume to judge between one method of creation and another; I shall not judge between Matisse and Picasso; but I do say that, as a rule, it is the intellectual artist who becomes, in spite of himself, schoolmaster to the rest. And there is a reason for this. By expressing themselves, intellectual artists appeal to us aesthetically; but, in addition, by making, or seeming to make, some statement about the nature of the artistic problem, they set us thinking. We feel sure they have something to say about the very stuff of art which we, clumsily enough, can grasp intellectually. With purely aesthetic qualities the intellect can do nothing; but here, it seems, is something the brain can hold of hold of. Therefore we study them and they become our leaders; which does not make them our greatest artists. Matisse may yet be a better painter than Picasso.

Be that as it may, from Matisse there is little or nothing to be learned, since Matisse relies on his peculiar sensibility to bring him through. If you want to paint like him, feel what he feels, conduct it to the tips of your fingers, thence on to your canvas, and there you are. The counsel is not encouraging. These airy creatures try us too high. Indeed, it sometimes strikes me that even to appreciate them you must have a touch of their sensibility. A critic who is apt to be sensible was complaining the other day that Matisse had only one instrument in his orchestra. There are orchestras in which fifty instruments sound as one. Only it takes a musician to appreciate them. Also, one hears the others talking about "the pretty, tinkley stuff" of Mozart. Those who call the art of Matisse slight must either be insensitive or know little of it. Certainly, Matisse is capable of recording, with an exquisite gesture and not much more, just the smell of something that looked as though it would be good to eat. These are notes. Notes are often slight—I make the critics a present of that. Also of this: it takes a more intense effort of the creative imagination to leave out what Tchechov leaves out of his short stories than to say what Meredith put into his long ones.

In the Plutarchian method there was ever a snare, and I have come near treading in it. The difference between Matisse and Picasso is not to be stated in those sharp antitheses that every journalist loves. Nothing could be more obtuse than to represent one as all feeling and the other all thought. The art of Picasso, as a matter of fact, is perhaps more personal even than that of Matisse, just because his sensibility is perhaps even more curious. Look at a Cubist picture by him amongst other Cubists. Here, if anywhere, amongst these abstractions you would find a surreptitious, small room for idiosyncrasy. Yet at M. Léonce Rosenberg's gallery no amateur fails to spot the Picassos. His choice of colours, the appropriateness of his most astonishing audacities, the disconcerting yet delightful perfection of his taste, the unlooked-for yet positive beauty of his harmonies, make Picasso one of the most personal artists alive.

And if Picasso is anything but a dry doctrinaire, Matisse is no singing bird with one little jet of spontaneous melody. I wish his sculpture were better known in England, for it dispenses finely of the ridiculous notion that Matisse is a temperamen without a head. Amongst his bronze and plastic figures you will find sometimes a sense of something existing of several versions of the same subject, in which the original superabundant conception has been reduced to bare essentials by a process which implies the severest intellectual effort. Nothing that Matisse has done gives a stronger sense of his genius, and, at the same time, makes one so sharply aware of a brilliant intelligence and of erudition even.

Amongst the hundred differences between Matisse and Picasso perhaps, after all, there is but one on which a critic can usefully insist. Even about that he can say little that is definite. Only, it does appear to be true that whereas Matisse is a pure artist, Picasso is an artist and something more—an involuntary preacher if you like. Neither, of course, falls into the habit of puffing out his pictures with literary stuff, though Picasso has, on occasions, allowed to filter into his art a, to me most distasteful, dash of sentimentality. That is not the point, however. The point is that, whereas both create without commenting on life, Picasso, by some inexplicable quality in his statement, does, unmistakably, comment on art. That is why he, and not Matisse, is master of the modern movement.

Clive Bell.

DECORATIONS FOR THE LEEDS TOWN HALL

We understand that Professor Sir Michael Sadler has submitted to the Leeds City Council a scheme for the decoration of the Victoria Hall of the Leeds Town Hall, and that the scheme has been approved in principle. Professor W. Rothenstein has been entrusted by Sir Michael Sadler with the task of selecting artists and approving preliminary designs. Professor Rothenstein has invited Messrs. Paul and John Nash, Stanley Spencer, Albert Rutherston, Jacob Kramer and Edward Wadsworth to prepare sketches for panels, symbolizing the local industries and the character of the surrounding landscape, for eventual submission to the City Council, who will then, it seems, appeal to private donors for the necessary subscriptions. We trust that donors will not be found wanting when such an opportunity occurs of securing permanent decorations by a group of talented artists.
EXHIBITIONS OF THE WEEK

MANSARD GALLERY.—The London Group.

GOUPI Gallery.—Spells of Russia, by Nicolas Roerich.

McLEAN'S GALLERY.—Paintings by Master Students.

THE LONDON GROUP'S EXHIBITION comes as a welcome refreshment between two visits to the Royal Academy. There is, we admit, a certain monotony in the endless still-life studies of apples and pink tulips and the endless Sickertesque glimpses of circus and music-hall. But the monotony is supported, given substance, as it were, by much genuine preoccupation with the problems of pictorial composition and it is a pleasure to follow the development of the painters who exhibit with this interesting group.

Any student or amateur of the arts who is still vague as to what the so-called modern movement in painting is all about could not do better than examine Mr. Bombberg's "Studio" (45), which is an elementary demonstration of the fundamental principle of the movement. The picture is made up of the lower part of an easel, a few floor-boards, a mat and half a window; but these things are not the subject of the picture. The subject is the relation of the lines and planes and recessions formed by this particular arrangement of the objects. Other objects in the same shape and depth make the same picture, but an even slightly different arrangement of the same objects would create an entirely different picture, because their mutual relations in space would be changed. The student will not find Mr. Bombberg's other exhibits so helpful, first because they are not so specifically abstract in intention, and secondly, because they are relatively unsuccessful attempts at compromise.

Much, however, might be learned from the work of a newcomer, Miss Cicely Stock, whose "Saw Mill" (27) is, in our view, the most notable picture in the exhibition. Here the eye travels over the component parts into a remote recession. The appeal as a whole is essentially aesthetic, like the appeal of Mr. Bombberg's "Studio," but the objects which form the component parts of Miss Stock's picture are much more varied in shape and volume and relation, and the appeal is, therefore, at once more complex and more impossible to describe in words. "Saw Mill" has one or two incompletely expressed passages, and suffers from a slight tendency to wooliness (also evident in Miss Stock's drawing, 91), but it is more satisfying than most of the pictures here because it is constructed with a consistent intention to achieve an aesthetic appeal and is eminently plastic in composition.

It is more satisfying, for example, than Mr. C. K. W. Nevinson's "La Grenouille" (19), although more interesting than most of Mr. Nevinson's exhibits at his recent exhibition, is a mixture of several points of view. It can be analysed into a decorative motif of star-shaped palm trees imposed upon a naturalistic painting of a bay, with some rather tipsy Cubistic houses scattered in between. Doremus, however, has never strayed far from the main line of compromise which it reveals, especially as they will have to admit that Mr. Nevinson's eclectic talent has somehow jockeyed the picture into effectiveness. Miss Stock's picture is also more satisfying than the exhibits of Mr. Scabrooke and Mr. Baynes, because Mr. Scabrooke's "Jay" (48), though attractive, is not more than decorative in intention and result, and Mr. Baynes' "Tulips" (14) is marred by the heavy diagonal of the window-sash, which destroys the structure of an otherwise delicately composed series of form relations.

Guiding our imaginary student round the exhibition, we have tried to keep the issues as simple as possible, and have, therefore, postponed appreciation of a number of quite individual artists. The brothers Nash, for example, once more delight us with evidence of their subtle sensibilities. Mr. Mark Gertler continues with commendable concentration his search for a conventional formula of expression. He has more and more clearly abandoned any conflict with the presentation of the human figure, but he has not yet attacked the problem in its larger application to the whole world of visible things, and he is comparatively uninterested in abstract pictorial composition. The same is largely true of Mr. Meninsky, an able draughtsman of the John school, whose drawings have in them little that is truly suggestive of the "jazz" impulse. He forgets that the material which will see him through a small drawing is apt to prove insufficient for a large oil painting. He calls in the help of pretty colours, pink and green and blue; but the artifice is too evident. The picture, which is not created de novo, remains palpably an enlargement from a drawing, and often a quite lifeless enlargement. Then there is Miss Nina Hannett, who has a remarkable eye for silhouette and a stylistic facility of touch, and Mr. Ethelbert White, who weaves intriguing and intricate tapestries in his drawings and which is less successful than his study of a Gainsborough decoration. Neither Mr. Duncan Grant nor Mrs. Vanessa Bell is represented, but expressionism is upheld by Mr. Roger Fry in a characteristic flower piece. Finally, we must signal Mr. E. M. O'R. Dickey's "Power-Station" (85), a solid piece of naturalistic painting seen through a haze of purple and green, which is less successful than his study of a Gainsborough decoration. We are unable to find either confirmation or negation of our concept in Mr. Roerich's pictures, because they fail in the first place to convince us as works of art. They excite a mild interest as decorations executed in harmonies which are strange and happen to be repellent to our local taste, but we are no more inclined to believe that they represent the Russian spirit than to believe that a mandarin's coat represents the soul of China.

The French pictures now collected at Messrs. McLean's Galleries are more interesting than any works recently shown there. It is instructive to see once more characteristic pieces by Bouguereau, Fantin-Latour, Fantin, and Fantin-Latour. Fantin in "Tannhäuser at the Venusberg," here shown, attacked the same problems which subsequently attracted Cézanne, and which had previously attracted Eddy in "Youth on the Prow and Pleasure at the Helm." And Fantin's relative failure is not without its message to contemporary students.

R. H. W.

RECENT ADDITIONS TO THE VICTORIA AND ALBERT MUSEUM

As an exhibition of recent acquisitions, by gift and purchase, to the Department of Engraving, Illustration and Design, has been arranged in Room 132 of the Victoria and Albert Museum. The exhibits include a group of Old Master drawings, notably those by Perino del Vaga, Primaticcio and Perugino, together with some important ceiling designs by Sir E. A. Poynter. Modern draughtsmanship and design is well represented by a series of original studies by Mr. Frank Brangwyn, R.A., for his painted decorations in the Great Hall of the Skinners' Company, and by a collection of drawings by Sir E. J. Poynter. The Poynter drawings range from sketches for details of the Museum Grill Room, the Ashanti war medal and other decorative work, to figure studies for well-known paintings, such as "Israel in Egypt" and "The Catapult." Several water-colour and pencil drawings by Samuel Palmer are exhibited, together with a fine series of his etchings, chiefly the gift of the late Mrs. J. Merrick Head of Bath, at one time an intimate friend of the artist. Among them of kindred interest is shown in a first proof of Edward Calvert's "The Ploughman," which Calvert gave to Palmer in the early days of their friendship, when both were young and ardent disciples of Blake. Of special interest are some designs for Norwich printed fabrics made in the early part of last century. In their combination of black and purple, and use of "jazz" patterns, they strike a curiously modern note.
Music

THE VIRTUOSO VIOLINIST

LAST week Mr. Lamond drew a full house to the Queen's Hall to hear him play five of the most abstruse sonatas of Beethoven. It was not a demonstrative audience, but it was a closely attentive one. Nobody would ever describe Mr. Lamond as "the sensational middle-aged pianist." He gave up being a child prodigy long ago, and he is still a long way off the age when decrepitude brings real popularity. He is not at the time of life for being sensational, even if he wished to be thought so. He is merely a great artist who interprets the greatest of music with modest dignity and dignified simplicity. By no other means has he attained that honourable position which the musical public has accorded him.

